This has been accomplished without compromise. It is not enough that Dr. Koussevitsky has brought the orchestra to a tonal richness, a brilliance of virtuosity, and a warmth of response quite beyond compare. He looks always to a more complete capturing of beauty. To a great artist in the fullness of his day, his art is always an adventure, a new testing.

MUSICAL AMERICA
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAR 10 1945

Koussevitzky Suggests Taxes for Music Support

AN addition of 50 cents a year to each individual's income tax for the purpose of state-supported music has been suggested by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony. Such a plan has been working successfully for some years in Mr. Koussevitzky's native Russia and he feels that it should work here as well.

"There are about 3,500,000 taxpayers in New England," said the conductor. "If each were to add half a dollar to his state income tax bill we could have several symphony orchestras as well as operas, chamber music and conservatories (state-supported)".

"A project like that also would give jobs to musicians returning from the fighting fronts."

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
MAR 3 - 1945

AMONG the recent offerings of new symphonic music was "The Feast During the Plague," composed by Arthur Vincent Lourié and introduced here by the Boston Symphony under the knowing guidance of Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Lourié'[redacted], derived from one of his ballets, is well written and the movements start promisingly, but the net result isn't particularly striking. In addition, the Philharmonic-Symphony and Artur Rodzinski lately delivered the première of Paul Creston's second symphony. It is pleasant music, though not as interesting as Mr. Creston's first symphony, which won the New York Music Critics' Circle award two years ago. Mr. Creston handled his material adroitly, but I'm afraid that the basic thematic substance is not rich enough. Another Philharmonic-Symphony first-timer was Virgil Thomson's "Symphony on a Hymn Tune," for which Mr. Thomson appeared as conductor. This symphony was composed in the twenties and somewhat revised last year. It is musicianly and ingenious but rather jumpy, and not so appealing and effective as many of Mr. Thomson's other works. The soloist at this concert was Wanda Landowska, who, to no one's surprise, contributed superlative performances in a Mozart piano concerto and Haydn concerto for harpsichord. —ROBERT A. SIMON

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
MAR 9 1945

First Boston Symphony Recording in 5 Years

NEW YORK, March 8 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, has just [redacted] first recording in nearly five years. The work, a five-record album of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," with William Primrose as violist, will be released by Victor in April.

It's the first complete recording of the Harold anywhere, and the first time the work has appeared on American discs. It is the first new Victor recording to be released since the Petrillo ban was lifted.

RED CROSS WAR FUND SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston's Greatest Musical Event — The Climax of the War Fund Drive

Beethoven's
NINTH SYMPHONY
in the
BOSTON GARDEN
SUNDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 8 at 3:30

Boston Symphony Orchestra
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor
Assisted by
THE HARVARD GLEE CLUB
and
RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY
(G. WALLACE WOODWORTH, Conductor)

SOLOISTS
(Metropolitan Opera Company)
ELEANOR STEBER, Soprano
KERSTIN THORBORG, Contralto
KURT BAUM, Tenor
NORMAN CORDON, Bass

The 400 performers participating have offered their services

Tickets — NOW — at leading stores
Admission $2, $3, $5, $7.50, and $10 (Tax included)
Auspices, Retail Trade Board of Boston

Herald Mar. 10

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 19th program of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Georges Mager, trumpet, and Louis Speyer, English horn, were soloists. The program was as follows:

"Quiet City"	Copland
Symphony No. 3	Hanson
"Siegfried Idyll"	Wagner
'La Valse'	Ravel

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Yesterday's concert, perhaps one of the most nondescript in many seasons, must be considered something of a mishap. It just didn't go right except as performance, and even an especially brilliant and sensitive performance of Ravel's "La Valse" hardly sufficed to save the day.

Copland's "Quiet City," with which the program began, is good, evocative music and all that, but there are so many, many other pieces so much better and so much more deserving of hearing which consume the same general span of time, you can't help but be disappointed, especially when, as was the case, one of the leading parts was so insecurely done. The Hanson Third Symphony, which for some inexplicable reason appeared again on the program, sounds (it seems to me) as if the composer were trying to remember how a Sibelius Symphony he had heard many years ago sounded but recollected instead a movie score intended to accompany scenes of Errol Flynn as an Arapahoe Indian in a buffalo hunt during which there were a suitable number of tender love scenes under the cottonwood trees, the whole taking place, oddly enough, in central Sweden.

After all this there was Wagner's very beautiful and tender Siegfried Idyll, a piece offered nowadays at least every fortnight on the radio and so hardly worth going to a concert hall to hear any more. It was exquisitely played, of course, although in a much slower tempo than is seemly, and it was certainly good to hear after its predecessors. At last came Ravel's strange and turbulent waltz apotheosis and here, for the first time, the afternoon came alive. It found both conductor and orchestra in topmost form, and seldom, indeed, has Dr Koussevitzky displayed his enormous rhythmic feeling for this anguished remembrance of a Vienna that even in Ravel's day was no more. The performance brought a storm of applause and sent everybody home in a reasonably happy frame of mind. The orchestra makes its final out-of-town visits next weeek, returning to play Mahler's Fourth Symphony and Paul Creston's Second Symphony under Richard Burgin on March 23 and 24.

Two Recent American Works Revived by Dr. Koussevitzky

(Monitor Mar. 8

By L. A. Sloper

Complaint is often heard that the American composer doesn't get a fair deal from the conductors; not because they don't play his works, but because they play them once and then forget them. It is true that a new work needs to be heard more than once, if the public is expected to return a just verdict on it. Dr. Koussevitzky, however, is not placed upon the defensive by these complaints. He not only submits many new works, American and foreign, but he sometimes repeats them quite promptly, if he thinks the audience has not appreciated them properly at a first hearing.

Whether for this reason or for another, he did so in the season of 1939-40 with Howard Hanson's Third Symphony, and in the calendar year of 1941 with Aaron Copland's "Quiet City." Dr. Hanson had directed the first performance of his symphony, and had left the impression that here was perhaps his most important contribution to symphonic literature. Dr. Koussevitzky is playing both works again at this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It cannot be said that the repetitions yesterday afternoon made either composition seem more significant than it had appeared on its earlier hearings. As for the Copland, it was again evident that the music needed the play for which it was written; the fact that Mr. Mager had trouble with the very difficult and very important solo trumpet part may have made the need seem greater.

Dr. Hanson's Third Symphony, surprisingly enough, had sounded better under the composer's baton than under that of our regular conductor. That's something that doesn't often happen. Yesterday the reason became clear: Dr. Kousevitzky was over-interpreting the work.

The piece itself is a belated echo of the romantic school, competent but uninspired, banal in material and epigonous in treatment. Dr. Koussevitzky's intense reading exposed its weaknesses. The lamentation and the brooding were exaggerated and even the slow movement was feverish, rather than tranquil. Where Dr. Hanson had exercised moderation Dr. Koussevitzky indulged a Slavic passion. Only the Scherzo, with its amusing kettledrum part, retained its effectiveness.

For the rest, the program listed Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Ravel's "La Valse." Not a very stimulating aggregation.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

There were those who found yesterday's Symphony Concert soothing. Taken as a whole, it was certainly not designed for those who want music to quicken their pulse. It began with Copland's "Quiet City" and continued with Hanson's Third Symphony, three of whose movements are in slow tempo. After the intermission came Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl," hardly a heady piece, and there was something curiously inert about yesterday's performance. To be sure, there was a turn for the livelier in the last number, Ravel's "La Valse,' but Dr. Koussevitzky prefers to emphasize the sensuous aspects of this music rather than its rhythmic qualities—at least until the end, when he goes to the other extreme and turns it into a tonal orgy.

Both American pieces are receiving their third local performances at the current pair of concerts. Mr. Copland's made the more favorable impression at the outset and it wears distinctly better than the Hanson Symphony, although to tell the truth, there is not much to it. There is mood and atmosphere. There are agreeable sonorities. There is a distinguished if rather reticent musical speech and expert writing for the chosen medium: trumpet, English horn and strings. The solo players yesterday, as before, were Georges Mager and Louis Speyer and both were warmly applauded.

The obvious derivation of Hanson's Symphony from those of Sibelius has been widely commented on but the Finn manages to get a great deal more contrast into his scores than his American disciple has put into this one. If we except the third movement, marked "Tempo scherzando," the Symphony seems all of a piece. The kettledrums are thumped ominously and monotonously; the essentially simple harmonies are solemnly proclaimed by the brass choir. Mr. Hanson would pay tribute to the "epic qualities" of his Swedish forebears, who founded a settlement on the Delaware in the early 17th century, and he makes us realize that their life was hardly a giddy round of excitement.

GUEST CONDUCTING

~~Feb~~ By VIRGIL THOMSON March 7

THE symphony orchestra is a standardized institution all over the world. Its players, its conductors, its programs are all interchangeable. Any part from any machine can be fitted into its place in any other machine without any interruption of that machine's efficiency. Guest conducting is the proof of my statement. Any schooled conductor can replace another as easily as a Catholic priest from anywhere can sing mass in any church of Christendom or any surgeon operate in any hospital. The sacraments do not suffer from guest clergymen; but the parish work, if there are too many of these, does. And that is the whole story of guest conductors. A little change is good for everybody; visiting and receiving is a civilized custom. But the family fails of its function in civilization when it tries to act like a boarding house, because, though housekeeping benefits from standardization, human beings do not.

* * *

Duties of the Host

THE Philharmonic learned a lesson, we hope, several years back, when a constant parade of guest conductors, none of them responsible for keeping the machine going or for carrying out a musical policy appropriate to the local circumstances, came very near to wrecking the machine. Under Artur Rodzinski the machine has been repaired, and a beginning has been made toward making its functioning a part of New York's intellectual life. And a just proportion of guest conductors has been established, eight weeks out of thirty-two being just enough to keep the resident director all nicely rested up and fresh and quite enough to give the players and the customers a little variety. Philadelphia observes about the same proportion. Boston is skimpier, and its efficiency is beginning to suffer. Their playing is no less exact than it was; on the contrary, it resembles more and more a well running clock. But their music making needs the humanizing influence of variety in the leadership. The N. B. C. suffers from insufficient communion with its chief conductor, a communion that is badly spaced not only throughout the season but within any given week as well, since the orchestra works as a unit only week ends.

* * *

The Recording Guest

GUEST appearances facilitate recording, too, make it possible for great leaders to record in foreign countries. No symphonic work is put out on discs any more, at least not in America, that cannot be recorded without rehearsal, because the standard union wage for this work, as is only just in view of this work's larger dissemination, is, per man, about three times the price of a concert rehearsal. It is always arranged, therefor, to record works the men know or that are fresh in their minds from recent performance. Pieces are put on programs very often for no other reason than to get them ready for recording more cheaply than could be done otherwise. And guest appearances of famous conductors with famous orchestras are arranged (through the interlocking directorate) in order that unusual executions may be prepared for the gramophone trade.

This practise is in no way abusive, except possibly toward the executant musicians; and even that is doubtful, since the American Federation of Musicians tolerates it, adjusting its standard recording fee, no doubt, in compensation. It is not abusive to the public, either, because to degrade the standard of orchestral programs would be killing the golden goose. It just isn't done. It tends rather to salt up the programs, in fact, since conductors introduce on these occasions many novelties too advanced for present recording policy (which is conservative) in order to conceal the presence of certain overfamiliar standard works. And it offers the subscribers many a hearing of great interpreters that the local conductor might not voluntarily expose to them.

* * *

The Composer Guest

GUEST appearances of composers in their own works are more troublesome, from the simple fact that all composers do not necessarily conduct well. Mendelssohn, Wagner, Strauss and Mahler were virtuoso conductors. Berlioz, Brahms and Saint-Saens could lead their own works quite effectively. Beethoven could sort of get through his. Schubert and Schumann and Debussy and Ravel mostly didn't even try, though they did occasionally perform a piano piece. Schoenberg doesn't conduct either, but Stravinsky and Chavez do. Legend wishes it that all composers conduct their own works badly, and there is truth there. Even Strauss is said to have made his own pieces sound a little tame. Certainly no composer, no matter how skillful he may be with a baton, is going to work himself into a public passion in front of his own music. Always the author's rendering is a sober one.

In the long life of a piece, other hands are where it really belongs. That is the way it becomes all things to all men. But a composer's reading, if it is reasonably expert, is always a priveleged communication. The public understands it that way and forgives a little stiffness. Timid, tenuous, lacking in warmth and profoundly embarrassed, it is still the culprit's personal confession. No detective can ever completely reconstruct the crime without it. And no jury can ever from outside evidence alone correctly determine the facts, let alone assess fairly the blame and the extenuating circumstances.

* * *

The Foreign Expert

GUEST conducting helps us to understand national styles, too. No musician is an ideal stock company, perfect in every play. Always he is more at home in certain regions of repertory than in others. Everybody conducts Debussy more or less well; but only the French do it right, because the way they do it, their standard way of doing it, is by definition right. The same is true of Mahler and the Viennese musicians, of Spanish music and the Spaniards, and profoundly so with regard to American music of all categories. This generalization does not apply to real classics, to music so old that no person living ever knew anybody who knew what it sounded like before it became a classic. We do not buy much Beethoven from the Germans any more; we buy it from Beecham and Monteux and Toscanini. Mozart we buy wherever we find it good, rarely nowadays from the Viennese. Bach and Handel and Haydn and Schubert and Schumann are every nation's property. But it is a great pleasure to hear a Frenchman do modern French works, a Viennese modern Austrian, Leonard Bernstein anything written in the U. S. A.

* * *

The Good Houseparty

PEOPLE who have houses of their own are considerate house guests. People who don't are brilliant ones. People who are creative artists in their own right are often difficult to handle; you never know what they are going to do. But their acquaintance is a privelege for all, and they are invited everywhere. One of the pleasantest of guests is the foreigner who is accustomed to travel, who knows the ways of the world, including our ways, and who has been recently enough in contact with his country to bring us all up to date concerning it and to correct the distortions that invariably creep into even the most informed outsider's viewpoint regarding it. All these guests are delightful provided there is a real host, a man whose house it is and who runs it. If he doesn't run it it isn't run, and people cease to enjoy living or visiting in it. If he runs it as just his own show it gets to be a bore, and so does he. Nobody wants to hear Papa talk all the time.

RED CROSS WAR FUND SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston's Greatest Musical Event — The Climax of the War Fund Drive

Beethoven's

NINTH SYMPHONY

in the

BOSTON GARDEN

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 8 at 3:30

Boston Symphony Orchestra

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Assisted by

THE HARVARD GLEE CLUB

and

RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY

(G. WALLACE WOODWORTH, Conductor)

SOLOISTS
(Metropolitan Opera Company)
ELEANOR STEBER, Soprano
KERSTIN THORBORG, Contralto
KURT BAUM, Tenor
NORMAN CORDON, Bass

The 400 performers participating have offered their services

Tickets — NOW — at leading stores
Admission $2, $3, $5, $7.50, and $10 (Tax included)
Auspices, Retail Trade Board of Boston

Herald Mar. 10

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 19th program of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Georges Mager, trumpet, and Louis Speyer, English horn, were soloists. The program was as follows:

"Quiet City" .... Copland
Symphony No. 3 .... Hanson
"Siegfried Idyll" .... Wagner
"La Valse" .... Ravel

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Yesterday's concert, perhaps one of the most nondescript in many seasons, must be considered something of a mishap. It just didn't go right except as performance, and even an especially brilliant and sensitive performance of Ravel's "La Valse" hardly sufficed to save the day.

Copland's "Quiet City," with which the program began, is good, evocative music and all that, but there are so many, many other pieces so much better and so much more deserving of hearing which consume the same general span of time, you can't help but be disappointed, especially when, as was the case, one of the leading parts was so insecurely done. The Hanson Third Symphony, which for some inexplicable reason appeared again on the program, sounds (it seems to me) as if the composer were trying to remember how a Sibelius Symphony he had heard many years ago sounded but recollected instead a movie score intended to accompany scenes of Errol Flynn as an Arapahoe Indian in a buffalo hunt during which there were a suitable number of tender love scenes under the cottonwood trees, the whole taking place, oddly enough, in central Sweden.

After all this there was Wagner's very beautiful and tender Siegfried Idyll, a piece offered nowadays at least every fortnight on the radio and so hardly worth going to a concert hall to hear any more. It was exquisitely played, of course, although in a much slower tempo than is seemly, and it was certainly good to hear after its predecessors. At last came Ravel's strange and turbulent waltz apotheosis and here, for the first time, the afternoon came alive. It found both conductor and orchestra in topmost form, and seldom, indeed, has Dr. Koussevitzky displayed his enormous rhythmic feeling for this anguished remembrance of a Vienna that even in Ravel's day was no more. The performance brought a storm of applause and sent everybody home in a reasonably happy frame of mind. The orchestra makes its final out-of-town visits next weeek, returning to play Mahler's Fourth Symphony and Paul Creston's Second Symphony under Richard Burgin on March

---

Two Recent American Works Revived by Dr. Koussevitzky

(Monitor Mar. 8

By L. A. Sloper

Complaint is often heard that the American composer doesn't get a fair deal from the conductors; not because they don't play his works, but because they play them once and then forget them. It is true that a new work needs to be heard more than once, if the public is expected to return a just verdict on it. Dr. Koussevitzky, however, is not placed upon the defensive by these complaints. He not only submits many new works, American and foreign, but he sometimes repeats them quite promptly, if he thinks the audience has not appreciated them properly at a first hearing.

Whether for this reason or for another, he did so in the season of 1939-40 with Howard Hanson's Third Symphony, and in the calendar year of 1941 with Aaron Copland's "Quiet City." Dr. Hanson had directed the first performance of his symphony, and had left the impression that here was perhaps his most important contribution to symphonic literature. Dr. Koussevitzky is playing both works again at this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It cannot be said that the repetitions yesterday afternoon made either composition seem more significant than it had appeared on its earlier hearings. As for the Copland, it was again evident that the music needed the play for which it was written; the fact that Mr. Mager had trouble with the very difficult and very important solo trumpet part may have made the need seem greater.

Dr. Hanson's Third Symphony, surprisingly enough, had sounded better under the composer's baton than under that of our regular conductor. That's something that doesn't often happen. Yesterday the reason became clear: Dr. Koussevitzky was over-interpreting the work.

The piece itself is a belated echo of the romantic school, competent but uninspired, banal in material and epigonous in treatment. Dr. Koussevitzky's intense reading exposed its weaknesses. The lamentation and the brooding were exaggerated and even the slow movement was feverish, rather than tranquil. Where Dr. Hanson had exercised moderation Dr. Koussevitzky indulged a Slavic passion. Only the Scherzo, with its amusing kettledrum part, retained its effectiveness.

For the rest, the program listed Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Ravel's "La Valse." Not a very stim-

---

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Post

There were those who found yesterday's Symphony Concert soothing. Taken as a whole, it was certainly not designed for those who want music to quicken their pulse. It began with Copland's "Quiet City" and continued with Hanson's Third Symphony, three of whose movements are in slow tempo. After the intermission came Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl," hardly a heady piece, and there was something curiously inert about yesterday's performance. To be sure, there was a turn for the liveller in the last number, Ravel's "La Valse,' but Dr. Koussevitzky prefers to emphasize the sensuous aspects of this music rather than its rhythmic qualities—at least until the end, when he goes to the other extreme and turns it into a tonal orgy.

Both American pieces are receiving their third local performances at the current pair of concerts. Mr. Copland's made the more favorable impression at the outset and it wears distinctly better than the Hanson Symphony, although to tell the truth, there is not much to it. There is mood and atmosphere. There are agreeable sonorities. There is a distinguished if rather reticent musical speech and expert writing for the chosen medium: trumpet, English horn and strings. The solo players yesterday, as before, were Georges Mager and Louis Speyer and both were warmly applauded.

The obvious derivation of Hanson's Symphony from those of Sibelius has been widely commented on but the Finn manages to get a great deal more contrast into his scores than his American disciple has put into this one. If we except the third movement, marked "Tempo scherzando," the Symphony seems all of a piece. The kettledrums are thumped ominously and monotonously; the essentially simple harmonies are solemnly proclaimed by the brass choir. Mr. Hanson would pay tribute to the "epic qualities" of his Swedish forebears, who founded a settlement on the Delaware in the early 17th century, and he makes us realise that their life was hardly a giddy round of excitement.

GUEST CONDUCTING

By VIRGIL THOMSON March 7

THE symphony orchestra is a standardized institution all over the world. Its players, its conductors, its programs are all interchangeable. Any part from any machine can be fitted into its place in any other machine without any interruption of that machine's efficiency. Guest conducting is the proof of my statement. Any schooled conductor can replace another as easily as a Catholic priest from anywhere can sing mass in any church of Christendom or any surgeon operate in any hospital. The sacraments do not suffer from guest clergymen; but the parish work, if there are too many of these, does. And that is the whole story of guest conductors. A little change is good for everybody; visiting and receiving is a civilized custom. But the family fails of its function in civilization when it tries to act like a boarding house, because, though housekeeping benefits from standardization, human beings do not.

• • •

Duties of the Host

THE Philharmonic learned a lesson, we hope, several years back, when a constant parade of guest conductors, none of them responsible for keeping the machine going or for carrying out a musical policy appropriate to the local circumstances, came very near to wrecking the machine. Under Artur Rodzinski the machine has been repaired, and a beginning has been made toward making its functioning a part of New York's intellectual life. And a just proportion of guest conductors has been established, eight weeks out of thirty-two being just enough to keep the resident director all nicely rested up and fresh and quite enough to give the players and the customers a little variety. Philadelphia observes about the same proportion. Boston is skimpier, and its efficiency is beginning to suffer. Their playing is no less exact than it was; on the contrary, it resembles more and more a well running clock. But their music making needs the humanizing influence of variety in the leadership. The N. B. C. suffers from insufficient communion with its chief conductor, a communion that is badly spaced not only throughout the season but within any given week as well, since the orchestra works as a unit only week ends.

• • •

The Recording Guest

GUEST appearances facilitate recording, too, make it possible for great leaders to record in foreign countries. No symphonic work is put out on discs any more, at least not in America, that cannot be recorded without rehearsal, because the standard union wage for this work, as is only just in view of this work's larger dissemination, is, per man, about three times the price of a concert rehearsal. It is always arranged, therefor, to record works the men know or that are fresh in their minds from recent performance. Pieces are put on programs very often for no other reason than to get them ready for recording more cheaply than could be done otherwise. And guest appearances of famous conductors with famous orchestras are arranged (through the interlocking directorate) in order that unusual executions may be prepared for the gramophone trade.

This practise is in no way abusive, except possibly toward the executant musicians; and even that is doubtful, since the American Federation of Musicians tolerates it, adjusting its standard recording fee, no doubt, in compensation. It is not abusive to the public, either, because to degrade the standard of orchestral programs would be killing the golden goose. It just isn't done. It tends rather to salt up the programs, in fact, since conductors introduce on these occasions many novelties too advanced for present recording policy (which is conservative) in order to conceal the presence of certain overfamiliar standard works. And it offers the subscribers many a hearing of great interpreters that the local conductor might not voluntarily expose to them.

• • •

The Composer Guest

GUEST appearances of composers in their own works are more troublesome, from the simple fact that all composers do not necessarily conduct well. Mendelssohn, Wagner, Strauss and Mahler were virtuoso conductors. Berlioz, Brahms and Saint-Saens could lead their own works quite effectively. Beethoven could sort of get through his. Schubert and Schumann and Debussy and Ravel mostly didn't even try, though they did occasionally perform a piano piece. Schoenberg doesn't conduct either, but Stravinsky and Chavez do. Legend wishes it that all composers conduct their own works badly, and there is truth there. Even Strauss is said to have made his own pieces sound a little tame. Certainly no composer, no matter how skillful he may be with a baton, is going to work himself into a public passion in front of his own music. Always the author's rendering is a sober one.

In the long life of a piece, other hands are where it really belongs. That is the way it becomes all things to all men. But a composer's reading, if it is reasonably expert, is always a priveleged communication. The public understands it that way and forgives a little stiffness. Timid, tenuous, lacking in warmth and profoundly embarrassed, it is still the culprit's personal confession. No detective can ever completely reconstruct the crime without it. And no jury can ever from outside evidence alone correctly determine the facts, let alone assess fairly the blame and the extenuating circumstances.

• • •

The Foreign Expert

GUEST conducting helps us to understand national styles, too. No musician is an ideal stock company, perfect in every play. Always he is more at home in certain regions of repertory than in others. Everybody conducts Debussy more or less well; but only the French do it right, because the way they do it, their standard way of doing it, is by definition right. The same is true of Mahler and the Viennese musicians, of Spanish music and the Spaniards, and profoundly so with regard to American music of all categories. This generalization does not apply to real classics, to music so old that no person living ever knew anybody who knew what it sounded like before it became a classic. We do not buy much Beethoven from the Germans any more; we buy it from Beecham and Monteux and Toscanini. Mozart we buy wherever we find it good, rarely nowadays from the Viennese. Bach and Handel and Haydn and Schubert and Schumann are every nation's property. But it is a great pleasure to hear a Frenchman do modern French works, a Viennese modern Austrian, Leonard Bernstein anything written in the U. S. A.

• • •

The Good Houseparty

PEOPLE who have houses of their own are considerate house guests. People who don't are brilliant ones. People who are creative artists in their own right are often difficult to handle; you never know what they are going to do. But their acquaintance is a privelege for all, and they are invited everywhere. One of the pleasantest of guests is the foreigner who is accustomed to travel, who knows the ways of the world, including our ways, and who has been recently enough in contact with his country to bring us all up to date concerning it and to correct the distortions that invariably creep into even the most informed outsider's viewpoint regarding it. All these guests are delightful provided there is a real host, a man whose house it is and who runs it. If he doesn't run it it isn't run, and people cease to enjoy living or visiting in it. If he runs it as just his own show it gets to be a bore, and so does he. Nobody wants to hear Papa talk all the time.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

3400 at Auditorium Hear Boston Symphony

By RAYMOND MORIN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its associate conductor Richard Burgin, last night brought the current Civic Music Series to a close before an Auditorium audience of 3400. The soloist was Ruth Posselt, violinist.

Those who still find it possible to feast to their satisfaction upon the music of the Boston Symphony in its Boston home with Dr. Koussevitsky at the helm were probably soon reconciled to his absence. In the estimation of many, Koussevitsky and the orchestra are inseparable. We are told that he is conducting very few out-of-Boston engagements this season because of his health.

Sound Musical Judgment

There is no reason to underestimate the musicianship of Mr. Burgin's style. Whether or not the orchestra sounds as well under his baton is quite another matter. The quality which stands out most vividly in Mr. Burgin's technic is the soundness of his musical judgments. On the other hand he is more demonstrative in some of his directions than would seem warranted by the phrase in process. Whereas this was apparent in some of the Beethoven "Leonore" overture, it was less obvious in the dramatic "Don Quixote."

But there is no necessity for further postponing comment upon the brilliant playing of Ruth Posselt (we assume that everyone knows that she is Mrs. Richard Burgin). In all of her Worcester appearances Miss Posselt has clearly revealed her extensive technical resources. The deep conviction of her playing remains unalterable and places her among the great violinists of the day, not excluding the men from the roster.

'Spanish Symphony'

The Lalo "Spanish Symphony" which she played has become too familiar to Worcester audiences to require explanatory notes in a review. Under Miss Posselt's sturdy bow it became exciting music. Compared to the magnificent performances we have heard her give of the Barber and Tschaikowsky concertos we cannot identify last night's playing as her best. Apart from a slightly nervous rhythm in the final movement her technical performance was superb and that is saying a great deal, for the Lalo work touches upon most of the foils of the strings and bow. The warm, sympathetic tone of the "Andante" was memorable. We anticipate with pleasure Miss Posselt's solo recital at the Art Museum on Sunday.

The Beethoven overture and Strauss tone-poem are at opposite ends of the stream interpretively. There is not the directness of expression in the "Leonore" overture that you will find in a corresponding opus of Von Weber for example. Mr. Burgin placed great emphasis upon sharp contrasts of speed and tone which is instrumentally rewarding (with such resources as the Boston orchestra) but of some expense to the continuity. Nevertheless is was playing and conducting of great finesse.

'Don Quixote'

Whether or not the "Don Quixote" score was the ideal close for the Civic series has probably inspired debate. We prefer to discuss it merely for its inherent value. Last night it was made highly significant by the 'cello solos of Jean Bedetti and violist Jean Lefranc. Bedetti was as usual dramatic and always vivid. His solo passages belong to the classification of "concerto" playing. There is fervor without affectation in his reading of this superbly dialogued score. In fact, the "Don Quixote" theme virtually came to life.

The auditor who hasn't taken the precaution to read his program notes is apt to be nonplussed by his music, for the symphony orchestra isn't frequently called upon to imitate bleating sheep or screaming winds. But its narrative qualities are too obvious to possibly escape observation. The Boston orchestra unraveled Strauss' obstacles effortless. The 10 variations were beautifully associated and Mr. Burgin's conceptions were lucid and skillfully followed.

Mar. 10 Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Everything at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this week is more or less familiar. The program conducted by Serge Koussevitsky assembles "Quiet City," by Aaron Copland; the Third or "Sibelius" Symphony by Howard Hanson; Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyll" and "La Valse" by Ravel.

The last-named is by all odds the most exciting, with Ravels enormous orchestra whipped into a three-time frenzy by Mr. Koussevitsky. Though the work comes last on a long program, it finds the conductor undiminished and unsparing in his energy. "La Valse," in a way, is a Koussevitsky specialty. No other conductor I have heard perform it manages the same combination of glowing sonorities, waltz abandon and an underlying irony which leers and mocks through the quasi-Viennese tunes.

Once again Mr. Speyer and Mr. Mager took, respectively, the English horn and trumpet solos in "Quiet City." The trumpet part must be fiendishly difficult. If yesterday there were a few burbled notes, they did not detract measurably from Mr. Mager's prevailing virtuosity.

"Quiet City" wears comparatively well. Though a touch pretentious, it does convey the mood of a vast, quiescent metropolis. In this score Mr. Copland wrote with a spareness of texture and a descriptive—emotional, if you will—directness that sets and sustains his desired mood.

If Howard Hanson's First Symphony is called "Nordic," and his Second "Romantic," his Third certainly must best termed "Sibelius." From start to finish, in all four of its movements, there are echoes of the Finnish composer. Sometimes they are reminiscences, sometimes orchestral detail, sometimes rhythmic patterns. But there is no mistaking the Sibelian influence.

Mr. Koussevitzky evidently has great faith in the work, since he has repeated it several times. This listener finds it pedestrian and boring not to say noisy, although he must extend to Mr. Hanson an agreeing hand in that the Hanson style is emotional and not barrenly intellectual.

If ever there were a serenade of tenderness and love, it is "A Siegfried Idyll." Perhaps, however, those writers who have spun pages of nonsense about the non-existent connection between Wagner "Ring" and Nazi ideology might find in the Idyll something insidiously destructive to the democratic way of life.

Yesterday's performance was loving and tender, a little less than perfect in some of its fine detail, but nevertheless a good display of Mr. Koussevitzky's and the Boston Symphony's art.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAR 8 - 1945

Boston Symphony Plays To Capacity Audience

By LESLIE MOORE

The Civic Music Association, concluding its season, presented the Boston Symphony Orchestra before a capacity audience last night in the Auditorium. Richard Burgin conducted. Ruth Posselt, violin, was the soloist. The program:

Beethoven
Overture to "Lenore" No. 3, Op. 72
Lalo Spanish Symphony for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 21
Allegro non troppo
Scherzando: Allegro molto
Andante
Finale: Allegro
R. Strauss "Don Quixote" Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, Op. 35

This program was a compliment to the Worcester audience, which annually looks forward to the Boston orchestra's performance and is annually rewarded. The compliment lay in the fact that the music included no tidbits to tickle the easy ear, unless you call a Beethoven overture a tidbit. The Lalo violin concerto, though highly tuneful, exercises judgment and senses. The Strauss fantasie presupposes not merely acquaintance with Cervantes' immortal crackpot of chivalry, but appreciation of what a composer's genius can do with an orchestra to give mood, picture, character, action and narrative.

Intelligent Direction

The orchestra, under its associate conductor, lacks the rich fervor and zing it achieves under Koussevitsky (whose strength is reported inadequate to the task of conducting in the provinces without respite this season). Yet Mr. Burgin is to be commended for workmanlike and intelligent direction of a taxing program. His leadership is clear and sensible, and he evokes a fine response from the magnificent instrument at his command. He knew his scores thoroughly. He displayed, for example, a firm grasp of the dramatic values of the Beethoven.

Miss Posselt pronounced the themes of the Lalo symphony decisively and coherently. The first movement's broad intervals had sweep and vitality, the romantic qualities of the Scherzando were done with finesse, and the lilt of the finale was delightful. All this was clothed in suave tone and built upon a precise technical framework. The orchestra, save for a moment or two in the finale when it slipped away from soloist and conductor, gave sonority and fine balance to the performance. That was notable in the rhythmic emphasis, in the beauty of the andante, and in that curiously accumulative preamble to the fourth movement. The orchestra so enriched the piece, indeed, that you wonder how even the giants of the violin dare attempt it with only the piano to handle Lalo's score.

Strauss Theme

For those who don't get Richard Strauss, nothing can be said about the "Don Quixote." To devote the entire second half of a program to the uninterrupted playing of any composer, even Adam Geibel, is apt to be a trifle trying, I suppose when the composer is R. Strauss, courage is the word. But how else, in music, depict the poor knight de la Mancha? Mr. Burgin conducted with imaginative insight, and an experienced player's understanding of the composer's incomparable use of elaborate orchestration for color, mood and impulse. If at times the music's capriciousness seemed under wraps, there was nevertheless a lucid treatment of fantastic theme and eccentric embellishment. Sancho Panza trudged along graphically in the tenor tuba, bass clarinet and particularly in Jean Lefranc's fine viola. Dulcinea flitted elusively in the oboe. And Jean Bedetti's eloquent cello bespoke the indomitable, but pathetic knight errant himself with remarkable musical sense. The orchestral effects, wind machine notwithstanding, were skillfully woven into the Strauss fabric. Altogether a reminder that it's time to get out Cervantes' masterpiece for another reading. Altogether a most satisfying concert.

Violinist

Young violinist Ruth Posselt who appeared here last night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present her own concert Sunday at 3.30 p. m. at the Worcester Art Museum. Called "one of the greatest violinists of our time" by Serge Koussevitzky, the Medford girl was featured as a child prodigy in Boston and New York about 15 years ago. Her concert will be free.

OPERA NEWS
NEW YORK, N. Y.

MAR 5 - 1945

Yolanda Novak, daughter of the Metropolitan scenic artist, Joseph Novak, greets Serge Koussevitzky at a contest for the best letter on "Why I Enjoy the Boston Symphony Radio Concerts." Miss Novak, a former member of the Metropolitan ballet school, was the youngest of the six winners.

FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL

MAR 16 1945

Koussevitzky And Primrose Play Berlioz

BY WALTER A. HANSEN
News-Sentinel Music Critic

It would be wrong to speak of Hector Berlioz as one of the greatest composers of all time; but it would be right in the complete sense of the word to call him one of the greatest masters of the art of orchestration. His scores bear evidence of remarkable skill; his work on instrumentation is indispensable.

Berlioz' "Harold in Italy," a symphony for orchestra and solo viola is worthy in every way of being heard as often as the "Fantastic Symphony." Unfortunately, however, it has been treated as a stepchild for many years. In all probability it would be performed far more frequently if there were enough violists equipped with the awe-inspiring dexterity and the solid musicianship of William Primrose, who appears as soloist in a gripping reading of the composition by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky (Victor Album 989). The recording has captured all the marvelous tonal beauty of Boston's great orchestra and every detail of the sensitive artistry of Mr. Primrose.

The score of "Harold in Italy" abounds in the same orchestral magic that Berlioz put into the "Fantastic Symphony." It is a graphically programmatic work. The four movements are entitled "Harold in the Mountains," "March of the Pilgrims," "Mountaineer's Serenade" and "Brigands' Orgy."

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

MAR 3 - 1945

3400 at Auditorium Hear Boston Symphony

By RAYMOND MORIN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its associate conductor Richard Burgin, last night brought the current Civic Music Series to a close before an Auditorium audience of 3400. The soloist was Ruth Posselt, violinist.

Those who still find it possible to feast to their satisfaction upon the music of the Boston Symphony in its Boston home with Dr. Koussevitsky at the helm were probably soon reconciled to his absence. In the estimation of many, Koussevitsky and the orchestra are inseparable. We are told that he is conducting very few out-of-Boston engagements this season because of his health.

Sound Musical Judgment

There is no reason to underestimate the musicianship of Mr. Burgin's style. Whether or not the orchestra sounds as well under his baton is quite another matter. The quality which stands out most vividly in Mr. Burgin's technic is the soundness of his musical judgments. On the other hand he is more demonstrative in some of his directions than would seem warranted by the phrase in process. Whereas this was apparent in some of the Beethoven "Leonore" overture, it was less obvious in the dramatic "Don Quixote."

But there is no necessity for further postponing comment upon the brilliant playing of Ruth Posselt (we assume that everyone knows that she is Mrs. Richard Burgin). In all of her Worcester appearances Miss Posselt has clearly revealed her extensive technical resources. The deep conviction of her playing remains unalterable and places her among the great violinists of the day, not excluding the men from the roster.

'Spanish Symphony'

The Lalo "Spanish Symphony" which she played has become too familiar to Worcester audiences to require explanatory notes in a review. Under Miss Posselt's sturdy bow it became exciting music. Compared to the magnificent performances we have heard her give of the Barber and Tschaikowsky concertos we cannot identify last night's playing as her best. Apart from a slightly nervous rhythm in the final movement her technical performance was superb and that is saying a great deal, for the Lalo work touches upon most of the foils of the strings and bow. The warm, sympathetic tone of the "Andante" was memorable. We anticipate with pleasure Miss Posselt's solo recital at the Art Museum on Sunday.

The Beethoven overture and Strauss tone-poem are at opposite ends of the stream interpretively. There is not the directness of expression in the "Leonore" overture that you will find in a corresponding opus of Von Weber for example. Mr. Burgin placed great emphasis upon sharp contrasts of speed and tone which is instrumentally rewarding (with such resources as the Boston orchestra) but of some expense to the continuity. Nevertheless is was playing and conducting of great finesse.

'Don Quixote'

Whether or not the "Don Quixote" score was the ideal close for the Civic series has probably inspired debate. We prefer to discuss it merely for its inherent value. Last night it was made highly significant by the 'cello solos of Jean Bedetti and violist Jean Lefranc. Bedetti was as usual dramatic and always vivid. His solo passages belong to the classification of "concerto" playing. There is fervor without affectation in his reading of this superbly dialogued score. In fact, the "Don Quixote" theme virtually came to life.

The auditor who hasn't taken the precaution to read his program notes is apt to be nonplussed by his music, for the symphony orchestra isn't frequently called upon to imitate bleating sheep or screaming winds. But its narrative qualities are too obvious to possibly escape observation. The Boston orchestra unraveled Strauss' obstacles effortless. The 10 variations were beautifully associated and Mr. Burgin's conceptions were lucid and skillfully followed.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAR 6 - 1945

Boston Symphony Plays To Capacity Audience

By LESLIE MOORE

The Civic Music Association, concluding its season, presented the Boston Symphony Orchestra before a capacity audience last night in the Auditorium. Richard Burgin conducted. Ruth Posselt, violin, was the soloist. The program:

Beethoven
Overture to "Lenore" No. 3, Op. 72
Lalo Spanish Symphony for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 21
Allegro non troppo
Scherzando: Allegro molto
Andante
Finale: Allegro
R. Strauss "Don Quixote" Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, Op. 35

This program was a compliment to the Worcester audience, which annually looks forward to the Boston orchestra's performance and is annually rewarded. The compliment lay in the fact that the music included no tidbits to tickle the easy ear, unless you call a Beethoven overture a tidbit. The Lalo violin concerto, though highly tuneful, exercises judgment and senses. The Strauss fantasie presupposes not merely acquaintance with Cervantes' immortal crackpot of chivalry, but appreciation of what a composer's genius can do with an orchestra to give mood, picture, character, action and narrative.

Intelligent Direction

The orchestra, under its associate conductor, lacks the rich fervor and zing it achieves under Koussevitsky (whose strength is ~~reported inadequate~~ to the task of conducting in the provinces without respite this season). Yet Mr. Burgin is to be commended for workmanlike and intelligent direction of a taxing program. His leadership is clear and sensible, and he evokes a fine response from the magnificent instrument at his command. He knew his scores thoroughly. He displayed, for example, a firm grasp of the dramatic values of the Beethoven.

Miss Posselt pronounced the themes of the Lalo symphony decisively and coherently. The first movement's broad intervals had sweep and vitality, the romantic qualities of the Scherzando were done with finesse, and the lilt of the finale was delightful. All this was clothed in suave tone and built upon a precise technical framework. The orchestra, save for a moment or two in the finale when it slipped away from soloist and conductor, gave sonority and fine balance to the performance. That was notable in the rhythmic emphasis, in the beauty of the andante, and in that curiously accumulative preamble to the fourth movement. The orchestra so enriched the piece, indeed, that you wonder how even the giants of the violin dare attempt it with only the piano to handle Lalo's score.

Strauss Theme

For those who don't get Richard Strauss, nothing can be said about the "Don Quixote." To devote the entire second half of a program to the uninterrupted playing of any composer, even Adam Geibel, is apt to be a trifle trying, I suppose when the composer is R. Strauss, courage is the word. But how else, in music, depict the poor knight de la Mancha? Mr. Burgin conducted with imaginative insight, and an experienced player's understanding of the composer's incomparable use of elaborate orchestration for color, mood and impulse. If at times the music's capriciousness seemed under wraps, there was nevertheless a lucid treatment of fantastic theme and eccentric embellishment. Sancho Panza trudged along graphically in the tenor tuba, bass clarinet and particularly in Jean Lefranc's fine viola. Dulcinea flitted elusively in the oboe. And Jean Bedetti's eloquent cello bespoke the indomitable, but pathetic knight errant himself with remarkable musical sense. The orchestral effects, wind machine notwithstanding, were skillfully woven into the Strauss fabric. Altogether a reminder that it's time to get out Cervantes' masterpiece for another reading. Altogether a most satisfying concert.

Violinist

Young violinist Ruth Posselt who appeared here last night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present her own concert Sunday at 3:30 p. m. at the Worcester Art Museum. Called "one of the greatest violinists of our time" by Serge Koussevitzky, the Medford girl was featured as a child prodigy in Boston and New York about 15 years ago. Her concert will be free.

Mar. 10 Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Everything at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this week is more or less familiar. The program conducted by Serge Koussevitsky assembles "Quiet City," by Aaron Copland; the Third or "Sibelius" Symphony by Howard Hanson; Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyll" and "La Valse" by Ravel.

The last-named is by all odds the most exciting, with Ravels enormous orchestra whipped into a three-time frenzy by Mr. Koussevitsky. Though the work comes last on a long program, it finds the conductor undiminished and unsparing in his energy. "La Valse," in a way, is a Koussevitsky specialty. No other conductor I have heard perform it manages the same combination of glowing sonorities, waltz abandon and an underlying irony which leers and mocks through the quasi-Viennese tunes.

Once again Mr. Speyer and Mr. Mager took, respectively, the English horn and trumpet solos in "Quiet City." The trumpet part must be fiendishly difficult. If yesterday there were a few burbled notes, they did not detract measurably from Mr. Mager's prevailing virtuosity.

"Quiet City" wears comparatively well. Though a touch pretentious, it does convey the mood of a vast, quiescent metropolis. In this score Mr. Copland wrote with a spareness of texture and a descriptive—emotional, if you will—directness that sets and sustains his desired mood.

If Howard Hanson's First Symphony is called "Nordic," and his Second "Romantic," his Third certainly must best termed "Sibelius." From start to finish, in all four of its movements, there are echoes of the Finnish composer. Sometimes they are reminiscences, sometimes orchestral detail, sometimes rhythmic patterns. But there is no mistaking the Sibelian influence.

Mr. Koussevitzky evidently has great faith in the work, since he has repeated it several times. This listener finds it pedestrian and boring not to say noisy, although he must extend to Mr. Hanson an agreeing hand in that the Hanson style is emotional and not barrenly intellectual.

If ever there were a serenade of tenderness and love, it is "A Siegfried Idyll." Perhaps, however, those writers who have spun pages of nonsense about the non-existent connection between Wagner "Ring" and Nazi ideology might find in the Idyll something insidiously destructive to the democratic way of life.

Yesterday's performance was loving and tender, a little less than perfect in some of its fine detail, but nevertheless a good display of Mr. Koussevitzky's and the Boston Symphony's art.

FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL

MAR 1 6 1945

Koussevitzky And Primrose Play Berlioz

BY WALTER A. HANSEN

News-Sentinel Music Critic

It would be wrong to speak of Hector Berlioz as one of the greatest composers of all time; but it would be right in the complete sense of the word to call him one of the greatest masters of the art of orchestration. His scores bear evidence of remarkable skill; his work on instrumentation is indispensable.

Berlioz' "Harold in Italy," a symphony for orchestra and solo viola is worthy in every way of being heard as often as the "Fantastic Symphony." Unfortunately, however, it has been treated as a stepchild for many years. In all probability it would be performed far more frequently if there were enough violists equipped with the awe-inspiring dexterity and the solid musicianship of William Primrose, who appears as soloist in a gripping reading of the composition by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky (Victor Album 989). The recording has captured all the marvelous tonal beauty of Boston's great orchestra and every detail of the sensitive artistry of Mr. Primrose.

The score of "Harold in Italy" abounds in the same orchestral magic that Berlioz put into the "Fantastic Symphony." It is a graphically programmatic work. The four movements are entitled "Harold in the Mountains," "March of the Pilgrims," "Mountaineer's Serenade" and "Brigands' Orgy."

OPERA NEWS
NEW YORK, N. Y.

MAR 5 - 1945

Yolanda Novak, daughter of the Metropolitan scenic artist, Joseph Novak, greets Serge Koussevitzky at a contest for the best letter on "Why I Enjoy the Boston Symphony Radio Concerts." Miss Novak, a former member of the Metropolitan ballet school, was the youngest of the six winners.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAR 13 1945

Boston Symphony ~~Pleases Capacity~~ Audience At Smith

Final Event of College Series Brings Applause as Tumultuous as Any Heard This Season

In accordance with long-established custom, the Smith college concert course came to a close with the Boston symphony orchestra last night at John M. Greene hall. The occasion is always one which combines pleasure with regret—pleasure at having again heard a group which, occupying so lofty a place in the musical world, is a special source of pride for Massachusetts, and regret that the concert and the series is at an end until next fall.

The audience, having expressed its impatience by buying all the seats and standing room space last Saturday, tonight wore its heart on its sleeve, for the riot of applause that greeted the final chord of the Schumann symphony was as sustained, as tumultuous as any ever heard this season. As a concerted opinion of Serge Koussevitsky and his renowned group of musicians, the applause was well justified. It seems that Koussevitsky is better than ever. If it were possible that he should lead the men with greater freedom, with greater economy of movement, with greater simplicity of style than ever in the past, he has done so. He is the ablest kind of a leader, for if the orchestra will do what he wants without his help, he seems quite content to stand and wait until he is needed. Or if the men need to be roused to a climactic moment, he will wield his stubby baton violently, shake from toe to head and work his jaws furiously, until a whole flood of music has been loosed.

All the facets of his greatness and that of the orchestra were revealed in a program which included, besides the Schumann, a Haydn symphony and a work called "Rudepoema" by the contemporary Brazilian, Villa-Lobos. Koussevitsky seems to get Haydn just right. The work, one of the so-called London symphonies, was a model of classic clarity. Particularly enjoyable were the adagio, which was played with stately and deliberate tempo, and the finale, whose sharpness of line, for which the justly-famed string section was partly responsible, underscored Haydn's humor.

The work by Villa-Lobos was infuriating and one is at a loss to understand why it should have been allowed to stand where it did on the program, to shatter the mood left by Haydn. The program note says the work is "rhapsodic, free in form", so one feels reasonably sure that no great design escaped detection. After form was eliminated as a discussion point, what was left? To a degree the work was bound together by the insistence of themes that had an Iberian quality, but what knit it together even more closely was the unparallelled ugliness of the sounds. Villa-Lobos, it seems, outdid himself in his struggle to turn the orchestra into a wounded beast,and what the audience heard was noise, often hysterical and sometimes positively obscene. Supposedly, the work tells something of the character of the pianist, Artur Rubinstein, a friend of the composer. For the sake of Rubenstein, let us hope that Villa-Lobos, no modest man, has made a mistake.

The program ended with a full-blooded performance of the Schumann symphony, known as the Spring symphony. Here Koussevitsky showed how much life can be infused into a work which shows little thematic imagination.

Distributed with the program last night was the announcement of next year's concert course. It includes the Boston, Cleveland and Cincinnati orchestras; Claudio Arrau, South American pianist; Bidu Sayao, soprano of the Metropolitan opera; and Erica Morini, one of the great violinists of the day, who played during this season's series.—R. M. H.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NEWS

MAR 11 1945

Keyboard

Tuesday

"La Gioconda," Metropolitan Opera Company; Academy of Music, 8.

Wednesday

Sidor Belarsky, bass-baritone, and Misha Mishakoff, violinist, in a concert of international music; Academy of Music, 8.30.

Thursday

Boston Symphony Orchestra, ~~Serge Koussevitzky~~ conducting; Philadelphia Forum; Academy of Music, 8.30. Program: Mozart's Divertimento for Horns and Strings; Stravinsky's Suite from Petrouchka; Tschaikovsky's Pathetique.

Friday

Philadelphia Orchestra, Alexander Hilsberg, violinist; Academy of Music, 2.30.

Saturday

Philadelphia Orchestra, Alexander Hilsberg, violinist; Academy of Music, 8.30.

Coming Events

Philadelphia Orchestra, Rudolf Serkin, pianist; Academy of Music, March 19.

"Cavalleria Rusticana" and "I Pagliacci," La Scala Opera Company; Academy of Music, March 22.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR: Conductor Serge Koussevtizky will bring the Boston Symphony here on Thursday night in its annual concert at the Academy under Philadelphia Forum auspices.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 11 1945

RECENT RECORDS

By JEROME D. BOHM

VICTOR'S most important publication since the lifting of the Petrillo ban on recording is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's performance of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, with William Primrose as viola soloist. This is the first complete recording of this work and the first recording made by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in almost five years.

No one has written as discerningly or as wittily as Tovey about Berlioz and about "Harold in Italy" in particular. He opens his essay on this work by telling us that "there are excellent reasons for reading 'Childe Harold's Pilgrimage,'" but among them I cannot find any that concern Berlioz and this symphony, except for the jejune value of the discovery that no definite elements of Byron's poem have penetrated the impregnable fortress of Berlioz's encyclopedic inattention. Many picturesque things are described in famous stanzas in "Childe Harold"; but nothing remotely resembling Berlioz's "Pilgrim's March," nor his serenade in the Abbruzzi.

As to the brigands, Byron has described the varieties of costume in a crowd of mixed nationality consisting undoubtedly of potential brigands; but the passage is not in the Italian cantos, and Berlioz tells us that this work concerns Harold in Italy. On the other hand, there is no trace in Berlioz's music of any of the famous passages in "Childe Harold." No doubt "there was a sound of revelry by night" in the Orgy of Brigands, but the Duchess of Richmond's ball was not an orgy of brigands, nor was it interrupted by a march of pilgrims singing their evening prayer. Nor is there anything to correspond to an invocation of the ocean, except a multitude of grammatical solecisms equivalent to Byron's "there let him lay."

"Perhaps the most gloriously nonsensical fact about the 'Harold' Symphony is that the viola solo is the result of the work having been commissioned by Paganini, who actually played it at the first performance in 1834. Anything less like a concerto has never been conceived; the part has its difficulties of endurance, tone production and conception, but is about as suited for the display of a virtuoso's powers as a bath chair for a world's speed record."

Mr. Koussevitzky has always been a devout exponent of Berlioz and his conception, as recorded here, is a telling one which illuminates every facet of the French master's superbly orchestrated score. Mr. Primrose sets forth the viola solo with complete mastery of the problems encountered and the sumptuous, luminous tone of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been recognizably transferred to the disks.

Other Victor Records

A "Lauritz Melchior Wagner Album" brings nothing new. The excerpts include the second act duet from "Tristan und Isolde" sung with Kirsten Flagstad, the Hymn to Venus from "Tannhaeuser," the Forge Song from "Siegfried," the Steersman's Song from "The Flying Dutchman," and the Rome Narrative from "Tannhaeuser." All of these have been available previously, either in sets or on single disks.

Another reissue is that of Vladimir Horowitz's technically magnificent but musically superficial performance of the solo part of Brahms's Second Piano Concerto in B flat, with Toscanini's superb account of the orchestral score with the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra.

Columbia Sets

The Philadelphia Orchestra's first recording for Columbia is of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, played under the direction of Eugene Ormandy. This is a straightforward discourse, rapidly paced throughout, the conductor's want of an enkindling imagination being missed especially in the allegretto movement. However, the recording, mechanically regarded, is a fine one, with exceptionally smooth surfaces.

Less satisfactory is the new version of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra conducted by Artur Rodzinski. Here, in addition to the rather insensitive, tepid approach to the music on the part of the conductor, one is disturbed by the frequently crackly and buzzy surfaces.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 15 1945

Concert Given At Carnegie Hall By Bostonians

Works of Schumann, Haydn and Villa-Lobos Played; Koussevitzky Conducts

By Jerome D. Bohm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, concert in Carnegie Hall last night, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The program:

Symphony No. 102, B flat	Haydn
"Rudepoema"	Villa-Lobos
Symphony No. 1, B flat	Schumann

It is this reviewer's unpleasant task to report that the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night was a disappointing one which pursued a course below this great organization's customary superlative level of achievement. This was less due to shortcomings in the ensemble as such, although even on this score everything was not so flawless as usual, several entrances in the Schumann Symphony being not quite on the beat.

The trouble seemed to lie principally with Mr. Koussevitzky, who, until the final movement of the Schuman Symphony, had difficulty in immersing himself completely in the music. The interpretation of the Haydn Symphony was leaden-footed, wanting in rhythmic grace and lightness, in delicacy of nuance and in dynamic variegation. In short, the spirit of Haydn was nowhere perceptible. The tonal investiture accorded this wonderful work was syrupy and wanting in transparency of texture.

Villa-Lobos's "Rudepoema," which received its first New York performance in orchestral dress, having been arranged from a piano piece originally penned for Artur Rubinstein, is a characteristic product of the Brazilian composer. It is a disjointed, episodic work, flitting from night club to jungle without pausing for breath. The orchestral din is unabating, and the ear tires long before the end of this effusion which sounds like Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" divested of its ideas and transferred from the Volga River to the banks of the Amazon. Here, however, the virtuosity of the orchestra found congenial material and the performance was all that could be desired, since the musical values concerned were slight.

But when Mr. Koussevitzky returned after the intermission to conduct the Schumann First Symphony he proved to be still in the musical doldrums, which had vitiated the effectiveness of his conception of the Haydn Symphony. The opening movement was all of one piece dynamically, almost consistently too loud, and conveying little of the music's exuberance for all the glowing sonoroties achieved. The exquisite Larghetto movement was treated with a similar lack of reticence along dynamic lines, little of its intimately poetic message being suggested. The Schumannesque humor of the Scherzo was only permitted to peer forth in the second trio, and it was not until the Finale was reached that Mr. Koussevitzky's lethargy was dispelled and his conception suddenly took on the essential vitality and imaginative perceptiveness.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM

945 —Hague—

Rude Noises At Carnegie

This being an open season for compositions by Heitor Villa Lobos among our major orchestras, another one of the prolific Brazilian's 1400 works had its local premiere Wednesday night when Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony played his Rudepoema in Carnegie Hall.

Rudepoema, which might be translated as rude or primitive poem, was originally a piano piece the composer wrote for and dedicated to Artur Rubinstein in 1926. The eminent pianist had been instrumental in furthering the Brazilian's musical career after first hearing one of his compositions played by a Rio movie theater orchestra—of which the composer was a member—some years before. In his dedication Villa Lobos wrote that in Rudepoema he had tried to catch Rubinstein's temperament and "put its image upon paper, as a camera might." Not having heard the piano version of the work (though Rubinstein has often featured it on his programs) I cannot say how near it comes to being a spiritual portrait of its interpreter. But judging from last night's orchestral version, which Villa Lobos completed in 1932, the composer must have been looking at his subject through a gargantuan telescope. And what he caught seems to have been the spirit of some outsize Caliban of the Brazilian jungles.

In any case, Rudepoema comes close to being the most clangorous and overpowering of this year's crop of Villa Lobos. Like many of the Brazilian's works, it is rhapsodic in character, free in form and rhythmically complicated. The orchestral texture is predominantly heavy. There's lots of brass—trombones and trumpets demolish little tunes and put them together again in ever-shifting rhythms; there's even some blue notes for the saxophone. In comparison, the work's lighter and more reflective passages, exotic though they may be, seem quietly pastoral. But there's never a dull moment from beginning to end and, with the Bostonians giving it their all, it was an exciting performance.

The evening opened with a characteristically Koussevitzkian reading of the superb Haydn Symphony in B-flat (No. 102) and closed with Schumann's First Symphony.

New 'Pas de Deux'

I passed up hearing the Bostonians' Schumann to take a look at George Balanchine's new Pas de Deux, given its world premiere by the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo at the City Center. It is a slight, brief piece, danced to Tchaikowsky's entre-acte music for The Sleeping Beauty and designed to show off the technical facility and brilliance of Alexandra Danilova and Frederic Franklin. This it does nicely enough, and there would seem to be considerable romantic charm to its choreography. But the general mood of the piece was unfortunately marred Wednesday night by off-key scrapings and other rude sounds in the orchestra pit. That was Tchaikowsky they were playing, not Villa Lobos.

—Robert A. Hague

PROGRAM IS LED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

N.Y. Sun Mar. 15

By ARTHUR V. BERGER.

Heiter Villa-Lobos has been represented by quite an aggregation of his music since the beginning of his visit, but the most solid recent tribute paid to him thus far in this city was that of the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky last night in Carnegie Hall. "Rudepoema," as the transcription of a piano work of 1926, did not promise very much in advance. But as the work unfolded in the sumptuous and highly energizing performance of the Boston musicians it revealed gratifying details.

The listener is tossed rather relentlessly at first into a gigantic jungle of violent sound. Coming after the Haydn Symphony in B-flat, No. 102, in which every climax is so magnificently prepared, the unprovoked excitement of the Brazilian composer's introduction seemed rather pointless. But as things settled down later there were some imaginative instrumental blends, and even a few appealing blues-like melodies, for example the one for saxophone and bass clarinet. There were long sections that might never have been written if it had not been for Stravinsky's "Le Sacre," notably the passage recalling the "Dance of the Adolescents." Also the work in general suffers from the usual shortcoming of Villa-Lobos, which is his failure to embody and develop, that is to say, to "compose" the striking effects he conceives. But it is, in general, a good deal less amorphous than some of his more recent works introduced here this season.

"Rudepoema," which was orchestrated in 1932, was being heard in New York for the first time last night. It shared the program with Schumann's Symphony in B-flat, in addition to the Haydn in the same key. The maximum effort seemed to have gone into the preparation of the new work, for the other music scarcely represented the orchestra in its most inspired vein. The violins, under Mr. Koussevitzky's guidance, carried the melodic lines of the Haydn forward with unwavering attention and excellent musical understanding, but the balance of the various orchestral choirs was not transparent enough, and the general conception was scarcely Haydnesque. The last movement of the Schumann, however, was presented with the clarity and brilliance we have come to expect from the estimable visiting body of musicians.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 15 1945

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS 'RUDEPOEMA'

Dr. Koussevitzky Offers the Villa-Lobos Composition First Time in New York

By OLIN DOWNES

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall offered for the greater part familiar music, superbly played, and a first performance of a work new to audiences in this city—the "Rudepoema" of Villa-Lobos.

It is not unfair or indiscreet, presumably, to refer here to a remark made during the recent and welcome visit to this country by the Brazilian composer. "I have written," said Mr. Villa-Lobos, "a great deal of music. Some of it is bad, but some of it is very good." With this verdict, from a source of singular and admirable impartiality in the matter, one can readily agree. The question is, to which category does the "Rudepoema," which we are told, is to be translated as "Primitive Poem," belong?

Villa-Lobos wrote the "Rudepoema" as a musical portrait of the pianist, Artur Rubinstein, with a dedication which stated the composer's "sincere belief" that he had caught the pianist's temperament "and put its image upon paper, as a camera might. So, if I have succeeded, it is indeed you who are the true author of this work."

We think the music more suggestive of Brazil than of the personality of Artur Rubinstein, who has often played this work in the piano version. We have the impression that as soon as Mr. Villa-Lobos transferred his pianistic conception to the orchestral canvas he enlarged the proportions of the original piece to the dimensions of a big symphonic poem.

At any rate, the Rudepoema, having powerful and richly colored pages which could only be by Villa-Lobos, is over-long for its structure. Or let us say that the structure is rambling and that there are too many different ideas in the work for its best good. The line of it is broken. One is blinded to the musical scenery by the endless picturesqueness of its detail. A quarter as many ideas, concisely developed, would still mean a good-score that would be more effective. In this work alone Mr. Villa-Lobos has written a good deal of music, too much of which is not good. It impresses as one of his earlier and less significant creations. But there was, however, hearty and long-sustained applause for the composition.

N.Y. World-Telegram

Music

By Robert Bagar Mar. 15

Boston Symphony Plays Villa-Lobos' 'Rudepoema'

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its fourth Carnegie Hall visit of the season last evening, bringing with it "Rudepoema," a new work—or at least an orchestral version of a familiar work—by Villa-Lobos. This local novelty occupied the middle of the program, which began with Haydn's Symphony in B flat (London No. 9) and ended with the Schumann First Symphony. The conductor, of course, was Serge Koussevitzky.

The Villa-Lobos item was born in 1926 as a piano piece dedicated to Artur Rubinstein, who, incidentally, plays it a lot in recital. Its orchestral transcription was done in 1932, and this is it. The term "Rudepoema" links together two Portuguese words to make one meaning "Primitive Poem."

Dedicated to Rubinstein.

With the dedication to Mr. Rubinstein went the following statement: 'My devoted friend, I do not know whether or not I have been able to put all your spirit into this 'Rudepoema,' but it is my sincere belief that I have caught your temperament and put its image on paper, as a camera might. So, if I have succeeded, it is indeed you who are the true author of this work.' And so much about factual background.

The music runs a mercurial course in rhythms. Most of it is loud, but of loudness made the more so by the density of the orchestration, and it is reasonable to believe the composer wanted exactly the effects he obtained in that respect. Undoubtedly the piece is both primitive and a poem, a crude, brusque poem flung out hotly.

Too Long and Noisy.

Villa-Lobos' is not a conventional form. It is free and unpredictable and, therefore, altogether outside of comparative analysis. The important point is—does the design he has created for this work give the fullest play to his musical ideas? And that is a question I am in no position to answer. I can say, though, that I did not like "Rudepoema." It is too long, too noisy and too stationary. It heaves and strains too much. Apparently Mr. Rubinstein's temperament is a flame under glass, if a very personal interpretation of the music may be permitted. The number was apathetically received by the audience, though the Bostonians did play it well.

The Haydn's last movement brought into play the orchestra's well-known talents of cohesive performance. That part of the work, at least, had been thoroughly rehearsed, it seemed, so much so that the musicians probably could have played it from memory.

* * *

Mezzo Rosina at Met.

For the first time in the history of the Metropolitan Rosina in "The Barber of Seville" was sung by a mezzo soprano instead of the usual "coloratura." That happened last evening and Jennie Tourel was the mezzo in question.

Though one appreciated Miss Tourel's efforts in this role, her instinctive musicianship and clarity of enunciation, one missed the sparkle of the soprano voice. It may be because habit makes reactionaries of all of us.

Anyway, the duets between Rosina and Almaviva (Bruno Landi) had none of the contrast they ordinarily possess. The reason—and a pretty obvious one—is that Miss Tourel's and Mr. Landi's voices were almost alike. Also, to judge from her work in the last half of the opera, Miss Tourel does a bouncy, tip-toe sort of Rosina, always jigging around and, regrettably, ineffectually so. She found, too, some of the music too high, which resulted in metallic sounds, and some of it too low.

The remainder of the cast included Richard Bonelli, as Figaro; Salvatore Baccaloni, as Bartolo; Virgilio Lazzari, as a capital Basilio, and Doris Doe, as Berta, in addition to John Baker and Richard Manning, who assumed the smaller roles. Wilfred Pelletier conducted.

Villa-Lobos Guest Conductor Of Boston Symphony Orchestra

Monitor

By L. A. Sloper Mar. 15

Heitor Villa-Lobos of Brazil is paying us a neighborly visit this week as guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Yesterday, at the seventeenth Friday concert of the season, he conducted three of his works, all of which were heard for the first time in Boston. He was received with marked cordiality and was accorded an ovation at the intermission and at the close of the program. He shared the applause generously with the orchestra, and finally passed it along to Dr. Koussevitzky in the balcony.

This of course was not the first time the music of Mr. Villa-Lobos had resounded in Symphony Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky introduced his Chôros No. 10 in 1941 and repeated it in 1942. That work by the evidence of yesterday's program, was characteristic.

The composer opened with the Toccata and Fugue from his "Bachianas Brasileiras No. 7," went on to the Chôros No. 12, written, "in admiration" of Dr. Koussevitzky, and closed with the "Rudepoêma," dedicated to Artur Rubinstein.

The Bachian piece, which we might call "Bach in Brazilian," was the most interesting item of the program to me, because it was clear in form and logical in development. It shows the classical side of the composer, who here has clothed Bach's frame in the garb of Brazil, and very successfully too, giving the master a handsome South American vesture which does not compromise his dignity.

Mr. Villa-Lobos has written many of those works which he calls Chôros, and a great deal has been written about them. The composer has said that the word "serenade" gives the closest impression of the significance of the Chôros, which is a loose form employing freely Brazilian folk songs and folk dance-tunes. To me the term "rhapsody" is closer, for the freedom is extreme, and rhapsodic in character, shifting from sentimental song to lively dance to overwhelming outbursts of sound.

Most of the time the full orchestra, with such additional instruments as saxophones, rattles, notched sticks and scrapers, and vibraphone, is hard at work. The rhythms are complex in the Stravinskyan manner, and the climaxes are Prokofieffian. The trouble is that for the listener, if not for the composer, the rhapsodic mood is hard to maintain for so long a time as this work continues, especially when there is no visible structual quality to hold the interest.

The "Rudepoêma" is also formless and rhapsodic. It seems, like the Chôros, to echo the sounds and paint the colors of the Brazilian jungle, but there are too, I think, some imported fauna and flora, and certainly there are measures that recall strongly a famous moment in "Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk." The "Savage Poem" is sufficiently savage, but this sort of thing has been done before, and better, and Mr. Villa-Lobos will hold our attention longer with his classical adventures.

As conductor Mr. Villa-Lobos was able to secure with no fuss an excellent performance of these very difficult scores.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

MAR 11 1945

Concert Program

Smart publicity, a good time spot, and a program designed for the widest popular appeal brought the "Hour of Charm" from ninth to first place in a year's time, besting last year's favorite, the John Charles Thomas program, by a small margin. "Those Who Serve" and Richard Crooks dropped out of the running. The reason in the case of the former must be attributed to the changed program format. "Those Who Serve" now presents dramatic sketches along with music.

1945	1944
1. Hour of Charm.	1 John C. Thomas.
2. John C. Thomas.	2. New York Philharmonic.
3. Stradivari Concert.	3. Refreshing Music.
4. New York Philharmonic.	4. Those Who Serve.
5. Boston Symphony.	5. Stradivari Concert.
6. Chicago Theater of the Air.	6. NBC Symphony.
7. Refreshing Music.	7. Richard Crooks.
8. NBC Symphony.	8. Carnival.
9. James Melton.	9. Hour of Charm.
10. Great Artists.	10. Chicago Theater of the Air, Lucille Manners Concert (tie).

[62]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 11 1945

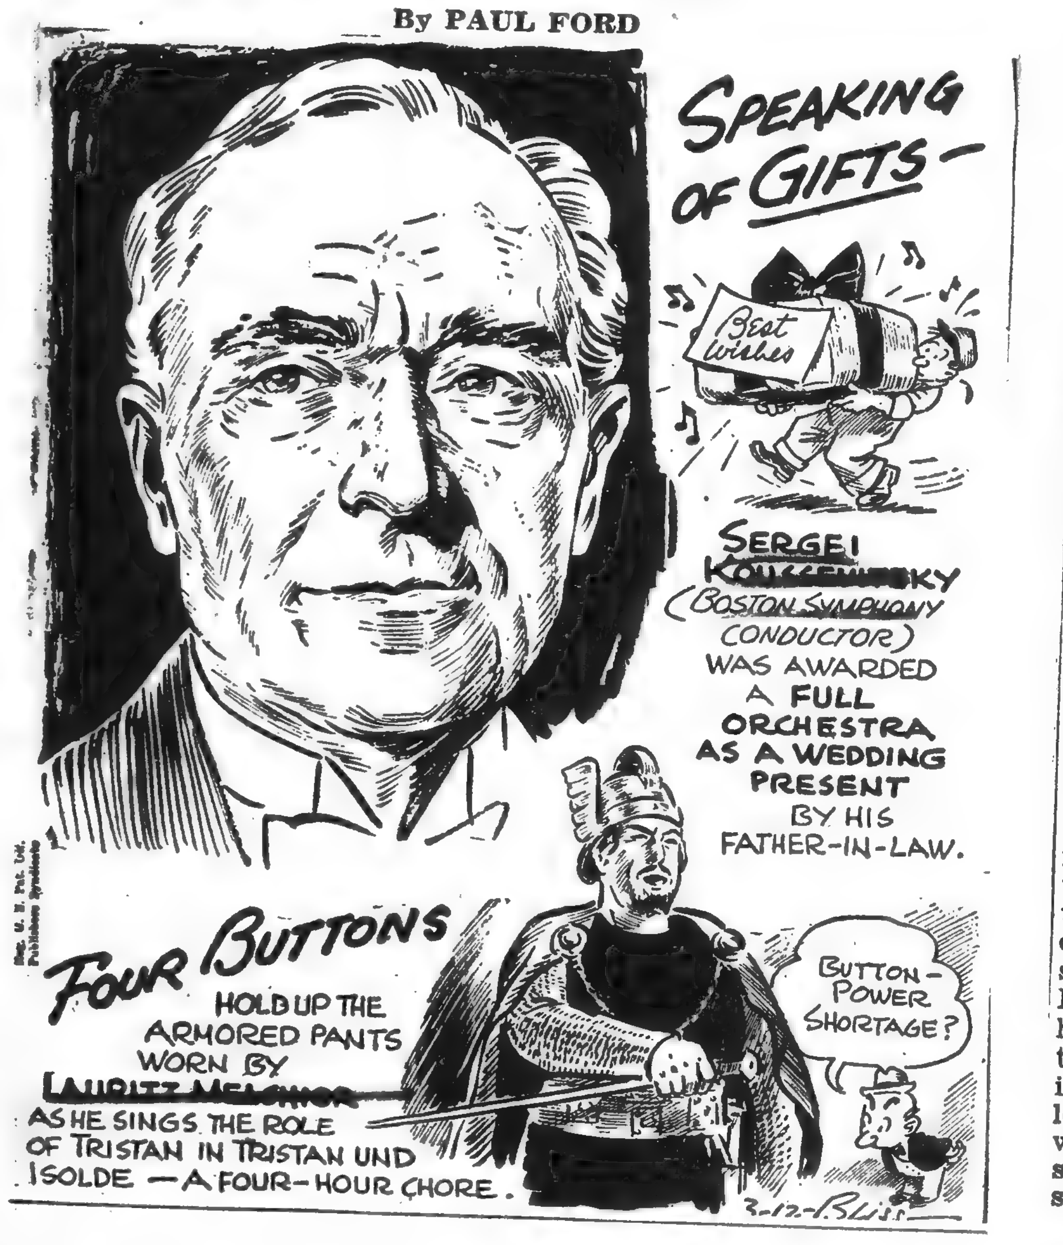
Conductor-Composer Conference

David Nilsson

Serge Koussevitzky (left), who will conduct the first New York performance of Heitor Villa-Lobos' "Rudepoema" at Carnegie Hall Wednesday, discusses the work with the composer.

Private Lives

By PAUL FORD



SPEAKING OF GIFTS -
Best wishes
SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY (BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR) WAS AWARDED A FULL ORCHESTRA AS A WEDDING PRESENT BY HIS FATHER-IN-LAW.
FOUR BUTTONS HOLD UP THE ARMORED PANTS WORN BY LAURITZ MELCHIOR AS HE SINGS THE ROLE OF TRISTAN IN TRISTAN UND ISOLDE — A FOUR-HOUR CHORE.
BUTTON-POWER SHORTAGE?
3-12- Bliss

Globe

MUSIC

Mar 19.

• SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

"Bright Holiday" means Easter to the Russians. It meant the same thing to the large audience at Symphony Hall yesterday aft-ernoon. Mozart's triumphantly gay Symphony in E-flat Major No. 39 (erroneously listed in the program as No. 3) was as brilliant as yesterday's sun; Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Russian Easter" Overture personified the mixture of religious and carnival spirit with which the day has come to be celebrated; and the many-sided Second Symphony of Sibelius emerged with the sonority of a cathedral organ.

Both orchestra and audience seemed duly appreciative of the contrasts between the religious themes intoned by the woodwinds and the secular merrymaking proclaimed by the bells, trumpets and cymbals. Jean Bedetti's cello solo and Richard Burgin's brief violin solo were bright spots in the pizzicato threads spun by the strings.

Mozart's Symphony No. 39 was delivered with warmth and polish by Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra. The introduction, unusual in a Mozart symphony, prepared the way for a fleetly paced allegro. The superior orchestration of the slow movement shone clearly through the transparent fabric of the melodic exterior. The contribution of the clarinets, which were just beginning to be accredited instruments in a symphony orchestra in 1788, was notable in the trio.

The Sibelius Second Symphony can have a few detractors when it is given the benefit of a Koussevitzky reading. His underscoring of the string figures which open each movement, his enthusiasm for the uninhibited bowing of the double bases, his separation of the three muffled drum beats announcing the trio, his leading the woodwinds straight across the eddying currents of the strings, are superb.

Herald

MUSIC

Mar 17

Sunday Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the fifth program of its series of Sunday concerts in Symphony Hall. The program:
Symphony in E flat (K. 543) . . . . Mozart
"Russian Easter" Overture, Op. 36 Rimsky-Korsakov
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43 Sibelius

A well-balanced program of favorite familiarities got a performance in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon as glowing as the day itself, and it is hard to think what more anyone could want. The Mozart Symphony, which Dr. Koussevitzy always takes a little more time with than most conductors, responds to the comfortable tempos with a sort of romantic melancholy. This isn't exactly what Mozart scholars see in the work, but no matter; the music is delightful from beginning to end, and none the less so for the conductor's personal and loving conception of it.

The Rimsky-Korsakov Overture on themes of the Russian liturgy, stood out yesterday as it should stand out; an interesting and effective character piece designed especially for Easter-tide. The other day, entangled as it was in a thicket of somewhat similar Russian comrades, it seemed a little obvious and calculated. Yesterday, between two contrasted works, it hit the mark squarely. All three works on the program earned the conductor and orchestra warm applause. The next concert in this series comes on April 22.

R. F. E., Jr.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 16 1945

[From Late Edition of Yesterday's TIMES.]

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS 'RUDEPOEMA'

(1)

Dr. Koussevitzky Offers the Villa-Lobos Composition First Time in New York

By OLIN DOWNES

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall offered for the greater part familiar music, superbly played, and a first performance of a work new to audiences in this city—the "Rudepoema" of Villa-Lobos.

It is not unfair or indiscreet, presumably, to refer here to a remark made during the recent and welcome visit to this country by the Brazilian composer. "I have written," said Mr. Villa-Lobos, "a great deal of music. Some of it is bad, but some of it is very good." With this verdict, from a source of singular and admirable impartiality in the matter, one can readily agree. The question is, to which category does the "Rudepoema," which we are told, is to be translated as "Primitive Poem," belong?

Villa-Lobos wrote the "Rudepoema" as a musical portrait of the pianist Artur Rubinstein, with a dedication which stated the composer's "sincere belief" that he had caught the pianist's temperament "and put its image upon paper, as a camera might. So, if I have succeeded, it is indeed you who are the true author of this work."

We think the music more suggestive of Brazil than of the personality of Artur Rubinstein, who has often played this work in the piano version. We have the impression that as soon as Mr. Villa-Lobos transferred his pianistic conception to the orchestral canvas he enlarged the proportions of the original piece to the dimensions of a big symphonic poem.

At any rate, the "Rudepoema," having powerful and richly colored pages which could only be by Villa-Lobos, is overlong for its structure. Or let us say that the structure is rambling and that there are too many different ideas in the work for its best good. The line of it is broken. One is blinded to the musical scenery by the endless picturesqueness of its detail. A quarter as many ideas, concisely developed, would still mean a good-sized score that would be more effective. In this work alone Mr. Villa-Lobos has written a good deal of music, too much of which is not good. It impresses as one of his earlier and less significant creations. But there was, however, hearty and long-sustained applause for the composition.

Dr. Koussevitzky began the concert with the Haydn Symphony in B flat numbered by Breitkopf and Hartel 102. We had not heard the introduction played so transparently and solemnly, almost in mystical vein not customarily associated with Haydn. For the accent of it we could have been listening to the opening of the Prelude to Lohengrin! It is to be remembered that Haydn was by no means the cheerful old simpleton that he was for long depicted to be. The performancce, tonally, stylistically, would have glorified the most ordinary music. There was the hint of special "interpretation" here and there, such as we have mentioned. That is Dr. Koussevitzky's conception of Haydn, and it must be confessed that his ideas, with such an orchestra to convey them, are exceptionally persuasive.

The Schumann Spring symphony would be a glorious evocation whatever the season. In its natural state it is rather inexpertly and reticently scored, so that it commonly sounds stringy, with indistinct edges—this despite some instrumental effects of unique beauty. Dr. Koussevitzky by special emphasis here and strengthening of tone there made the symphony positively brilliant in its color and effect. We have seldom felt that the tempi were so justly taken, or the Schumann phrase given a more characteristic curve than on this occasion. There was only one thing: too much brilliancy instead of too little, which, though the scoring was not changed, had the effect of reinforced instrumentation. One wonders if he doesn't prefer Schumann in his native shyness and inexpertness. These are opinions. The important facts last night were the beauty and fancy of the music.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 17 1945

MUSIC

By Miles Kastendieck

Koussevitzky Programs Howard Hanson's Third Symphony for Concert at Academy

Koussevitzky programmed his first major American work of the season with the Boston Symphony at the Academy of Music last night. It was also the first time for Howard Hanson's Third Symphony in Brooklyn. Since Mr. Hanson was present to take a bow, he might have been invited to conduct his own music. The performance of it would have been quite different from that of Koussevitzky, who took some of the vigor and the ruggedness out of the music in over-refining it.

This Third Symphony has its academic qualities and it follows a middle-of-the-road course in its harmonic texture. Coming as it did last night after Stravinsky's Suite from "Petrouchka" it sounded like much older music than a work composed in 1936-38 should have. The Stravinsky composed in 1911 was much more contemporary! But there is solid substance in Hanson's work (indeed, the orchestral sonorities are scored almost too fully.) With due respect to the influence of Sibelius it stands on its own feet. Perhaps the composer followed too closely his plan of paying tribute to the epic qualities of the pioneer Swedish settlers in Delaware, whom this work commemorates, but he has something to say and says it well.

So deliberately paced as it was last night, this music loses its true spirit. The turbulent character of the first movement, the rhythmic exhilaration of the Scherzo, the triumphant note at the end: these were missing. There was too much of a brooding New England religious note, too little of the essense of pioneer days that can be found in a more inspired interpretation.

As a matter of record, neither Haydn's Symphony in B Flat nor the Stravinsky were given the kind of performance Koussevitzky has been known to give them. While the playing itself was superb, the musicians were held down too much. The over-restrained effects, sometimes altogether too precious, robbed the Haydn of its essential sparkle. The vivacity of the first movement, the joyousness of the finale were refined out of their natural utterance. Nevertheless, this performance was better than that in Carnegie Hall on Wednesday night.

A month ago Koussevitzky played the Stravinsky so strikingly that there were cheers in Carnegie Hall. Every one was stimulated. Last night the applause was polite because the stimulus was only suggested; in fact, the performance just stopped suddenly instead of ending effectively because the conductor lost his dramatic emphasis.

Fundamentally a good program, this concert needed more zest to give the music the lift one had a right to expect from it.

List of Boxholders At Academy Concert

Boxholders attending the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in the Academy of Music were:

Seated in Box 1: Mr. and Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Lowell Keiser, Mrs. Kate Hodges William, Mrs. A. Longstreet Reid, James McLaren and Millerd Morgan.

Box 2 was occupied by Mrs. Dean C. Osborne and her guests, Mr. and Mrs. Donald Sinclair, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Fawcett, former Supreme Court Justice Lewis L. Fawcett, Mrs. James M. Fawcett and Mrs. C. T. Frohne.

Occupants of Box 3 were the guests of Mrs. Benjamin Prince: Mrs. Karp P. Mikhalenkoff, the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. John Howland Lathrop, Mr. and Mrs. James C. McMullin, Mr. and Mrs. B. Meredith Langstaff and Lt. Ben Prescott.

Members of the Brooklyn Women's Club seated in Box 4 were: Mrs. Burgess Osterhout, president; Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. Adolph L. Muller, Mrs. William E. Howes, Mrs. H. S. Rasi and Mrs. George Hills Iler.

Seated in Box 5 were Emma Jessie Ogg, Mrs. William B. Parker, Jessie Lockitt and Mrs. William A. Macfarlane.

Tickets for Box 7 were donated by the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Concerts, Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, chairman, to enlisted army men and non-commissioned officers at Fort Hamilton.

Tickets for Box 8 were distributed to officers of the Brooklyn Navy Yard. This box was a gift of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

APR 16 1945

William Kapell Gives Recital Here Thursday

William Kapell will give his first piano recital at the Academy of Music Thursday night.

The 22-year-old New Yorker, who has been hailed by Koussevitzky, Ormandy, Horowitz and other musicians as one of the most promising pianists of the day, will play the Brahms Sonata in F minor; a Chopin group, Scherzo in E, Nocturne in B, and Polonaise in A flat; five preludes by Shostakovich, Albeniz' Evocacion, a Gershwin prelude, and Liszt's Mephisto Waltz.

Kapell has won many top awards, including a youth contest prize from the Philadelphia Orchestra, and the Town Hall Endowment Series Award. However, the first honor he ever won for his playing was earned at the age of 10 a turkey dinner given by Jose Iturbi.

WILLIAM KAPELL . . . makes his debut as soloist.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAR 17 1945

Bostonians Record Again
Primrose Soloist in Koussevitzky's 'Harold in Italy'
By C. E. L.

Koussevitzky

The first major work to be recorded by Victor since the ban brings us the Boston Symphony Orchestra which because of its particular differences with Petrillo had made no new discs for about five years, although previously recorded works had been released from time to time. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's choice for this historic set was "Harold in Italy" by Berlioz, for the performance of which he enlisted the help of the eminent violist, William Primrose, as soloist.

Of all the romantics, Berlioz, the arch-romantic, sounds the best in this neo-classic day. A good reason for this may be the cleanness of his orchestration.. There are big sonorities and there are lean ones, but never a cloudy one. The sound never gets soggy or turgid, a condition which is fatal for recording purposes.

So while the studio technicians may be put to some trouble in adjusting the dynamic range they need never worry about keeping the music transparent. Certainly not while the Bostonians are at work. The orchestra here produces its loveliest, purest textures and the result is singularly gratifying. Primrose has no rivals. There are some very flattering pages for his instrument in this strange composition and his artist's eye shapes the phrase and the coloring matter to perfection.

Primrose

This rambling tone poem is thoroughly Byronic in mood although its programmatic scheme may be difficult to trace back to its literary origins. The first movement, "Harold in the Mountains" and the final "Orgy of the Brigands" are best listened to as sensuous, subjective music. The "Serenade" is non-committal as to content, pretty if you like, excellent Berlioz. Personally your reviewer is partial to the "March of the Pilgrims," melodiously insinuating, eerie, inimitable.

Victor has made a brilliant beginning for the post-ban era.

* * *

Ordinarily an entire album of boogie-woogie piano music risks monotony but Asch takes a chance with three records by Mead Lux Lewis. Here's a player who has the resourcefulness to keep the idiom varied and interesting. Moreover, some of the sides are in the blues vein.

His best boogie playing is in the driving bass of "Randini's Blues" and "Lux's Boogie." He pays a tribute to his pioneering predecessor with "Yancy's Pride." Two titles which hint at a California slant "Denapas Parade" (Pasadena!) and "Glendale Glide" but like "Boogie Tidal" they all have the Lux Lewis power and treble brilliance.

* * *

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

MAR 16 1945

Boston Orchestra Returns to Academy
By EDWIN H. SCHLOSS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its distinguished leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, appeared in the Academy of Music last night to play the first of two concerts the New England maestro and his men will offer here this season under Philadelphia Forum auspices.

Bringing an outside orchestra, even a great one like the Bostonians, to the home of our own proud village band, may seem like carrying coals to Newcastle.

But Forum Director William K. Huff and his associates have been engaged in this musical anthracite traffic (as far as the Bostonians are concerned) for some seasons now and always to the profit of all concerned—especially the audience.

And substantial dividends were declared once more last night.

For, of course, the Boston Symphony is a magnificent orchestra, too, and its annual appearance here turned out to be, as usual, one of the memorable events of the musical year.

It was a pleasure to hear Dr. Koussevitzky play on his superb instrument from the first notes of the opening number—John Stafford Smith's "The Star-Spangled Banner"—to the concluding dolors of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique." Though, if it isn't too unmannerly to speak frankly of such distinguished visitors, the ensemble was not in its best "voice" at all times last night. The orchestra sounded a bit tired in the opening Mozart (the E flat Symphony K. 543). Dr. Koussevitzky has given us crisper and more carefully enunciated Mozart before, and although the lower strings were reduced in number, the first and second fiddles failed to come out in that cameo profile so desirable in an 18th century symphony. Nor did they play with the flexibility to which Philadelphia Orchestra audiences are accustomed. However, the following "Petrouchka" Suite was set forth with great brilliance, style and color, especially by the fine Boston brasses, and the prominently incidental piano part was gallantly and handsomely played by Lukas Foss.

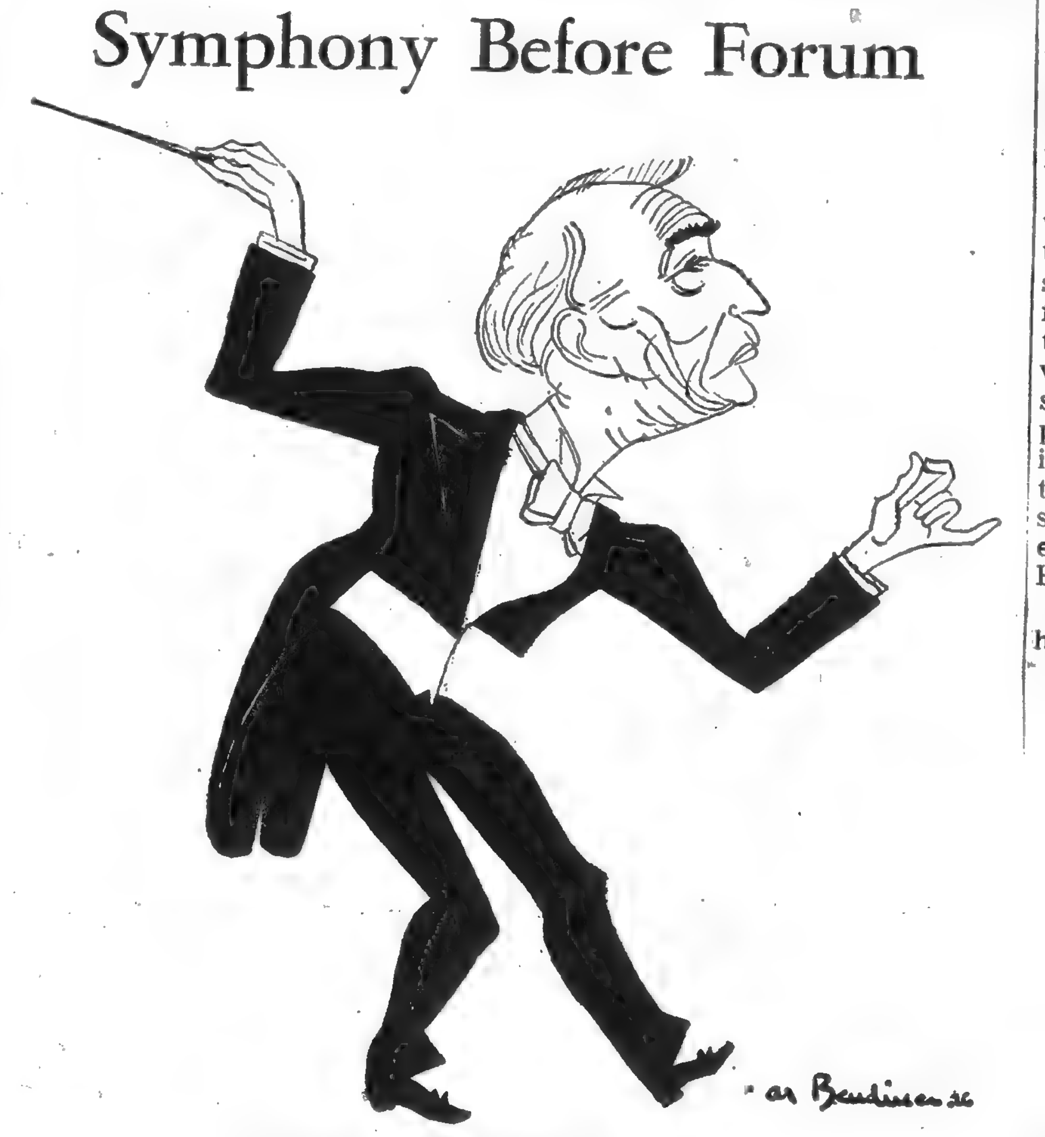
And Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique," with which the evening closed, was one more demonstration of Dr. Koussevitzky's artistic legerdemain—the glowing magic of a conductor who can take a shopworn favorite of decades and deliver it to his audience as a glamorous musical experience.

The Forumites and their paying guests were properly appreciative at all stages and Dr. Koussevitzky was obliged to summon his men to rise for repeated acknowledgments.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

MAR 16 1945

Koussevitzky Conducts Boston Symphony Before Forum



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

By MAX de SCHAUENSEE

THE one and only Boston Symphony and its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, delighted a capacity audience when it was presented by the Philadelphia Forum at the Academy of Music last night.

Superlatives seem always monotonously in order when speaking of this unique group of musicians and its leader. The precision of attack, the superb tonal balance, the mellowness of sound which are synonomous with the Boston Symphony—all were again impressively present last night.

Dr. Koussevitsky's program consisted of three compositions: Mozart's Symphony in E-flat major; Stravinsky's Orchestra Suite from the ballet "Petrouchka," and Tschaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 in B minor, ("Pathetikue").

The Mozart E-flat symphony has not been played in Philadelphia lately. It is one of Mozart's great symphonies, one of the composer's last compositions. Dr. Koussevitzky demonstrated that Mozart is not merely, as is popularly supposed, a composer of surpassing elegance and refinement, but as well an artist who requires a certain spaciousness of treatment. This was superlatively fine Mozart playing.

Dr. Koussevitzky is not Russian for nothing. This was clearly demonstrated in the signal authority with which he played the Stravinsky and Tschaikovsky compositions. There was a drive and an urgency to the "Petrouchka" suite, as though the conductor had the devil at his heels. Seldom have we heard anything more perfect in its way. And here a word for the pianist Lukas Foss, whose fire, nervous edge and rhythmical brilliance in the solo passages must have pleased Dr. Koussevitzky indeed.

The Tschaikovsky "Pathetique" was another case of authority and unsurpassed ensemble. The strings sounded luminously beautiful in the first movement and the vigor of the third movement, Allegro molto vivace, was breathtaking. Dr. Koussevitzky invested the entire symphony with a dignity and a nobility that surely must be brought to the music of this unfortunate Russian, who in the "Pathetique" bared his soul and called on high Heaven.

The Boston Symphony returns here on April 12, and judging from the salvos of applause which greeted it last night, this will be another treat and privilege for all serious lovers of music in Philadelphia.

CORNELL, ILL.
JOURNAL

MAR 15 1945

Women who neglect the musical training of their children are missing one of the most enriching experiences of their lives and the lives of their children. One reason for such an oversight is the feeling of some that they lack sufficient technical knowledge. According to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, eminent conductor of the "Boston Symphony Orchestra," it is not necessary. "Don't be afraid of your lack of technical knowledge. Plenty of people who have a true feeling for music cannot read a note," he says. "The enjoyment of a great piece of music comes with familiarity. The deeper you go, the more you find." The Allis-Chalmers broadcasts of the "Boston Symphony" concerts are heard each Saturday night (8:30-9:30 EWT, Blue).

Post Mar. 17

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter" Overture, sandwiched between Mozart's E flat Symphony (koechel 543) and Sibelius' Second Symphony was the only concession made to the holiday on yesterday's program at Symphony Hall. Actually the only thing in keeping with the day is the title, since the music is as lush and pagan as anything written by the brilliant Russian. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation left one with the impression that "Harem Reminiscences" would have been a much more appropriate title.

Sibelius' symphony was played with careful delineation of the mosaic construction. There may have been just a shade too much premeditation and deliberation in the culmination of climaxes, but that was less displeasing than the heavy, dragging texture of the violin tones.

Although there was great transparency and clarity in the performance of Mozart's symphony, much of the pleasure was minimised by erratic tempi. An andante that should have been just that became more gruesome than a dirge. Throughout the other movements there was not that general consistency of tempi that is as much a hall mark of so called classical music as anything can be.

Koussevitzky Ends 21 Years With Hub Symphony

BOSTON, April 28 (AP)—Symphony Hall was the scene of 18 musical "world premieres" this year, Boston Symphony Director Serge Koussevitzky announced today as the orchestra finished its season.

"And seven of these first-performed works were by American composers," said the Russian-born conductor who tonight concluded 21 years with the orchestra.

Koussevitzky is more proud of his adopted countrymen's musical prowess than anything else the orchestra has accomplished under his direction.

Proud of the fact that more than a third of the musicians he first directed in 1924 are still with him, Koussevitzky said: "Many have had offers from other American orchestras, but where would they find such audiences as Boston has?"

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

MAR 17 1945

On the Record
By Claudia Cassidy

"Harold in Italy."

Victor is so justifiably proud of its first major release in nearly five years by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra that it shot the reviewing records out before the album was ready for distribution. But the wrapper isn't particularly important. What counts is the first American recording of Berlioz's Symphony No. 3, called "Harold in Italy," featuring that virtuoso of the viola, William Primrose [M-989; five 12-inch records]. It is a notable recording of a brilliant performance, and tho you will find slight acoustical flaws at the tip ends of sides five and six, they amount to little when balanced against the splendors of a great orchestra.

Like all Berlioz works, "Harold in Italy" has a touch of the fantastic in its story to make up for some of its drawbacks in the line of music. It is certainly not a great symphony, but it is enjoyable in occasional performance. Besides, who can forget that, according to Berlioz, Paganini himself commissioned it for his Stradivarius viola, which almost rivaled his violin in fame, and then was unhappy because the viola was too incidental. "I have," he said plaintively, "to be playing all the time." Be that as it may, Paganini is said to have paid Berlioz 20,000 francs for the composition, and that supported the composer while he wrote the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.

"Harold in Italy" is a Byronesque venture in the manner of "Childe Harold," a tale of moody wanderings in the mountains, of the pilgrim's march and prayer, the serenade of the Abruzzi mountaineer, and the orgy of brigands, that frenetic finale which like much of the score is reminiscent of the brilliant Symphonic Fantastique. This is Berlioz in his most lush vein of narrative symphony, and it gets the bravura performance without which it can be pretty dull going.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 18 1945

MUSIC'S OVERTONES

Victor Boldly Presents Berlioz's 'Harold in Italy' as 'First' Album

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Dramatizing the importance of its first major symphonic release since the recording ban was lifted last November, Victor boldy presents the first American, and only complete recording, of Hector Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky with William Primrose as the viola soloist. How much more commendable is this undertaking than Columbia's first releases which are none other than Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony, works already brilliantly recorded. Let us hope that Victor carries on this refreshing beginning and makes possible recordings of music not yet adequately presented.

This new album marks the return of the Boston Symphony to discs after nearly five years inactivity. The orchestra's recording activities had come to an end early in 1940 because of previous non-affiliation with the Musicians Union. When that crisis passed the ban against recording was already in effect. Thus it is that "Harold in Italy" is doubly welcome because it gives full scope to the glories of this orchestra, finding Koussevitzky completely engrossed in setting forth a brilliantly orchestrated score.

The work itself is not too well known but represents Berlioz composing in the white heat of romanticism. It compares favorably with the better known Symphonie Fantastique, which was written one year before "Harold in Italy." The story of the Symphony is that of Harold's wanderings, somewhat autobiographical because of the poetic recollections Berlioz had of his own wanderings in the Bruzzi. He makes his hero a sort of melancholy dreamer and suggests that the key to understanding the work may be found in Byron's poem "Childe Harold." There is little connection between the Symphony and Byron's poem, but there was no intention on the part of the composer to write a symphonic poem after Byron. His reference to the poet is chiefly that of making his hero a melancholy dreamer, using the solo viola to represent him on his wanderings. At first, Harold beholds the glories of nature in the mountains, but somehow these fail to inspire him. He then moves in the midst of some devout and happy pilgrims, but their religion fails to calm his troubled spirit. Nor does loves, observed in a mountaineer serenading his mistress, overcome his melancholy. Only when he throws himself into an orgy of drunken bandits does he appear to find release, but even this eventually flees.

Of the Finale, Berlioz himself, describing a performance that he conducted, writes: "in this furious orgy in which the drunkenness of wine, blood, joy and rage all shout together; where the rhythm now seems to stumble, and now to run madly; where the mouths of brass seem to vomit forth curses and reply with blasphemies to entreating voices; where they laugh, drink, strike, bruise, kill and ravish; where, in a word, they amuse themselves; in this scene of brigands the orchestra became a veritable pandemonium; there was something supernatural and frightful in the frenzy of its dash; everything sang, leaped, roared with diabolical order and unanimity—violins, basses, trombones, drums and cymbals; while the solo alto, Harold, the dreamer, fleeing in fright, still sounded from afar some trembling notes of his evening hymn.

Those who like this kind of music will rejoice in this work and revel in Koussevitzky's version, undoubtedly as fine as Berlioz himself has described his performance.

Oratorio Society to Give 19th Bach B Minor Mass

In all the years that the New York Oratorio Society has presented its annual performance of the Bach B Minor Mass in entirety, this season will actually mark the first time that the work will be heard during Holy Week, on March 27.

This will be the 19th successive performance by the Oratorio Society. Alfred Greenfield will lead the orchestra, made up of members of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Society, and chorus of almost 300 voices. The soloists include Barbara Troxell, soprano; Lydia Summers, contralto; Joseph Victor Laderoute, tenor, and Wellington Ezekiel, bass.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

MAR 18 1945

On the Records

Victor has blossomed forth with its first major symphonic release since the recording ban was lifted last fall.

It's an album of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," recorded by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony with William Primrose playing the solo viola part.

This is the first recording by the eminent Bostonians in five years, and with it they come out of retirement in a brilliant burgeoning. Acoustically and with respect to orchestral tone and balance the new album leaves little to be desired. The luminous quality for which Dr. Koussevitzky's records are famous is evident here in all its pristine glory. And Primrose's performance is fully worthy of his reputation and achievement of one of the great violists of our time.

What you may think of the artistic merits of Berlioz's tone poem is another matter.

SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS LIGHT

MAR 18 1945

AS A MATTER OF RECORD

As record buyers may or may not know, the Boston Symphony orchestra made no recordings for nearly five years. Early in 1940 the Boston's recording activities were halted because of previous non-affiliation with the musician's union, and when the orchestra did affiliate in December, 1942, the ban against all recording at major studios was in effect. Within 48 hours after the ban was lifted, however, Victor's engineers had arrived at Boston's Symphony Hall with portable sound equipment and a recording session was under way. This was last November 15.

Now scheduled for April release is a performance of Hector Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" Op. 16, starring William Primrose, the famed violist, with the orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky (five 12-inch discs in album). Besides bringing the Boston back to Victor records, this is introduced as "the first complete and the only American recording" of the Berlioz work. The title having been suggested by Byron's wandering hero, the piece itself might be called a concerto for viola. And that's where William Primrose comes in. Primrose assisted in making "Harold in Italy" one of the high spots in the Boston's current season, and he's as

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.
Records after five years.

---

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

MAR 18 1945

Recorded Music

Victor's first major symphonic release since the lifting of the Petrillo ban is a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, of Berlioz' "Harold in Italy," with the incomparable William Primrose in the solo viola part.

The set is the first made by the Bostonians in more than five years, and it is the first complete and the only American recording of "Harold."

The work, which may be considered a concerto for viola, was inspired by "Childe Harold's Pilgrimage," though as finally drawn up by Berlioz it bears little relation to Byron's poem. The titles of the four movements are in Berlioz' typically extravagant style, and are sufficient index to the lush character of the music. The first is "Harold in the Mountains, Scenes of Melancholy, Happiness and Joy." Then follow "March of Pilgrims Singing Their Evening Hymn," "Serenade of a Mountaineer of the Abruzzito to his Mistress," and, finally, "Orgy of Brigands."

"Harold" was commissioned by Paganini, who paid Berlioz well, but never performed the work — presumably because he had already been stricken by the illness which was to prove fatal.

Mr. Koussevitzky likes Berlioz, and "Harold" has figured notably on his programs. The Bostonians play it stunningly here; and Mr. Primrose is in his usual impeccable form. The recording, made in Boston's Symphony Hall, is of the first order, mechanically speaking; it is sonorous, as the occasion requires, at the same time maintaining remarkably well the balance between orchestra and soloist. The set comes on five 12-inch records.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 18 1945

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS DEBUSSY

Dr. Koussevitzky Excels in Directing 'Afternoon of Faun' at Carnegie Hall

At yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall the program conducted by Serge Koussevitzky contained two works, of which he is the unexcelled interpreter, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and "La Valse" of Ravel. These offerings formed the central part of a list that opened with Mozart's Symphony in E flat and was brought to a close by Howard Hanson's Third symphony.

There are orchestral directors who conceive Debussey's tone poem along more subdued lines than Dr. Koussevitzky, but who in so doing impart an anaemic quality to the music. In his remarkable reading Dr. Koussevitzky knows just where to bring passages into high relief, so that instead of nullifying the dreaminess and sensuousness of the music they stress these elements, while at the same time giving firmness and clarity to the composition's structural patterning.

The orchestra played all of it with enchanting beauty of tone and the subtlest ow delicate nuances, the flute part being especially notable for purity and limpidity. A deliberate tempo was adopted, and it lent the whole just the right degree of languor and luxuriousness.

Dr. Koussevitzky's superlative treatment of Ravel's "La Valse" is an old story, but each rehearing of the work under his baton only serves to increase one's wonder at the results he achieves in it. It was again a marvel of rhythmic allure, kaleidoscopic coloring and orchestral virtuosity. How the conductor and his men accomplish what they do in the peroration remains a mystery, for they alone seem capable of the glory of sound and tremendous impact they bring to these electrifying measures.

Mozart's symphony in E flat was less convincingly performed. There was more exuberance and vitality in the interpretation than finesse or subtlety, the opening movement being the least amenable to this approach, which was too objective for it and robbed it of sufficient contrasts of mood.

On the other hand, Dr. Koussevitzky threw himself heart and soul into the presentation of Hanson's Third symphony, leaving nothing undone to convey the intentions of the content in each of the four movemets. But this is a work which, after its first movement, begins to pall with its constant unrelieved richness of scoring and the building up of mighty climaxes leading nowhere in particular. Sibelius, and also Bruckner, Dvorak and the Wagner of "Parsifal" are echoed in the music, which is of interest principally because of its unquestioned sincerity and the spiritual impulse behind it all.

N. S.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 1 [illegible] 1945

Concert Given At Carnegie Hall By Bostonians

Works of Schumann, Haydn and Villa-Lobos Played; Koussevitzky Conducts

By Jerome D. Bohm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, concert in Carnegie Hall last night, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The program:

Symphony No. 102, B flat................Haydn
"Rudepoema"..............................Villa-Lobos
Symphony No. 1, B flat..................Schumann

It is this reviewer's unpleasant task to report that the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Wednesday night was a disappointing one which pursued a course considerably below this great organization's customary superlative level of achievement. This was less due to shortcomings in the ensemble as such, although even on this score everything was no so flawless as usual, several entrances in the Schumann Symphony being not quite on the beat.

The trouble seemed to lie principally with Mr. Koussevitzky, who, until the final movement of the Schumann Symphony, had difficulty in immersing himself completely in the music. The interpretation of the Haydn Symphony was leaden-footed, wanting in rhythmic grace and lightness, in delicacy of nuance and in dynamic variegation. In short, the spirit of Haydn was nowhere perceptible. The tonal investiture accorded this wonderful work was syrupy and wanting in transparency of texture.

Villa - Lobos's "Rudepoema," which received its first New York performance in orchestral dress, having been arranged from a piano piece originally penned for Artur Rubinstein, is a characteristic product of the Brazilian composer. It is a disjointed, episodic work, flitting from night club to jungle without pausing for breath. The orchestral din is unabating, and the ear tires long before the end of this effusion which sounds like Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" divested of its ideas and transferred from the Volga River to the banks of the Amazon. Here, however, the virtuosity of the orchestra found congenial material and the performance was all that could be desired, since the musical values concerned were slight.

But when Mr. Koussevitzky returned after the intermission to conduct the Schumann First Symphony he proved to be still in the musical doldrums, which had vitiated the effectiveness of his conception of the Haydn Symphony. The opening movement was all of one piece dynamically, almost consistently too loud, and conveying little of the music's exuberance for all the glowing sonorities achieved. The exquisite Larghetto movement was treated with a similar lack of reticence along dynamic lines, little of its intimately poetic message being suggested. The Schumannesque humor of the Scherzo was only permitted to peer forth in the second trio, and it was not until the Finale was reached that Mr. Koussevitzky's lethargy was dispelled and his conception suddenly took on the essential vitality and imaginative perceptiveness.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

MAR 20 1945

Jules Wolffers, who writes reviews of Boston's music for some of the national music magazines, states — "Under Serge Koussevitzky's insistent educational programming, Symphony hall patrons have learned to listen to new music with considerable politeness and some discrimination. A modicum of mild enthusiasm is to be noted from time to time, particularly when the music does not offend too violently the more orthodox ear. But at heart the Boston andience is almost incurably conservative; give it an established masterpiece, provide a celebrity as soloist, and the hearers will let you know that this is what they have been waiting for."

Mr. Wolffers has very neatly expressed the reaction of most of the country to new music.

MUSIC

May. 24

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the 20th program of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Mona Paulee, soprano, was the soloist. The program:

Symphony No. 4 in G major......Mahler
Recitative and aria "Adieu, forets" from "Maid of Orleans"....Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 2, Op. 35 ....Creston

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

It is a very odd thing that Mahler has never caught on in this country, or in any country but Holland. He is a veritable fountain of heady, luscious melody, piquant, fetching rhythms, novel orchestral effects and sonorities and highly personal but dramatic programmatic implications. His Fourth Symphony, heard (amazingly enough) in its entirety for the first time here yesterday is all of these things and many more, and you would have thought it would bring down the house. It was surprisingly well received, yes, but the house was never imperilled.

In the first place, of course, Mahler just isn't heard in this or any other country (but Holland). Only a few (who have banded together like Nelson Eddy fans to revere their idol) really know and love him. And for that poor Mahler had only himself to thank. He sought to corner the concert market by writing symphonies which would fill an entire concert and which, moreover, required either soloists or a host of extra help. This proved to be both a conceit and an impracticality and Mahler remains in the closet while lesser men clutter up the parlor.

But there is more to it than that, I think, and the Fourth Symphony displays Mahler's great strength and his great weakness in striking fashion. In it he becomes as a child entering a forbidden fairyland. . . and remaining there, as a child, altogether too long for his or for his distracted parents' good. We, as good Anglo-Saxon listeners with good Anglo-Saxon consciences and reserves, somehow know that this exquisiteness, this incredible beauty, this blissful vision, this protracted pleasure is not good for us. And while we marvel at the incomparable melodic enchantment of the cellos in the second theme of the first movement, or at the delightful drolleries of the scherzo, or at the suspended incandescence of the beginning of the slow movement, or at the child-like enchantments of the versus sung by the soprano in the last movement, we cannot but wonder if we should enjoy anything so much.

Mahlerites in the audience tell me Richard Burgin played it a little too lingeringly, but it sounded, I must say, wonderfully well-played to me. Indeed, his feeling for nuance, for balance and for that peculiar quality you can only call Mahlerian, seemed especially acute and vital, while the orchestral performance—in recalling only the opening bars of the adagio—was well-nigh stupefying. Mona Paulee, one of the best vocal soloists the orchestra has invested in in some time, sang the closing movement beautifully and tenderly, and her every word could be understood. She returned after the interval to do a striking performance of Tchaikovsky's recitative and aria, and made an impressive success with the audience.

The Creston Symphony seemed to me an entertaining piece of work in a light, contemporary and honest vein. It makes no pretense whatever: it says it is a song and dance, and so it is. The song is most attractive and the dance good and exciting. I don't know what more anyone could want.

BRYN MAWR, PA HOME NEWS
3/23/45

IN THE WORLD OF RECORDED MUSIC

By Joseph E. Barone, Mus. D.

Director, Bryn Mawr Conservatory of Music

Harold In Italy

Victor's first major symphonic release since the recording ban was lifted last November is also the first recording in nearly five years by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Starring William Primrose, acclaimed as the greatest living master of the viola, the work is the first complete and only American recording of Hector Berlioz' "Harold in Italy, Opus 16." Housed in a handsome picture album, it is being released by Victor as a national special for April.

Musically, the work might be described as a concerto for viola; the title of the opus having been suggested by Byron's wandering hero. However, the four movements do not follow musically the action of the poem. Some index to the nature of this lush nineteenth century French romanticism may be found in the names of the movements: 1, Harold in the Mountains, Scenes of Melancholy, Happiness and Joy; 2, March of Pilgrims Singing their Evening Hymn; 3, Serenade of a Mountaineer of the Abruzzito to his Mistress, and 4, the turbulent and richly orchestrated final movement, subtitled Orgy of Brigands.

The composition has a fantastic history, since it was commissioned by the ailing Paganini, whose fame as a virtuoso of his famous Stradivarious viola was second only to his glamour as the most famous violinist of all time. When the work was completed, Paganini—who had not discussed prices with Berlioz—sent the composer twenty thousand francs, on which the grateful Berlioz supported his family while he wrote his "Romeo and Juliet Symphony." Oddly enough, Paganini never performed "Harold in Italy", presumably because he was in ill health when the work was completed. As a matter of fact, he died a little more than a year after Berlioz turned over the score to him.

Of the performance, it is enough to say that the Boston Symphony Orchestra maintains that high standard which has made it one of America's finest musical organizations. On the technical side, the sonorities are superlative.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
MAR 25 1945

Record Reviews:

Berlioz Symphony First Big Work Of New Releases

BERLIOZ, Hector (1803-1869).—Harold in Italy, Opus 16. Played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. William Primrose, viola soloist. Victor Album 989, five twelve-inch disks, $5.50.

Putatively this work was inspired by Byron's Childe Harold, but actually this source of inspiration can be disregarded. The thematic material was assembled as a concerto for Paganini who was in the mood to play the viola. He repudiated the work for its lack of bravura. Paganini was not content just to make music.

Berlioz didn't waste it. Harold in Italy emerged as virtually a programmatic symphony with sufficient emphasis on the viola solos to merit today the engagement of the best violist, William Primrose. In texture and musical idiom it is inspired by the Liszt tone poem. In contemporary light it is far better symphonic music than Liszt ever devised and stands up tall with the creations of Respighi and Richard Strauss.

The employment of symphonic resources is brilliant and advanced, even sophisticated by modern standards. The Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky plays Harold in Italy devoutly. The superb workmanship, the felicitious invention recommend Harold in Italy as a work deserving greater popularity in contemporary concert repertory.

This recording was made in Boston's Symphony Hall within a week after the Petrillo ban was resolved. It is, therefore, Victor's first major new cutting in two and a half years and also the return of the Boston Symphony after a five-year interdiction by the union.

Only musical values are important in the long run. This is music that deserves to live and to be reheard often in the living room. The performance is notable and the engineering is as of the latest wrinkle.

JOHN ROSENFIELD.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 18 1945

Koussevitzky Conducts Concert at Carnegie Hall

Bostonians Play Mozart, Ravel, Debussy and Hanson

Three of the four numbers played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall were a joy to hear. Or rather, three different kinds of joys. The playing of the Mozart E-flat Major Symphony (K.543) at the opening of the program was a criterion of the kind of beauty that can be made by classical, consonant writing when the performing ensemble is really together. Much of this feeling of easy precision came from the caressing suavity of the string section, whose perfect synchronization was most in evidence in the first two movements.

The two other pleasures were the unequaled readings of Debussy's sunlit "Prelude à L'Apres-Midi d'un Faune!", in which lucidity of orchestral balance reached its zenith for the afternoon, and Ravel's "La Valse." The tingling carnal sounds written into this work were all brought out by the excited Mr. Koussevitzky, and the nervous impact received by the listener at the end of the piece was as energizing as the lingering cadence at the end of the "Faune" had been relaxing.

After the intermission, the audience was given Howard Hanson's Third Symphony. Nothing happens here. The instrumentation and material are Brahmsian but, turbid; the working-out of themes is unfeeling, unimaginative and pedestrian. It has the modernism of the Waldort lobby; it is "contemporary" music written for pretentious people

---

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Globe By CYRUS DURGIN Mar. 24

This week's musical Award of Merit—were there one—would go to Richard Burgin who, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday gave the first Boston performance of Mahler's entire Fourth Symphony. Three years ago he introduced the two last movements; it has been understood that he long has wanted to play the complete work.

The soloist this time is Mona Paulee, Metropolitan Opera soprano, who also is heard in the aria "Adieu, forets" out of Tchaikovsky's opera "Jeanne d'Arc." The program is completed with the first Boston performances of the Second Symphony by Paul Creston.

It really is astonishing, when you come to think of it, that we so long have been denied such a score as Mahler's Fourth, which, though difficult, requires no abnormally large orchestra. The Fourth is not unlike Mahler's First. In each the dominant elements are fantasy and grotesquerie, a free and happy play of childlike imagination, laced with sophisticated technic. Both are untouched by that psychical torment and darkness of the later Mahler.

The Fourth is all blue skies and sunshine, daisies in the field and a warm breeze blowing — probably from the southwest. Paul Stefan said, no doubt spilliing a few tears into his beer as he did so, that the solo violin of the scherzo—tuned A-E-B-F-sharp—could be a good-natured Death fiddling for the people. He must be wrong; it is no more than the lightest of Cirrus clouds.

Musically the Fourth is very skilled, with its highly involved counterpoint beneath the childlike tunes. That melody—note the distinction—of the adagio, is celestially beautiful.

Miss Paulee sang in English the solo of the finale, a peasant's idea of Heaven, from that collection of literary early German romanticism that fascinated Mahler, "The Boy's Magic Horn." It went very nicely, not alone with pure and rich tones, but with admirable style and delightful naivete. Mr. Burgin conducted splendidly and secured a very good performance, although he took the whole thing so leisurely as to make it last a full hour.

Composed in 1944, Mr. Creston's Second Symphony falls in two longish movements: Introduction and Song, and Interlude and Dance. It is not very original; you can find hints of Roy Harris and Rachmaninoff and Hindmith, and perhaps it doesn't have very much to say. Yet the scoring is able, there are tunes and lively rhythms. Furthermore, a work that sends one out of the hall humming a theme from Rachmaninoff's E minor Symphony, has more to recommend it than one which makes you wonder if the composer is restricted to a diet of sour pickles.

Mona Paulee for Soloist, Richard Burgin Conducting

Monitor By L. A. Sloper Mar. 24.

Three years ago Richard Burgin, doing his tour of duty as relief conductor, introduced to Boston the second half of Mahler's Fourth Symphony, in G major. This week, in the same capacity, he is giving the first Boston hearing to the complete work. Mona Paulee of the Metropolitan Opera is the soprano soloist for the final movement, and she fills out her engagement by singing also a Recitative and Air, "Adieu, forêts," from Tchaikovsky's opera, "The Maid of Orleans," unheard "at these concerts" for 45 years. Finally, the program is rounded off with the first Boston performance of Paul Creston's Symphony No. 2.

The Battle of Mahler still rages. His music is as controversial as Dumbarton Oaks. It has been called almost everything. Mr. Burk in his program notes is reminded that Marc Connelly's (not Connolly's) "Green Pastures" was "not the first reflection of a faith which is strong because confiding and unquestioning, which is born of wonderment, is the source of folklore, and gives birth to true poetry."

* * *

But are all such reflections of equal value? No one questions Mahler's sincerity, but although sincerity is an admirable trait of character, it is hardly the complete equipment of an artist. Surely the test of a work of art is not good intentions but good performance.

Tovey called Mahler a musical Dickens. A telling phrase, and those who like Dickens will no doubt like Mahler. The fact that his shortest symphony, the Fourth, is three-quarters of an hour long will not trouble the readers of Dickens. The fact that the composer is so fond of his themes that he repeats them endlessly will not seem to them a cause for repining. Probably they will find it hugely diverting that the solo violin in the Scherzo is tuned higher than the rest of the orchestra. And no doubt they will find very touching the materialistic conception of Heaven as a place where there is plenty of fruit and vegetables, Peter catches the fish, Martha does the cooking, Ursula's 11,000 maidens dance, and Cecilia has charge of the court music.

* * *

Well, every man to his taste. In a democracy you can't forbid a man to like Dickens; neither, fortunately, can you force him to do so. If some of us prefer artists with greater restraint and self-criticism, we cannot be imprisoned for that—yet.

Miss Paulee sang the paradisiac verses with the proper naïvete, and the Tchaikovsky air with dramatic intensity. She has a voice of good quality, well trained. It was constricted at the beginning, but it soon became free. She also has clear diction in both English and French. She won generous applause.

Mr. Creston's Second Symphony left no particular impression. The composer seems to know his way about an orchestra, but there was nothing to indicate that he had a musical message of significance to convey.

N.Y. Herald

Koussevitzky Conducts Concert at Carnegie Hall

Mar. 18

Bostonians Play Mozart, Ravel, Debussy and Hanson

Three of the four numbers played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall were a joy to hear. Or rather, three different kinds of joys. The playing of the Mozart E-flat Major Symphony (K.543) at the opening of the program was a criterion of the kind of beauty that can be made by classical, consonant writing when the performing ensemble is really together. Much of this feeling of easy precision came from the caressing suavity of the string section, whose perfect synchronization was most in evidence in the first two movements.

The two other pleasures were the unequaled readings of Debussy's sunlit "Prelude à L'Apres-Midi d'un Faune!", in which lucidity of orchestral balance reached its zenith for the afternoon, and Ravel's "La Valse." The tingling carnal sounds written into this work were all brought out by the excited Mr. Koussevitzky, and the nervous impact received by the listener at the end of the piece was as energizing as the lingering cadence at the end of the "Faune" had been relaxing.

After the intermission, the audience was given Howard Hanson's Third Symphony. Nothing happens here. The instrumentation and material are Brahmsian but turbid; the working-out of themes is unfeeling, unimaginative and pedestrian. It has the modernism of the Waldort lobby; it is "contemporary" music written for pretentious people

RED CROSS SYMPHONY ON APRIL 8 AT GARDEN

Her Mar 25

City, State, Church Leaders Spur Drive

In a dramatic effort to save the $1,192,600 Greater Boston Red Cross War Fund drive from impending disaster, civic, state and religious leaders last night threw their full strength into the campaign's climax.

Appeals by Archbishop Cushing, Bishop Sherrill, Gov. Tobin and Mayor Kerrigan were added to those of other leaders in an eleventh hour plea for "immediate and generous" contributions to the fund by every citizen in Greater Boston as the last resort in attaining the goal in the drive.

An outstanding contribution to the fund will be the Red Cross War Fund Sypmony Concert, sponsored by the Retail Trade Board of Boston at Boston Garden Sunday, April 8 at 3:30 P. M. It is expected that this special event will raise at least $60,000 to help swell the total.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will present Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society of more than 300 trained voices.

In addition, through the co-operation of the Metropolitan Opera Association, solo parts will be sung by four Metropolitan Opera stars of national reputation.

ALL EXPENSES DONATED

These stars of opera and all other artists on the program are donating their services and the Garden management is giving its facilities for the event. All other expenses are being borne by the Retail Trade Board member stores.

This contribution to the Red Cross by the stores is in addition to all the regular subscriptions by the various firms and their employes.

Even though more than 70 per cent. of all seats will be within the same distance from the stage as at Symphony Hall, acoustics engineers from Boston and New York have solved the many Garden sound problems, so that all seats will be comparable in listening value to any of those in Symphony Hall.

Tickets, scaled in price at $2, $3, $5, $7.50 and $10 each, will go on sale tomorrow in all Retail Trade Board member stores. The Garden, for this kind of event can accomodate 13,500 seats, so that disappointments may be eliminated by early purchases.

Seldom has such a musical opportunity been available to so many persons in Boston, and offers everyone a chance to help "keep the Red Cross at his side."

Informed by Phillips Ketchum, general chairman of the drive, that the fund lacked $686,396 of the $4,192,600 yesterday noon, Archbishop Cushing issued an appeal, saying: "The money can be raised only if everyone makes his gift, and if everyone who has given only a part of what he can, gives the rest. Monday, March 26, is the closing day."

LEADERS APPEAL

Archbishop Cushing also announced he had asked all parish priests in the Boston archdiocese to make special Red Cross War Fund appeals at all masses today.

Bishop Sherrill said: "Sincere word has come that there is very real danger that we may not reach, in this community, the goal of the Red Cross. The call to us all is immediate and pressing for every reason of religion, idealism and practical necessity."

Rabbi Liebman of Temple Israel said the Red Cross "can go as our ambassador of mercy where no one of us individually can go. We Bostonians will have a haunted sleep if we allow complacency and indifference to deafen our ears to the greatest humanitarian call of our age."

Calling the plight of the Red Cross a "tragedy of major proportions" Gov. Tobin declared: "I submit that if the Red Cross fails in this campaign the Red Cross will not be the loser; you of Greater Boston will be the sufferers as will you men in uniform who are winning their campaigns in the face of warfare's horrors."

For the City of Boston Mayor Kerrigan urged a "last minute reexamination by Bostonians of their consciences" and a reappraisal of their capacity to give to the Red Cross."

TELEPHONE SET-UP FOR FUND PLEDGES

A battery of telephones by means of which girls will accept pledges of donations to the Red Cross War Fund throughout today and tomorrow was set up yesterday to handle last-minute gifts. The number is Kenmore 6226.

Cash donations should be brought to the 10th floor of campaign headquarters, 101 Milk street, or to Red Cross receiving stations that have been set up in all Greater Boston banks.

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR TESTIFIES

Koussevitzky Opposes $32,587 Tax Levy on Estate

An appeal by the executors of the estate of Mrs. Nathalie Koussevitsky, wife of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, against the levying of a deficiency of $32,587.87 in estate taxes by the commissioner of internal revenue, was heard by Judge Eugene Black of the Tax Court of the United States at a special tax session at the Federal building yesterday.

The government contends and petitioners deny that transfer of bank and agency accounts held by Mrs. Koussevitzky for 11 years, from May of 1930 to December, 1941, to a joint account for her husband and herself in the latter month was made in contemplation of death. She died suddenly Jan. 11, 1942, a few hours after suffering a cerebral stroke. According to the papers the valuation of the account at the time of the transfer was $91,162.31.

Dr. Koussevitzky, testifying that he was an executor under his wife's will, said emphatically that her death was most unexpected, although she had had a shock in the summer of 1940 while at their summer home in Lenox. She seemed to have entirely recovered, he said. He said that he had always expected to die before she did. Louis Pasteur, eminent French scientist, he declared, had not been incapacitated by a shock and actually had done his greatest work after the stroke. Mrs. Koussevitzky, witness said, had never mentioned the likelihood of death.

The world-renowned conductor said, in response to questions from counsel, that his wife had handled all financial transactions because he was so busy. "Music was everything to me," he said, emotionally. "I never even signed a check." Dr. Koussevitsky said that in December, 1941, he made his usual concert tour and in accordance with a custom of many years telephoned his wife daily. Even in bygone years when he has been in Vienna and elsewhere in Europe he had observed this practice. On the morning of her death he was in New York and, as usual, made the customary phone call. She was well, up and about, and even gay, he said, giving no intimation that her condition was any worse than it had been. That evening she was stricken and died within four hours.

Dr. Roger I. Lee of 264 Beacon st., president-elect of the American Medical Association, family physician for the Koussevitzkys for 20 years, said that she was in good health, except for minor ailments such as common colds, etc., up to the time of the stroke in 1940. Thereafter, however, she made a complete recovery, he said, and was in good condition when he last saw her Dec. 31, 1941, just 11 days before her sudden end.

Atty. Robert G. Dodge appeared for the petitioner and the government was represented by Carl A. Stutsman, from the tax commissioner's office in Washington. Judge Black asked both attorneys to submit briefs to him, and after a study of these and the evidence presented, he will render a decision, probably in July.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 25 1945

'HAROLD IN ITALY'

By MARK A. SCHUBART

THE first American recording of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" is Victor's initial major post-ban offering (Album DM-989, five twelve-inch records). The recording artists are Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with William Primrose playing the viola solos.

"Harold in Italy," like most of Berlioz' big works, is rarely performed and even more rarely recorded. The French composer's music, perhaps because of its overpowering individuality, has never achieved the popularity of its contemporaries, though Berlioz enthusiasts are likely to be extremely emphatic about their taste, as are Bruckner and Mahler followers. But even Berlioz' more lukewarm auditors recognize the stature of the composer and the importance of his music. For, as one Berlioz admirer said, he is perhaps the only direct musical descendant of Beethoven.

Dr. Koussevitzky has always been a champion of Berlioz in general and of "Harold in Italy" in particular. His performance for the present recording is an appropriately colorful one, and the powerful language of the composer is allowed to sound forth, unfettered. Mr. Primrose deals competently with the viola solos and continues to be an eloquent champion of the instrument's virtues. The work is, of course, by no means a concerto. Despite the fact that it was commissioned by Paganini (supposedly for 10,000 francs), the viola part is subsidiary to the general structure of the work, though important in many respects. Judging from this performance, Mr. Primrose understands such matters perfectly, and his performance reflects credit on his musicianship.

From the point of view of recording, the album seems extremely competent, though far from remarkable. The two years during which no records were manufactured appear to have wrought few changes in recording technique, despite occasional extravagant claims to the contrary. It is safe to assume that when the war situation permits the installation of new equipment and the expenditure of more time on research, we will have new developments—both on records and record players. Meanwhile, do not expect anything startling. The future is not as yet with us.

In the Popular Field

"After Dark," Morton Gould and his orchestra (Columbia, Album C-107, four twelve-inch records). Mr. Gould is one of the most strikingly original talents on the present musical scene and one of the most fluent. He also wastes a lot of time. The present album, which includes chic arrangements of such items as "Temptation," "Speak Low" and "Besame Mucho," is an excellent example of Mr. Gould wasting his time. The arrangements are slick, elaborate, inventive, juicy, tricky. They represent a large expenditure of energy on Mr. Gould's part and of money on Columbia's. We wish both of them, as well as this album, well. We also wish that Mr. Gould would write more music, and spend as little time playing confectioner to other people's music as is necessary to earn him a living.

"Song of Norway." Excerpts from the score of the Broadway show as sung by Irra Petina and Robert Weede, accompanied by an orchestra conducted by Sylvan Shulman (Columbia, Album M-562, three twelve-inch records). Watered-down, cut, re-orchestrated, and just plain rewritten Grieg may be very satisfactory stuff for the pit of a theatre, but it certainly is dull fare for passive listening. Miss Petina is a pleasant personality and Mr. Weede a competent baritone, but the spectacle of commercial jazz interspersed with shreds of genuine, authentic Grieg is too discouraging a one to permit enjoyment of their labors.

Music of George Gershwin. André Kostelanetz and his orchestra (Columbia Album MM-559, four ten-inch records). Typical Kostelanetz productions of such innocent victims as "Embraceable You," "The Man I Love," "Soon" and "Lady, Be Good." Strictly commercial, and for Kostelanetz addicts only.

YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR

MAR 25 1945

Make 1st Complete Recording Of Berlioz' "Harold in Italy"

Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony, and Viola Master Are Heard in Popular Classic

By Col. L. R. Boals

RCA Victor's first major symphonic release since the recording ban was lifted last November is also the first recording made in nearly five years by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Starring William Primrose, acclaimed by common consent as the greatest living master of the viola, the work is the first complete and only American recording of Hector Berlioz's "Harold in Italy, Op. 16."

Musically the work is variously described as a symphony, a symphonic-poem, and as a concerto for viola and orchestra. Paganini, the violin virtuoso of the early part of the 19th Century, commissioned Berlioz to compose a solo for his Stradivarius viola. The result was "Harold in Italy," which was given its first performance at the Paris Conservatory in 1834, with Paganini as soloist. It is a work of symphonic proportions, being in four movements entitled: I. Harold in the Mountains, Scenes of Melancholy, Happiness and Joy; II. March of Pilgrims Singing Their Evening Hymn; III. Serenade of a Mountaineer of the Abruzzito to his Mistress; and, IV. Orgy of Brigands.

Berlioz's inspiration was derived from Byron's "Childe Harold's Pilgrimage." Tovey, the English composer and critic, had a good time to himself pointing out the smallness of the relationship between Byron's work and Berlioz's sub-titles and music. The obvious answer seems to be, "So what?" Don't poets deviate from strict fact or rule? Why can't composers do so also? Perhaps Tovey doesn't know what Hollywood sometimes does to stories after paying fabulous prices for them.

The important thing is that Berlioz has written a superbly orchestrated score, and, while the solo part probably did not tax the virtuosity of Paganini, or of Mr. Primrose, it gives the soloist plenty of opportunity to display his tone and musicianship. Mr. Primrose shows complete mastery of his instrument, and the great Boston orchestra, led by Mr. Koussevitzky, an exponent of Berlioz's music, gives its usual outstanding performance. On the technical side, the Victor engineers, who recorded the work in Boston's "Symphony Hall," less than a week after the Petrillo ban was lifted, achieved a perfect balance between solois and orchestra. The surfaces are excellent.

Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" is housed in a handsome picture album on the 10 sides of a five-disk set, DM-989.

CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER

MAR 22 1945

VICTOR OFFERS 'LAST SPRING'

The lilting waltz from Tchaikowsky's "Serenade for Strings," which the composer in a rare burst of self-confidence once proclaimed "the best thing I have written," and Edvard Grieg's "The Last Spring," one of the ornaments of the score of the current Broadway hit operetta "Song of Norway," are performed to perfection by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitszky on a 12-inch Red Seal single, which Victor now releases.

The Tchaikowsky waltz has previously been available only as an odd side in the Boston Symphony's sonorous rendition on records of the Tchaikowsky Fourth Symphony. It is coupled with Grieg's "The Last Spring" in answer to the enormous increased interest in the music of Grieg which followed hard on the heels of the success of "Song of Norway," a melodiously romantic biography of the composer.

The Serenade was written in 1880, while Tchaikowsky was enjoying the patronage of his "beloved friend," Madame von Meck. According to his biographers, the composer did have his moments of relaxation, of utter peace and contentment with the world. Much of this easy-going happiness found expression in his "String Serenade." The waltz from this score, in particular, bubbles over with rare charm and good humor. Like the Tchaikowsky "Serenade," Grieg's "The Last Spring" gives the string section of one of America's greatest orchestras a chance to demonstrate its famous flawless playing.

rding Italy" la Master

e since the he first re-oussevitzky

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH
MAR 25 1945

Music and Music Makers

Hector Berlioz

By Thomas B. Sherman

THE first complete recording ever made of the symphonic drama, "Harold in Italy," by Hector Berlioz, has just been released by the Victor company (five records). The recording was made by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The viola obligatto is played by William Primrose.

Koussevitzky's untrammeled temperament makes him the ideal interpreter for this and for all the other major compositions of Berlioz. The Boston maestro is not deficient in taste but he is really not at his best unless he has a full-sized passion which he is at liberty to tear into tatters. The music of Berlioz is just what he needs. It is poetic, extravagant and full of allusions that require all sorts of unusual orchestral effects.

Berlioz's extravagance was not confined to his music. He was not a quiet little man who ate his omelette by the clock and kept an account in the corner savings bank. His life, like his music, was full of excitement, rebellion, suffering and romantic postures. Indeed, he was the very prototype of the desperate, half-starved, long-haired artist—so much so that a playwright who attempted to put his life into dramatic form would have to throw out at least two-thirds of the material in order to keep his play within reasonable bounds.

★ ★ ★

As a boy he conceived a tremendous passion for an actress named Estelle. He never met her until many years afterward when he was almost at the end of his career and she, after a long and exciting life on the French stage, had been in retirement for almost 20 years. The sight and the few mumbling words of this quavering old woman were quite as electrifying to him as when he had first heard her on the stage in his native Grenoble. All he could say when he walked out of her presence was: "It was always her love that I wanted."

★ ★ ★

BERLIOZ'S rebellion against the orderly and "philistine" ways of the life surrounding him began with his refusal to follow the career his father had chosen for him. He complied with the parental will only long enough to enter a medical college in Paris but gave it up almost immediately. The routine of the classroom bored him and he recoiled in horror from the dissecting laboratory.

His insecure grounding in the fundamentals of musical composition is sometimes explained by the fact that his formative years were spent in aimless studies—such as materia medica—which brought no response from him and left no impression on him. This is pure hypothesis but it is quite evident from his music that he cared less for form than for content, that his harmonic progressions were awkward and that he disdained the uses of counterpoint.

★ ★ ★

YET BERLIOZ WAS a true original. He was the father of modern program music—all of his compositions have very specific programs—and his ideas on orchestration, as expressed in his famous treatise on that subject, were regarded by Richard Strauss, Weingartner and others as standard. Even now, when orchestral virtuosity is a gift that many ordinary composers seem to possess, the Berlioz orchestra is still vivid and arrestingly descriptive.

Moreover, Berlioz is capable of the most delicate and sensitive fantasy. The "Queen Mab" scherzo from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony is as perfect a transcription of the poetic imagery of Shakespeare as Mendelssohn's equally famous "Midsummer Night's Dream" scherzo.

★ ★ ★

Much of his melodic writing seems blatant, largely because of the perfervid orchestration. But he could also write touchingly, as in the "King of Thule" aria from the "Damnation of Faust," "The Childhood of Christ" and in parts of the viola solo from "Harold in Italy."

★ ★ ★

THE BRILLIANT NEW recording by the Boston orchestra provides a hearing for a work that has almost disappeared from the repertory of American orchestras. One reason for this almost unanimous neglect of "Harold in Italy" is in the dilemma created by the necessity of having a first rank viola soloist. Conductors do not like to entrust the work to a man from the orchesral ranks and orchestral managements seem to have an unconquerable aversion to engaging viola soloists.

This is to be regretted. For while "Harold in Italy" has many passages which are nothing but sound and fury, it is on the whole an eloquent and deeply felt poetic composition.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
MORNING TRIBUNE
MAR 25 1945

RECORDED MUSIC

Victor's recording of Berlioz' HAROLD IN ITALY symphony (DM-989, $5.78) is something to make you throw your hat in the air. Its issue marks not only the entry of this discursive, richly romantic and little-heard work into the disc catalogs but a return (permanent, we hope) of quality, full-range recording. Even the swing groove that stops the record works.

The performance is the first since the Petrillo ban was lifted of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. William Primrose plays the important viola role. The two artists and orchestra all work together with beautiful union of interpretative skill, enhanced and made truly eloquent by the roundness and color of the sound reproduction.

The symphony (last played here by Mitropoulos in 1939) is based on Byron's "Childe Harold" and was written for Paganini, who didn't like it and never played it. Typical of Berlioz, it contains both his eerie frenzies and his pastoral moods, is linear and prolix; and its thematic originality and curious hues and instrumental combinations sound strangely modern in 1945. If you have a taste for Berlioz, this is a "must" for your music library. —J.K.S.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Post Mar. 24

Not that it had been very serious competition, but Mahler's Fourth Symphony, in its inexcusably belated first full performance hereabouts, completely stole the show at yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert. To dispose of these lesser matters first, the air, "Adieu, forets" from Tchaikovsky's "The Maid of Orleans," sung by Mona Paulee of the Metropolitan, sounded unbelievably trite after the exquisitely fanciful finale of Mahler, in which Miss Paulee also sang the soprano solo based on verses of the old Bavarian folk song, "In Heaven Hang Many Fiddles." And Paul Creston's Second Symphony, new to Boston, sounded, after the Mahler, commonplace and generally footless, yet it is pleasant enough in its way and might have appeared to better advantage in other company.

Like Beethoven's Fourth, this is Mahler's symphonic idyll. In the first movement and elsewhere he has recaptured something of the style and spirit of Haydn and Mozart. But this is no mere experiment in neo-classicism. While essentially Mahlerish, the always charming melodic material has in it more often the element of folk song, though the beautiful chief theme of the slow movement does not fit in either of these categories. The inevitable touch of the bizarre occurs, in modified form, in the Scherzo.

Mr. Burgin conducted a performance than can only be described as loving. Perhaps by lavishing so much attention on every fascinating detail he slightly held up the progress of the whole. Though her costume was ill-suited to the simplicity of verses and music, Miss Paulee brought to her solo the innocent delight and just the quality of voice that it demands. The audience rewarded her, Mr. Burgin and the deserving orchestra with warm applause.

CHICAGO, ILL.
JOURNAL OF COMMERCE
MAR 23 1945

RECORDS

'Harold in Italy'; Tschaikowsky and Grieg; Coming Events; Singles; Populars

By William Leonard

FLUSHED with the excitement of its first major symphonic release since the musicians' union lifted its recording ban last November, Victor rushed copies of Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" to reviewers without even waiting for the picture album that will encase the set when it is distributed to retailers next month. The publication (DM-989, five twelve-inch records) not only represents Victor's first big new recording since July, 1942, but the first by the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1940, and the first American pressing of "Harold."

William Primrose's viola, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, the Bostonians and the Victor sound engineers have collaborated in a job that brings brilliance and luminosity of tone to a work that needs such imaginative treatment, for all its excellence of orchestration.

Mr. Primrose performs masterfully in a role which is not ideally suited for the display of a virtuoso's talents (as a matter of fact, Paganini, who commissioned the work for his own viola, was disappointed in its lack of theatrical effects for the sololist).

Mr. Koussevitzky draws effectively the colorful scenes depicted in a score whose wanderings and fitful outbursts understandably resemble those of another work based on Byron—the "Manfred" symphony by Tschaikowsky.

Much of the glorious orchestral tone which thrilled audiences at two Chicago concerts this season is reproduced with the same kind of effect on the ten record sides.

* * *

AS novel as the shipment of the above work, dispatched as a batch of records denuded of album covering, is a current Victor release consisting of two albums without any records. Handsomely illustrated volumes designed to hold twelve twelve-inch records, they are titled "Great Masterpieces for the Piano" and "Great Masterpieces from the Opera," and are the first in a series for storing individual records. Such albums heretofore have been devoid of illustration or titling, and this innovation should make an improvement in the appearance of home record libraries.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

CONDUCTORS

TO THE EDITOR:

In his discussion in THE TIMES Magazine of the increasing interest and respect with which concertgoers regard symphony orchestra leaders, Olin Downes makes the observation that the center of attention has shifted in our day from the prima donna to the conductor. With the exception of the most renowned of the baton wielders, such as Toscanini, Koussevitzky and Stokowski, public response to symphonic programs is predicated, I suspect, to a considerable extent on "name" soloists whose interpretations of the classical and modern concertos provide a needed diversity to the overtures, symphonies and tone-poems of the standard repertoire. While an orchestral season depending solely on the talents of the man occupying the podium might be artistically triumphant, it is more than a little doubtful whether it would be successful economically

THOMAS G. MORGANSEN.
New York.

Mar. 27 Trav.

Red Cross Benefit Concert April 8 Delights President

His "delight" and "approval" for the big Red Cross War Fund benefit concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and assisting artists April 8 is expressed by President Roosevelt in a message to Phillips Ketchum, chairman of the Greater Boston 1945 Red Cross War Fund drive.

"As President of the National American Red Cross, I am naturally delighted to hear that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and by four distinguished artists from the Metropolitan Opera Company, are to give a concert in the Boston Garden for the Benefit of the Greater Boston 1945 Red Cross War Fund.

"I understand that more than 13,000 people will have the opportunity of hearing Beethoven's Ninth or Choral Symphany under the conductorship of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and that they will listen with the additional satisfaction of knowing that the entire receipts of this great concert will go to the Red Cross War Fund," he wrote.

"Such a blending of the arts and the needs of a great cause cannot fail at this time to win public approval as it has already won mine," he concluded. This concert is being sponsored by the Retail Trade Board of Boston in the Red Cross drive. Tickets are obtainable at all Boston Retail Trade Board member stores. The concert will be at Boston Garden Sunday afternoon, April 8, at 3:30 o'clock. The need for the resultant revenue for the Red Cross is desperate—and the performance, made possibly only by the generosity of all the participating artists and the management of Boston Garden, will present an afternoon of the world's finest music.

[illegible] Mar. 28

4 Metropolitan Opera Stars For Red Cross Concert Named

Herald Mar. 28

Predicting that additional gifts this week will swell the Greater Boston War Fund beyond the 101 per cent. announced Monday night, Phillips Ketchum, general chairman of the drive, yesterday hailed the victory as an "achievement of national importance."

"The Greater Boston campaign," he said, "was the largest allied effort in the nation and the first in any comparable area to reach its goal. Citizens and volunteers in the 43 cooperating communities may feel that they have done their share to keep the Red Cross at the side of their men in uniform in 1945."

Ketchum revealed that as late as 6 P. M. Monday estimates were that there was a deficit of about $175,000, "but," said he, "the inflow of many gifts continued so that at 9 P. M., although the margin was very small, it could be stated with confidence that the $4,192,600 goal had been passed."

Meanwhile, the names of the Metropolitan stars who are to be heard on the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, sponsored by the Retail Trade Board of Boston, at Boston Garden, April 8, were announced.

They are Norman Cordon, Kurt Baum, Eleanor Steber and Kirstin Thorberg, who with the other artists, are contributing their services to help swell the Red Cross War Fund by at least $50,000.

The Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will also be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, to make the musical treat one long to be remembered.

The allied chapter of Cambridge had its own victory dinner yesterday at the Cambridge Chapter House to celebrate the raising of $314,424, which is 12 per cent. above the $283,000 quota. Winthrop H. Churchill, chairman, who at the Monday night dinner at the Hotel Statler, had announced Cambridge as over the top, said it was the largest goal the city had ever been asked to meet.

[68]

Globe

Koussevitzky "Tolerant" as He Rehearses Choral Group

Mar. 29

A raised eyebrow and a faintly chiding smile. That was all the usually fiery-tempered and volatile Dr. Serge Koussevitzky evinced when the combined Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society missed a cue or sang a bit too fortissimo in the wrong place.

"When you are singing at the Boston Garden, you will be singing some of the greatest music ever written. That is why you and I should demand perfection," Dr. Koussevitsky told the 300 singers from Harvard and Radcliffe at the first rehearsal last Monday at Sever Hall for the gala Red Cross benefit performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the Boston Garden Sunday afternoon, April 8, being sponsored by the Retail Trade Board.

Although tired and suffering from a cold, the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra led the glee clubs through their parts in Beethoven's "Choral" Symphony over and over again, urging them on to perfection.

Overlooks Slips

His manner of rehearsing this group differed greatly from rehearsals at Symphony Hall, according to onlookers. He was as intense and as absorbed as ever, but when a few scattered and obviously flustered soprano voices broke into a baritone section he merely shook his head and began over. At Symphony rehearsals, it was said, he is not quite so tolerant of a sloppy performance. Quite the opposite. The reproval as sacrosanct Symphony Hall is not gentle.

But this was something different. This was an eager and earnest group of students who realized they were being led by perhaps the greatest conductor in the world, and were singing one of the great masterpieces of music.

"Koussevitsky," one of the Boston Symphony officials said while the doctor was discussing a point with G. Wallace Woodward, director of the Harvard Glee Club, "feels that there is a mutual benefit from these concerts. He enjoys and is inspired by the youthful eagerness of the glee clubs and believes they receive much benefit from singing really great music."

The 300 singers, including several young men in Navy uniform, crowded into the little ampitheatre in Seaver Hall, Harvard, gave rapt attention while the doctor explained in precise terms how a certain three of four bars should be sung. Their eyes never moved from his expressive face. They listened intently to his pronounced but fascinating accent.

Before Koussevitsky made his appearance, the glee clubs were restless and excited. Every time the door opened they turned en masse, hoping it was the doctor.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL—Serge Koussevitsky leads combined Radcliffe and Harvard Glee Clubs in Ninth Symphony rehearsal.

When he finally did make his entrance they stood on the chairs and cheered and applauded wildly.

Conducts With Pencil

Before starting the rehearsal Dr. Koussevitsky asked for his "stick." There was no stick available. He was handed a long yellow pencil, which he accepted with a smile. "All my life," he said, "I have conducted with a stick and my pupils haven't liked it. Now I fear I shall have to do as my pupils want."

With that the young singers relaxed and really sang their hearts out. When they outdid themselves, Koussevitsky would demand they do even better. And they did.

During a rest period Dr. Koussevitzky explained to a Globe reporter that he was very much concerned over the success of the Red Cross benefit concert at the Garden.

"This Ninth Symphony is perhaps the culmination of Beethoven's career. It was written for the masses, for all people. Its theme is one of great joy and of the brotherhood of mankind. It is for the people, for humanity. That is why we think it is so appropriate for the Red Cross show. While it was written for the masses, they seldom have a chance to hear it. It is a difficult symphony to do for it demands a huge chorus and four individual singers. That is why we are delighted to be able to do it at the Garden, for a great number of people will be able to hear music written expressly for them."

Besides the Boston Symphony, the Harvard Glee Club, and the Radcliffe Choral Society, Metropolitan Opera stars will appear—Eleanor Steber, Kurt Baum, Kerstin Thorborg and Norman Cordon.

The concert will be given Sunday afternoon, April 8, and is being sponsored by the Retail Trade Board of Boston for the Greater Boston 1945 Red Cross War Fund. Tickets are available at all Boston Retail Trade Board member stores.

'Harold in Italy' and Other Pertinent Record Matters

Harold

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Mar. 27

If anybody, or at least anybody who has a phonograph which still creaks along somehow, has been hanging about in record shops the past few weeks waiting for the first post-Petrillo batch of Victor and Columbia releases to come along, he will be glad to learn—if indeed he doesn't already know—that the long-anticipated first-in-five-years recording of the Boston Symphony orchestra is now available and good times are here again.

The album is Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" long one of the Boston Symphony orchestra's ranking performances under Dr. Koussevitzky, whose way with Berlioz is little short of miraculous. To make it better, the solo viola part is played by William Primrose, and so it would hardly be stretching a point to consider this recording the last word in authority. And, recorded as it is with the utmost fidelity and mechanical excellence, it is a very satisfactory addition to almost anyone's record library.

The music, while by no means "great," is great fun. Byron's mauve hero is given his full purple coloring in the music which is by turns lush, super-romantic, sentimental, boisterous, heroically melancholy and sometimes just tiresome. But there are wonderfully entertaining effects of orchestration, of contrast between the solo viola and the orchestra and of sonority in general, while the tunes are heady and a little intoxicating. You can get the idea best from the sub-titles of the movements, which go like this: "Harold in the Mountains, Scenes of Melancholy, Happiness and Joy;" "March of the Pilgrims Singing Their Evening Hymn;" "Serenade of a Mountaineer of the Abruzzito to His Mistress" and "The Orgy of Brigands." The orchestra's marvelous brilliance and virtuosity is captured to the last drum roll while Dr. Koussevitzky's ardor and drive pervades the whole thing. I think you'll like it.

In the meantime Columbia has also rushed out with its first post-ban recordings, both of them familiar items to everyone; indeed, it is hard to imagine any record collector without them in his library. They are Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and Tchaikovsky's Sixth, the first done by the Philadelphia orchestra under Ormandy, the second by the New York Philharmonic under Artur Rodzinski. They are doubtless the best recordings of these works now on the market and those contemplating them can not go wrong. The Beethoven is especially well done from an interpretative standpoint, but both are above reproach, and both are excellently recorded to offer a minimum of reproduction difficulties. Still, I can see no reason why anybody should throw whatevery copy of these two works he already has into the dust bin simply because these are now available. It is much better to wait until both Columbia and Victor get around to recording something more novel. After all, the real purpose of a phonograph as I see it is to be able to play music on it you can otherwise only very seldom if ever hear.

Melchior's new album of "Scenes from Five Wagner Operas" comes under this heading it seems to me. To be sure, the set consists of reissues of the Hammer Song from "Siegfried," the Helmsman's song from "The Flying Dutchman," the love music from "Tristan" (Act II), the narrative from "Lohengrin" (Act III) and the Hymn to Venus from "Tannhaueser," but they make a splendid and valuable album, and they are exceedingly well done by Mr. Melchior and the orchestra.

In the same category is Brahms' G major Violin Sonata, Op. 78, performed by Yehudi and Hepzibah Menuhin. It is a beautiful, moody work with the distinction of all Brahms' chamber music yet with few virtuoso aspects. It takes a bit of hearing—another great asset of the phonograph (why buy music you're sure to tire of in a fortnight?) but it gets better all the time and there's an encore as Mr. Menuhin plays the Praeludium from Bach's Third Partita and plays it marvelously well.

There is a new Budapest Quartet recording for Columbia out recently which no one collecting recorded chamber music can overlook. It's Beethoven's C minor Quartet of Op. 18, an early but nonetheless warm, even passionate work whose occasional gayety is colored and sobered throughout by its minor mode. A perfect performance, too. Rather less successful is Marian Anderson's new Victor album of "Songs and Spirituals," chiefly because none of the songs give the singer a chance to turn on her impressive artistry. Still, as encores or occasional music, they are ingratiating and enjoyable. Included are "Will o' the Wisp," "The Cuckoo," Massenet's "Elegie," "Com' Thro' the Rye," "When Night Descends," Brahms' "Die Schnur, die Perl and Perle" and three Spirituals.

Another reissue—and a very notable one—is Brahms' B flat Piano Concerto performed by Vladimir Horowitz with the NBC orchestra under Toscanini. It is unquestionably the standard version of this great and beautiful composition and you'd better hustle out and get it right away before it disappears again from the market. The rest are single records and, for lack of space, I can only list the titles which speak, as a matter of fact, for themselves.

There are two orchestral medleys of "Oklahoma!" one by Kostelanetz (Columbia) and the other by the Boston Pops (Victor); there is Wieniawski's Capriccio Valse and the Romance from the D minor Concerto, performed by Erica Morini, violinist (Victor); Dvorak's "Songs My Mother Taught Me" and "Goin' Home," done by William Primrose, viola (Victor); Liadoff's "Kikimora" with the Halle orchestra conducted by Sir Adrian Boult (Victor); the Ave Marias of Bach-Gounod and Schubert played by Kostelanetz (Columbia) and Kreisler's "Liebesfreud" and Schubert's Serenade performed on the piano by Rachmaninoff (Victor).

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

MAR 29 1945

RECORD ALBUM

BY MARION BOONE.

RECORDED versions of Broadway musicals are common nowadays but a super wrap-up like Decca's new "Song of Norway" album is indeed a rarity. And St. Louis may rightly swell with pride over this one because it spotlights Municipal Opera stars Helena Bliss and Robert Shafer along with other members of the original New York cast.

The album (DA-382, 12-inch, 12 sides) is a transcription of the music from the operetta based on the life of Edvard Grieg and, in addition, carries enough dialog to tell the story in a thinly-fabricated fashion. With the Son of Norway orchestra and singing ensemble in support of principals, the disc makers have been highly successful in capturing the sentimental import of the story and atmospheric beauty of the tranquil Scandinavian setting.

In fact, by turning on just a bit of imagination, one might sit by his player for something like an hour and visualize the show right on our own Forest Park stage (which, of course, can't be a reality for a season or two.)

Helena Bliss

* * *

You'll find it best to play "Song of Norway" through at least once in proper sequence, then there'll be choice parts you'll play over to hear Shafer's fine rendition of the prelude and legend; or Lawrence Brooks and Miss Bliss blending in "Strange Music"; or Kent Edwards, Gwenn Jones and the chorus in "Freddy and His Fiddle."

* * *

Subbing for Irra Petina, prima donna of the show who with Robert Weede is out on a "Son of Norway" album for Columbia, is Kitty Carlisle, also known to Muny Opera patrons, in the role of Countess Louisa Giovanni for Decca.

By all standards—technically, musically, dramatically—Decca's album is big-time, eclipsing all else of similar effort. And to get the fullest enjoyment, follow the lyrics in a 28-page booklet with which each set is equipped.

* * *

THE new Victor recording of Hector Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" is something of an event inasmuch as it brings to the platter public for the first time this seldom-played, dramatic and colorful composition in its entirety by the Boston Symphony in an excellent performance under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky.

The work is symphonic in form, with a prominent viola part, beautifully played by William Primrose. It is based on the legend that served Lord Byron in the writing of "Childe Harold" and Tschaikowsky in his "Manfred" symphony. In character, "Harold in Italy" is highly emotional, moody and exciting—a typical example of "Hectic Hector's" high-flown, romantic writing.

The performance by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky is excellent.

* * *

HITS AND MISSES in the single parade: From Decca—Deanna Durbin's "Always" and "Spring Will Be a Little Late This Year." The re-arranger has given "Always" an odd tempo. Johnny Long's orchesra does "My Dreams Are Getting Better All the Time" satisfactorily, out "Candy" on the flip-over is disappointing; Bing Crosby's "All of My Life" and "A Friend of Yours" are just two more on Der Bingle's ist; Eddie Condon's orchestra in "When Your Lover Has Gone" and 'Wherever There's Love," nice, smooth rhythm; Delta Rhythm Boys n "Gee, Baby, Ain't I Good to You?" and "Is There Somebody Else?"

Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Mar. 31

The afternoon concert this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was advanced to Thursday since today is Good Friday. The evening concert, as usual, will be Saturday at 8:30. In prospect, Serge Koussevitzky's oddly assorted program, with its half-dozen items, suggested that someone had been rummaging in the library at Symphony Hall.

As things worked out, it was an ideal program for a March afternoon fantastically hot. None of the music required very hard listening, and in itself each piece was good. Yet the arrangement of the list, which may have been dictated by considerations of the Saturday broadcast, had an effect of anticlimax. It was not altogether comfortable to start with the color and magic and romantic warmth of Rachmaninoff's Vocalise and "The Isle of the Dead," and wind up amid the pious auterities of Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony.

Liadov's "The Enchanted Lake," an admirable bit of delicate Russian tone painting, was rather lost between Rachmaninoff's evocation of eternity and the plangent rejoicings of "The Russian Easter" Overture by Rimsky-Korsakoff. The last-named represented Mr. Koussevitzky's recognition of the season. Arcady Dubensky's Prelude for strings nad Fugue for full orchestra, in slow tempo, is effective in a conservative way, and skilfully wrought, but it might have made more of an impression with other surroundings. The composer was present and bowed from the stage.

The "Reformation" Symphony was a revival, last having been done by the Boston Symphony in 1920, which was Pierre Monteux' time. Without intending to be supercilious, one may profess to understand why the work has dropped out of the repertory. Missing are the vivacity of the "Italian" Symphony, the lyricism and rugged grandeurs of the "Scotch." In their place is what —for Mendelssohn—was intellectualism.

The "Reformation" Symphony was written with a definite occasion in mind. Whether the fact served to repress the composer's usual bubbling expression is debatable. Yet the Symphony, with its quotations of the Dresden "Amen" and the "Ein feste burg" chorale seems contrived rather than created, music that was thought out rather than felt. On the other hand, the Mendelssohnian skill produced a work of solid structure and abundant ideas. Certainly the "Reformation" is agreeable if not exciting.

The orchestra played excellently the afternoon through. Mr. Koussevitzky was in his finest interpretive vein. With "The Isle of the Dead" he built up a mood that was enthralling at beginning and end of the score, and electrifying in the middle.

Globe

F. D. R. Indorses Red Cross Concert Sunday

Phillips Ketchum, chairman of the Greater Boston 1945 Red Cross War Fund, today received the following communication from President Roosevelt:

"As President of the National American Red Cross I am naturally delighted to hear that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and by four distinguished artists from the Metropolitant Opera Company are to give a concert in the Boston Garden for the benefit of the Greater Boston 1945 Red Cross War Fund.

"I undrstand that more than 13,000 persons will have the opportunity of hearing Beethoven's Ninth or Choral Symphony under the conductorship of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and taht they will listen with the additional satisfaction of knowing that the entire receipts of this great concert will go to the Red Cross War Fund.

"Such a blending of the arts and the needs of a great cause cannot fail at this time to win public approval as it has already won mine."

This concert, being sponsored by the Retail Trade Board of Boston to swell Greatr Boston's response to the Red Cross War Fund drive, will be held at Boston Garden next Sunday afternoon at 3:30. Tickets are being sold at all Boston Retail Trade Board stores.

[61]

Boston's

Greatest

Musical Event

The Climax of the War Fund Drive!

RED CROSS WAR FUND
SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor

Harvard Glee Club — Radcliffe Choral Society

Metropolitan Opera Star Soloists

Boston Garden, Sunday, April 8 at 3:30 o'clock

Tickets $2 to $10
(tax incl.)

All Seats Reserved.

Available at Whitney's

Trav Mar 26

CLIMAXING THE RED CROSS WAR FUND DRIVE!

THE IMPORTANT

RED CROSS WAR FUND
SYMPHONY CONCERT

BOSTON GARDEN, APRIL 8 AT 3:30 P. M.

Sponsored by the Retail Trade Board of Boston, this great musical event will feature Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with these artists giving their services:

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor

Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society

Metropolitan Opera Star Soloists

Eleanor Steber, Soprano Charles Kullman, Tenor
Kirsten Thorborg, Contralto Norman Cordon, Bass

Tickets are 2.00, 3.00, 5.00, 7.50 and 10.00 including tax — ALL proceeds to go to the Red Cross. Get tickets now . . . on any floor at Jordan's.

JORDAN MARSH COMPANY

Get your tickets at Filene's for the

RED CROSS WAR FUND
SYMPHONY CONCERT

—all seats reserved, $2 to $10 tax included

Mar 25
Globe

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor
Harvard Glee Club — Radcliffe Choral Society
Metropolitan Opera Star Soloists
Boston Garden, Sunday, April 8, at 3:30 o'clock

Mar 28

BOSTON'S
GREATEST
Musical Event

The Climax of the War Fund Drive!
RED CROSS WAR FUND
SYMPHONY CONCERT
Boston Symphony Orchestra
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor
Harvard Glee Club — Radcliffe Choral Society
Metropolitan Opera Star Soloists
Boston Garden, Sunday, April 8, at 3:30 o'clock
Tickets $2 to $10 (tax incl.)
All Seats Reserved
Available at Conrad's

BOSTON'S GREATEST
MUSICAL EVENT
RED CROSS WAR FUND
SYMPHONY CONCERT
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
HARVARD GLEE CLUB—RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY
BOSTON GARDEN, SUN., APR. 8 at 3:30

TICKETS $2 to $10 (tax incl.)
RESERVED SEATS ON SALE AT Pray's

BOSTON'S
GREATEST
Musical Event

Trav Mar 27

The Climax of the War Fund Drive!

RED CROSS WAR FUND
SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor
Harvard Glee Club—Radcliffe Choral Society
Metropolitan Opera Star Soloists
Boston Garden, Sunday, April 8, at 3:30 o'clock

Tickets $2 to $10
(tax incl.)
All Seats Reserved
Available at CHANDLER'S
Tremont St.

NEXT SUNDAY—Boston Garden
AT 3:30
Beethoven's
NINTH SYMPHONY by the
Boston Symphony Orchestra
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY — Conductor
Assisted by
HARVARD and RADCLIFFE CHORUS
Soloists
(METROPOLITAN OPERA QUARTET)

Eleanor STEBER Soprano
Kerstin THORBORG Contralto
Kurt BAUM Tenor
Norman CORDON Bass

TICKETS AT LEADING STORES AND SYMPHONY HALL
Admission $2, $3, $5, $7.50 and $10 (Tax Inc.)
Auspices: RETAIL TRADE BOARD of BOSTON
Benefit—AMERICAN RED CROSS WAR FUND

Trav Mar 26

BOSTON'S GREATEST

Musical Event

The Climax of the War Fund Drive!

RED CROSS WAR FUND SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor
Harvard Glee Club — Radcliffe Choral Society
Metropolitan Opera Star Soloists
Boston Garden, Sunday, April 8 at 3:30 o'clock

Tickets $2 to $10
(tax incl.)
All Seats Reserved
Available at

Hovey's

Trav
Mar 28

BOSTON'S GREATEST

Musical Event

The Climax of the War Fund Drive!

RED CROSS WAR FUND SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor
Harvard Glee Club — Radcliffe Choral Society
Metropolitan Opera Star Soloists
Boston Garden, Sunday, April 8 at 3:30 o'clock

Tickets $2 to $10
(tax incl.)
All Seats Reserved
Available at

PAINE Furniture Company

HANcock 1500 81 Arlington St.

BOSTON'S
GREATEST MUSICAL
EVENT

RED CROSS WAR FUND SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor
Harvard Glee Club—Radcliffe Choral Society
Metropolitan Opera Star Soloists
Boston Garden, Sunday, April 8, at 3:30 O'clock

TICKETS
2.00 to 10.00
(Tax Included)
All Seats Reserved

Available at C. Crawford Hollidge

Globe Mar 28

TICKETS
$2 to $10
(tax incl.)
ALL SEATS RESERVED
AVAILABLE AT

Filene's

Boston's Greatest Musical Event

The Climax of the War Fund Drive!

RED CROSS WAR FUND

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

HARVARD GLEE CLUB — RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY
METROPOLITAN OPERA STAR SOLOISTS
BOSTON GARDEN, SUNDAY, APRIL 8, AT 3:30 O'CLOCK

Herald Mar 28

Trav
Mar 28

Music Lovers!

The Greatest Event in Boston History!

Red Cross War Fund Symphony Concert

Boston Garden, Sunday, April 8, at 3:30
(Further details thruout this paper)

Get Your Tickets at Jays

Globe
Mar 28

Boston's
Greatest
Musical Event

The Climax of the War Fund Drive!

RED CROSS WAR FUND CONCERT

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor
HARVARD GLEE CLUB . . . RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY
METROPOLITAN OPERA STAR SOLOISTS

Boston Garden, Sunday, April 8, at 3:30 O'clock

Tickets $2-$10, tax incl.
All Seats Reserved
R. H. STEARNS CO.

Post

BOSTON'S
GREATEST MUSICAL
EVENT

RED CROSS WAR FUND SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor
Harvard Glee Club—Radcliffe Choral Society
Metropolitan Opera Star Soloists
Boston Garden, Sunday, April 8, at 3:30 o'clock

Tickets
$2 to $10
(tax included)
All Seats Reserved

Available at C. Crawford Hollidge

Trav Mar 27

BOSTON'S GREATEST

Musical Event

The Climax of the War Fund Drive!

RED CROSS WAR FUND SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor
Harvard Glee Club — Radcliffe Choral Society
Metropolitan Opera Star Soloists
Boston Garden, Sunday, April 8 at 3:30 o'clock

Tickets $2 to $10
(tax incl.)

All Seats Reserved

Available at

Slattery's

Adv. Mar. 25

JORDAN MARSH COMPANY

Announcing

BOSTON'S GREATEST MUSICAL EVENT CLIMAXING THE RED CROSS DRIVE!

Red Cross War Fund Symphony Concert

Boston Garden, April 8 at 3:30 p. m.
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor
HARVARD GLEE CLUB
RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY
METROPOLITAN OPERA STAR SOLOISTS

All Seats Reserved. Tickets $2 to $10 (tax incl.)

ASK ON ANY FLOOR AT JORDAN'S

Red Cross War Fund SYMPHONY CONCERT

BOSTON'S GREATEST MUSICAL EVENT

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor
Boston Garden
Sunday, April 8
at 3:30 o'clock
Tickets $2 to $10
All Seats Reserved

Available at

Leopold Morse Co.

Herald

BOSTON'S GREATEST

Musical Event

The Climax of the War Fund Drive!

RED CROSS WAR FUND SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor
Harvard Glee Club — Radcliffe Choral Society
Metropolitan Opera Star Soloists
Boston Garden, Sunday, April 8 at 3:30 o'clock

Tickets $2 to $10
(tax incl.)

All Seats Reserved

Available at

R.H. WHITE'S

Ther 27

Hovey's

The Climax of the War Fund Drive!

RED CROSS WAR FUND SYMPHONY CONCERT

★

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Serge Koussevitzky,
Conductor

★

Harvard Glee Club
Radcliffe Choral Society

★

Metropolitan Opera
Star Soloists

★

BOSTON GARDEN
Sunday, April 8
3:30 in the afternoon

TICKETS $2 TO $10
(tax incl.)

AVAILABLE AT

HOVEY'S
BOSTON

Boston Post Mar 27

Boston's Greatest Musical Event

The Climax of the War Fund Drive!

RED CROSS WAR FUND SYMPHONY CONCERT

TICKETS $2 to $10
(tax incl.)
ALL SEATS RESERVED

AVAILABLE AT

Filene's

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY,
Conductor

HARVARD GLEE CLUB
RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY
METROPOLITAN OPERA
STAR SOLOISTS

BOSTON GARDEN
SUNDAY, APRIL 8,
AT 3:30 O'CLOCK

[illegible] Mar 28

BOSTON'S GREATEST

Musical Event

The Climax of the War Fund Drive!

RED CROSS WAR FUND SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor
Harvard Glee Club—Radcliffe Choral Society
Metropolitan Opera Star Soloists
Boston Garden, Sunday, April 8, at 3:30 o'clock

Tickets $2 to $10
(tax incl.)

All Seats Reserved

Available at

R.H. WHITE'S

Globe Mar. 28

BOSTON'S GREATEST MUSICAL EVENT

RED CROSS WAR FUND SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor
Harvard Glee Club—Radcliffe Choral Society
Metropolitan Opera Star Soloists
Boston Garden, Sunday, April 8, at 3:30 o'clock

Tickets $2 to $10
(tax incl.)

All Seats Reserved
Available at Gilchrist's Booth
Street Floor

Get your tickets for the great

RED CROSS WAR FUND SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Garden

April 8, 3:30 P. M.

All seats reserved.

2.00 to 10.00

ASK ON ANY FLOOR
AT JORDAN'S

Jordan Marsh

RECORDS: 'HAROLD IN ITALY'

Mar 28 Fin.

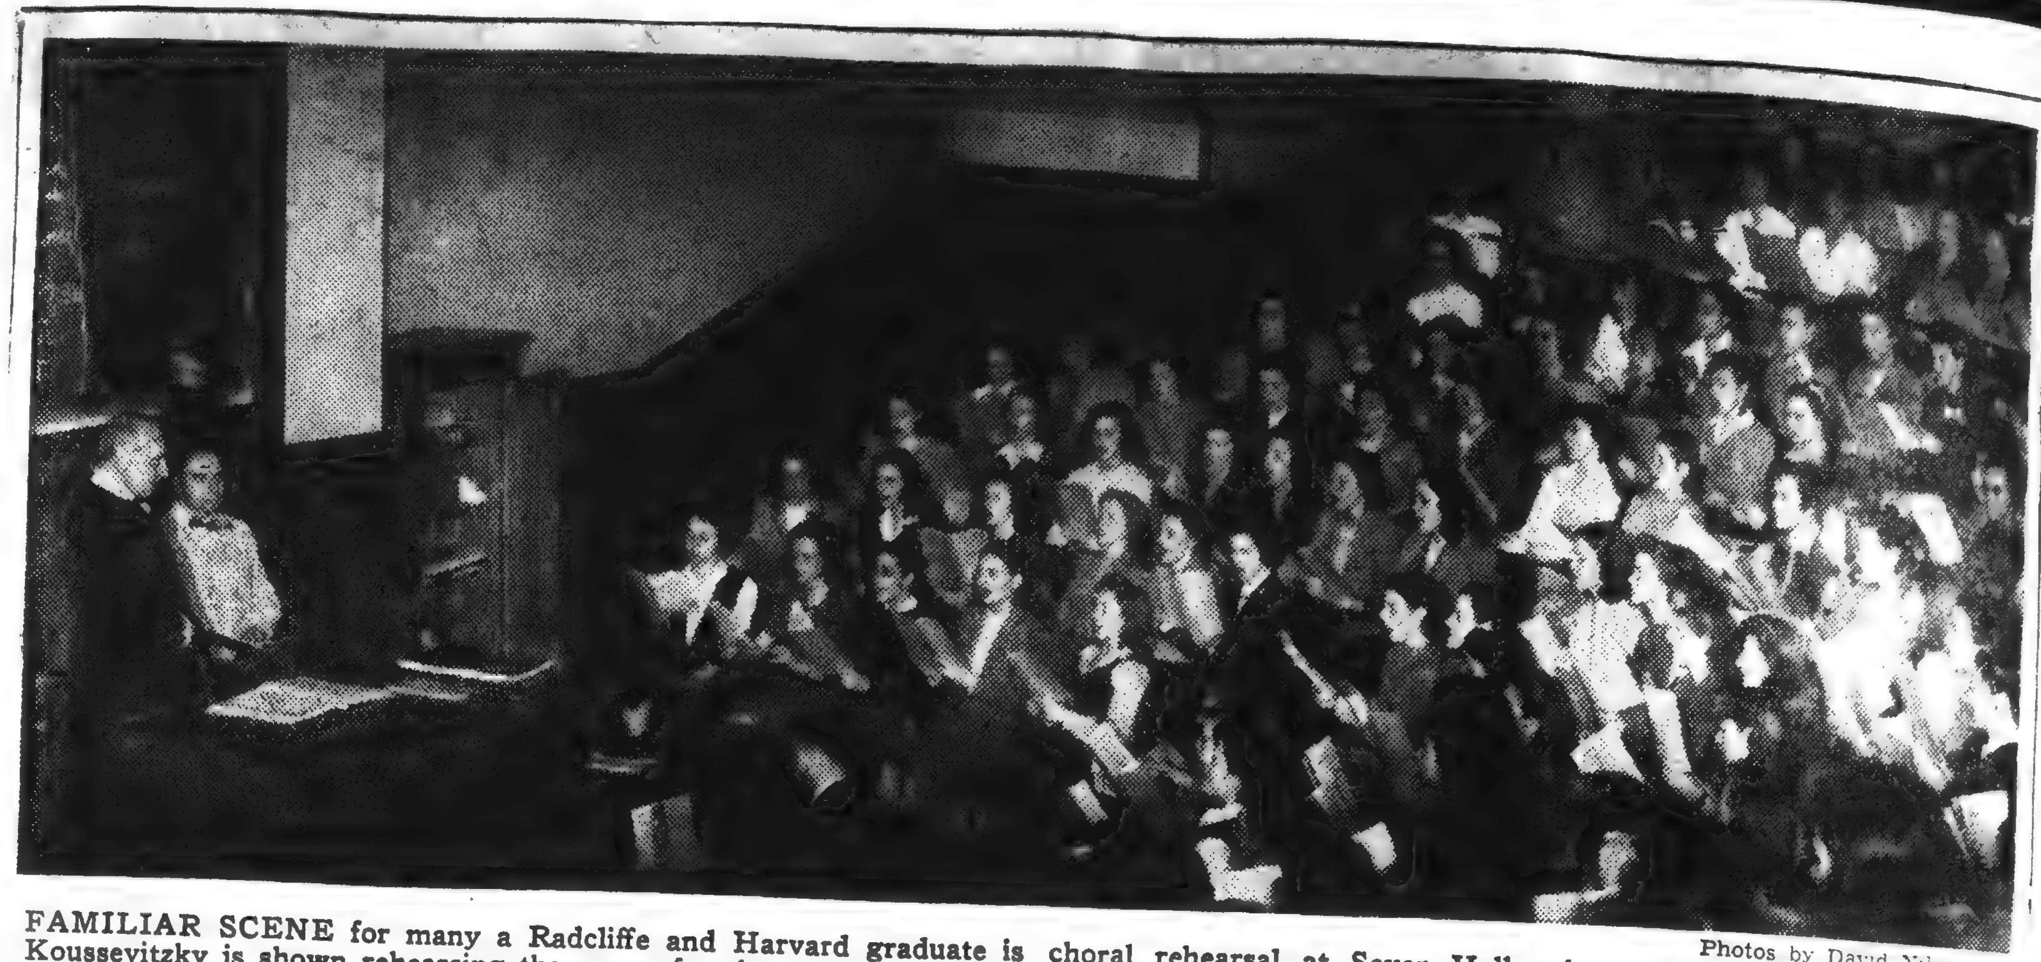
By MARK A. SCHUBART

THE first American recording of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" is Victor's initial major post-ban offering (Album DM-989, five twelve-inch records). The recording artists are Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with William Primrose playing the viola solos.

"Harold in Italy," like most of Berlioz' big works, is rarely performed and even more rarely recorded. The French composer's music, perhaps because of its overpowering individuality, has never achieved the popularity of its contemporaries, though Berlioz enthusiasts are likely to be extremely emphatic about their taste, as are Bruckner and Mahler followers. But even Berlioz' more lukewarm auditors recognize the stature of the composer and the importance of his music. For, as one Berlioz admirer said, he is perhaps the only direct musical descendant of Beethoven.

Dr. Koussevitzky has always been a champion of Berlioz in general and of "Harold in Italy" in particular. His performance for the present recording is an appropriately colorful one, and the powerful language of the composer is allowed to sound forth, unfettered. Mr. Primrose deals competently with the viola solos and continues to be an eloquent champion of the instrument's virtues. The work is, of course, by no means a concerto. Despite the fact that it was commissioned by Paganini (supposedly for 10,000 francs), the viola part is subsidiary to the general structure of the work, though important in many respects. Judging from this performance, Mr. Primrose understands such matters perfectly, and his performance reflects credit on his musicianship.

From the point of view of recording, the album seems extremely competent, though far from remarkable. The two years during which no records were manufactured appear to have wrought few changes in recording technique, despite occasional extravagant claims to the contrary. It is safe to assume that when the war situation permits the installation of new equipment and the expenditure of more time on research, we will have new developments—both on records and record players. Meanwhile, do not expect anything startling. The future is not as yet with us.



Photos by David Nilson.

FAMILIAR SCENE for many a Radcliffe and Harvard graduate is choral rehearsal at Sever Hall, where Symphony's famous Serge Koussevitzky is shown rehearsing the group for the much anticipated April 8 concert at the Boston Garden benefitting the Red Cross, assisted by the group's own loved director, G. Wallace Woodworth.

By MARJORIE WATTS

Boston's biggest benefit of the year for the nation's most urgent cause, the American Red Cross, will be next Sunday's concert at the Boston Garden, when more than 13,000 persons will be there to hear the outstanding performance of Beethoven's choral Ninth Symphony, by Serge Koussevitzky and the full Boston Symphony, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society and four distinguished stars of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

The entire proceeds from the concert will go to the Red Cross, and all the 400 persons taking part in the program are giving their services.

It will be the first time in the history of the famed Harvard and Radcliffe choruses that they have appeared at the Garden, and special acoustics have been arranged to give the huge audience the full benefit of this superb choral music, among the greatest that Beethoven wrote. Radcliffe and Harvard students singing will represent nearly every state in the union, and Metropolitan soloists Eleanor Steber, Kerstin Thorborg, Kurt Baum and Norman Cordon have sung in the famous opera houses of every capital in the world.

Radcliffe choral officers are: Margaret Williams of Cambridge, president; Alice Blackmer, vice president; Augustus Gifford, treasurer, and Betty Prescott, secretary. Ethel Potts Bernard, wife of Boston Symphony viola player Albert Yves Bernard, is assistant conductor.

Harvard Glee Club officers are' Arthur Curry, president; P. Dunlap Smith Jr., vice president; Hibbard G. James, secretary, and Eugene Blount, librarian. Irving G. Fine is assistant conductor.

Tickets for the concert are on sale at Symphony Hall, Garden and retail department stores, and every one sold means that the Red Cross can do just that much more to help the suffering people whose only hope can be that help.

Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole, Ruth Posselt for Soloist

Monitor

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Mar. 27

As prophet in her own country, Ruth Posselt, the violinist, is held in high honor, let everybody everywhere be assured of that; and at the same time let nobody at home mar the impression of that by overpraise of her. Mme. Posselt carried off solo honors at the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony's Monday series last night, assisting in a presentation of the Lalo Spanish Symphony for Violin and Orchestra, op. 21. She was the very picture of the piece in her red and gold costume, and she was in the mood of today with the something military in the ornamentation. If a Bostonian artist does not dress the part, then the whole matter is done for; and Mme. Posselt certainly made a figure of charm on Symphony Hall platform.

As to how she handled the situation musically out in front there, with nothing but her violin to balance in tone power the aggregation of howsoever many men there were banked behind her and on each side of her, is something for various opinion. Truly enough, Richard Burgin, as conductor, showed no particular favor to her in moderating the tone of the great accompanying ensemble. Indeed people out in the parquet or up in the balconies, looking on and listening, might wonder doubtingly whether he thought much about how the sonorities equated out there for them. He seemed too near the source to realize the effect of the occasion as a practical concert rather than as an abstract performance.

The conductor of an orchestra belongs, as far as his person goes, on that box which they call podium; but it is a question whether he does not belong, in regard to his imagination, back in the farthest end of the top balcony of the auditorium. That the orchestra, in fine, produced a too powerful general volume of tone for the soloist in the Lalo Spanish Symphony there can hardly be dispute. Which makes it difficult to determine whether Mme. Posselt was in the feeling of the music or not. She could scarcely be expected to be if she was constantly striving and struggling to build up noise against noise.

Possibly, too, the Boston Symphony is a little out of the solo-and-accompaniment habit. Much playing of modern music of the sort that opened this program (Creston Symphony No. 2, op. 35) may be showing the consequences. But remark what we will about the beginning and the middle of the bill, the end (Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A major, op. 92) was Boston Symphony in the tradition.

ALLENTOWN, PA.
CHRONICLE

MAR 31 1945

On the RECORD

Berlioz—"Harold in Italy" William Primrose and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting—Album DM 989 (Five 12" Records, $5.50)

Victor presents this album as a National Special Release for April. This is the first American and only complete recording of Hector Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," and is also the first post-ban major release of a recording by the Boston Symphony (their first new recording in nearly five years) so it has many reasons for being considered as something very special.

We find the glowing flame of Byron and the romantic movement expressed in this lovely symphonic composition by Berlioz. It was in music of this type that he excelled and he has captured the spirit of the poem in tones, rythms and harmonies as deftly as a painter might have done with colors. The four movements do not follow musically the action of the poem, they are named as follows: the first, Harold in the Mountains; second, March of Pilgrims singing their Evening Hymn; third, Serenade of a Mountaineer of the Abruzzito to his Mistress, a sweetly sentimental passage; and fourth, the turbulent and richly orchestred final movement, subtitled Orgy of Brigands.

The composition has a fantastic history. It was commissioned by Paganini, whose fame as a viola virtuoso was second only to his glamour as a violinist. The work was completed about a year before Paganini's death but it was never performed by him, presumably because of his ill health. Musically the composition could be called a concerto for viola and William Primrose's performance is indeed masterly.

* * *

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

APR 1 1945

Record Reviews

By Alice Eversman

When the recording ban was lifted in November, the Victor company started work on an important symphonic release, that of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," played by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitsky's direction with William Primrose taking the viola obbligato portions. Besides ushering in a new era for the Victor people, this album is the first complete and only American recording of this symphony and the first made by the Boston orchestra in nearly five years. It is Victor's special release for this month.

Berlioz wrote this work, which bears the title of Byron's poem at the request of Paganini whose skill on the viola was as great as on the violin. Ill and nearing the end of his life, Paganini was unable to carry out his intention to perform "Harold in Italy" in public, his death occurring about a year after he received the finished score. The French composer has caught the spirit of the poem without following its actual sequence, only those portions offering drama and variety being selected. Mr. Primrose's beautiful tone and polished musicianship dominate the performance for which Dr. Koussevitsky and the orchestra provide a splendid background.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

APR -1 1945

What's On The Records

Blending the talents of William Primrose, probably the world's greatest violinist, and the virtuosic Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, Victor's first major classical recording since the lifting of the Petrillo ban is a musical event. Incidentally, it's the Boston's first performance on wax in nearly five years because of previous union difficulties.

Koussevitzky

The vehicle for the stellar combination is Hector Berlioz's Harold in Italy an unfamiliar but nonetheless pleasing work. It won critical acclaim in a concert performance by Primrose and the Boston earlier this season.

In the recording, the artistry of orchestra and soloist, kept in perfect balance by the master hand of Dr. Koussevitzky, are matched by the technical skill of the sound engineers. The result is a "solid" interpretation.

Also by the Boston Symphony is a single of Tchaikovsky's lilting waltz from the String Serenade, previously an "odd" side in the orchestra's album of the Russian composer's Fourth Symphony. Coupled with it on the new waxing is Grieg's The Last Spring, which also gives the string section a chance to demonstrate its skill.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

APR 1 1945

Reviewing New Records

New Recordings of Standard Symphonies

Disk reviewers have a penchant for managing the recording companies' business and recently have stated some positive opinions on new recordings of music already well represented in the catalogue. Inasmuch as the Petrillo trouble visited a long spell of inactivity, the critics think the recorders should make up for lost time on the new music.

Columbia, however, has undertaken to refurbish the standards in its catalogue. The Philadelphia Orchestra is brought out under Ormandy's baton in a stunning new version of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, the lovely, rhythmic A Major (Album 557). Come to think of it, there are only Columbia's old set by the Vienna Philharmonic under the late Felix Weingartner (Album 260), and Victor's highly popular Philharmonic-Symphony version under Toscanini (Album 317). Other sets, most of them European and made many years ago, have disappeared. We doubt that the Weingartner is too satisfying these days. The Toscanini reading is vernal but comes from an earlier recording period. The new Ormandy version is impressive technically and Ormandy, one of the most improved conductors of the last two seasons, reads the work brilliantly.

Columbia also hastens a new Tchaikovsky No. 6 (Pathetique) to the market. This is by the Philharmonic-Symphony under Rodzinski. Against it is Victor's early 337 under Ormandy with the Philadelphians and the same firm's antiquated No. 85 by Koussevitzky and the Bostonians. Otherwise there is Victor's imported set, No. 553, by Wilhelm Furtwaengler and the Berlin Philharmonic, which is a beauty if you care for the conductor's highly emotional, programmatic interpretation. Tonally it is one of the real achievements of recording.

Columbia's only other available Pathetique was Stokowski's with Youth Orchestra (No. 432), which is satisfactory neither acoustically nor interpretatively. The Rodzinski set fills a big gap in the Columbia catalogue and probably will be the preferred set for Pathetique buyers, although Rodzinski isn't the last word in interpretative batonship. But he'll have to do until another comes along. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony might re-record the piece and make themselves felt on the market, but Victor, which has retained the Boston setup, probably has no such plans.

—JOHN ROSENFIELD

BOSTON SYMPHONY ACHIEVEMENT

sevitzky

[illegible] NCERT ON FRIDAY EVE- [illegible] Boston Symphony and [illegible] Serge Koussevitzky, will [illegible] other season at the Institute. [illegible] hen Dr. Koussevitzky [illegible] at the Academy of [illegible] that the forthcoming concert [illegible] the conclusion of his twenty-first [illegible] ooklyn. And all who have come to know [illegible] music of Dr. Koussevitzky through his appearances here can agree that the Institute has succeeded over the years, in presenting the ultimate in symphonic experience.

Thomas Mann once wrote, and he might well have had Serge Koussevitzky in mind: "Great conductors [illegible] music [illegible] educators, for that is their [illegible]. And if they are more than just professional experts—which they have to be to be great—their will to educate, their belief in education [illegible] reach into ethics and enter the political-human sphere." Dr. Koussevitzky's role as an educator has grown from his sense of responsibility to creative talent. He envisions the director of an orchestra not as a lone genius in an ivory tower content to hug his musical faith to himself, but rather as a musical leader in his community who must convince both his players and his listeners of the worthiness of such faith.

The successful functioning of this philosophy has widened the horizons of Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra and audiences, has stimulated modern composition, and has breathed new life into waning appreciations. All this has not been accomplished without considerable effort, nor without frequently flying in the face of popular opinion and critical approbation. Winning over his orchestra has been a comparatively easy task. Dr. Koussevitzky himself says, "The musicians were and are always cooperative and interested, no matter how difficult a work may be to play. In fact, the harder a work is, the more willingly they devote themselves to it." And, more than once, as consistent champion of some contemporary composer, Dr. Koussevitzky has had the keen satisfaction of watching the more difficult public and critics accept his view.

This facet of the Boston Symphony's work, this promotion of its contemporaries, is constantly quoted, and rightly so, as one reason for the organization's perennial brilliance. Its current season's offerings by Villa-Lobos, Schoenberg, Hanson, Shostakovitch, Bloch, Bartók, Gould, Still, and other moderns stand as evidence. Not so frequently spoken of in general terms is the open-mindedness of Dr. Koussevitzky toward older music. Such an attitude has been gravely needed to rescue many great composers from the limbo of prejudices formulated in another generation. Take just one instance. This past year we find a prominent critic hailing the Koussevitzky interpretation of Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique" Symphony for its revelation of the "wholly exceptional power and originality of form" long denied yet plainly to be perceived in the score. The commentator remarks and welcomes the Boston Symphony's disregard of "antiquated nonsense," of embarrassment at Tchaikovsky's intense humanity.

The retrospective view, offering a panorama of musical accomplishment pre-eminent in symphonic annals, augurs well for the plans already being laid for next year's series of concerts by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra here at the Institute. The dates have been set—Friday evenings, November 16, January 11, February 15, March 15, and April 12—and Brooklyn's music lovers can look forward again to the pleasure and privilege of hearing the best by the best.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY

MAR 31 1945

INFATUATION WITH SOUND OF OWN WORDS DEPARTMENT
(PUBLIC UTILITIES DIVISION)

[From "The Man with the Baton," by David Ewen]

He was its dynamo of energy. —Page 86.

. . . the electric incisiveness of ~~Koussevitzky's~~ stroke . . . —Page 104.

A conductor can often inspire and electrify them with his gestures. —Page 105.

He was like a dynamo. . . . He converted the efforts of his musicians into electric energy. —Page 119.

. . . performances of electrifying quality. —Page 126.

. . . a vital moving force which always makes it electrically alive. —Page 146.

A dynamo of energy . . . —Page 146.

. . . seemed to emit with each sweep an electric current. —Page 171.

Something about the conductor . . . electrified them . . . —Page 171.

Upon his return to Italy he continued to startle and electrify. —Page 172.

In front of him, one senses instantly that one is in contact with an electric current. —Page 189.

. . . on the air or on the concert-stage he radiates electricity . . . —Page 198.

. . . he is a distinct personality, electric, magnetizing. —Page 199.

. . . a great musician and electric showman . . . —Page 200.

. . . the electric news of his resignation . . . —Page 206.

We find him electrifying his audiences. —Page 212.

. . . his levity is as ephemeral as lightning . . . —Page 221.

The programs in Boston . . . were . . . electric in their experimentalism. —Page 229.

The baton . . . acquired an electric appeal . . . —Page 230.

His was a personality full of magnetic power . . . —Page 245.

. . . up he springs as if electrified . . . —Page 247.

The electric current that shot through Strauss' poem, igniting the coruscant tone-colors with added glow . . . —Page 266.

Rodzinski proved that an electric baton was in his hand. —Page 276.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ACHIEVEMENT

W[illegible] CONCERT ON FRIday evening, April [illegible], the Boston Symphony and [illegible] conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will bring to a close another season at the Institute. Those who remember when Dr. Koussevitzky [illegible] ensemble at the Academy [illegible] hardly [illegible] concert [illegible] who [illegible] Dr. [illegible] performances [illegible] has [illegible] presenting the [illegible] he might well [illegible] mind: "Great [illegible] tors, for that is [illegible] re than just pro- [illegible] have to be to be [illegible] their belief in edu- [illegible] nter the political- [illegible] 's role as an [illegible] se of responsi- [illegible] visions the di- [illegible] lone genius in [illegible] his musical faith [illegible] al leader in his [illegible] both his players [illegible] of such faith. [illegible] this philosophy [illegible] r. Koussevitzky's [illegible] mulated modern composition, and has breathed new life into waning appreciations. All this has not been accomplished without considerable effort, nor without frequently flying in the face of popular opinion and critical approbation. Winning over his orchestra has been a comparatively easy task. Dr. Koussevitzky himself says, "The musicians were and are always cooperative and interested, no matter how difficult a work may be to play. In fact, the harder a work is, the more willingly they devote themselves to it." And, more than once, as consistent champion of some contemporary composer, Dr. Koussevitzky has had the keen satisfaction of watching the more difficult public and critics accept his view.

This facet of the Boston Symphony's work, this promotion of its contemporaries, is constantly quoted, and rightly so, as one reason for the organization's perennial brilliance. Its current season's offerings by Villa-Lobos, Schoenberg, Hanson, Shostakovitch, Bloch, Bartók, Gould, Still, and other moderns stand as evidence. Not so frequently spoken of in general terms is the open-mindedness of Dr. Koussevitzky toward older music. Such an attitude has been gravely needed to rescue many great composers from the limbo of prejudices formulated in another generation. Take just one instance. This past year we find a prominent critic hailing the Koussevitzky interpretation of Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique" Symphony for its revelation of the "wholly exceptional power and originality of form" long denied yet plainly to be perceived in the score. The commentator remarks and welcomes the Boston Symphony's disregard of "antiquated nonsense," of embarrassment at Tchaikovsky's intense humanity.

The retrospective view, offering a panorama of musical accomplishment pre-eminent in symphonic annals, augurs well for the plans already being laid for next year's series of concerts by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra here at the Institute. The dates have been set—Friday evenings, November 16, January 11, February 15, March 15, and April 12—and Brooklyn's music lovers can look forward again to the pleasure and privilege of hearing the best by the best.

Sibelius Second Is Featured

Monitor

Apr

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Nobody ever knows exactly what will happen at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; but whoever wants to make sure of what does take place worthy of remark must attend every performance the management arranges, even to the series of matinees first ventured the present season on Sunday afternoons. The fifth program fell in turn yesterday; and truly what happened for one undeniable thing was an extraordinarily clear and supple performance of the Sibelius Symphony No. 2 in D major, Serge Koussevitzky in charge.

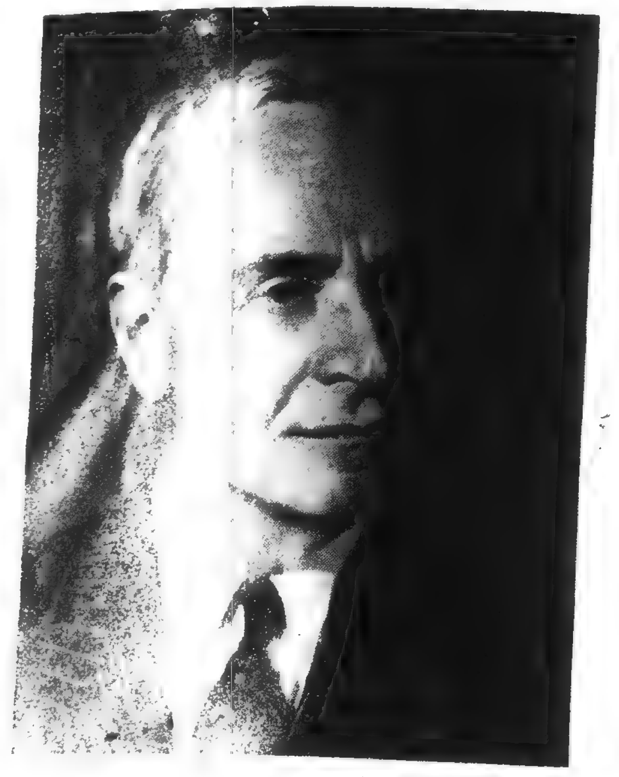
How it came about, let anyone explain who will. Very likely there was high expectation in the Sunday afternoon audience, which evidently consists in considerable degree of students, whether those actually pursuing academic courses just now or those somewhere along in a state of adult educational advancement. Again, the musicians may have been on right terms of familiarity with the work, knowing it from recent particular study and yet not so point-by-point rehearsed in it as to be without an over-all independence.

At any rate there seemed to prevail that balance between attention to the conductor's wishes and freedom of execution which listeners like. Strings, woods, and brasses took part as three choirs rather than as an agglomeration of 10 times 9 or so instruments, with the result that sonorities came through in their right value and melodies stood out in extraordinary clearness. The symphony seemed an organized affair as it proceeded from page to page. It seemed to carry a structural relation from episode to episode, and it seemed a perfect and inevitable cycle as it went from movement to movement.

When the Second Symphony is thus played, both the composer's originality and his indebtedness to others in the orchestral line show; his originality in his quality of song, and his imitativeness in his instrumental method. We could hardly have Sibelius without Wagner, and we would scarcely have him just as he is without Strauss. Yet we seldom are struck by any actual copying.

He has a way, too, of setting off the back of the orchestra against the front that neither Wagner nor Strauss knew. You hear it at the very opening, the horn passage (excitingly rendered this particular day) against the activity of a subordinated sort in the violins.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ACHIEVEMENT



Koussevitzky

WITH THEIR FINAL CONCERT ON FRIDAY EVENING, April 13, the Boston Symphony and its eminent conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will bring to a close another season at the Institute. Those who remember when Dr. Koussevitzky first led this great ensemble at the Academy of Music will hardly realize that the forthcoming concert will mark the conclusion of his twenty-first year in Brooklyn. And all who have come to know the music of Dr. Koussevitzky through his appearances here can agree that the Institute has succeeded, over the years, in presenting the ultimate in symphonic experience.

Thomas Mann once wrote, and he might well have had Serge Koussevitzky in mind: "Great conductors of music are educators, for that is their métier. And if they are more than just professional experts—which they have to be to be great—their will to educate, their belief in education, reach into ethics and enter the political-human sphere." Dr. Koussevitzky's role as an educator has grown from his sense of responsibility to creative talent. He envisions the director of an orchestra not as a lone genius in an ivory tower content to hug his musical faith to himself, but rather as a musical leader in his community who must convince both his players and his listeners of the worthiness of such faith.

The successful functioning of this philosophy has widened the horizons of Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra and audiences, has stimulated modern composition, and has breathed new life into waning appreciations. All this has not been accomplished without considerable effort, nor without frequently flying in the face of popular opinion and critical approbation. Winning over his orchestra has been a comparatively easy task. Dr. Koussevitzky himself says, "The musicians were and are always cooperative and interested, no matter how difficult a work may be to play. In fact, the harder a work is, the more willingly they devote themselves to it." And, more than once, as consistent champion of some contemporary composer, Dr. Koussevitzky has had the keen satisfaction of watching the more difficult public and critics accept his view.

This facet of the Boston Symphony's work, this promotion of its contemporaries, is constantly quoted, and rightly so, as one reason for the organization's perennial brilliance. Its current season's offerings by Villa-Lobos, Schoenberg, Hanson, Shostakovitch, Bloch, Bartók, Gould, Still, and other moderns stand as evidence. Not so frequently spoken of in general terms is the open-mindedness of Dr. Koussevitzky toward older music. Such an attitude has been gravely needed to rescue many great composers from the limbo of prejudices formulated in another generation. Take just one instance. This past year we find a prominent critic hailing the Koussevitzky interpretation of Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique" Symphony for its revelation of the "wholly exceptional power and originality of form" long denied yet plainly to be perceived in the score. The commentator remarks and welcomes the Boston Symphony's disregard of "antiquated nonsense," of embarrassment at Tchaikovsky's intense humanity.

The retrospective view, offering a panorama of musical accomplishment pre-eminent in symphonic annals, augurs well for the plans already being laid for next year's series of concerts by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra here at the Institute. The dates have been set—Friday evenings, November 16, January 11, February 15, March 15, and April 12—and Brooklyn's music lovers can look forward again to the pleasure and privilege of hearing the best by the best.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
MAR 31 1945

INFATUATION WITH SOUND OF OWN WORDS DEPARTMENT
(PUBLIC UTILITIES DIVISION)

[From "The Man with the Baton," by David Ewen]

He was its dynamo of energy. —Page 86.

... the electric incisiveness of Koussevitzky's stroke ... —Page 104.

A conductor can often inspire and electrify them with his gestures. —Page 105.

He was like a dynamo. ... He converted the efforts of his musicians into electric energy. —Page 119.

... performances of electrifying quality. —Page 126.

... a vital moving force which always makes it electrically alive. —Page 146.

A dynamo of energy ... —Page 146.

... seemed to emit with each sweep an electric current. —Page 171.

Something about the conductor ... electrified them ... —Page 171.

Upon his return to Italy he continued to startle and electrify. —Page 172.

In front of him, one senses instantly that one is in contact with an electric current. —Page 189.

... on the air or on the concert-stage he radiates electricity ... —Page 198.

... he is a distinct personality, electric, magnetizing. —Page 199.

... a great musician and electric showman ... —Page 200.

... the electric news of his resignation ... —Page 206.

We find him electrifying his audiences. —Page 212.

... his levity is as ephemeral as lightning ... —Page 221.

The programs in Boston ... were ... electric in their experimentalism. —Page 229.

The baton ... acquired an electric appeal ... —Page 230.

His was a personality full of magnetic power ... —Page 245.

... up he springs as if electrified ... —Page 247.

The electric current that shot through Strauss' poem, igniting the coruscant tone-colors with added glow ... —Page 266.

Rodzinski proved that an electric baton was in his hand. —Page 276.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ACHIEVEMENT

Apr. 45

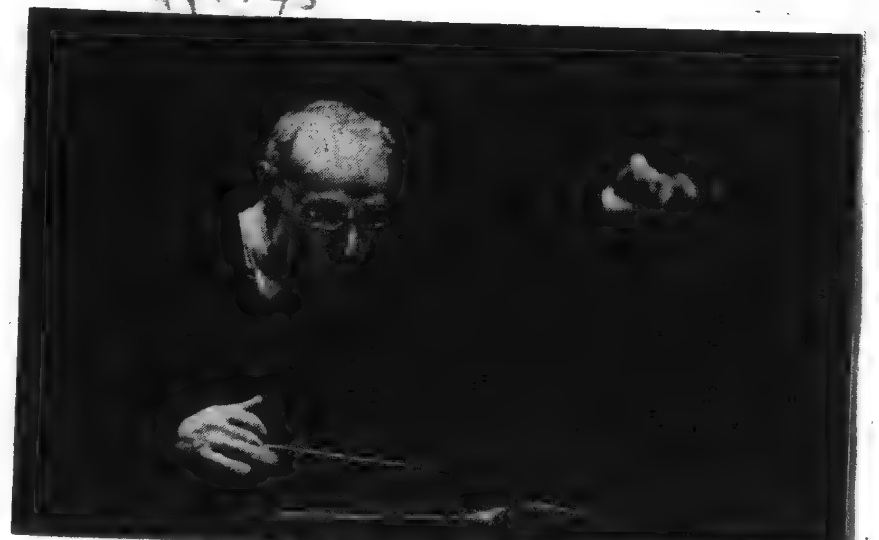
WITH THEIR FINAL CONCERT ON FRIDAY evening, April 13, the Boston Symphony and its eminent conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will bring to a close another season at the Institute. Those who remember when Dr. Koussevitzky first led this great ensemble at the Academy of Music will hardly realize that the forthcoming concert will mark the conclusion of his twenty-first year in Brooklyn. And all who have come to know the music of Dr. Koussevitzky through his appearances here can agree that the Institute has succeeded, over the years, in presenting the ultimate in symphonic experience.

Thomas Mann once wrote, and he might well have had Serge Koussevitzky in mind: "Great conductors of music are educators, for that is their métier. And if they are more than just professional experts—which they have to be to be great—their will to educate, their belief in education, reach into ethics and enter the political-human sphere." Dr. Koussevitzky's role as an educator has grown from his sense of responsibility to creative talent. He envisions the director of an orchestra not as a lone genius in an ivory tower content to hug his musical faith to himself, but rather as a musical leader in his community who must convince both his players and his listeners of the worthiness of such faith.

The successful functioning of this philosophy has widened the horizons of Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra and audiences, has stimulated modern composition, and has breathed new life into waning appreciations. All this has not been accomplished without considerable effort, nor without frequently flying in the face of popular opinion and critical approbation. Winning over his orchestra has been a comparatively easy task. Dr. Koussevitzky himself says, "The musicians were and are always cooperative and interested, no matter how difficult a work may be to play. In fact, the harder a work is, the more willingly they devote themselves to it." And, more than once, as consistent champion of some contemporary composer, Dr. Koussevitzky has had the keen satisfaction of watching the more difficult public and critics accept his view.

This facet of the Boston Symphony's work, this promotion of its contemporaries, is constantly quoted, and rightly so, as one reason for the organization's perennial brilliance. Its current season's offerings by Villa-Lobos, Schoenberg, Hanson, Shostakovitch, Bloch, Bartók, Gould, Still, and other moderns stand as evidence. Not so frequently spoken of in general terms is the open-mindedness of Dr. Koussevitzky toward older music. Such an attitude has been gravely needed to rescue many great composers from the limbo of prejudices formulated in another generation. Take just one instance. This past year we find a prominent critic hailing the Koussevitzky interpretation of Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique" Symphony for its revelation of the "wholly exceptional power and originality of form" long denied yet plainly to be perceived in the score. The commentator remarks and welcomes the Boston Symphony's disregard of "antiquated nonsense," of embarrassment at Tchaikovsky's intense humanity.

The retrospective view, offering a panorama of musical accomplishment pre-eminent in symphonic annals, augurs well for the plans already being laid for next year's series of concerts by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra here at the Institute. The dates have been set—Friday evenings, November 16, January 11, February 15, March 15, and April 12—and Brooklyn's music lovers can look forward again to the pleasure and privilege of hearing the best by the best.



Sibelius Second Is Featured

Monitor

April 2

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Nobody ever knows exactly what will happen at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; but whoever wants to make sure of what does take place worthy of remark must attend every performance the management arranges, even to the series of matinees first ventured the present season on Sunday afternoons. The fifth program fell in turn yesterday; and truly what happened for one undeniable thing was an extraordinarily clear and supple performance of the Sibelius Symphony No. 2 in D major, Serge Koussevitzky in charge.

How it came about, let anyone explain who will. Very likely there was high expectation in the Sunday afternoon audience, which evidently consists in considerable degree of students, whether those actually pursuing academic courses just now or those somewhere along in a state of adult educational advancement. Again, the musicians may have been on right terms of familiarity with the work, knowing it from recent particular study and yet not so point-by-point rehearsed in it as to be without an over-all independence.

At any rate there seemed to prevail that balance between attention to the conductor's wishes and freedom of execution which listeners like. Strings, woods, and brasses took part as three choirs rather than as an agglomeration of 10 times 9 or so instruments, with the result that sonorities came through in their right value and melodies stood out in extraordinary clearness. The symphony seemed an organized affair as it proceeded from page to page. It seemed to carry a structural relation from episode to episode, and it seemed a perfect and inevitable cycle as it went from movement to movement.

When the Second Symphony is thus played, both the composer's originality and his indebtedness to others in the orchestral line show; his originality in his quality of song, and his imitativeness in his instrumental method. We could hardly have Sibelius without Wagner, and we would scarcely have him just as he is without Strauss. Yet we seldom are struck by any actual copying.

He has a way, too, of setting off the back of the orchestra against the front that neither Wagner nor Strauss knew. You hear it at the very opening, the horn passage (excitingly rendered this particular day) against the activity of a subordinated sort in the violins.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

APR 1 - 1945

Some Flaws Are Found in First Releases As Ban Against Recordings Is Lifted

By ANNE L. GRIMES

The big things expected on the recording front, with the lifting of the Petrillo ban, have yet to come to pass.

While the few newly-made discs show some improvement in clarity and in the wider range of dynamics, pressings are often uneven, if not defective.

Quite possibly, in order to note real technical improvement, we shall have to wait until that future time when the manufacture of record players is resumed. Needles that get reproduction results and do no harm to record surfaces have become harder to find than the poverbial haystack variety.

New Range Needed

But the worst let-down has come from the compositions selected for post-ban recording. Much new and old music, hitherto unrecorded, but familiar to music lovers via concert and radio, is crying to be included in well-balanced record libraries and catalogues.

So far major companies have chosen to make new recordings of tried and true standard works, many of which have already been presented on records by other interpreters.

It is rather like ending a similar book publishing famine with new but unexciting editions of "Vanity Fair" or "David Copperfield."

Beethoven's "Seventh," performed by Ormandy with the Philadelphia Orchestra (Columbia, Album M-557), while given a straightforward reading, does not come up to the interpretive or technical recording standards already available on discs, as conducted by Toscanini, Weingartner and Stokowski.

Bombastic Recording

Better mechanically, but lesser artistically, is the same company's release (Album M-558) of Rodzinski's bombastic recording debut with the New York Philharmonic in (of all things!) Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6 ("Pathetique").

It has already been better recorded and better performed on records under Ormandy, Furtwangler, Beecham, Stock, Stokowski and even (with the Cleveland) Rodzinski himself.

However, the first American recording of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" and the first complete recording ever made of the seldom-heard work, takes Victor's initial major post-ban offering (Album DM-989) oue of the eternal round of hackneyed "classics."

Furthermore, an all-around imaginative and eloquent interpretation of this colorful and rather Beethoven-like program symphony is given by its recording artists: Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with William Primrose, viola soloist. Technically the recording is competently excellent.

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

MAR 23 1945

Recorded Music

News and Reviews

By CLIF BRADT

In bringing its important post-ban issues to the front, Victor has taken a shot into a clear field. Scheduled for review soon, but too late for this week, is "Harold in Italy" by Berlioz, played by William Primrose, violist, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

Meanwhile, there is a reshuffle of another group of recordings that should be considered:

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 1 - 1945

BOSTON PREMIERE

Randall Thompson's "The Testament of Freedom," for men's voices and orchestra, will receive its Boston première at the pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, Friday afternoon and Saturday night. The orchestra will be assisted in this offering by the Harvard Glee Club.

April 4

Red Cross Shifts Sunday's Concert

Shift of the Red Cross War Fund Symphony Concert next Sunday afternoon, April 8, at 3:30, from the Boston Garden to Symphony Hall, was announced today by the Retail Trade Board of the Boston Chamber of Commerce.

No more tickets are available for the concert. Those already sold will be honored, without exchange, at Symphony Hall. Seats are being allotted in blocks, in proportion to the numbers sold at different prices for the Garden. This means that though individual seat numbers will not apply, higher priced tickets will give holders seats in choice locations.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will perform Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. It will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and four Metropolitan Opera stars.

9th Symphony Chorus Ready

Koussevitzky Praises Red Cross Benefit

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and soloists yesterday held a dress rehearsal at Boston Garden in preparation for what is expected to be Boston's greatest and most exciting performance of Beethoven's Ninth (choral) Symphony, at the Boston Garden next Sunday afternoon for the benefit of the Red Cross.

G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor of the chorus, and the technical staff were unanimous in the opinion that the expected record audience would be thrilled by the brililance and quality of the performance, for which a staff of Boston and New York engineers have perfected the sound controls.

Serge Koussevitzky, Symphony conductor, said:

"The rehearsal proved for the second time that the Boston Garden is a fitting auidtorium for extraordinary occasions. With the assistance of expert engineers, the results achieved were most satisfactory in regard to controlling sound. However, the matter of sound and acoustics becomes of secondary importance. The predominant factor is the response of the public. Of the response of the Boston public, we have no doubt.

"This was demonstrated last December by the remarkable results of the Sixth War Loan concert. The present undertaking is as great in purpose. While our hearts go to our wounded and to suffering humanity, we are able to give to thousands of people in Boston one of the greatest masterpieces in musical art—The Ninth Symphony of Beethoven."

In addition to the orchestra of 110 musicians and the chorus of 300 specially trained voices, the Metropolitan Opera stars, Eleanor Steber, Kerstin Thorberg, Kurt Baum and Norman Cordon will sing as soloists.

Tickets are on sale at leading Boston stores and at Symphony Hall.

GARDEN READY FOR SYMPHONY

Red Cross Benefit to Be Given Next Sunday

Post April

Sound engineers have perfected arrangements at the Boston Garden for the performance of Beethoven's Ninth (Choral) Symphony to be given next Sunday for the Red Cross by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, it was announced last night.

The concert, the proceeds from which will go to the Red Cross, is being sponsored by the Retail Trade Board.

HANFORD, CALIF.
JOURNAL

APR 1 - 1945

The latest sunrise services will be heard from Mirror Lake in Yosemite Valley, with music presented by the College of the Pacific A Capella Choir, directed by J. Russell Bodley.

Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the BOSTON SYMPHONY orchestra in today's concert to be heard at 5:30 o'clock on KFBK in an all Russian program. In keeping with the Easter season, Russian Easter Overture by Rimsky - Korsakoff will be featured.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

APR 1 - 1945

NINTH SYMPHONY AT GARDEN FOR RED CROSS

The choral Ninth Symphony of Beethoven will have its largest Boston audience and its most distinguished performers when the famous music is performed in the Boston Garden next Sunday afternoon, April 8, at 3.30, the entire proceeds to go to the American Red Cross. The performing forces, 400 strong, all of whom have volunteered their services, are the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, and four stars from the Metropolitan Opera Company: Eleanor Steber, soprano; Kerstin Thorberg, contralto; Kurt Baum, tenor, and Norman Cordon, bass.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 2 - 1945

State Support of Music

Editor:

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky recently advocated State support of music. It seems to me that this State should finally wake up to the fact that Maestro Sciotti, our well-known conductor, has been speaking of a plan of this nature for 15 years or more. It seems a shame that a State cannot support operas, symphonies and concerts on its own.

Dr. Koussevitzky states that a plan of this nature would give jobs to many men and women in the orchestral and choral work. Think of the many opportunities offered young singers for work in the choral and solo parts. These singers, I am sure, are in the State and amply qualified. It not only gives singers work but also makes many more jobs in the field of stage production.

Projects of this sort are being carried out in many States. I cannot see why our own Rhode Island cannot be the first State of New England to adopt such a plan. Wake up, music lovers of Rhode Island! Let's be the first to win this fight. Our musical postwar planning should start right now.

VINCENT J. DELPONTE.

Providence.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

APR 4 - 1945

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Final Concert of Providence Season.

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the fifth and last concert of its Providence season in Metropolitan Theater last night. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky plunged the audience into one of those luxurious baths of tone that he is so eminently expert in devising. It was an experience both sedative and stimulating in the enjoyment of sound.

The symphony in E-flat, K.543, by Mozart, was displayed with the grace, elegance, and zest that Dr. Koussevitzky always bestows upon it. Nor did it lack weight of utterance where it is needed, as in the vigorous assertion of the minuet.

The perfumed and subtly tinted phrases of "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," with the flute of Mr. Laurent at its flawless best, and the oboe of Mr. Gilett equally eloquent, was next. The enchantment of this music seems to persist. The audience applauded conductor, soloists, and orchestra rapturously.

Ravel's "La Valse," a favorite with Dr. Koussevitzky, was a demonstration of virtuoso conductor and virtuoso orchestra coming to grips with a bit of virtuoso orchestration.

All this was topped off with the second symphony of Sibelius. It is not always possible to determine what the rugged Finn is muttering about, but it is impressive muttering, and the interludes of oboe solo, of modal flavoring, of motives that give promise of becoming melodies but never do are hypnotic. When the brass enunciates its mighty rhythms and the basses and all their small brothers are rumbling and sighing and the drums are booming, it takes considerable detachment to inquire of oneself, "What is this all about?" One tumbles along in the waves and doesn't care where or why.

The audience said au revoir with its accustomed warmth in appreciation of the season's visits.

BURLINGTON, N. C.
TIMES NEWS

APR 5 - 1945

. . Art Hodges, the scholarly pianist at Village Vanguard, who took his trio to Smith College (Northampton, Mass,) and played to standing room. The Boston Symphony of 110 attracted a partly-filled house . . The stupid comic who, "entertaining" at St. Albans Hospital (for wounded men), opened his act by firing a pistol!

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 4 - 1945

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Plays Its Final Concert of Providence Season

BY G. Y. LOVERIDGE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the fifth and last concert of its Providence season in Metropolitan Theater last night. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky plunged the audience into one of those luxurious baths of tone that he is so eminently expert in devising. It was an experience both sedative and stimulating in the enjoyment of sound.

The symphony in E-flat, K.543, by Mozart, was displayed with the grace, elegance, and zest that Dr. Koussevitzky always bestows upon it. Nor did it lack weight of utterance where it is needed, as in the vigorous assertion of the minuet.

The perfumed and subtly tinted phrases of "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," with the flute of Mr. Laurent at its flawless best, and the oboe of Mr. Gilett equally eloquent, was next. The enchantment of this music seems to persist. The audience applauded conductor, soloists, and orchestra rapturously.

Ravel's "La Valse," a favorite with Dr. Koussevitzky, was a demonstration of virtuoso conductor and virtuoso orchestra coming to grips with a bit of virtuoso orchestration.

All this was topped off with the second symphony of Sibelius. It is not always possible to determine what the rugged Finn is muttering about, but it is impressive muttering, and the interludes of oboe solo, of modal flavoring, of motives that give promise of becoming melodies but never do are hypnotic. When the brass enunciates its mighty rhythms and the basses and all their small brothers are rumbling and sighing and the drums are booming, it takes considerable detachment to inquire of oneself, "What is this all about?" One tumbles along in the waves and doesn't care where or why.

The audience said au revoir with its accustomed warmth in appreciation of the season's visits.

Post

RED CROSS CONCERT AT SYMPHONY HALL

The Retail Trade Board announced yesterday that the Red Cross War Fund Symphony Concert will be given at Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, April 8, at 3:30 p. m., instead of the Boston Garden.

The orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society and four Metropolitan opera stars, will perform Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

The capacity of Symphony Hall has already been sold out. All tickets sold for the Garden concert will be honored at Symphony Hall.

'Testament of Freedom' By Thompson for Novelty

Apr 6

By Winthrop P. Tryon

It is an American show, then, is it not?

"Yes!"

Question put to Randall Thompson, the composer, whose work, "The Testament of Freedom," for men's voices with orchestral accompaniment, will be brought out in completed form for the first time at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, this week. Nor did his reply evince any signs of umbrage at the word, "show;" quite a test, too, for a man be made to submit to who writes symphonies, chamber music pieces, motets, madrigals, and all that. Still, he has had something to do with what are technically known in the theater as "shows," having lent a collaborating hand once at least to something in the stage follies line.

The trouble with American music, particularly in forms requiring an orchestra for their realization, has been that American was the wrong description for it. The native composer has fashioned symphonies after models set before him by European teachers. What he has turned out amounts, oftentimes, to hardly more than an exalted imitation. But Mr. Thompson this time, if never before, gives us something absolutely home-imagined and home-designed. Nothing could be more in the national mood and manner than a college glee club; and for the University of Virginia Glee Club he composed "The Testament of Freedom" on texts drawn from the writings of Thomas Jefferson two years ago this very April.

He entertained but a remote notion at that time of an orchestral background of accompaniment for his singers. A piano answered the original purpose. Now, however, he brings along for trial before Boston audiences a version of his work in shape practically symphonic. The opening motto on five notes, corresponding in rhythm to the syllables of the name of the author of the words—"Thom-as Jef-fer-son!"—sounds not as a pair of hands at the keyboard makes it, but as a large force of players on instruments of many kinds makes it; and we have, instead of a mere introductory figure in the black-and-white of the piano, what will turn out to be, before we are done, the elemental theme of a symphonic poem, set forth in full blare of sonority and full blaze of color.

Immediately after the assertion of this motive, choral recitation of the words begins, voices of men, "The God who gave us life gave us liberty at the same time."

Prose, we are aware; and can music, by any sort of appropriate rhythmical method, be composed to prose? Naturally enough; it has been done in oratorio, though even there, when Biblical texts are used, a certain metrical quality prevails. But the lyrical idea by no means inheres in Jefferson's "A Summary View of the Rights of British America" (1774); and Mr. Thompson has the task of fitting measured music to a non-measured, informal phrasing of words.

Well, the job is his. He assumed it, and we must let him put it through according to his talent and skill. Back along 13 years ago, John Alden Carpenter, composing his "Song of Faith" for chorus and orchestra, to commemorate the bicentennial of Washington's Birthday, used a free, rhymed verse text of his own making. Mr. Thompson undertakes something quite different; and performances given, with piano accompaniment, here and there under academic and other auspices seem to have raised no serious doubt of his having found a solution of the prose problem.

Now if there is one thing more than another that a listening country would like to have proceed from such an enterprise as Mr. Thompson undertakes, it is a tune that everybody could sing—something of an exalted, patriotic sort that would be an addition to the body of popular melody, a "Finlandia," a "Land of Hope and Glory," or something. A hasty look at the manuscript orchestral score which he brings to town with him for trial before the Bostonian public finds signs of something of the sort, and a more leisurely looking over the pages of the printed form of the work used by the singers furnishes some verification. Certainly there runs through the piece, along with the "Thom-as Jef-fer-son!" motto a sustained strain of melody of great dignity and high ecstasy, something that seems to want to keep on singing in recollection.

Metropolitan Opera

The Metropolitan Opera's Boston season will be inaugurated tonight at the Opera House with Bellini's "Norma." The principal roles will be taken by Mmes. Milanov, Tourel and Votipka and Messrs. Jagel, De Paolis and Cordon. Cesare Sodero will conduct. Curtain at 8.

Randall Thompson Chorus; Shostakovitch Eighth Again

By L. A. Sloper April 7

The first performance with orchestral accompaniment of Randall Thompson's choral work, "The Testament of Freedom," was given yesterday in Symphony Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the Harvard Glee Club, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, as the opening number of the twenty-second Friday and Saturday program of the season. The day's list of compositions was completed by Shostakovitch's Eighth Symphony, which was heard here for the first time a year ago.

There was a novel trick of program making: the opening adagio of the symphony was played before the intermission, the other four after it. Presumably this was done to fill out the time for the radiocast tonight.

Mr. Thompson's chorus, for men's voices, was first performed two years ago by the Glee Club of the University of Virginia, where the composer teaches. On that occasion he played a piano accompaniment. It is a setting of four passages from the writings of Thomas Jefferson, and the text evidently was chosen for its timeliness when considered in connection with the present war. Jefferson's eloquent words are stirring today, when victory seems near; no doubt they were even more so two years ago, when the future was less clear.

The sincerity of Mr. Thompson's tribute to Jefferson is beyond question. It is apparent that his purpose was not to draw attention to himself but to remind his hearers of the testament of the great statesman. His setting of the words is straightforward, without unnecessary embellishment. The melodic line follows faithfully the rhythmic shape of Jefferson's sentences, giving the effect often of a chant rather than of a thematic structure.

There are moments when the musical underlaying seems to place the stress on unimportant words; and the musical expression provided for Jefferson's solemn Declaration of Causes and Necessity of taking Up Arms seems trivial and inappropriate. The orchestral commentary comports well with the vocal part. Whether the work as a whole really intensifies Jefferson's thought is doubtful, but it performs a service in bringing his declarations to our attention.

Dr. Koussevitzky's realization of the work was characteristically fervid. It was possible to feel at times that there was an excess of emotion, that the interpretation was more Russian than American, more passionate than ratiocinative, more Koussevitzkyan than Jeffersonian or Thompsonian.

The early repetition of Shostakovitch's Eighth Symphony was perhaps in line with Dr. Koussevitzky's theory that if people hear often enough a work that they do not at first care for they will come to like it. This theory, we may suppose, assumes that the work is a good work. But how can any number of repetitions alter the obvious fact that a symphony is ill-proportioned and excessively repetitious?

Red Cross Concert Shifted

The Retail Trade Board has announced that the Red Cross War Fund Symphony Concert, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, scheduled for the Boston Garden next Sunday afternoon, will, instead, be given at Symphony Hall. No more tickets are available because the capacity of Symphony Hall already has been sold out. Tickets for the Garden may be used at Symphony Hall without exchange.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, gave the first Boston performance of Randall Thompson's "The Testament of Freedom" at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The remainder of the program was given to the Eighth Symphony of Shostakovich, the long first movement just before intermission, and the other four after the audience had enjoyed a needed respite.

"The Testament of Freedom" is a musical curiosity, a setting of prose writings by Thomas Jefferson. There are two extracts from the Declaration of Causes and Necessity of Taking Up Arms (July 6, 1775); one from A Summary View of the Rights of British America (1774) and one from a letter of 1821 to John Adams.

Mr. Thompson had a terrific challenge in those words of Jefferson whose militant ring still sends a thrill up your spine. It is extremely difficult to create music of equal intensity. It is also difficult to write music for a prose text; you are faced with the necessity of expressing literary ideas musically, and at the same time you must match the stresses, syllables and inflections of speech.

The man who set, in a satirical way, items from The American Mercury probably can do it as well as any. On the whole "The Testament of Freedom" is a good and effective job, even though a couple of sentences in the third section remind you of a Gilbert and Sullivan patter song.

What seems to have stumped Mr. Thompson are words of several syllables and Latin derivation, like "privilege," "civilization" and "violation." Those are words of exposition, not in themselves dramatic or associated primarily with emotion, which is, after all, the keystone of musical expression. But he managed to make them clear and musically plausible, at least.

The musical style is plain and rugged. There is little true melody, but its place is more or less taken by diatonic harmonies and an orchestration bold, vivid and plangent. Mr. G. Wallace Woodworth had trained the Harvard men well. They sang vigorously and to good purpose. The composer was cordially applauded when he bowed from the stage.

Well, here we are again on the [illegible] of Shostakovich, and we may as well set our teeth and get on [illegible]. To my ears, the Eighth Symphony is infernally boring, irritating and long-winded, in spite of its enormous technical cleverness and not a few resounding pages. Why O why, must anyone write a symphony an hour long?—C. D.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 6 1945

REGINALD FOSTER, OCD OFFICIAL, 55

Head of Civilian Mobilization Dies in Boston—Lawyer and Banker Had Served OWI

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, April 5—Reginald Candler Foster, investment banker, lawyer and government official, died here today in Phillips House of the Massachusetts General Hospital. His age was 55.

He was a partner in the investment banking firm of Spencer Trask & Co. until 1939, when he resigned as manager of the London office. Mr. Foster became deputy director of the Office of Facts and Figures in February, 1940, later joined the Office of War Information as deputy director and was liaison officer with the Office of Civilian Defense and other war agencies. In 1942, he was appointed assistant director of the OCD and placed in charge of civilian mobilization.

Born in Brookline, Mass., he was graduated from Harvard in 1911 and five years later went to France as a member of the War Relief Commission of the Rockefeller Foundation to help supervise the feeding of children and to set up canteens later used by the Army. Upon completion of the work in 1917, he joined the American Red Cross. Mr. Foster received a commission as a second lieutenant in the field artillery on Dec. 1, 1917.

He participated in the first two organizational months of the American Peace Commission in Paris and then was sent to poland on an information mission. He was demobilized on Sept. 1, 1919, but went back to Europe in January, 1920, as special assistant to E. L. Dressel, American Commissioner to Germany at Berlin.

Mr. Foster was a director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Boston [illegible] Railroad, the Continental Mills and the Old Colony Trust Company. He was vice president and counsel of the New England Mutual Life Insurance Company and a trustee of the Provident Institution for Savings and the Pemberton Building Trust. His Clubs included the Harvard of Boston, the Dedham Country, the Athenaeum and the Eastern Yacht.

He leaves a widow, Mrs. Frances Helen Hoar Foster, and three sons, Rockwood H., Charles H., and Hugh Foster.

TULSA, OKLA.
TRIBUNE

APR 7 1945

RECORD REVIEWS: The lilting waltz from Tchaikowsky's "Serenade For Strings," which the composer in a rare burst of self-confidence once proclaimed 'the best thing I have written,' and Edvard Grieg's "The Last Spring," one of the ornaments of the score of the current Broadway operetta "Song of Norway," are performed to perfection by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, on a 12-inch Red Seal single which Victor now releases as a new coupling.

The Tchaikowsky waltz has previously been available only as an odd side of the Boston Symphony's sonorous rendition on records of the [illegible] Fourth Symphony. It is coupled with Grieg's "The Last [illegible] the enormous increased interest in the music of [illegible] hard on the heels of the success of "Song of Norway" [illegible] romantic biography of the composer

The Serenade was written in 1880, while Tchaikowsky was enjoying the [illegible] of his "beloved friend," Madame von Meck. According to his biographers, the composer did have his moments of relaxation, of [illegible] and contentment with the world. Much of this easy-going [illegible] found expression in his "String Serenade." The Waltz from the score in particular, bubbles over with rare charm and good humor. Like the Tchaikowsky "Serenade," Grieg's "The Last Spring" gives the string section of one of America's greatest orchestras a chance to demonstrate its famous flawless playing.

Symphony for Roosevelt

Apr 16

A slip inserted in the program book of last evening's Symphony concert, concluding the current Monday series, stated that the concert was dedicated to the memory of Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

By one of those curious coincidences that have been so frequent in these past few days, the wholly appropriate first half of the program was planned some time ago. It consisted of Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead" and Randall Thompson's "The Testament of Freedom," a setting for male chorus and orchestra of excerpts from the writings of Thomas Jefferson, which had its first performance with orchestral accompaniment at the Symphony concerts of April 6 and 7.

As the program originally stood, the number following the intermission was the First Symphony of Brahms. When he decided to dedicate the concert to the memory of Mr. Roosevelt, Dr. Koussevitzky sent word from New York that he would conduct instead the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven.

He conducted the "Eroica" in New York last Saturday afternoon, along with Thompson's work and the first movement of Shostakovitch's Eighth Symphony, and told the audience that his intention was to pay tribute to "the greatest man in the world." With its tremendous Funeral March and its mighty proclamation of the heroic mood in the first movement, the "Eroica" was an almost inevitable choice for this double occasion.

Heard under these particular circumstances and divorced from the same composer's "Vocalise," which somewhat unfortunately preceded it at a recent pair of Symphony concerts, "The Island of the Dead" made a deep impression, and whatever may be the ultimate verdict on Mr. Thompson's music, the words of Jefferson seemed more appropriate than ever.

Already performed at the beginning of the season, the "Eroica" again received full measure of Koussevitzkyan eloquence. As before, the Harvard Glee Club gave a stirring account of the Thompson music, pronouncing the noble words of the text with fervor and conviction.

Reginald C. Foster

April 6

Prominent Banker, Harvard 1911 Class, Dies in Hospital

Reginald C. Foster, 55, of Charles River, investment banker, Boston Symphony Orchestra trustee and prominent member of the Harvard class of 1911, died today at Phillips House of the Massachusetts General Hospital.

A member of the United States High Commission in Berlin and partner of the banking firm of Spencer Trask & Co. until resigning as manager of the London office in 1939, he held many important war jobs.

He went to Washington in February, 1940, as deputy director of the Office of Facts and Figures, later joined the Office of War Information as deputy director and liaison officer with OCD and other war agencies and then was appointed assistant director of civilian defense in charge of civilian mobilization.

He leaves his wife, the former Frances Helen Hoar of Worcester, and three sons, Rockwood, who is in the Navy, and Charles and Hugh, who attend Brooks School.

A former Harvard track captain, he went overseas before the United States entered World War I as a member of the Rockefeller Foundation War Relief Commission, then served as a captain of field artillery during the war, and later on the United States high commission in Berlin and with the State Department.

He was a member of the Harvard Club of Boston, Tennis and Racquet Club, Dedham Country Club, Eastern Yacht, Exchange and Somerset Clubs of Boston.

He began his banking career in 1924. In the Fall of 1939 he became chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and was elected a trustee the following April.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

APR 6 1945

Reginald C. Foster, Boston Banker, Dies

BOSTON, April 6 (AP)—Reginald C. Foster, 55, investment banker, Boston Symphony Orchestra trustee and member of the Harvard class of 1911, died yesterday at Massachusetts General Hospital.

He was a member of the United States High Commission in Berlin and a partner of the banking firm of Spencer Trask and Company until he resigned as manager of the London office in 1939. In February of 1940 he went to Washington as deputy director of the Office of Facts and Figures and later joined the Office of War Information as deputy director and liaison officer.

Boston Banker Dies

(Bachrach Photo)

REGINALD C. FOSTER

[76]

---

sic

the front, Victor has review soon, but too played by William chestra conducted by

's Concert

Symphony Hall. Seats allotted in blocks, in the numbers sold at ces for the Garden.
that though individual rs will not apply.
tickets will give in choice locations.
Symphony Orches-ted by Dr. Serge Kous-ll perform Beethoven's phony. It will be as-
Harvard Glee Club, Choral Society and olitan Opera stars.

IC

ony Plays ncert of Season

ERIDGE

ony Orchestra last concert of in Metropoli-
Dr. Serge the audience urious baths of inently expert an experience ulating in the -flat, K.543, by yed with the zest that Dr.
bestows upon ight of utter-ded, as in the the minuet.
subtly tinted a l'Apres-Midi flute of Mr.
best, and the inly eloquent, ntment of this
t. The audi-uctor, soloists, usly.
a favorite with a demonstrauctor and vir-to grips with estration.
ed off with the Sibelius. It is to determine is muttering sive muttering,
f oboe solo, of otives that give r melodies but tic. When the ighty rhythms all their small g and sighing oming, it takes ent to inquire n this all about?"
the waves and r why.
au revoir with th in apprecia-

NCERT
NY HALL

announced War Fund given at afternoon, April of the Boston direction of assisted by and the Rad-four Metro-will perform ony.
y Hall has tickets sold be honored

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAY 6 - 1945

MUSIC'S OVERTONES

Victor Recording Highlight Is Reissue Of Toscanini in Month of Popular Releases

By MILES KASTENDIECK

While recordings by Victor are being issued with regularity, nothing of consequence has been released since the notable album of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's performance of the Berlioz "Harold in Italy" Symphony. That album was hailed enthusiastically not only because of its quality but also because it promised well for the future policy of the company. What has come instead is a collection of miscellaneous items which even in the aggregate total very little actual contribution to a music lover's library. A re-issue of Rossini's "William Tell" Overture, played by the N. B. C. Symphony under Toscanini, is inevitably a highlight. No other conductor gives so definite a perfomance of Rossini as Toscanini, so that those who want a recording which finds him at his best can turn readily to this popular favorite.

Victor's policy suggests going in for the popular, even to the point of placing commercial interest above everything else. So far as the albums are concerned, there are the songs which Lauritz Melchior sings in his technicolor musical film "Thrill of a Romance." The album is, in effect, a popular song recital, containing as it does such numbers as Schubert's "Serenade," Grieg's "I Love You," Victor Herbert's "I Want What I Want When I Want It," "Please Don't Say No, Say Maybe," "Lonely Night" and "Vive L'Amour." Then there is the "Music to Remember" album, which features the four Chopin pieces played by Iturbi in the current film "A Song to Remember." These include the "Minute Waltz," the B-Flat Mazurka, the "Fantasie Impromptu" and the Waltz in C-Sharp Minor, all of which are thrice-familiar. They are meticulously played but not exactly in outstanding fashion.

Having given films their due, Victor turns to two musical shows—albums of selections from "Oklahoma," sung by James Melton, Eleanor Steber and John Charles Thomas, and selections from "Up in Central Park," sung by Jeanette MacDonald and Robert Merrill, neither of the performances of which found particular favor with this reviewer, though the album of Romberg selections appears to be the more vocally pleasing of the two.

Among the single records occur that of Tchaikowsky's Waltz from the String Serenade and Grieg's "The Last Spring," played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky and Offenbach's Overture to "Orpheus in Hades," which represents the first major recording of the Detroit Symphony under the direction of Karl Krueger, both of which are good but not of great musical importance. There is a single Marian Anderson release, bringing Schubert's "Ave Marie" and "Aufenthalt," which are typical of the Negro contralto's artistry. Two other Red Seal "specials," one by James Melton, the other by John Charles Thomas, are hardly a credit to either singer.

On the popular front, then, Victor may have done satisfactorily; on the musical front, it has let us down. To hope that the fall from grace is momentary and that the announcement of important "Musical Masterpieces" will soon be forthcoming is the only summary of the situation to date.

CONCERT NETS FUND $10,000

Music Lovers Aid Red Cross Campaign

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday's Red Cross War Fund Symphony concert at Symphony Hall, sponsored by the Boston Retail Trade Board, turned out to be a performance of Beethoven's Ninth, better, perhaps, than its immediate predecessors, remarkable as these have been.

The hall was filled, and it was announced that some $10,000 had been raised for the fund. Dr. Koussevitzky, the Symphony Orchestra and the Harvard and Radcliffe choirs, who participated in the finale, gave their services, and so did the four Metropolitan stars who made up the best Ninth Symphony solo quartet that we have heard in a long, long time. Symphony Hall, to put it bluntly, doesn't generally do that well by us and by Beethoven. Perhaps the latter does not deserve too much, since he has written for these four singers some of the most hideously ungrateful vocal music in existence.

In his final years, Ludwig took little account of anyone's limitations, and in order to bring off some of his later works a sort of miracle has to be achieved. It was achieved again yesterday. These very excellent soloists, by the way, were Eleanor Steber, soprano; Kerstin Thorborg, contralto; John Garris, tenor, (replacing Kurt Baum); and Norman Cordon, bass. Other solo singers will be heard when the Ninth is repeated at the final pair of Symphony Concerts, those of April 27 and 28.

Though the musical value of most of the choral finale has often been questioned, under the right circumstances it can generate a considerable degree of excitement. That, indeed, was the case yesterday. The audience got the point that applause was not in order between the movements of a symphony, but when the end came there was a tumult, with special ovations for the soloists, for Dr. Koussevitzky, who is at his very best in this particular work, for the orchestra and for G. Wallace Woodworth, who had trained the chorus.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES

APR 8 - 1945

Enduring Record

BERLIOZ—"Harold in Italy," William Primrose, Violist, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor. Victor Red Seal, DM-989.

Starring William Primrose, acclaimed by common consent as the greatest living master of the viola, "Harold in Italy" is the first recording made in nearly five years by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is also the first complete and only American recording of this work.

This concerto marks a wide departure from the accepted virtuoso concerto form of the Nineteenth Century, and an interesting account of how it came to be written is given by Abraham Veinus in his recent book, "The Concerto." The work was started at the suggestion of Paganini, who owned a very fine viola, but complained that he had no music to play. Berlioz wanted to "write a solo for the viola, but so combined with the orchestra as not to diminish the importance of the latter." He evidently stressed the importance of the orchestra too much to suit Paganini. After taking a look at the work in progress, Paganini said, "That is not what I want. I am silent much too long. I must be playing the whole time."

Berlioz refused to concede to Paganini's ideas and later he says, "I conceived the idea of writing a series of scenes for the orchestra, in which the viola should find itself interwoven, like a person more or less in action, always preserving his own individuality. The background I formed from my recollections of my wanderings in the Abruzzi, introducing the viola as a sort of melancholy dreamer, in the style of Byron's Childe Harold."

The four movements are named, Harold in the mountains, scenes of sadness, happiness and joy, March of the Pilgrims singing their evening prayer, Serenade of a mountaineer of the Abruzzi to his mistress, and Orgy of the brigands, memories of past scenes.

REGINALD C. FOSTER

Herald

R. C. Foster, Banker, Dies

Apr. 6

Also Was Attorney, Government Official

Reginald Candler Foster, 55, of 484 Charles River street, Needham, Boston banker, attorney and government official, died yesterday at Phillips House of the Massachusetts General Hospital.

An assistant to the American Commissioner in Berlin after the last war, Mr. Foster was a partner of the banking firm of Spencer Trask & Co. until he resigned in 1939 as manager of the London office. He became deputy director of the Office of Facts and Figures and later joined the Office of War Information as deputy director and liaison officer with the Office of Civilian Defense and other war agencies. In 1942 he was appointed assistant director of the OCD and placed in charge of civilian mobilization.

A native of Brookline, Mr. Foster attended Volkmann's School in Boston and was graduated from Harvard in the class of 1911. In 1916 he went to France as a member of the War Relief Commission of the Rockefeller Foundation where he aided in feeding and housing thousands of children and set up canteens which were later used by the AEF.

He served as a lieutenant in the Field Artillery in France between Dec. 1, 1917 and Sept. 1, 1919 and went through the major American battles of the war. He participated in the American Peace Commission following the Armistice.

Mr. Foster was a director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Boston & Maine Railroad, Continental Mills and Old Colony Trust Company. He served as vice-president and counsel of the New England Mutual Life Insurance Company and was a trustee of the Provident Institution for Savings and the Pemberton Building Trust. He held membership in the Harvard Club of Boston, Dedham Country Club, The Athenaeum and Eastern Yacht Club.

He leaves his wife, Mrs. Frances Helen (Hoar) Foster and three sons, Rockwood H., Charles H. and Hugh.

Funeral services will be announced later.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
HERALD

APR 8 - 1945

PERMANENT

BERLIOZ: HAROLD IN ITALY—Red Seal's first post-ban symphonic release returns to the recording ranks Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra in the first U. S. performance for phonograph of Hector Berlioz' programmatic composition Harold in Italy. Although the work is not a concerto, the viola is nevertheless featured in some of the movements, and starring on that instrument in this interpretation is the American champion William Primrose. A picture piece keyed to the wanderings of Byron's frustrated hero, Harold in Italy follows him through melancholia and joy in the mountains, listening to religious pilgrims, hearing a mountaineer serenade his mistress, and taking part in the orgy of the brigands, one of the noisiest movements ever written or played. Incidentally, the Red Seal recording, done in Boston's Symphony hall, is sometimes alarmingly brilliant. (Victor.)

MARIAN ANDERSON Ave Maria & Aufenthalt—Danbury's distinguished contralto has made this coupling of Schubert lieder one of her biggest best-sellers. Incidentally, Ave Maria is Miss Anderson's final encore number in her concerts. Kosti Vehanen at the piano. (Victor.)

Herald

MUSIC

April –

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the 22d concert of its 64th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The Harvard Glee Club, G. Wallace Woodworth conducting, assisted in the following program:
Thompson . . . "The Testament of Freedom"
Shostakovitch . . . . . Symphony No. 8, Op. 65

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Yesterday we had Randall Thompson and we had Shostakovitch, and it is pretty hard to find much to say that is bright and cheery about either. The Thompson piece, which is sort of a high school graduation cantata with words (and sometimes it seems music) by Thomas Jefferson began the afternoon and the Shostakovitch Eighth, which is probably a fine thing but which you have to have a special attitude for, ended it.

Mr. Thompson, whose music has hitherto seemed interesting in an amiable, honest and unpretentious way, has been at pains in his cantata to use no harmonic or melodic invention or orchestral device isolated since 1845. The result, contrasted with some of Thomas Jefferson's most powerful utterances, is a routine and elementary underscoring of good words like "democracy," "liberty" and "the 4th of July, 1776" with good clean chords, and of underscoring bad words like "despotism" and "aggressors" with big bad chords. The rest goes along with snatches of 19th century melody while the orchestra, when not making good and bad chords, follows along.

What I am trying to say is that this cantata, while certainly destined for great success as an addition to the college or high school glee club repertoire, is hardly worth the services of Dr. Koussevitzky (who is so faithful to his art he conducts this work as if it were the B-minor Mass), the Boston Symphony Orchestra, or the Harvard Glee Club. It is, true, easy to listen to, but Thomas Jefferson's words happen to be important.

Shostakovitch's Eighth Symphony, done here last season, has some splendid moments, but it is impossible to stay with it as long as its composer asks us to. There is no need today to extend and repeat and dwell upon musical material to that extent, I am sure, and even though the symphony was made more endurable by the intermission between the first and the following four movements, it was still hard going for all but the most ardent admirers of the composer. Here again, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave their considerable all to the effort of proving that Shostakovitch must write great symphonies because he writes such long ones.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This week Dr. Koussevitzky has got himself into another program jam. About to record the Eighth Symphony of Shostakovitch, he wished to give it a run-through first. He also wished to bring us Randall Thompson's new piece for men's voices with orchestra, "The Testament of Freedom," a very simple choral setting of passages from the writings of Thomas Jefferson. There was also the matter of the broadcast, and this was settled by putting the Thompson and the long intial Adagio of the Shostakovitch before the intermission. While this procedure smacked of expediency, splitting the Eighth Symphony proved decidedly salutary and the same device might well be resorted to in the case of other symphonic Marathons, notably those of Brucker and Mahler.

Getting back to Mr. Thompson, the vocal portion of his work has been entrusted in these Boston performances to the Harvard Glee Club, which yesterday acquitted itself of its not very complicated task in praiseworthy fashion. Jefferson's words are great and noble and wonderfully applicable to our present problem. Mr. Thompson has set them in a straightforward manner. The chorus sings for the most part in unison and there is but a modicum of vocal counterpoint. The music, however, does little to heighten the eloquence of the text and sometimes detracts from it. You might say that the composer would achieve the elemental by having recourse to the elementary; but it is somewhat late in the day for that sort of thing. It is only fair to record that Mr. Thompson and his music were received with the greatest enthusiasm.

From the Sixth onward, the symphonies of Shostakovitch have been getting poorer and poorer. There are both pleasant and exciting episodes in the last four movements of this one. The first, an inferior copy of the Adagio of the Fifth, but twice as long and twice too long, is almost a total loss. The performance was altogether remarkable.

PORTLAND, OREGON
OREGONIAN

APR

The Boston Symphony Orchestra playing over X at 5:30 with the Harvard Glee club under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevtizky, will present the first performance by a full symphony orchestra and chorus of Randall Thompson's "The Testament of Freedom." The work is a choral setting based on significant excerpts from the prose of Thomas Jefferson.

Philadelphia and Detroit

The Philadelphia Orchestra at 2 gives the first radio performance of Richard Yardumian's "Desolate City." The Symphony No. 2 in E Minor of Rachmaninoff completes the program. Eugene Ormandy will conduct. Yardumian, a Philadelphian, now in the army, is largely self-taught, though important musicians including Iturbi, Stokowski and Ormandy have interested themselves in his work.

The Detroit Symphony at 5:30, under the direction of Karl Kreuger will present a program of the lighter classics.

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra will be heard over KGW at 12:30 playing works by Chabrier, Franck and Richard Strauss under the baton of Desire Defauw.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Red Cross Benefit

By CYRUS DURGIN

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed Beethoven's Ninth Symphony yesterday afternoon in aid of the American Red Cross Fund. The concert had been shifted from the Boston Garden to Symphony Hall, where a capacity audience attended.

The choruses were the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth. The quartet of soloists were from the Metropolitan Opera Association: Eleanor Steber, soprano; Kerstin Thorborg, contralto; John Garris, tenor (who substituted for Kurt Baum, ill with laryngitis), and Norman Cordon, bass.

The concert was sponsored by the Retail Trade Board of Boston. All the artists gave their services. Charles Watkins, chairman of the special events committee of the Red Cross War Fund campaign, announced from the stage that the concert had brought $10,000 to the Red Cross.

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony for some years has been a sort of specialty with Mr. Koussevitzky. His interpretation of it, while adhering strictly to the spirit of the work, is nothing less than electrifying. Yesterday he and the Boston Symphony again achieved a miracle of intensity, whereby the mighty Ninth was heard in all its majesty and overwhelming force.

The soloists were the best-balanced quartet for this terribly difficult music that I can remember. Individually, too, they sang with extraordinary mastery of their high-ranging and exhausting parts. Miss Steber, especially, managed to make herself heard without becoming shrill. The Harvard men and Radcliffe women displayed excellent preparation of the choral parts and they sang with clarity and solid tone.

All hands were noisily applauded when the concert was over.

DALLAS, TEX.
TIMES-HERALD

APR 8 - 1945

ON THE RECORD

By GENEVA JONES

The long-awaited Harold in Italy Symphony by Hector Berliaz has been released by Victor in a five-record album, DM-989, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by ~~Serge~~ Koussevitzky and accompanied by Violist Walter Primrose.

Program music, based on Lord Byron's "Childe Harold," the music digresses from the path of the poem, but it fills entirely its dutiful portrayal of the thoughts and dreams of the young man (Byron), who leaves his native England to visit the continent in an attempt to forget for a while the dissipation of his life.

Until now, Berlioz' music has been sunk in obscurity in the United States. Few besides Koussevitzky have believed it great, and the character of the Frenchman's compositions was too full of overpowering individuality to ride a rail. But, liked or disliked, the importance of his works must be admitted.

The full-blown romanticism of the Harold symphony begins with the first movement, Harold in the Mountains, and winds its way through the successive three, March of the Pilgrims, Serenade of a Mountaineer to His Mistress, and the Orgy of the Brigands, all of them steeped in majestic melody.

[77]

APR 8 - 1945

HUMORESQUE: Serge Koussevitzky and his merry men enjoy a little innocent merriment, with the maestro sitting this number out. The distinguished conductor and his Boston Symphony Orchestra will make their second appearance of the season in the Academy of Music under Philadelphia Forum auspices on Thursday night. The program includes the first performance here of the Shostakovich Eighth Symphony.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

MAY 1 2 1945

Berlioz Work Finest Victor Record Product

ONE of the finest recordings in the classical line is the Berlioz "Harold in Italy," played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Sergei Koussevitzky, with William Primrose, one of the country's outstanding violinists, as soloist. (Victor M-989, $5.50).

The dramatic reading of the tone poem is reproduced faithfully on the discs and the interpretative artistry of Koussevitzky and technical virtuosity of Mr. Primrose are the highlights of the recording.

In concert, on discs and on the air the Boston is the greatest symphony orchestra today. That it does justice to this romantic and moving work is natural. And the Koussevitzky baton brings out the orchestral colorings vividly.

The history of the work reveals it was composed on commission from Paganini. When it was completed the virtuoso sent Berlioz 20,000 francs, which supported the composer for a number of years and it was during this time he wrote his famous "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony. Oddly, Paganini never performed the work. He died a year after the completion of "Harold in Italy."

When There's a Will There's A Way: Music in Boston

Harold

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr. Apr 8

The backbone of commercial music in Boston today—to conclude last week's observations on the matter—are the roadshow musical artists like Marian Anderson, Yehudi Menuhin, Vladimir Horowitz, Ezio Pinza and Jose Iturbi. They are superb musicians no one will deny, and they can fill Symphony Hall to capacity at the drop of a small advertisement. Consequently they draw large fees for their appearances (Marian Anderson is reputed to have earned well over $100,000 last season on the road), and they deserve every penny they earn, for theirs is not an easy lot.

They are popular in direct ratio to their stage presence, or through the public personality they may have achieved through shrewd public relations management. They are popular only in an indirect ratio to their transcendent musical ability or to the quality of the music they perform. Certainly, they could not have got anywhere at all without spectacular notices from New York music critics, and this implies both of these factors (although a number have done wonders with quotes distilled cleverly from notices anything but spectacular). Nonetheless, most of them who have achieved national fame and held it have combined personality, publicity and musicianship. Vladimir Horowitz, for example, has personality, personal attractiveness and publicity and is, to boot, the greatest living pianist. This is a phenomenon, and results in a mammoth audience everywhere. Mischa Elman, on the other hand, is by no means handsome, has a rather dated, over-flowery stage deportment, and hasn't been in Life lately if ever—but is certainly one of the greatest living violinists. This is a pity, and results in small audiences everywhere. It is hardly necessary to continue the examples through Rise Stevens vs. Lottie Lehmann, William Kapell vs. Borovsky, etc., to demonstrate that if it is a choice between music and glamour, music comes second in a commercial recital.

The backbone of resident music in Boston is, of course, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its four regular series of concerts. Once established at the opening of each season, the audiences remain fairly steady; the orchestra does not depend on transient customers. Everyone agrees the performances of the orchestra and the interpretations of its conductor are magnificent. But the programmiing of these concerts has for some years been open to legitimate criticism considering the necessarily high admission charges. Now that radio sponsorship has fixed an inflexible limit to the first half of the program, the situation has worsened. But this has all been dwelt upon in this column to a tiresome and certainly futile extent. Granted, devising programs for more than 50 programs a season is a difficult and exacting job with all sorts of pulling and hauling from all directions. But is there any good reason for repeating, two and three times a year, season after season, a few favorite works—unless that reason is that the musical, the really musical, public here is too small or too inarticulate to say "come now, just what is this?"

As for opera in Boston, it is pretty hard to gaze upon it without jaundiced eye. This year we have had—or will have had by next Saturday—four sessions of opera. The Boston Grand Opera Company, which seems to have had the idea that all it had to do was employ one adequate singer per opera and turn him or her loose in a shambles of unrehearsed orchestra, rags and tatters scenery and no stage direction whatever, came here for two engagements and staggered everybody who had ever seen an opera before and surely convinced everyone who had not that opera is the silliest imaginable invention. The San Carlo, which did a little better, repeated "Cavalleria," "Rigoletto," "Aida," etc., well knowing it would take a fearful beating if it had done anything nobody had ever heard of, like "Otello." Indeed, the only thing that induced the Metropolitan to come here this year with its really interesting repertoire was a not unreasonably held notion that you can sell anything today. (It has found this is perhaps not wholly true; several operas have not been sold at this writing as it developed everybody wanted to see a movie star sing "Mignon.")

But the encouraging, indeed, the very bracing thing about this season in Boston is this: The little musical events, the events at which the music, not the personality or the social aspects or the grandeur of performance, was the main attraction, have done exceptionally well. True, there weren't as many of them this season as hitherto, and for obvious reasons. But most of them drew splendid, appreciative and distinctly musical audiences. I refer to the various concerts and series (some of them free, some of them expensive) arranged by the Longy School, the Conservatory, Harvard, Boston University, Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge (bless her heart), the Society of Early Music, the Cambridge Collegium Musicum, the Civic Symphony, the Gardner Museum, the Handel and Haydn Society, France Forever, and so on.

Naturally, the audiences consisted in part of friends or sympathizers. But I venture to say those audiences consisted largely of people young and old, who simply wanted to hear great and good and unthreadbare music performed sincerely and well if not always greatly; of people who have come up in music the hard way, who have developed taste, discernment, awareness, and discrimination, by dint of radio and record listening and concert-going; of people who have seen the hollowness of much of the recital industry of today; of people who recognize the greatness of Beethoven's Fifth, but who want to hear something else once in a while; of people who, in short, are growing up musically as they add years to their age. I believe Boston and America is developing more and more people like this every year. And I believe that when it has developed people like this in sufficient numbers to attend recitals given by people who are not handsome but who are great musicians, to force opera companies to put on operas in such a way as not to betray a great tradition and a great art, to force symphony orchestras to range widely through the world's music, and to support music first and the men who perform it second, then I believe this nation and maybe this city will be ready to produce its own musical art, and I further believe that that art when it comes will rank with the world's greatest.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

APR 9 - 1945

MAESTRO: Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony will make their second appearance of the season at the Academy of Music on Thursday night under Philadelphia Forum auspices.

SYMPHONY CONCERT BOOSTS RED CROSS FUND BY $10,000

An estimated $10,000 was added to the Boston Red Cross War Fund as a result of a benefit symphony concert presented yesterday before a capacity audience at Symphony Hall by the Boston Retail Trade Board.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, performed Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the concert assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and John Garris, Norman Cordon, Eleanor Steber and Kerstin Thorborg, all of the Metropolitan Opera Company. All artists volunteered their services for the benefit.

Following the performance, Dr. Koussevitzky, the Metropolitan Opera soloists and G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor of the Harvard and Radcliffe groups, were presented with miniature bound copies of the Beethoven score by Red Cross and Retail Trade Board officials.

Among the Red Cross War Fund officials attending the concert were Edgar C. Rust, executive vice-chairman, Charles F. Rowley, vice-chairman, Charles H. Watkins, co-chairman of the special events committee, and Joseph R. Hamlen, chairman of the Boston Metropolitan Red Cross Chapter.

MUSIC

Red Cross Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, yesterday afternoon performed Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in D minor, Op. 125. The soloists were Eleanor Steber, soprano; Kerstin Thorborg, contralto; John Garris, tenor, and Norman Cordon, bass, and assisting were the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. The concert was sponsored by the Retail Trade Board of Boston for the benefit of the American Red Cross.

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Serge Koussevitzky's performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony is always illuminated with a spiritual intensity that carries everything before it, but not in many years, if ever, has he achieved the radiance and the incandescence of his performance yesterday. It was a truly stupendous musical event, and one which reflected from beginning to end the certainty in all of us that while perhaps still far off, the end is in view, and that the Olympian spirit of the fellowship of man which gave rise to this monumental work will at last prevail upon this earth.

The circumstances of the performance, that is, the hope of V-E day, the benefit of the Red Cross, the atmosphere of spring and of renewal were enough to set the stage, but there were also the factors of the finest quartet of soloists who have taken part in this work here in many seasons, of the most brilliant sounding (if perhaps not the best-schooled) choral group in recent seasons, and of the orchestra at the very peak of its form. It was no wonder, then, that with this fabulous battery of musicians before him, the conductor could drive more deeply into the spiritual content of the music than ever before, and could project it with overwheming emotional impact.

The reading of this immensely difficult score by the conductor was personal in every sense of the word, and why it should not be I can see no reason whatever. This, he tells us, is what Beethoven has come to mean to me in a career devoted entirely to the study and the recreation of the world's great music, and this is the only way I can honestly play him. And the result is a performance with all the qualities of classical clarity, proportion and brilliance, yet with a sort of corona of romantic hysteria and tension. Yesterday, too, the reading had astonishing vigor and drive. Here was no mere realization of a printed page; here was living music, perhaps the greatest music ever written in certainly one of the greatest performances.

The soloists—all Metropolitan Opera members who contributed their services—cannot be too highly praised for their traversal of their exacting roles. For once, you could hear every note the soprano (Eleanor Steber) sang; for once, you could be excited by the baritone (Norman Cordon) recitative; for once, you could be not dismayed by the tenor (John Garris, who had never sung the role before, yet took over for Kurt Baum at practically no notice); for once, you could hear the contralto (Kerstin Thorborg) in the quartet passages, and for once you could hear them all over the chorus. The audience, which endured a good deal of inconvenience in the unexplained change from the Garden to Symphony Hall, would have been happy to hear the whole symphony repeated then and there.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

APR 12 1945

Shostakovich Opus Heard

By GRENA BENNETT

Last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall began auspiciously with the Eighth Symphony of Shostakovich, Russia's white-haired boy among its modern composers.

He has written an odyssey of the present world conflict on music paper, last night's composition being self-described as his intention "to put in music the new optimism found by a long-suffering people—and to create a musical interpretation of our triumph over barbarism and express the greatness of our people."

This is rather a large order, long drawn out in analyzing his thesis; diverse and digressing in thematic premise; economic in melodic content; and generous in flamboyant sonorities.

All this was performed valiantly by one of the world's greatest orchestras.

Of different matter was Faure's "Pelleas et Melisande" suite, taken from the stage music to Maeterlinck's tragedy. This was serene and suave, three episodes of fluent, translucent melody performed with ingratiating charm and simplicity.

The same composer's "Elegie" was delightfully played by Jean Bedetti, solo 'cellist.

The orchestral accompaniment was admirable as was the conducting throughout the evening of Serge Koussevitzky.

Symphony Pianist, 22, Hailed As Musical Genius, Works Like Man In a Frenzy When He Is Composing

Post

April 8

BY SALLY ELLIS

Carl Sandburg, the great American poet, once introduced him at a banquet as a "demon welterweight composer" and Dmitri Mitropoulos, the famous conductor, insists that the way he plays the piano "he either has the devil or God in him," but if you saw Lukas Foss, who at the youthful age of 22 is official pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, coming down the street with an armful of books you'd think he was just another high school senior!

Foss, although only 22, has an imposing list of accomplishments behind him. The New York Philharmonic Orchestra with Rodzinski conducting, spent $5000 to put on his astounding cantata, "The Prairie," with the Westminster Choir and four well-known singers—the first time in its history they presented a work of such dimension and expense by an American composer. For Beethoven's Ninth Symphony or the Matthew Passion, of course! But never befor for such a young and comparatively new American composer.

Fritz Reiner and the Pittsburgh Symphony did his First Symphony and George Szell conducted the New York Philharmonic in the first performance of his moving "Ode to Those Who Will Not Return."

Acts Quite Wild

Koussevitzky, whom Foss terms his "musical fairy godfather," thinks he is one of the most gifted boys he's known and critics and conductors alike always refer to him as a "musical genius."

Through Koussevitzky's munificence he has the good fortune to be official pianist of the Boston Symphony, a position which not only keeps the wolf from baying at his door, but which allows him, by its unusual nature, to spend most of his time composing.

"It is not necessary," Koussevitzky declares, "to wait 10 years to recognize ability and talent. Once it is discovered there should be opportunities to cultivate it." Happily for Lukas Foss and other brilliant young men, Koussevitzky often makes these opportunities possible.

"There are so few piano parts in orchestra literature," Foss explains, "that I am free to go along pretty much as I please." In October and November of the season, for instance, he had only four days of actual work or one single concert which meant four days of rehearsal. Usually Foss sits in at the rehearsals, absorbing and observing and tucking away things in his remarkable memory.

Although he will tell you in one breath that he is exactly like any other normal young man of 22, in the next he will startle you with the fact that he lives in an office building on Huntington ave., near Symphony Hall—so he can make a lot of noise.

"Noise," he explains carefully, "on the piano. When I compose I am a madman. I look like a fanatic, I make a terrific lot of noise, and I act quite wild on the piano.

"Anyone who looks in at me would think I was crazy. That is why I always close the curtains!" Foss' curtains are as dramatic as he is. Made of dark red damask, they are carefully draped and pulled back—until he composes.

Started at Seven

Once, not so very long ago, Foss could compose anywhere—even in the subway. Some of his earlier compositions were written while he shuttled back and forth in the New York subway. Today he seriously doubts his ability to compose under similar circumstances.

In the first place, he points out, Boston subway trips aren't long enough (at least those journeys which Foss makes) and secondly, he couldn't draw curtains around himself in the subway!

"I am much more intense about composing now and I demand much more of myself!" he explained. Another drawback to subway composing is a piano. Foss couldn't exactly tote his $1500 parlor-grand along with him and he almost always plays while composing because he likes the sound playing provides and running his fingers over the keyboard and the resulting harmony is a stimulant to him just like black coffee.

Berlin-born, Foss had his first piano lesson at the age of 7 and immediately began composing. Recognizing the boy's unusual talent Julius Goldstein, Foss' first teacher, started at once to develop this ability by having him write little tunes at each lesson.

He would, for instance, put some simple question to the child such as "How is the weather today?" And Lukas would reply "It's fine" or "It's lousy" (these are his words) by putting notes down on paper and singing the answer.

As a youngster Foss says his voice was excellent, but now he describes it as "very, very awful." This does not prevent him from always yelling out his own compositions and when he plays a whole opera score he often finds himself trying to sing all the voices at once.

Sharpened Up

"A musician," says Foss, "sings all the time whether he's happy or blue or just plain disgusted."

Sensitive, intelligent and quick to moods, Foss is a typical artist in that he is oblivious to his physical needs for the most part. When he first came to the Boston Symphony his clothes were so deplorable, he says, that the perfectly-tailored Koussevitzky took him aside one day and informed him that he must develop better taste in clothes.

"Look at this suit!" sighed the great conductor. "It is too big here, it doesn't fit right here, it is awful." Foss, for the first time aware of his baggy suit immediately agreed with him.

"You can," Koussevitzky confided, "get a good suit for $65!" This rather floored young Foss who, fresh from New York where he had been picking up what money he could at odd jobs such as teaching, lecturing before women's clubs and girls' colleges and arranging, was rather flat as to capital.

Nevertheless he went straight to the first men's store he could find and purchased a made-to-order afternoon formal for which he carefully counted out the suggested $65 and then he bought two other suits, a brownish herringbone tweed and a double breasted brown suit with stripes.

"Koussevitzky," says Foss, "was pleased! He did not, however, kiss me because of my new suits." Everyone who is acquainted with the Boston Symphony's amazing conductor knows his manner of showing his pleasure and exuberance by kissing—in the typical Russian way.

He Didn't Dare

When Jeanette MacDonald was introduced to Koussevitzky, whom nearly everyone calls Koussey or "the old man," the great man shook hands with her. Miss MacDonald looked up at him in amazement. "Why Dr. Koussevitzky," she remonstrated, "I'm so disappointed! I thought you always kissed people."

"My dear lady," replied the suave, gentlemanly conductor, "I did not dare!" whereupon he quickly rectified this horrible error by bending over and kissing Miss MacDonald's cheek.

Foss has often been the recipient of Koussevitzky's exuberance when he has done something particularly worth-while. At the Berkshire Music Centre he composed a piece in three days in honor of Koussevitzky's birthday, and the Music Centre chorus practised in great secrecy. Leonard Bernstein, another of Koussevitzky's proteges, was to conduct and Foss was to play the piano.

It all went off beautifully and at the end the happy and surprised Koussevitzky came up on the platform and kissed both Bernstein and Foss.

People are constantly referring to both Bernstein and Foss as the "two darlings of Koussevitzky" and Foss' name is never mentioned without someone comparing the two young men. Both were trained at Curtis Institute in Philadelphia and both have been befriended by Koussevitzky. Foss refers to their relationship as "friendly rivals" adding that he hoped they were more friendly than rivals.

this performance that Mitropoulos made his famous remark about Foss being inspired by either the devil or God.

"Never," he declared fervently, "have I had such an experience. I was so stimulated I went back and I couldn't sleep all night. It was amazing!"

Foss has the uncanny knack of getting the spirit behind his music across. Other musicians insist it is a sort of hypnotic thing, that he doesn't write just notes but what is behind and between them. Nor does he stop at merely playing them. He gets the drama of his music across. Lukas himself describes his playing as "sort of the al fresco type as an opposite to the very detailed type of playing."

While both Martin and Hilda Foss, his father and mother, are proud of his accomplishments they are more concerned with their son's contribution to the world than they are with his success.

Lukas Foss, who at the age of 22 is official pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is also an accomplished composer.

Won Pulitzer Scholarship

While the two are alike in that they both are pianists, composers and conductors, Bernstein's interest lies in the conducting field while Foss is more interested in composing.

Foss, too, is foreign educated which to a good many conductors, including Koussevitzky, is considered a great advantage.

He went to the Lycee in Paris and at the age of 11 entered the Paris Conservatory, where he studied piano with Lazare Levy and composition with Noel Gallon. At 15 and still in knee pants, he came to America with his parents and brother and spent four years studying composition with Rosario Scalero, conducting with Fritz Reiner, and piano with Mme. Vengerova at the Curtis Institute. During three summers of the Berkshire Music Centre he studied conducting with Dr. Koussevitzky and Paul Hindemuth, continuing his work with this composer at Yale University.

In 1940 he wrote a suite of incidental music for Shakespeare's "The Tempest" for an amateur production and in 1942 it carried away a Pulitzer scholarship of $1500.

Although Foss' first and almost complete interest lies in classical music he does, when the hour is late enough and the room smoky filled, bang out some terrific boogie-woogie which he learned while teaching at a colored settlement in Philadelphia. He is a jazz purist, but admits that he tires of it pretty quick.

When he first came to the Boston Symphony he used to do a lot of improvising and once, just before a performance conducted by Villa-Lobos, he broke into an improvisation of the "Star Spangled Banner" which shocked his colleagues so that they lectured him severely on being "undignified" in his position.

If you ask Foss which, of all his compositions, was his favorite he wouldn't be able to answer. "It would be like asking a father which is his favorite child," he declares. His most famous composition by far is "The Prairie," which Foss says he composed because he loved the poem and thinks it is America at its best.

Foss has read practically everything Sandburg wrote but "The Prairie," taken out of the volume of poems entitled "Cornhuskers," is his favorite. "I turned it completely upside down, cut it, and then worried about what Mr. Sandburg would think," he revealed, "but I was delighted and happy indeed when he told me I had revitalized it."

Never a Sensation

A professor of philosophy at Haverford University in Pennsylvania, Martin Foss' attitude is definitely an idealistic one. He has taught his son the judgment of values and Lukas has a very clear idea of what is important and what is not. "The greatest thing," Martin Foss has always told his boys, "is making the most of what is in you."

"My father is happier when I write a new composition that is really good," explained Foss, "than when I am honored by Broadway." Koussevitzky and other conductors are apt to trace the Foss depth and feeling to his training at the Paris Conservatory, but Lukas feels that it has more to do with what his folks have taught him at dinner and supper. The Foss philosophy was actually lived—even at mealtime.

It is this background that makes Foss feel he will never be a sensation in the musical world. "I may be a success," he smiles, "but never a sensation. And I don't want to be, because to me a sensation is nothing more than a sort of blown-up bubble magnified through the glamor machine of radio, newspaper and magazines.

"It is an enslaving thing and you must always feed the machine until it squeezes you out like a lemon and then when you are all used up it throws you away. Success, on the contrary, is nothing more than the usual reward for your endeavors."

Foss has tasted that reward and being human, likes it. He was disappointed because he was unable to attend the premiere of his "Ode to Those Who Will Not Return," inspired by John Donne's "Devotion" and because he missed the second performance of his "First Symphony." "Composers," explained Foss, "should be there to take their bows. The audience expects it."

ALTOONA, PA.
TRIBUNE

APR 13 1945

RECORDS

By LORNA W. WALTER

BERLIOZ: HAROLD IN ITALY, Op. 16: ~~Boston~~ Symphony Orchestra conducted by ~~Serge Koussevitzky, with~~ William Primrose, Violist (Victor Album DM-989). Hector Berlioz tells us in his Memoirs that his reason for composing Harold in Italy was "to write for the orchestra a series of scenes in which the solo viola should figure as a more or less active personage of constantly perserved individuality; I wished to put the viola in the midst of poetic recollections left me by my wanderings in the Abbruzzi, and make it a sort of a melancholy dreamer after the manner of Byron's Childe Harold. Hence the title, "Harold en Italie." The history of this composition began after the aging Paganini heard a Berlioz concert at the Paris Conservatory. So impressed was Paganini that he requested Berlioz to write him a solo piece for his Stradivarius viola (which he had never played in public) saying, "you are the only one I can trust for such a work." When you listen to the music, you will know why it proved to be such a success.

Berlioz, always acknowledged as a genius for instrumentation and composition, distinguished himself in the four descriptive movements of Harold in Italy. In the delightful first movement—Harold in the Mountains—are scenes of gaiety, happiness and melancholy; in the second—March of the Pilgrims—is heard the song of the approaching pilgrims, introduced by mysterious chords; Serenade of an Abbruzzi Mountain Dweller to his Mistress is the colorful, rhythmic third movement; in the Orgy of Brigands—the final movement—are heard the gay, savage and vigorous passages of the boisterous brigands.

This very excellent recording was made in the accoustically perfect Symphony Hall, Boston, by the nation's number one orchestra—the Boston Symphony, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky and this score has been the perfect material for Dr. Koussevitzky's great interpretive talents.

LATEST POPULAR RECORDS

[79]

Never Practices

"The Prairie" is scored for two flutes and piccolo, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, four horns, three trumpets, three trombones and tubs, timpani, xylophone, bass drum, triangle, snare drum, cymbals, piano, harp and strings. His cantata won the Critics Circle prize.

Strangely enough, Foss never practices the piano. His technique, he will tell you naively, keeps up by itself. Not that Foss doesn't play! He does—all the time. But he is not doing what the usual pianist does five or eight hours a day, concentrating on scales and pieces and various techniques.

Yet when Dmitri Mitropoulos came to his studio to listen to him he told young Foss that he could spare only half an hour and that he was very, very tired. Completely exhausted! Foss sat at the piano and Mitropoulos stood by the window for one hour. It was after

Ideal Conditions

Koussevitzky in an effort to console Foss magnanimously declared, "Do not feel too badly, my boy, next season the Boston Symphony Orchestra will do them." Foss, however, still wishes he could have been present for the first performance of his "Ode" which was written in a little village church in Pennsylvania.

The only available piano was in the village church so Foss, after the minister granted permission, spent two weeks in it, composing. The clergyman who loaned his piano and church was apparently very much impressed with Foss because he used him as the perfect example in a sermon he preached on "Divine Gifts."

"Right now there's a young man playing in my church," he explained to a guest audience, and then searching for the ideal expression to define Foss' greatness he continued, "and he sounds like two people playing the piano!"

"He wanted to say something about quality," Foss smiled, "and it was very typical and American that he should express it in quantity."

The First Symphony was created in an equally idyllistic spot—the MacDowell Colony, Peterboro, N. H., where Foss has spent the last two summers. Foss glows when he talks about the colony which to him is a wonderful combination of privacy and sociability where each person has a cottage of his own which is practically isolated instead of being right next to each other.

"The only human thing you see is a lunch wagon and they just silently put your lunch at the door. It used to be a donkey, but now it's an automobile."

This convenience particularly appealed to young Foss who, although he gets ravenously hungry, is apt to forget his meals altogether when he is composing.

Sketchy Eating Habits

His studio apartment, while otherwise equipped for light housekeeping, does not have an icebox, so Lukas goes out to eat. He seldom attempts even a cup of tea because, as he says, "I either lack sugar or find there is no lemon, or when I have these two things I discover I am entirely out of tea."

"I have quite a lot of old junk on the shelves like pots and pans and other strange things that I haven't the least idea what to do with." The pots were donated by a sympathetic fellow member of the Boston Symphony who mistakenly thought Lukas might like to cook a snack some morning.

"It is perhaps a good thing," he continued, "because I used to do my own breakfast and lunch and the only difference between the two was that the orange came first at breakfast and at lunch it came at the end. Otherwise it always consisted of bread and butter, milk, and an egg boiled two minutes—by intuition." It was always too much trouble to squeeze an orange for juice, toast was a bore, and it was much simpler to pour the milk straight from the bottle.

As a result of these rather sketchy eating habits, Foss is apt to look a little hollow-cheeked, which only serves to enhance an artist's appearance anyhow. Slight and probably underweight, Foss knows he should drink a quart of milk a day and get plenty of rest but he does neither. His bedtime is apt to stretch to 2 and 3 in the morning and if he gets a bad cold which usually turns into grippe it never keeps him from a performance.

Turned down by his draft board because of an asthmatic condition, Lukas was completely crushed at first, but sat down at once and wrote six patriotic popular songs as an outlet for his patriotic fervor. Foss is very proud of his brother, Oliver Ulric, who is with the army overseas.

An American

It always irks Foss when his Berlin and Paris background is brought up. "I am American," he will point out, "and I really remember very little of my days abroad." At first he was self-conscious about his Americanism but recently overcame this because, as he put it, he had "nothing to worry about."

Critics always describe Foss' compositions as being typically American and full of inventiveness, while Foss in writing about American music uses the same term of inventiveness, adding that American music is original, fresh, spontaneous and alive.

"In a way, every country is today a young country," he declared. "Everywhere the old cultures are coming to an end, and new ones are emerging. And everywhere mankind faces the same problem, the building of a new world and a new faith—with the artist as its most enthusiastic champion, prophet, servant and fighter."

And Lukas Foss, being young and sensitive, American and creative, talented and ambitious, is giving everything in him to build the new faith, the new culture and the new world!

EUREKA, CALIF.
HUMBOLDT STANDARD

APR 12 1945

Art Hodes, the scholarly pianist at Village Vanguard, who took his trio to Smith College (Northampton, Mass.) and played to standing room. The Boston Symphony of 110 attracted a partly-filled house . . . The stupid comic who, "entertaining" at St. Albans Hospital (for wounded men), opened his act by firing a pistol!

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 8 - 1945

CONCERTS AT THE FRONT LINES

Armed Forces Master Records Provides Music on Disks to Keep Our Fighting Men in Touch With Home

By OLIN DOWNES

THE concert to be given on the sixteenth of this month by the Schola Cantorum, Hugh Ross, conductor, in Carnegie Hall will be for the benefit of the Armed Forces Master Records. The proceeds will go to the further purchase of items for libraries of recorded music for the use of the men and women of the armed forces at home and overseas. Over 1,200 of these record libraries of great music have thus far been provided.

The Armed Forces Master Records, Inc., was founded in June, 1942. It is organized on a voluntary basis, with no paid staff. It has reason to feel honored by the contributions of distinguished musicians, the Federation of Churches, committees organized in various cities, ASCAP, committees of schools and universities over the country, orchestral associations and the American Academy of Arts and Letters. Toscanini has given forty libraries of these records. Gladys Swarthout, Helen Traubel, Josef Hofmann, the Dessoff Choirs, the National Orchestral Association, the High School Boys' Band, the Tuesday Evening Music Circle of Watertown, S. D., are among the many other donors. The national sponsors of this organization, directed by Harry Futterman, with its offices at 9 Rockefeller Plaza, are John Alden Carpenter, Walter Damrosch, Howard Hanson, Serge Koussevitzky and Deems Taylor. Income tax exemption has been accorded contributors.

Careful Selection

This project has demonstrated its value. The names cited are merely indicative of the character of the organization and the variety of sources from which the donations have come.

Part of the success of the plan lies in the fact that the records are good ones, new ones, chosen as carefully as the circumstances permit to meet the wishes of the men. What their wishes are may be indicated by two of the programs given at Milna Bay, Papua, New Guinea. The first program was arranged by the chaplain, who knew from experience the tastes of the men. It went as follows: The Lord's Prayer; a Bach Chorale; Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"; Victor Herbert melodies; First Rumanian Rhapsody, Enesco; symphonic suite, "Schéhérazade," Rimsky - Korsakoff; "Emperor Waltz," Johann Strauss; "He shall feed His Flock," Handel.

The second program is one arranged by the men themselves, who quickly took over. It begins with Bach's song, "Bist du bei mir," and proceeds with Beethoven's Fifth symphony; Enesco's First Rumanian Rhapsody; Saint-Saëns' "Danse Macabre"; Richard Strauss' "Rosenkavalier" waltzes; Polka and Fugue from Weinberger's "Schwanda"; von Weber's "Invitation to the Dance"; a Trumpet Voluntary, authorship unstated; De Falla's "Ritual Fire Dance"; Elgar's "Enigma" variations.

"Putting ashore just three months after the Japs had departed," writes Chaplain Richard L. Harbour, USNR, to Mr. Futterman, CPA, of these concerts, "we found no one to greet us but a clan of Papuans and ten lads of the Army * * * and virtually no evidence of modern civilization other than a few skeletons of such as passed for complete buildings in that stage of our progress toward Tokyo. One of those buildings had a white cross on the roof beam and I took charge of it immediately.

"You will recall that Christian spent some time in the Slough of Despond. Well, believe me, we were right there too. Two days after the ship had left us deep in the muck, the good electricians had wired up a few spots and the 'Power and Light Company' was in business. The chapel was among those places lighted and we brought out the record player, the record folios, and held concerts thereafter every night for some time.

Simple Presentation

"The concerts were very simply presented; how else could one have done it in that rugged atmosphere? The player was set up in the sanctuary of the little chapel, and I sat in the first pew (the pews were New Guinea Gothic, consisting of three saplings held up by braces also constructed of saplings) and announced the selections, giving brief program annotations throughout the concert.

"And who were the listeners? They were yeomen, corpsmen, truck drivers, pipe fitters, carpenters, electricians, linemen, coxswains, boatswains and seamen first and second class.

"Was the gamble which you all made worth while? Well, I think of those letters home, of the many lads who gathered around after concerts to comment on some number and to request others, of the chap who frankly admitted to me that he couldn't keep back the tears during Fauré's "Requiem" and of the boys in the sick bay who flatly announced that we needn't bother to bring along the popular stuff when we played concerts for them."

Libraries Needed

Six hundred more record libraries than the AFMR has thus far been able to supply are in urgent demand. Its libraries of new, good records have been sent, among other places, to Iceland; to Dutch Harbor, Alaska; to the First Marine Division of the South Pacific; to United States Army Bases in Burma, the South Pacific, Alaska; to the Walter Reed Hospital in Washington, D. C.; to the U. S. Navy Carrier; to Overseas Medical Transport Service; to Army and Navy bases in America from the Marine base at Quantico, Va., to the Army Air Base at Fresno, Calif.

Lieut. George Odierno, under the caption "Concerts Pacific Style," wrote Mr. Futterman that "money has little value in an island economy, goods being the medium of exchange, so I swapped a Jap helmet for a record player which required but little repair. A marine presented me with the 'Fire Bird' suite, swearing that the records were warped, a remark which I considered as criticism of Stravinsky. From Seabee I obtained two more Beethoven piano concertos in exchange for a quart of whisky, which I obtained from an infantry captain in exchange for a Jap rifle that I had obtained from a quartermaster for a flatiron with which he desired to press his uniforms in anticipation of a leave in New Zealand."

One of the most striking results of the distribution of these Master Records is the place that the music takes in the listeners' consciousness. Men in sick bay as well as the able-bodied ask constantly for records of music masterpieces and in increasing numbers decline the jazz and the general run of the topical music of the day. These in greater part are musical laymen, as the lists show. They are finding, from actual experience, that the dance music, inclining to the brittle and the nervous, gives them less solace and entertainment than the creations of symphonic masters. This, too, is significant: that such music not only impresses the men by its beauty but has a special attraction for them because, though they can't define it, it brings them, in distant lands and exotic surroundings, a sense of the quality of their own civilization.

What else, indeed, is an art, but such an emanation—such an accretion, in terms of sound, of the thoughts, experiences and social evolutions of peoples and nations. In unforeseen ways, and by unforeseen methods, great music has proved its value to humanity in the most fundamental emergencies.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 13 1945

Boston Symphony Gives Concert in Carnegie Hall

French-Russian Program Led by Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony Orchestra Wednesday night at Carnegie Hall in a French-Russian program which included two short and infrequently heard pieces by Gabriel Fauré: a suite from his incidental music to Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande," and the "Elegie" for violoncello and orchestra. The former work, dating from 1898, contains the accustomed constantly shifting harmonies, here applied to making a faintly nostalgic atmosphere; its most charming section is "Fileuse," a gentle perpetuum mobile. The "Elegie," suavely read by Jean Bedetti, solo 'cellist, seemed less rewarding musically, but elicited more applause from the audience.

The concert began with a superb performance of the Shostakovich Eighth Symphony. The contours were clearer, there was more expression in the tortured fortissimo passages of the first movement than one had previously heard. The least attractive movement still appears to be the final fugal one. It lacks the necessary decisiveness to be emotionally satisfactory after the very unequivocal movements which precede it. Ravel's Second Suite from "Daphnis et Chloe" provided sparkle and excitement. P. B.

[80]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 12 1945

SHOSTAKOVICH 8TH CONCERT FEATURE

Koussevitzky Conducts Boston Group in Brilliant Reading of Symphony at Carnegie Hall

By OLIN DOWNES

The Shostakovich Eighth Symphony, which Dr. Rodzinski introduced in America at a Philharmonic-Symphony concert of April 2 last year, and which had since been given both Boston and New York performances by the Boston Symphony, was repeated by that organization under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction last night in Carnegie Hall.

This performance was a sheer triumph of beautiful and brilliant playing by the unrivaled orchestra. It is hard to believe that anything the composer had in mind was absent from the interpretation, into which Dr. Koussevitzky put every fiber of his energy and insight, and his intense admiration for the composer. For the present writer the eloquence of this performance merely emphasized the inventive weakness, long-windedness and diffuseness of the composition.

Receives Warm Reception

Neither in this symphony nor in his Seventh does Shostakovich impress us as fulfilling himself as a symphonic writer. He sets himself certain tasks; he takes a certain emotional position; the results are artificial. The symphony was respectfully applauded. The brilliancy of its presentation was warmly approved, and with these words the nature of its welcome is described.

In honor, evidently, of the centenary of the birth of Gabriel Faure in May of 1845 this program, the first of the last two that the Boston Symphony gives this season in New York, included two of the compositions of that master. The first was the Suite made from the wistful music that he wrote for Mrs. Patrick Campbell's production of Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande." The second was the "Elegie" for solo 'cello, heard in this instance with the orchestral accompaniment.

Jean Bedetti as Soloist

This solo, played with the most admirable finish and tonal excellence by Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the orchestra, delighted the audience. More distinguished music was furnished by the suite. Its utter simplicity, its grave beauty and tenderness, conveyed by the fewest possible notes, became in a way a wholly unintended rebuke of the pretentions and inflated rhetoric of Shostakovich's symphony—and this although the tempi of the first and the last movements of the suite were hurried and the aristocratic reticence of the score replaced by an over-dramatic accent.

The concert ended to the joy of all with the spectacular performance that conductor and orchestra give, and so often have given in this city, of the second "Daphnis et Chloe" suite of Ravel.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN

APR 12 1945

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS FIRST ADIEU

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

The superlative qualities of the Boston Symphony were lavishly set before its audience last night in Carnegie Hall at the last of its Thursday night concerts of the season. The program, itself, was not an exciting one. Only in the final Suite—the second—from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe," which Serge Koussevitzky has conducted here many times, was there something to cause a stir. But his ensemble played sumptuously. The evening was particularly noteworthy for the sensitive performance of the strings.

The Shostakovich Eighth Symphony is now an old story. The work has its admirers, of course, and its detractors. For many of us it is much too long—its material wears thin. For others, its expansiveness is that of great Russia, the Russia of today. There was a little more than an hour of it last night. Possibly Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of it changed no one's opinion. But it could scarcely have been achieved more clearly and with more warmth and color. The famous Boston strings were true to their traditions. The nuances the conductor drew from them were fabulous.

Again, in the Suite which Gabriel Faure extracted from his stage music for Maeterlinck's "Pelleas et Melisande"—gentle, suave, elegant, altogether French—the string playing could scarcely have been more exquisite. Jean Bedetti, leaving his accustomed place as first cellist of the orchestra, moved forward to a place beside the conductor for the solo part of the same composer's "Elegie," which was gratefully presented, with a modesty of tone that would never have resulted had a concert virtuoso of the instrument been called in as an assisting artist. Mr. Bedetti was rewarded for his artistry with the applause of a pleased audience.

Saturday afternoon's program will close the Boston Orchestra's New York season. The program will repeat Shostakovich's Eighth and afford a first opportunity to hear Randall Thompson's "The Testament of Freedom," a setting of words by Thomas Jefferson. The Harvard Glee Club will thus be given a part in Dr. Koussevitzky's seasonal farewell.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

APR 11 1945

BURGIN CONDUCTS SYMPHONY HERE

Boston Orchestra Brings Concert Series to Close

By Willard M. Clark

The 1944-1945 Community Concert Series, presented by the Junior League of Springfield, came to a close last night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid its annual visit to the Auditorium. Because of the illness of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Richard Burgin, concertmaster, conducted. Mr. Burgin is no stranger to this city and has won the admiration of music lovers, not only for his own splendid musicianship but for his many gracious acts in behalf of the Springfield Symphony. The program offered food for serious listening. Beethoven's "Eroica" and the second symphony of Sibelius.

There is little more to write about the excellencies of the Boston Symphony Orchestra than has been written many times before. It stands today, as it has stood for years, the premiere orchestra in the country, perhaps in the world. Not only is it made up of 100 or more virtuosi, but it has had for 21 years the same leader, Dr. Koussevitzky. This companionship has resulted in the superb organization one heard tonight.

It takes a mighty orchestra to do full justice to the might of Beethoven's "Eroica" and the second symphony of Sibelius. Both are the heroic, defiant outpourings of men who were unafraid, sure of themselves. The equal of Beethoven's third symphony has never been written and it is small wonder that it confounded the critics of the day who found in the increased dynamic range and stupendous length of the opening movement the same ear-shocking novelty as not so long ago we discovered in Stravinsky, Schonberg or even Bloch. The grandeur of the funeral march will never dim, nor will wonder at the exquisite handling of the final variations, forerunner of the wealth of variations to come from Brahms. Mr. Burgin provided an inspiring reading, robust and spacious, deeply felt. The performance was one of the finest the Bostonians have ever given here.

The second symphony of Sibelius bids fair to become as well known as Beethoven's "Eroica." It is not strange that they were placed together on this program for there is an affinity between them. One finds in the Sibelius opus the same rugged strength and conviction, the same heroic contours as one finds in the third symphony of Beethoven.

It is a symphony which has become associated with the Boston players and last night one heard a definite performance such as only this group of players can give.

During intermission it was announced that the artists to be heard next season will be Erica Morini, violinist; Vladimir Horowitz, pianist; Patrice Munsell, soprano, and the Boston Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 15 1945

Carnegie Hall Audience Spellbound As Koussevitzky Honors Roosevelt

Boston Symphony Presents Masterpieces in Tribute to Late President—Conductor Asks Silence for 'Greatest Man'

By OLIN DOWNES

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky's leadership before a silent audience yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall was an unforgettable salutation to the passing of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. It was an occasion that far transcended in its significance and atmosphere anything that performances with exclusively artistic objectives could have offered. Yet it was an achievement of the highest art, and exemplification of the place that sovereign artists should take in the life of the world today—by the side of the greatest statesmen and in humanity's cause.

Against black cloth at the rear of the stage hung an American flag. The performance of the national anthem was put forward from its customary place at the beginning of the program to the end, and Dr. Koussevitsky, from the stage, announced the music that was to be played in observance of the passing of President Roosevelt.

The program, he explained, would begin with the first movement of Shostakovitch's Eighth symphony, because the composer intended this symphony as an expression of the tragedy and pain which humanity has undergone.

Then would follow the first two movements of the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven, ending with the funeral march which will always rank as one of the greatest elegies in all music. And Dr. Kousevitzky asked the audience to remember that "Beethoven dedicated this symphony 'to a great man.' We play it in memory of the greatest man in the world."

Finally, with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club, there was to be given the first performance in this city of Randall Thompson's setting of words from the writings of Thomas Jefferson, written for observance of the 200th anniversary of his birth, and singularly prophetic of the crisis of the present day.

Moment of Silence

Dr. Koussevitzky asked for a moment of silence before the performances began, and there was no applause at any time during the concert, which had the atmosphere and character of a religious observance.

The conductor had given an extremely eloquent performance of Shostakovitch's entire Eighth symphony on the Wednesday night preceding. It is to be said that on this occasion, with a sincerity and intensity that drove every note nome, he surpassed his previous effort. It is also to be said that under the circumstances the music impressed the writer as it never had before. Whether the whole of the long symphony would have the same effect on this special occasion is a matter for speculation. The single movement yesterday went deep and rang true.

The same emotional quality, but classically ordered and controlled, underlay the reading of the greatest of symphonies. The virility and unadorned directness of the statement of the hero theme and its rugged developments was one characteristic of this performance; the romantic and pathetic treatment of the second theme, so significantly contrasted to the first in its free tempo and harmonies, was another—and both were unforgettable. When the epochal march—if that vast movement is so to be called—came to its end, with the broken phrases of its opening theme stammered, as it were, by the instruments, as though they, too, were nearly speechless with grief, it was indeed as if the last sigh had been uttered, the last word said.

It may be conceived that after such music the composition of a certain Randall Thompson faced difficulties. It is very remarkable that this apprehension proved groundless. Mr. Thompson has written a composition of astonishing simplicity, appropriateness and effect. He has produced what amounts almost to a choral symphony in four movements, and one which made a profound impression on the audience.

Fortunate that his virtuosity is matched by his gifts and his sincerity. One looked ahead and wondered what he would do when he came to this place and that. He had the answer. The introductory pages set a sentence from "A summary view of the Rights of British America," written by Jefferson in 1774. The second part and the third come from the "Declaration of Causes and Necessity of taking up Arms," of 1775. The fourth is from a letter to John Adams, beginning, "I shall not die without a hope that light and liberty are on steady advance. . . . And even should the cloud of barbarism and despotism again obscure the science and liberties of Europe, this country remains to preserve and restore light and liberty to them. . . ." The end repeats the text of the beginning, the shouts of "Liberty" and "God" rising always higher over the orchestral splendor.

Admirably Proportioned

His score is admirably proportioned, climaxed and carried through. It does not sag or falter in its progress. It is written, vocally and practicably, at the same time that it uses the orchestra admirably for coloristic and dramatic effects. The exact unrhythmed texts are set with great skill and ingenuity in supplying musical patterns which have form in themselves while fitting like a glove the immortal words of Jefferson. As old religious composers have done with Latin texts, so has Mr. Thompson shown his great knowledge and unfailing device in this procedure, which also takes fully into account laws of dramatic sequence and contrast. And he has written music which can be sung and understood by great numbers of people, while standing on its feet as a work of art.

It was with a thrill that yesterday's audience discovered one of the most convincingly American scores that this period has produced. Mr. Thompson has not written as a sensationalist or a patrioteer, but as a most thoughtful and modest artist, seeking for the right notes to communicate something, profoundly of his people, that was in his heart. His musical instinct and his honesty protected him from all the notes, but the right ones. He has succeeded because of this, being as man and musician farthest from the self-seeking and the high-pressure salesmanship that disfigures too much of our native musical activities of today. All rejoiced in his accomplishment and the reassurance it gave them in a troubled hour.

Here it should be said that no small part of the effect of his music was due to the splendid perfection of the Harvard Glee Club in point of tone and declamation, and its superb enunciation of the text. When Americans write and sing music like that, we have something to expect.

Afterward Dr. Koussevitzky again asked for silence, then played the national anthem, which was sung by chorus and audience a few seconds prior to 4 o'clock, when the funeral ceremonies at the Capitol began.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

APR 13 1945

Boston Symphony Concert Here Honors Memory of President

By MAX de SCHAUENSEE

BOWING, like everything else, in deference to the tragic news of President's Roosevelt's death, Sergo Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, began his program at the Academy of Music last night, with a few well chosen words.

In a voice shaken with emotion, the Boston conductor said, "Our great President is no longer with us," and he asked the audience to stand for a minute of silent tribute.

Then Dr. Koussevitzky announced a change in program, saying that he would play only the first movement of the scheduled Shostakovitch Symphony No. 8, and that he would replace the previously announced "Apres-midi d'un Faune" and "Dapnis and Chloe" with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. About the latter piece Dr. Koussevitzky said, "It was written by Beethoven for a great man, and we will play it as a tribute to the greatest man of our times."

Nothing could have been more appropriate for the solemnity of the occasion than the tragic and forsaken texture of the long initial movement of the Shostakocich Eighth, which occupied the first half of the program. The long stretches of woodwind weaving plangents melodies ove trremolando of violins and 'cellos; the passages of subdued and melancholy strings, and the wild burst of tragic climax, as the percussion and brass reverberated on high, created a mood which was singularly right and fitting.

It goes without saying that Dr. Koussevitzky gave a noble and heroic account of the Beethoven Symphony. Undoubtedly it was one of the great performances of a Beethoven symphony heard in the orchestral life of this city.

We can think of no higher tribute to the Russian conductor's moving eloquence than to say that it was indeed worthy of the subject to which it was dedicated.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

MAY 13 1945

Simon

On Discs . . .

Recent Releases

Berlioz: HAROLD IN ITALY played by William Primrose and the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky (Victor) $5.78. Paganini paid Berlioz 20,000 francs for this "Symphony with Viola Obligato," but never played it himself: not enough of a show piece for the viola. Perhaps that is why it was never recorded before. Or maybe the reason is that its musical merits are extremely uneven, its poetic qualities far removed from the Byron epic which inspired it. At any rate, orchestra and soloist give it a luscious and spirited performance, and the recording is first rate. The Berlioz cult, which is quite sizeable, should be grateful to Victor.

Stravinsky: SCENES DE BALLET played by the Philharmonic-Symphony under the composer (Columbia) $2.67. This is the work commissioned by Billy Rose for The Seven Lively Arts. Only about half of it was left when the curtain went up, but it sounded very fine compared with the banality of most of the score for that tasteless production. As a concert piece, it sounds skilful, clever, and rather trivial. Its themes share the prettiness of traditional Russian ballet; there are echoes from both Tchaikowsky and the composer's own Petrouchka; and the dissonances of the later Stravinsky, the passages of emotionless intellectuality, sound out of place. It receives, of course, a much better performance than it had in the theater pit.

Mozart: JUPITER SYMPHONY played by the Philharmonic-Symphony under Walter (Columbia) $4.73. A highly satisfying performance of a great symphony. Walter not only conducts mit Verstandt, but he eschews the melting sentimentality that sometimes mars his readings of Mozart. The odd side offers the Overture to Cosi fan tutte.

Brahms: FOURTH SYMPHONY played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy (Columbia) $5.78. Presumably this is an apology for the poor recording of this symphony by the All American Orchestra released by Columbia shortly before the Petrillo ban went into effect. The apology was not necessary, as there are 10 other recordings in the market, including Columbia's good one by the London Symphony under Weingartner. This one is much better recorded, but it lacks the vitality Ormandy brings to his readings of modern scores.

NATION
NEW YORK, N.Y.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

ON THE maps, provided by critics and teachers, on which I had to depend in my youthful exploration of the world of music Berlioz was marked off as a desert: I first read about the Fantastic Symphony, for example, in the New York Times review of Mengelberg's first concert with the National Symphony in 1921, in which Richard Aldrich deplored the waste of effort on a hopelessly arid and banal work. The truth about Berlioz—as about a number of other musical matters—was something I had to discover through my own experience of the music; and one experience—a performance of "Harold in Italy" by Toscanini with the New York Philharmonic around 1930—had the effect of revelation: I found myself following Berlioz's mind in the finale with new understanding and delight; and I was now ready to appreciate fully the marvels in "Romeo and Juliet" and—I find now—the earlier movements of "Harold in Italy."

Those marvels are the product of a great melodic gift, a subtle harmonic sense, a magician's ear for the orchestra, which operate in completely individual ways in the service of an individual mind and imagination. The Berlioz melody is an exfoliating progression, with unexpected turns and exquisite inflections which pivot on, and are enriched by, equally unexpected and exquisite moves in the underlying harmony, and with further enrichment by the instrumental colors. You can hear all this in the second movement of "Harold"—in the developing series of statements by the strings, each moving unpredictably to its conclusion in a sustained note that is echoed by a magical note of the horn and wonderful murmurings of the other winds. And in the third movement, where, after preliminary pastoral pipings, the English horn begins a serenade with two simple phrases which leave you unprepared for the ravishing subtleties of melodic turn of phrase and harmonic and instrumental coloring that follow. As for the finale, there the Berlioz mind runs riot in an extreme dynamic and rhythmic activation of the material—by sharp contrasts of loud and soft and sudden crescendos and decrescendos in the brilliant sonorities; by antiphonal tossing of them between choirs of the orchestra; and above all by abrupt shifts in their rhythmic impetus through irregularities of accent, grouping, and so on.

Victor's new recording of Koussevitzy's performance with the Boston Symphony and William Primrose as viola soloist (Set 989; $5.50) has enabled me to document my dissatisfaction with the performance when I heard it in Carnegie Hall last November. The work did not have the effect I remembered and expected; and I was aware of one thing that lessened its effectiveness: its sections fell apart into detached episodes, instead of cohering in a unified utterance. And I can see now that the performance is the product of a man with an ear for sonority but no feeling for pace—either for the single tempo that will give a passage of music its right character and meaning, or for the several tempos that will give the sections of a piece of music coherence.

If it had been Koussevitzky's performance of the finale that I had heard in 1930 I doubt that the effect would have been revelation; for at his slow pace the music hasn't the lightness and élan it should have, but is stodgy and heavy. In the third movement Berlioz gives a metronome number for the Allegro assai of the introductory section, and another metronome number for the Allegretto of the serenade to implement his direction that the dotted quarter-note of the Allegretto shall equal the dotted half-note of the Allegro assai—or in other words that one measure of the Allegretto shall take the time of two measures of the Allegro assai. But Koussevitzky slows down the Allegretto, altering its relation to the Allegro assai, and changing what Berlioz intended as a fairly animated serenade into a rather lugubrious lament. Later in the movement there is a repetition of the Allegro assai leading again to the Allegretto; and this time Berlioz further integrates the two by continuing the sharply rhythmed accompaniment-figure of the Allegro assai into the half-as-fast Allegretto as a background for the serenade. Clearly the accompaniment-figure must continue unaltered in speed and character, and Berlioz's directions for the two tempos must be obeyed literally; but Koussevitzky again slows down the Allegretto, and with it the accompaniment-figure of the Allegro assai. And there is another example of this involving two movements: when the viola solo of the introduction of the first movement recurs in the course of the second movement it should move at the same pace—as it does if one takes Berlioz's tempos for the movements; but with Koussevitzky's altered tempos it comes out enormously slower in the second movement.

The sound of the performance in Carnegie Hall was phenomenally beautiful; but the recording was made in Symphony Hall, which is over-brilliant even when filled; and though the press-release about the recording said a curtain had been hung to eliminate the echoing of the empty hall, the brilliance of the fast and loud passages comes off the records blurred and noisy from reverberation such as I do not recall in any previous Boston Symphony recording (some of the noise, however, is caused by Koussevitzky's disregard of some of the pp's that Berlioz opposes to the ff's). But the slow and quiet portions of the work are beautifully reproduced. In my review copy there are a few buzzes and two sides with wavering pitch (in addition to a few notes which Primrose does not hit accurately).

With its defects of performance and recording the set will not give you all the beauty that is in the work; but it will give you enough to make it a set you should not fail to acquire. Given the sound of the serenade or the finale, you may be able to imagine it in its correct tempo.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

MUSIC

By Miles Kastendieck

Koussevitzky Holds Memorial Service For Roosevelt at Academy of Music

Through the symbolism of music came "the perfect tribute" to Franklin Delano Roosevelt at the Academy of Music last night. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra held a memorial service in place of the regularly scheduled concert. The program had been specially selected, Dr. Koussevitzky explained in a brief speech at the opening of the service, for the appropriateness of the music.

He chose to open with Tchaikowsky's Sixth Symphony "because more than any other composition, it expresses the grief of man," and to close with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, "now known as the Victory Symphony, "because no one man has led to victory his people, his country and the world with greater courage than our late President."

The deep personal qualities of Tchaikowsky's music released a great surge of emotion so difficult to speak of in words but so eloquently stated in sound. The somberness of the first movement increased in tone because the great conductor poured into it all the understanding of his own experience, an understanding which in the finale struck the very depths probed by this great soul-stirring lamentation. The performance revealed the Boston Symphony in all its magnificence, unleashed from the restraint and the refinement often characteristic of its playing.

The Beethoven struck the note of triumph in a singularly impressive way, symbolized as is the opening "motto" as the keystone of victory. The exaltation of the final pages representative of Roosevelt's spirit and the course of events was profoundly stirring. Musically there could have been no finer tribute than this which was paid so embracingly, so simply and so nobly.

List of Boxholders At Symphony Concert

Boxholders at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert last night in the Academy of Music included:

Box 2 was occupied by Mrs. Dean C. Osborne and her guests, former Supreme Court Justice Lewis L. Fawcett, Mrs. James Fawcett, Mr. and Mrs. Donald Sinclair, Mrs. C. T. Frohne, and Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Fawcett.

Occupants of Box 3 were guests of Mrs. Benjamin Prince, the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. John Howland Lathrop, Mrs. Jessica Lozier Payne, Irene Golden, Edith Sterling Smith, Mrs. and Mrs. B. Meredith Langstaff and Mrs. Karp P. Mikalenkoff.

Members of the Brooklyn Women's Club seated in Box 4 were Mrs. Burgess Osterhout, president; Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Mrs. Adolph L. Muller, Mrs. George Hills Iler, Mrs. H. S. Rasi and Mrs. William E. Howes.

Seated in Box 5 were Emma Jessie Ogg, Jessie Lockitt, and Mrs. William B. Parker and her guests, Ella Taylor, Rosalie Parker and Katharine Parker.

Tickets for Box 1 were presented by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences to army officers at Fort Hamilton.

Tickets for Box 7 were donated by the Brooklyn Committee for Boston Symphony Concerts, Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, chairman, to enlisted men and non-commissioned officers at the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 14 1945

MUSIC PROGRAMS ALTERED FOR DAY

Local Concert Plans Undergo Changes as Orchestras Join in Mourning for Roosevelt

The music world will observe the day of mourning for President Roosevelt today with many concerts being canceled or postponed and programs changed.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its concert at Carnegie Hall this afternoon under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky as scheduled. The program, however, has been altered to include the first movement and Funeral March of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, the first movement of Shostakovich's Eighth symphony and Randall Thompson's "The Testament of Freedom," sung by the Harvard Glee Club. Dr. Koussevitzky has announced that there will be no intermission so that the concert will end before 4 P. M., the hour of the President's funeral. It will be a memorial concert for the President and will be open only to subscribers to the Boston Symphony.

Two Concerts Postponed

A concert of Czechoslovak music at Town Hall, scheduled for this evening, has been postponed until April 26, and a concert of Prokofieff Piano Sonatas, planned for this afternoon at the same hall, has been put off until April 21.

This evening the City Center Opera Company will give its performance of "La Bohème" at the Center, as originally planned, and the Salmaggi Opera Company will present Verdi's "Otello" at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

A performance of Mozart's "Requiem" by the chorus of the Institute of Musical Art and the orchestra of the Juilliard School of Music, both under the direction of Igor Buketoff, will be heard this evening at the school as scheduled, as the directors felt that the presentation was wholly appropriate to the occasion.

Ballet Theatre, currently having its spring season at the Metropolitan Opera House, has canceled its matinee performance, but the evening showing will go on as planned.

Philharmonic Revisions

The program of the concert of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall was changed from that previously announced, in observance of the passing of President Roosevelt.

The Philharmonic - Symphony concert of Thursday night had been canceled on the news of the President's death, this being the first subscription concert canceled by the society since the assassination of Abraham Lincoln. The precedent was properly followed, and yesterday compositions which would have been offensively out of place for the occasion were replaced by the "Allegretto" from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Mozart's G minor Symphony and Brahms' Second.

After the playing of the Beethoven allegretto Dr. Rodzinski, the conductor, motioned to the audience and the orchestra to rise. A moment of silence was held before the orchestra resumed.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

Last Of Symphony Programs

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will bring its Monday evening series in Symphony Hall to a close tomorrow, and its Sunday afternoon series a week from today. On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next, Dr. Koussevitzky, will present the 23rd program and last but one of the longer series. The first half of this program will be devoted to French music, including D'Indy's "Istar" Variations, "La Peri" by Paul Dukas, and Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole." In the second portion of the program Richard Burgin will appear as soloist in Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. Mr. Burgin will complete this season 25 years as concert master of the orchestra.

The program for tomorrow evening will include Rachmaninoff's Symphonic Poem "The Island of the Dead," and Randall Thompson's "The Testament of Freedom" for Men's Voices and orchestra. The Harvard Glee Club, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, will appear in the setting of texts from Thomas Jefferson. The closing number will be the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

APR 15 1945

* * *

NEW RECORDINGS of these two arias have just been released by Columbia (three records), with accompaniment by an anonymous orchestra under the direction of Pietro Cimara. The recordings are extraordinarily faithful to the warm light texture of Miss Pons' voice. The records also reveal a fine artistic sensibility and ease of production in the strictly cantilena passages. It is only when she goes into her acrobatics that she loses her plasticity and starts forcing the tone. She impales a high F in both arias but the sound is not pleasant.

It must be said however that Miss Pons performs a real service for Donizetti by endowing the lyrical parts of the Mad Scene with a fragile and affecting poetic sentiment.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra make their bow in the direction of the popular audience with two "semi-classical" numbers: "The Last Spring" by Grieg and Tschaikowsky's "Waltz Serenade" (Victor, 1 record). Both are slightly overblown, but the sound of the orchestra is so beautiful that one can forgive in this case.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

APR 15 1945

DETROIT AND BOSTON

The first major recording by the Detroit Symphony Orchestra under Karl Krueger, the American-born conductor responsible for its revitalization, is a performance of Offenbach's sparkling overture to "Orpheus in Hades." This comes on a Victor 12-inch record, and the 116-piece band has been reduced to wax remarkably well.

Another of the world's great orchestras, the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky, also appears on a Victor 12-incher with a coupling of the Waltz from Tchaikovsky's String Serenade and Grieg's "The Last Spring." The first item has previously been available only as the filler side of an album set and the second is repressed because the success of "Song of Norway" has increased interest in Grieg's music. Both are beautifully recorded.

YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR

APR 15 1945

Red Seal Singles

One of Tschaikowsky's most popular movements is the lilting waltz from his Serenade for Strings in C. In a rare burst of self-confidence the composer once proclaimed it "the best thing I have written." This lovely music has been recorded by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitsky, coupled with Grieg's "The Last Spring," one of the ornaments of the score of the current Broadway hit "Song of Norway." Both of these gems are played in the manner to be expected of the great Boston orchestra. The surfaces are very fine.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

MAR 4 1945

Boston Symphony Brings Woolsey Series To Close

The Woolsey Hall Concert Series ended last night when Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra through a program of superb proportions. The great audience at Woolsey Hall heard the classics of Mozart and Beethoven separated by two enchanting compositions by Moussorgsky and Ravel played with unsurpassed artistry and breath-taking beauty, and showed their satisfaction and delight by thunderous applause throughout the evening.

Two concerts a year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are far too few for New Haven's musical appetite, as is clearly illustrated by the sold out house and the reception given this long famous orchestra at every visit. With the schedule for both Winter and Summer that the Boston group now maintains, however, New Haven is fortunate to be included for two concerts a season.

The crystal clarity of the strings in the Mozart E flat major Symphony was a matter of sheer delight, and was never lost even in the spirited menuette. The lovely and slow moving Andante was a finely etched contrast, with the Finale a racing gayety of perfect balance.

The Moussorgsky, Prelude to "Khovanstchina" must be described as tonally seraphic so persistent was the beauty of its phrases.

And in complete contrast in style "La Valse" of Ravel filled the air with the luscious tones and daring measures of a subtly sensuous waltz, part Strauss in approach and form, all Ravel in gay and ardent imagry. The orchestra's work in this amazing composition showed again the ability and ease with which these famous musicians enter into all types of composition and performance, ready at the slightest indication of the conductor to sharpen the mood, or enlarge the mould.

Of course the greatest heights of all were reached in the Beethoven. The beloved "Seventh" never shone more brightly in the exaltation that Dr. Koussevitzky and his men achieved. The conductor seemed to draw his inspiration from the men themselves, and they in turn showed an almost reverent devotion to the performance of his every indicated desire.

The Vivace of the opening movement scintilated with a vivid and colorful light that only this orchestra seems to be able to produce, and in the Allegro con brio closing the symphony, the terrific speed subtracted nothing from this remarkable vividness and color.

The extraordinary breadth that is demanded by Dr. Koussevitsky for Beethoven readings was in full evidence last night, and the work, as indeed the entire program must go in New Haven's music history as one of the most outstanding of all times.

MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE

APR 20 1945

Boston Symphony: Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Istar ~~Varia~~tions (Dukas); La Peri (Dukas); Spanish Symphony (Ravel). Tomorrow at 8.30 p.m. over CFCF, CBF and the Blue.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

APR 15 1945

Orchestra Season Ends.

The 1944-45 season of orchestra concerts is over and done with—or at least it will be when the New York Philharmonic gives its final concert this afternoon in Carnegie Hall. We have had no end of orchestral performances in New York and for the most part they have been of a highly interesting character. In addition to the regular Philharmonic programs we have had visits by the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, under Hans Kindler; and the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra under guest conductor Sir Thomas Beecham . . . with, of course, the regular concerts by the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the special performances of the NBC Symphony, and the City Symphony Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski.

In their final concert of the season in New York, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Westminster Choir conducted by Eugene Ormandy gave an excellent interpretation of Prokofieff's "Alexander Nevsky." The score was originally written for the Russian movie of the same name and later enlarged into a cantata. The story of the historical victory in 1942 of Russian arms, under Prince Alexander Nevsky, over the Knights of the Teutonic Order, it is no less timely today. It was unusual for its simplicity and the tremendous drama and color and Mr. Ormandy gave a remarkably dramatic performance.

The two final Boston Symphony concerts were excellent, and atoned for the odd lapse in quality of the two previous concerts.

Observations.

It is always exciting to anticipate hearing Vladimir Horowitz play and as usual one is never let down as is frequently the case when one pins ones hopes to seemingly the highest star. When Mr. Horowitz gave his recital at Carnegie Hall the other night it surpassed just about everything we have ever heard him do—and that is a large order. Whether it is his personality, his brilliant technic or sheer inspiration, we won't hazard a guess, but he seems to be one of the few who, through his studying and re-studying a score, interprets a composition as we think the composer intended or hoped it would be done. Thus he pleases his entire audience which includes musicians who are perhaps the most exacting in their demands.

While we are familiar with the voice of Muriel Rahn, Negro soprano, as one of the two Carmens in "Carmen Jones" it was interesting to hear her in a recital at Town Hall. A soundly trained singer, Miss Rahn has an excellent voice and the personality to go with it. Furthermore, her diction is so perfect that you can understand every word without straining out of your seat or getting a wry neck from craning to hear more clearly. Here is a soprano to watch for she appears to have the qualities that should take her far.

During the past few years an increasing emphasis has been placed on the efforts of our own American composers and while the majority are young, none of them can claim the youth of two whose compositions were played in a recent Young People's concert given by New York's Philharmonic - Symphony, with Rudolph Ganz conducting. Two orchestral pieces composed by Philippa Schuyler, 13 years of age, and Edward Earle, 14, "Manhattan Nocturne" and "The Misbehaving Clocks" respectively both compositions showing expert workmanship. The final program of the season was a riot for the children, and brought numerous prizes won for clever musical "bits" of various kinds.

The Philharmonic - Symphony with Robert Casadesus as soloist, gave a benefit concert the other night for the Red Cross. All the artists concerned—including the orchestra men — gave their services for the evening and the highlight of the concert was the playing of the "Emperor Concerto" by Mr. Casadesus. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and the Overture to "Egmond" made up the major portion of the evening's program.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitsky offered a last tribute to the late President Roosevelt last evening. The occasion was a solemn one. Accordingly the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven was substituted for Brahms' First, and the remainder of the program assembled, as planned, Rachmaninov's "Isle of the Dead" and appropriately, the "Testament of Freedom" by Randall Thompson. In the latter a choral setting with text drawn from the words of Thomas Jefferson, Dr. Koussevitsky enlisted the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth.

All these pieces had been heard previously this season in the regular Friday-Saturday series. Our conductor's way with Rachmaninov's elegaic music is well known. His "Eroica," as you might imagine, was touched with the inspiration of the "departed hero" to whom this particular performance was dedicated. In the magnificent Funeral March, especially, there was real, deep feeling and indescribable grandeur.

Mr. Thompson's latest work is very simply written. There is little counterpoint in the vocal parts. It is sung mostly in unison and the orchestral support is modest, with only an occasional pronouncement from the horns. Jefferson's powerful phrases are allowed to speak for themselves, with a minimum of embellishment.

They need none, of course. Because they had little, the whole was strikingly effective; more so, perhaps, than it was on first hearing, now that Mr. Roosevelt's death has added extra weight to their meaning. And what more significant words than these, at this or any other time . . . "the God who gave us life gave us liberty at the same time; the hand of force may destroy but cannot disjoin them. . . ." J. L.

FOOD FIELD REPORTER
NEW YORK, N.Y.

APR 18 1945

Allis-Chalmers To Salute The Food Industry On Air

MILWAUKEE — The Allis-Chalmers Co. will feature an intermission tribute to the wartime contributions of workers in the food processing industry on the April 21 Boston Symphony Orchestra program, heard on the Blue network. The salute will honor canners, meat packers, dehydrators, freezers, and packagers.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 17 1945

Dr. Koussevitzky's Good Taste

Editor:

I should like to express my appreciation of the immaculate good taste of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. When Cardinal O'Connell died, he played in his memory the beautiful "Largo" from Vivaldi's Concerto. On Saturday night last he changed his program to play, in memory of President Roosevelt, the fitting "Eroica" by Beethoven. The choices in both instances were perfect.

Providence. MUSIC LOVER.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 15 1945

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club, W. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. The program:

Symphony No. 8, First Movement..Shostakovich
Symphony No. 3, "Eroica," First and Second Movements .... Beethoven
The Testament of Freedom........R. Thompson
(First New York performance)

Randall Thompson

Whose "Testament of Freedom" was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday

Jefferson Ritualized

RANDALL THOMPSON'S "Testament of Freedom," which was performed locally for the first time by the Harvard Glee Club and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at yesterday afternoon's final concert of the Boston series in Carnegie Hall, employs as text four passages from the prose writings of Thomas Jefferson and consists of four pieces composed in four different musical styles.

The first of these is a harmonized hymn in the manner of the late Sir Hubert Parry. The second is accompanied chant of chiefly Orthodox Russian Church derivation, though it makes momentary references to sixteenth century Roman polyphony. The third is a modernistic battle piece of which the melodic material is very much the kind of tunes our Revolutionary ancestors actually played and sang. The fourth is a meditation that might have been written by Sir Arthur Sullivan after hearing "Lohengrin." This leads into a repeat of the Parry-like chorale and ends with a short vocalize that simulates an "Amen." Except for the battle piece, which is fun, the musical interest of the work seemed to your reporter slight. The texts, of course, are classical both as political thought and as literature.

* * *

A strange aspect of the "Testament" is its use of reflective (and hence personal) statements as vehicles for choral singing. Mass statements like creeds, canticles and common prayers are appropriate to massed intonation; and so are consecrated patriotic texts like the Declaration of Independence, military citations or the Bill of Rights. But Thomas Jefferson's signed reasoned reflections, though they express what many have felt, do not express communal thought. They are personal and hortatory. They live not by the feelings they provoke but by the sense they make. Setting them for mass pronunciation gives them a ritual character that is inappropriate to them, that contradicts their sense as reasoned statements.

* * *

Mr. Thompson's musical notation of their prosody carries them even further away for direct meaning than seems necessary. He has not caught the rhythm of our prose speech, and he has not observed with any rigor the quantities of the English language. The effective setting of prose requires either that the musical line follow the quantities of speed exactly or that it distort these in an expressive manner. The imposing of Russian chant rhythms and of Anglo-German hymn meters on the eighteenth-century Latinate and rococo cadences of the great Jefferson brings out little of their noble reasoning, though good Harvard enunciation, aided by a printed slip, did enable one yesterday to follow the words, in spite of the jerky rhythms Mr. Thompson had imposed upon them.

The purely instrumental part of the afternoon consisted of one movement of Shostakovitch's Eighth Symphony and two of Beethoven's Third. Both were clearly read and impeccably executed, as was also the "Testament of Freedom." At four o'clock, when the concert ended, the audience and orchestra stood for a moment in silence before singing the "Star-Spangled Banner," and departed without the usual expression of applause.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

APR 14 1945

'Eroica' Is Played Again As Tribute to Roo

PROGRAM

Bach ———— "Come Sweet Death"
Martinu ———— Second Piano Concerto
Beethoven ———— "Eroica" Symphony

By Linton Martin

Twice within less than 24 hours, Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony was given an unprogrammed performance from the stage of the Academy of Music in honor of the late President Roosevelt.

For, following the lead of Serge Koussevitzky at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert Thursday night, Eugene Ormandy substituted the same work and for the same reason, in place of the symphony originally scheduled, at the Philadelphia Orchestra concert yesterday afternoon.

Taking its cue from the conductor's attitude, the audience received the performance of the symphony in absolute silence, as it also did the playing of Bach's "Come Sweet Death," with which he opened the concert for the same reason.

TRIBUTE TO ROOSEVELT

In announcing the changes in the program as a tribute to President Roosevelt, Maestro Ormandy said that they were "in memory of the greatest man of our time." During the performance of the Bach transcription, many members of the audience stood.

The familiar Bach number in Charles O'Connell's admirable orchestral arrangement of the original contralto aria took the place of Paul Creston's "Chant of 1942," scheduled as a novelty. The "Eroica" Symphony, which Beethoven originally dedicated to Napoleon and later designated as a "heroic symphony for the celebration of the memory of a great man," after Bonaparte declared himself Emperor, occupied the time after the intermission that had been programmed for Dvorak's Fifth Symphony, "From the New World."

The one work that remained as originally scheduled came as a double novelty. For the first American performance of Bohuslav Martinu's Second Piano Concerto also marked the debut of Rudolf Firkusny as soloist in the orchestra's regular symphony series.

Mr. Martinu is recognized as the foremost living Czech composer, true musical heir of Smetana and Dvorak. And his compatriot interpretive artist, Firkusny, enjoys the same reputation as a Czech pianist of dynamic temperament.

EXUBERANT ENERGY

Exuberant energy was the outstanding feature of both composition and performance yesterday. The concerto is rich in Bohemian folk rhythms and color, and is scored in the neo-classical idiom. But it is not its composer's richest or most rewarding work, and is inferior to his two-piano concerto, introduced here last season.

Mr. Firkusny was always more

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

APR 14 1945

Boston Symphony Sets FDR Trbiute

In deference to the grief of the nation, the Boston Symphony will play Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony on tonight's broadcast.

[92]

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

MAR 14 1945

Boston Symphony Brings Woolsey Series To Close

The Woolsey Hall Concert Series ended last night when Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra through a program of superb proportions. The great audience at Woolsey Hall heard the classics of Mozart and Beethoven separated by two enchanting compositions by Moussorgsky and Ravel played with unsurpassed artistry and breath-taking beauty, and showed their satisfaction and delight by thunderous applause throughout the evening.

Two concerts a year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are far too few for New Haven's musical appetite, as is clearly illustrated by the sold out house and the reception given this long famous orchestra at every visit. With the schedule for both Winter and Summer that the Boston group now maintains, however, New Haven is fortunate to be included for two concerts a season.

The crystal clarity of the strings in the Mozart E flat major Symphony was a matter of sheer delight, and was never lost even in the spirited menuette. The lovely and slow moving Andante was a finely etched contrast, with the Finale a racing gayety of perfect balance.

The Moussorgsky, Prelude to "Khovanstchina" must be described as tonally seraphic so persistent was the beauty of its phrases.

And in complete contrast in style "La Valse" of Ravel filled the air with the luscious tones and daring measures of a subtly sensuous waltz, part Strauss in approach and form, all Ravel in gay and ardent imagry. The orchestra's work in this amazing composition showed again the ability and ease with which these famous musicians enter into all types of composition and performance, ready at the slightest indication of the conductor to sharpen the mood, or enlarge the mould.

Of course the greatest heights of all were reached in the Beethoven. The beloved "Seventh" never shone more brightly in the exaltation that Dr. Koussevitzky and his men achieved. The conductor seemed to draw his inspiration from the men themselves, and they in turn showed an almost reverent devotion to the performance of his every indicated desire.

The Vivace of the opening movement scintilated with a vivid and colorful light that only this orchestra seems to be able to produce, and in the Allegro con brio closing the symphony, the terrific speed subtracted nothing from this remarkable vividness and color.

The extraordinary breadth that is demanded by Dr. Koussevitzky for Beethoven readings was in full evidence last night, and the work, as indeed the entire program must go in New Haven's music history as one of the most outstanding of all times.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

APR 15 1945

tation of Prokofieff's "Alexander Nevsky." The score was originally written for the Russian movie of the same name and later enlarged into a cantata. The story of the historical victory in 1942 of Russian arms, under Prince Alexander Nevsky, over the Knights of the Teutonic Order, it is no less timely today. It was unusual for its simplicity and the tremendous drama and color and Mr. Ormandy gave a remarkably dramatic performance.

The two final Boston Symphony concerts were excellent, and atoned for the odd lapse in quality of the two previous concerts.

Observations.

It is always exciting to anticipate hearing Vladimir Horowitz play and as usual one is never let down as is frequently the case when one pins ones hopes to seemingly the highest star. When Mr. Horowitz gave his recital at Carnegie Hall the other night it surpassed just about everything we have ever heard him do—and that is a large order. Whether it is his personality, his brilliant technic or sheer inspiration, we won't hazard a guess, but he seems to be one of the few who, through his studying and re-studying a score, interprets a composition as we think the composer intended or hoped it would be done. Thus he pleases his entire audience which includes musicians who are perhaps the most exacting in their demands.

While we are familiar with the voice of Muriel Rahn, Negro soprano, as one of the two Carmens in "Carmen Jones" it was interesting to hear her in a recital at Town Hall. A soundly trained singer, Miss Rahn has an excellent voice and the personality to go with it. Furthermore, her diction is so perfect that you can understand every word without straining out of your seat or getting a wry neck from craning to hear more clearly. Here is a soprano to watch for she appears to have the qualities that should take her far.

During the past few years an increasing emphasis has been placed on the efforts of our own American composers and while the majority are young, none of them can claim the youth of two whose compositions were played in a recent Young People's concert given by New York's Philharmonic - Symphony, with Rudolph Ganz conducting. Two orchestral pieces composed by Philippa Schuyler, 13 years of age, and Edward Earle, 14, "Manhattan Nocturne" and "The Misbehaving Clocks" respectively both compositions showing expert workmanship. The final program of the season was a riot for the children, and brought numerous prizes won for clever musical "bits" of various kinds.

The Philharmonic - Symphony with Robert Casadesus as soloist, gave a benefit concert the other night for the Red Cross. All the artists concerned—including the orchestra men — gave their services for the evening and the highlight of the concert was the playing of the "Emperor Concerto" by Mr. Casadesus. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and the Overture to "Egmond" made up the major portion of the evening's program.

Orchestra Season Ends.

The 1944-45 season of orchestra concerts is over and done with—or at least it will be when the New York Philharmonic gives its final concert this afternoon in Carnegie Hall. We have had no end of orchestral performances in New York and for the most part they have been of a highly interesting character. In addition to the regular Philharmonic programs we have had visits by the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, under Hans Kindler; and the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra under guest conductor Sir Thomas Beecham . . . with, of course, the regular concerts by the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the special performances of the NBC Symphony, and the City Symphony Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski.

In their final concert of the season in New York, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Westminster Choir conducted by Eugene Ormandy gave an excellent interpre-

---

MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE

APR 20 1945

Boston Symphony: Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Istar Variations (Dukas); La Peri (Dukas); Spanish Symphony (Ravel). Tomorrow at 8.30 p.m. over CFCF, CBF and the Blue.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky offered a last tribute to the late President Roosevelt last evening. The occasion was a solemn one. Accordingly the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven was substituted for Brahms' First, and the remainder of the program assembled, as planned, Rachmaninov's "Isle of the Dead" and, appropriately, the "Testament of Freedom" by Randall Thompson. In the latter a choral setting with text drawn from the words of Thomas Jefferson, Dr. Koussevitzky enlisted the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club, trained by G. Wallace Woodworth.

All these pieces had been heard previously this season in the regular Friday-Saturday series. Our conductor's way with Rachmaninov's elegaic music is well known. His "Eroica," as you might imagine, was touched with the inspiration of the "departed hero" to whom this particular performance was dedicated. In the magnificent Funeral March, especially, there was real, deep feeling and indescribable grandeur.

Mr. Thompson's latest work is very simply written. There is little counterpoint in the vocal parts. It is sung mostly in unison and the orchestral support is modest, with only an occasional pronouncement from the horns. Jefferson's powerful phrases are allowed to speak for themselves, with a minimum of embellishment.

They need none, of course. Because they had little, the whole was strikingly effective; more so, perhaps, than it was on first hearing, now that Mr. Roosevelt's death has added extra weight to their meaning. And what more significant words than these, at this or any other time . . . "the God who gave us life gave us liberty at the same time; the hand of force may destroy but cannot disjoin them. . . ." J. L.

FOOD FIELD REPORTER
NEW YORK, N.Y.

APR 16 1945

Allis-Chalmers To Salute The Food Industry On Air

MILWAUKEE — The Allis-Chalmers Co. will feature an intermission tribute to the wartime contributions of workers in the food processing industry on the April 21 Boston Symphony Orchestra program, heard on the Blue network. The salute will honor canners, meat packers, dehydrators, freezers, and packagers.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 17 1945

Dr. Koussevitzky's Good Taste

Editor:

I should like to express my appreciation of the immaculate good taste of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. When Cardinal O'Connell died, he played in his memory the beautiful "Largo" from Vivaldi's Concerto. On Saturday night last he changed his program to play, in memory of President Roosevelt, the fitting "Eroica" by Beethoven. The choices in both instances were perfect.

Providence. MUSIC LOVER.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 15 1945

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club, W. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. The program:

Symphony No. 8, First Movement......Shostakovich
Symphony No. 3, "Eroica," First and Second Movements......Beethoven
The Testament of Freedom........R. Thompson
(First New York performance)

Jefferson Ritualized

RANDALL THOMPSON'S "Testament of Freedom," which was performed locally for the first time by the Harvard Glee Club and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at yesterday afternoon's final concert of the Boston series in Carnegie Hall, employs as text four passages from the prose writings of Thomas Jefferson and consists of four pieces composed in four different musical styles.

The first of these is a harmonized hymn in the manner of the late Sir Hubert Parry. The second is accompanied chant of chiefly Orthodox Russian Church derivation, though it makes momentary references to sixteenth century Roman polyphony. The third is a modernistic battle piece of which the melodic material is very much the kind of tunes our Revolutionary ancestors actually played and sang. The fourth is a meditation that might have been written by Sir Arthur Sullivan after hearing "Lohengrin." This leads into a repeat of the Parry-like chorale and ends with a short vocalize that simulates an "Amen." Except for the battle piece, which is fun, the musical interest of the work seemed to your reporter slight. The texts, of course, are classical both as political thought and as literature.

• • •

A strange aspect of the "Testament" is its use of reflective (and hence personal) statements as vehicles for choral singing. Mass statements like creeds, canticles and common prayers are appropriate to massed intonation; and so are consecrated patriotic texts like the Declaration of Independence, military citations or the Bill of Rights. But Thomas Jefferson's signed reasoned reflections, though they express what many have felt, do not express communal thought. They are personal and hortatory. They live not by the feelings they provoke but by the sense they make. Setting them for mass pronunciation gives them a ritual character that is inappropriate to them, that contradicts their sense as reasoned statements.

• • •

Randall Thompson

Whose "Testament of Freedom" was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday

tion of their prosody carries them even further away for direct meaning than seems necessary. He has not caught the rhythm of our prose speech, and he has not observed with any rigor the quantities of the English language. The effective setting of prose requires either that the musical line follow the quantities of speed exactly or that it distort these in an expressive manner. The imposing of Russian chant rhythms and of Anglo-German hymn meters on the eighteenth-century Latinate and rococo cadences of the great Jefferson brings out little of their noble reasoning, though good Harvard enunciation, aided by a printed slip, did enable one yesterday to follow the words, in spite of the jerky rhythms Mr. Thompson had imposed upon them.

The purely instrumental part of the afternoon consisted of one movement of Shostakovitch's Eighth Symphony and two of Beethoven's Third. Both were clearly read and impeccably executed, as was also the "Testament of Freedom." At four o'clock, when the concert ended, the audience and orchestra stood for a moment in silence before singing the "Star-Spangled Banner," and departed without the usual expression of

---

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

APR 14 1945

'Eroica' Is Played Again As Tribute to Roo

PROGRAM

Bach —— "Come Sweet Death"
Martinu —— Second Piano Concerto
Beethoven —— "Eroica" Symphony

By Linton Martin

Twice within less than 24 hours, Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony was given an unprogrammed performance from the stage of the Academy of Music in honor of the late President Roosevelt.

For, following the lead of Serge Koussevitzky at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert Thursday night, Eugene Ormandy substituted the same work and for the same reason, in place of the symphony originally scheduled, at the Philadelphia Orchestra concert yesterday afternoon.

Taking its cue from the conductor's attitude, the audience received the performance of the symphony in absolute silence, as it also did the playing of Bach's "Come Sweet Death," with which he opened the concert for the same reason.

TRIBUTE TO ROOSEVELT

In announcing the changes in the program as a tribute to President Roosevelt, Maestro Ormandy said that they were "in memory of the greatest man of our time." During the performance of the Bach transcription, many members of the audience stood.

The familiar Bach number in Charles O'Connell's admirable orchestral arrangement of the original contralto aria took the place of Paul Creston's "Chant of 1942," scheduled as a novelty. The "Eroica" Symphony, which Beethoven originally dedicated to Napoleon and later designated as a "heroic symphony for the celebration of the memory of a great man," after Bonaparte declared himself Emperor, occupied the time after the intermission that had been programmed for Dvorak's Fifth Symphony, "From the New World."

The one work that remained as originally scheduled came as a double novelty. For the first American performance of Bohuslav Martinu's Second Piano Concerto also marked the debut of Rudolf Firkusny as soloist in the orchestra's regular symphony series.

Mr. Martinu is recognized as the foremost living Czech composer, true musical heir of Smetana and Dvorak. And his compatriot interpretive artist, Firkusny, enjoys the same reputation as a Czech pianist of dynamic temperament.

EXUBERANT ENERGY

Exuberant energy was the outstanding feature of both composition and performance yesterday. The concerto is rich in Bohemian folk rhythms and color, and is scored in the neo-classical idiom. But it is not its composer's richest or most rewarding work, and is inferior to his two-piano concerto, introduced here last season.

Mr. Firkusny was always more

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

APR 14 1945

Boston Symphony Sets FDR Trbiute

In deference to the grief of the nation, the Boston Symphony will play Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony on tonight's broadcast.

[83]

CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA.
PROGRESS

[illegible]

"Testament Of Freedom" Wins Critic's High Praise

The "Testament of Freedom," Randall Thompson's musical setting to words of Thomas Jefferson, which was given its first public performance by the University of Virginia Glee Club here on April 13, 1943, on the 200th anniversary of Jefferson's birth, has received the accolade of the dean of America's music critics.

Performed under the direction of Sergei Koussevitzky by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the ~~Harvard Glee Club~~ in Carnegie Hall at New York last Saturday as part of a concert program in memory of Franklin D. Roosevelt, it was hailed by Olin Downes, music critic of the New York Times, as "one of the most convincingly American scores that this period has produced."

Mr. Downes devoted nearly a column to an appreciation of the work which he declared fitted perfectly into a program which included portions of Shostakovitch's Eighth symphony and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

"Mr. Thompson has written a composition of astonishing simplicity, appropriateness and effect," he said, describing the "Testament" as "almost a choral symphony in four movements."

The composer was especially lauded for having written as "a most thoughtful and modest artist, seeking for the right notes to communicate something, profoundly of his people, that was in his heart." Mr. Downes attributed Thompson's success to this high aim, which he declared was farthest from the self-seeking and high - pressure salesmanship "that disfigures too much of our native musical activities today."

In his summary, Mr. Downes wrote:

"His score is admirably proportioned, climaxed and carried through. It does not sag or falter in its progress. It is written, vocally and practicably, at the same time that it uses the orchestra admirably for coloristic and dramatic effects. The exact unrhythmed texts are set with great skill and ingenuity in supplying musical patterns which have form in themselves while fitting like a glove the immortal words of Jefferson. As old religious composers have done with Latin texts, so has Mr. Thompson shown his great knowledge and unfailing device in this procedure, which also takes fully into account laws of dramatic sequence and contrast. And he has written music which can be sung and understood by great numbers of people, while standing on its feet as a work of art."

French Music at Symphony; Homage to Richard Burgin

Monitor April 21

By L. A. Sloper

In compiling the last program but one of the season, Dr. Koussevitzky took the opportunity of catching up on his French music. This time his choice fell upon d'Indy's "Istar" Variations, two sections of the Suite from Fauré's "Pelléas" music, and Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody.

For opening number he used Walter Piston's Prelude and Allegra for Organ and Strings. This is a pleasant work and E. Power Biggs handles the solo part expertly, but again the tone of the Symphony Hall organ sounded pretty crude against that of the orchestra. Besides, what was Mr. Piston doing in the company of three Frenchmen, even though he did study with Nadia Boulanger?

* * *

The second half of the program was given over to honoring Richard Burgin, who is celebrating his silver anniversary as concertmaster of the Boston orchestra. The value of his services in this capacity is evident in the notable routine of the ensemble. He has also been extremely useful as assistant conductor. During his term of service he has grown steadily in this capacity, until today he stands high in the regard of those who appreciate his musicianship and his leadership.

The affectionate admiration felt for him by the Friday audience was made evident yesterday by the rousing welcome he received when he appeared on the platform, and by the ovation accorded him at the end. But was the gesture of billing him as soloist (particularly in the Mendelssohn Concerto) the most felicitous way of doing him honor? When a man has achieved so much in the concertmaster's chair and on the dais, surely it is too much to expect him to be also a first-rate solo violinist?

Mr. Burgin brings to his solo tasks the same qualities which serve him so well in his other capacities, but his tone is small, thin, and dry, his intonation is often doubtful, and his style is hardly suited to the medium, especially in romantic music. The enthusiasm shown toward him yesterday must have been an expression of the general feeling toward him, rather than a tribute to this specific performance.

The three French pieces, besides paying tribute to Gallic art, exhibited again in some of its most brilliant aspects the marvelous quality of the orchestra—the variety of its tonal beauties, the flexibility of its rhythms, the sensitiveness of its response to the directorial rein. This expertise was applied with the greatest devotion to these three scores, which are by now all familiar to us.

* * *

The "Istâr" Variations represent the French music which has not rid itself of its German accent. Fauré's music for "Pelléas" is truly French, but it has suffered from the fact that Debussy wrote an opera on the same subject. Some Frenchmen place Fauré's musical commentary on the story above Debussy's, but that opinion is not shared elsewhere, nor perhaps very widely in France. Possibly a hearing of it in full with the play in the theater might increase its stature.

As for Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody, it is as trivial as it is brilliant. As a piece of orchestral virtuosity, it astonishes, but actually it belongs on popular programs.

In the audience yesterday, appropriately enough, was Pierre Monteux, conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, who has been for many years a distinguished interpreter of French music and who brought Richard Burgin to Boston in 1920.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

APR 16 1945

Briggs Renews Contract With Orchestra

Robert Briggs

Twenty-two-year-old Robert Briggs of 30 First Street, believed to be the youngest bass trombonist in any of the major symphony orchestras, has been awarded a renewed contract with the National Symphony Orchestra for the 1945-46 season.

The orchestra will play a series of summer concerts at Watergate, Washington, D. C., beginning June 16 for six weeks. The winter season begins Oct. 17 for a 22-week period. The National Symphony Orchestra plays many benefit concerts for members of the armed forces and is conducted by Dr. Hans Kindler.

Briggs studied with John Coffey, bass trombonist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the New England Conservatory of Music. A graduate of Pittsfield High School in June 1940, Mr. Briggs played with the school orchestra for two years and with the Stanley Club Junior Symphony Orchestra. Before going to the National Symphony in February, 1942, he played with the Boston Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky.

N. TONAWANDA, N. Y.
EVENING NEWS

APR 1 6 1945

National Whirligig

WINNING THE WAR
By ALBERT N. LEMAN

ELECTRONICS

One of the great miracles of the war, "talking wires", is on the threshold of civilian use. This is the electronic device which records sound on a thin thread of metal and rebroadcasts it without loss of fidelity.

The first demonstration of a wire recorder built into a home radio was given this week to a group of engineers and scientific writers in New York. Straight microphone-playback types are made for the Army and Navy by several companies but this showing was the initial appearance of the combined radio-recorder, an invention of William P. Lear of Lear Incorporated, which will be marketed after the war.

MAGNETIZED

Brief descriptions have been published of the magic apparatus installed in American fighting planes. Heretofore censorship has veiled certain facts about it.

In a nutshell, the voice of music is transformed into electrical impulses and fed into an electromagnet. A stout wire — as thin as human hair — travels from spool to spool at the rate of three to six feet per second across the poles of this magnet and becomes magnetized in varying degrees according to the strength of the sound impulses. When the thread is rerun across the magnet, these waves are picked up, amplified and reproduced by loudspeaker.

The machine is entirely different from wax discs or cylinders in which vibrations are grooved on a soft surface. There aren't any needles to scratch and hiss. No physical change takes place in the metal; it becomes magnetized in varying strengths and it can be employed indefinitely.

When the operator wishes to "erase" a message, he merely demagnetizes the thread. Unlike the process in wax dictating, "shavings" are not required before each new recording.

MUSIC

The principle is not new. In 1896 Valdemar Poulsen, a Danish physicist, first recorded sound magnetically on steel wires, but reproduction was poor.

Later Marvin Camras perfected a recorder at the Armour Research Foundation of the Illinois Institute of Technology. Other inventors also dabbled with "singing wires"; most were laboratory "toys" before the war. The Foundation has licensed numerous manufacturers to make its type, including General Electric, Stromberg-Carlson and C. G. Conn.

In the early days our aviators returned from long reconnaissance flights too exhausted to give prompt and detailed accounts. Wax recordings made in tossing and diving aircraft during trips were unsatisfactory. Wire was introduced and proved effective not only in planes but also on warships shaken by the salvos of sixteen-inch guns.

The new home radio-wire recorder can do a great many things. If a visitor interrupts a person listening to his favorite program, the host can throw a switch and start the recorder. Later he can plug in and receive everything he missed.

The entire program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, ~~Sam~~ Donahue's Navy swing band, the Salt Lake City Tabernacle choir, the historical speeches of President Roosevelt or the patter of Bob Hope can be immortalized in a library of spools.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Apr 21 Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Two anniversaries are being commemorated at this week's Symphony Concerts, the 100th of the birth of Gabriel Faure, composer of refined, gentle, fastidious music, and the 25th of Richard Burgin as concert master of the orchestra. Besides being guest of honor at a post-concert reception tendered him by Dr. Koussevitzky in the first balcony foyer, Mr. Burgin marked the completion of his first quarter century with the orchestra by playing the solo part in the Mendelssohn Concerto.

Faure was not the only French composer on yesterday's list. The two movements from his stage music to "Pelleas and Melisande" (earlier than and very different from that of Debussy's operatic version of Maeterlinck's play) were flanked by the superb "Istar" of d'Indy and the "Spanish Rhapsody" of Ravel. The first piece of all, however, was American, Walter Piston's Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings, with E. Power Biggs as the soloist. Many of the works of what not so long ago was termed the modern French school, once looked upon as daring and exciting, have begun to fade. Their orchestral colors have paled, their harmonies have lost their bite. We can still recognize their sensitiveness but we feel their lack of vitality. This "Pelleas" music of Faure is a case in point and so, indeed, is Ravel's Rhapsody, despite the brilliance of the final section. Faure will live a long time yet through his songs and Ravel made better pieces than this one. Of the three composers represented yesterday, d'Indy came out best, and in a performance that overstressed a little the romantic element in his music.

Odd, indeed, that d'Indy was once considered cerebral and austere. Certain pages in the "Istar" now seem actually voluptuous. To these Symphonic Variations Dr. Koussevitzy is commendably faithful. It is high time, though, that he gave us the three-part tone poem, "A Summer Day on the Mountain," which he has never conducted here, and revived the noble Second Symphony and the fascinating "Symphony on a Mountain Air." D'Indy is one composer who nowadays does not receive his due.

The music of Piston, introduced here last season, harks back in spirit to Corelli and Handel and is an excellent example of neo-classicism, with genuine feeling in the Prelude and brilliant writing for the organ in the Allegro. Mr. Biggs was applauded for his performance, as was Mr. Burgin for his polished delivery of the Mendelssohn. The Concerto itself fitted well into the generally agreeable tonal picture. This was a pleasant concert.

Herald

MUSIC

Apr. 21

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony

Yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, Serge Koussevitsky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the next to last of the Friday afternoon concerts of the 1944-45 season; the soloists were E. Power Biggs and Richard Burgin, and the program was as follows:

Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings	Piston
E. Power Biggs, soloist
"Istar" Variations	D'Indy
Prelude, Andantino for "Pelleas et Melisande	Faure
Rhapsodie Espagnole	Ravel
Violin Concerto	Mendelssohn
Richard Burgin, soloist

By ELINOR HUGHES

Yesterday's Symphony concert was frankly in the romantic vein, with D'Indy, Faure and Mendelssohn providing the bulk of the music. The attractive Prelude and Allegro by Walter Piston, with E. Power Biggs as soloist, was the only really modern work on the program, and its clarity, precision and admirable blending of orchestra and organ provided an effective contrast to the outpouring of lush, though beautiful, harmonies in the selections that followed.

The recent performance of Debussy's "Pelleas et Melisdande" by the Metropolitan Opera Company, may easily have inspired the inclusion of Faure's orchestral suite, taken from the stage music to Maeterlinck's play and produced four years before the Debussy opera. Like the play for which it was written, the Faure score is delicate, poetic and elusive, without having the insistent vagueness that dogs the Maeterlinck text, and is a good example of romantic music which, though written for a specific occasion, can be listened to with pleasure for its own sake.

D'Indy's "Istar" variations have always attracted great interest for the sheer novelty with which they are handled, the composer choosing to give the variations first and save the theme for the very end, as though, on a purely aesthetic plane, D'Indy had decided to write a purely musical "Dance of the Seven Veils." The work was played yesterday with the orchestra's customary lush and beautiful tone. Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnol" followed, proving again a curious blend of French musical writing with Spanish rhythms, though the opening "Prelude a la Nuit" had the exquisite shimmer of a landscape by moonlight.

Following the intermission came the big event of the afternoon: Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto with Richard Burgin as soloist, for this week marks the completion of Mr. Burgin's 25th year as concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and there was a very real outburst of enthusiasm from audience and orchestra at the close of his performance. Making no pretensions at spectacular virtuosity, he played the beautiful sunlit music with fine musicianship and intelligence, neither sentimentalizing it nor over-emphasizing its potentialities for a display of dazzling display, and conductor and orchestra gave him staunch and affectionate support.

After the concert—which was attended, purely by coincidence, by Pierre Monteux, former conductor of the Boston Symphony and now conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, who engaged Mr. Burgin as concert master while he was here—there was a reception given by Mr. Koussevitsky for Mr. Burgin, attended by the members of the orchestra, the trustees and other invited guests. In presenting him with a watch as a token of personal appreciation, Koussevitsky hailed him as "the best concert master in the country, a splendid conductor, a notable soloist and a fine man," and added that the watch should be a reminder of "twenty-five years together as fellow artists and friends." Jerome D. Greene, on behalf of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony, presented Mr. Burgin with an inscribed silver salver, and on Monday night Mr. Burgin will be honored by the members of the orchestra at a dinner.

Yesterday's program will be repeated tonight, and the 64th season comes to a close next week with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, in the performance of which the orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and soloists. The Saturday night concert will start at 8:10, the Friday afternoon at the usual hour of 2:30.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

APR 21 1945

Boston Symphony Novelties

Season Not a Productive One—Again, Opera's Traditions—A Provocative Book.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

The Boston Symphony's novelties in its Carnegie Hall visits of the season, which were concluded last Saturday afternoon, were four. Included in this slender total is Randall Thompson's "The Testament of Freedom," though that work had, in fact, been performed at the Mendelssohn Glee Club's first concert of the season in November. But as this was a private concert, perhaps the Boston Symphony "premiere" should be permitted to stand.

The other new works of Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra were Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra, Villa-Lobos's "Rudepoema" and Lourie's "The Feast During the Plague." It is of small consequence that none of these can be acclaimed as of world-shaking impact. They were certainly of a quality that justified their introduction. But 20 or 25 per cent of the works presented is rather small for new music in these times. Dr. Koussevitzky had introduced other novelties in Boston—among them Diamond's Second Symphony—which, for one reason or another, were not set before his Carnegie Hall audiences.

Few 'Repeat' Performances.

Sponsorship of the contemporary in music led to some second or third performances of works that were still new to those who heard them. But these, too, were not many. Hanson's Symphony No. 3, Schuman's "Prayer in Time of War" and—by a generous extension of the principle—the Shostakovich Sixth and Eighth Symphonies were the works heard that could be regarded as supporting the conductor's avowed espousal of "repeats" for novelties already presented.

Otherwise the Boston Symphony's programs were made up of compositions of the standard repertory. Beethoven, Berlioz, Brahms, Corelli, Debussy, Faure, Haydn, Mozart, Mussorgsky, Ravel, Schubert, Schumann, Sibelius, Stravinsky and Tchaikovsky were the composers who figured in ten Carnegie Hall performances. It may be assumed that Dr. Koussevitzky's interest in the contemporary is unabated, but his programs, like those of the Philharmonic-Symphony—which were dealt with in this space a week ago—were disappointingly uneventful.

Still More About Tradition.

Because of its length—though the writer refers to it as only "a few more words"—this department is forced to forgo printing in its entirety still another letter on operatic tradition from Mary Edwards, whose first communication was published in full three weeks ago. But here is its essence. Replying to Charles L. Buchanan's letter on the same subject two weeks back, she states that to copy another's portrayal is "abhorrent to any good actor."

Fritz Kreisler

He will give a violin recital next Thursday night in Carnegie Hall for the benefit of the Musicians Emergency Funds War Program.

"To copy any former impersonation, no matter how admired, produces something that is neither flesh, fowl nor good red herring. For instance, Olive Fremstad certainly admired and revered Lilli Lehmann and especially her Isolde to the point of idolatry, but when, in her turn, she sang Isolde, Fremstad realized that she must put out of her mind every previous impression and build her impersonation anew. The result (or so I am told, for Fremstad was before my time) was as different from Lehmann as one could imagine. . . . Surely what you . . . mean by tradition is for the subsequent actor to model his impersonation along the same lines as another. This is as far as an actor should go, although this is what I claim is wrong and inartistic. The Don Giovanni of the future would surely do well to build his ideal on Mr. Pinza's serious and modest approach to his art (the greatest of all the arts). Beyond that he should forget that he had ever seen Pinza's Don Giovanni—if he can."

Forgetting Mr. Pinza's Don Giovanni may not be such a task as the writer seems to think, particularly if the singer has experienced others in the role.

Lively Critical Reading.

Virgil Thomson's book "The Musical Scene" is lively reading. Most of it is made up of his reviews of musical events written for the Herald Tribune, together with his Sunday articles. The opinions are often unorthodox, and some of them may strike an ordinarily well-informed listener to music as fantastic. But Mr. Thomson, it is to be remembered, came to his critical activities in New York from Paris, where he had resided and composed for a good many years. He reflects French critical standards and influences, and these are unsympathetic to much that has come out of Germany and points east for a century and more.

The heroic seems to him mostly the mock heroic. Wagner, Brahms, Tchaikovsky and Sibelius do not command his admiration, as they have quite generally commanded that of his fellow scribes. Music and music criticism will survive this. Even performing artists who have been strangely ridiculed—as Jascha Heifetz is in "Silk-underwear Music"—are still giving recitals. Articles like that on the French style, those on modern music, on "the appreciation racket" and on various choral subjects are more than provocative. They contain much of the soundest common sense. "The Musical Scene" is published by Alfred A. Knopf.

DAYTON, O.
HERALD

APR 22 1945

Tribute Concert

The last of the symphony concerts were given in tribute to the late Franklin Delano Roosevelt and both the Boston symphony and the New York Philharmonic played superbly—a fitting tribute of great music to a great man. The Boston played the first movement of Shostakovitch's Eighth symphony because the composer intended it as an expression of the tragedy and pain which humanity has undergone; the first two movements of the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven ending with the funeral march — Beethoven dedicated the symphony "to a great man"—and the first New York performance with the assistance of the Harvard Glee club, of Randall Thompson's music setting to words from the writings of Thomas Jefferson, written for observance of the 200th anniversary of his birth.

Observation

The Lewisohn committee has set a new high for free concerts for the armed services. They recently announced that they will play host to 50,000 service men and women during the summer and, in addition, have arranged for free admission to members of the armed services and their "dates" for Saturday and Sunday evening concerts. The last mentioned will have programs of a lighter vein featuring personalities from the entertainment field. The larger quota (it was 20,000 last year) set for this summer is due to the heavy increase in the number of wounded men being returned to hospitals here and the greater number of troops stationed in this area.

BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE

THEY SAID (And Where They Said It)—Eric Sevareid, CBS correspondent: "The German people have no individual or collective guilt regarding the war, nor any idea that they were the chief perpetrators of it" (at his welcome home luncheon in the Waldorf) . . . Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony conductor: "The conductor's function as a 'leader' is . . . to make the unpopular music of today the popular music of tomorrow, and always to have that tomorrow in his plans" (in a special article for Radio Annual).

Globe MUSIC Apr. 21

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, who this season is rounding out 25 years of association with the orchestra, is soloist this week in the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto. Serge Koussevitzky's program otherwise consists of the Prelude and Allegro for Organ and Strings by Walter Piston; the "Istar" Variations by D'Indy; the Prelude and "Fileuse" from Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" Suite, and the Spanish Rhapsody by Ravel.

No one needs to be reminded that the Mendelsshon Concerto is one of the world's great works, both from the virtuoso and musical points of view. It is indestructible. It sings. It is full of warmth and sun. Yet coming after all the spicy items of yesterday's program it was undeniably overshadowed, even with Mr. Burgin's fine and honest performance.

This was solo playing of high technical proficiency and the utmost musicianship, the finest style and heartfelt expression. Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra provided a glowing, in fact, a devoted, accompaniment. When it was over, all, but especially Mr. Burgin, received a resounding ovation.

Mr. Piston's Prelude and Allegro is masterfully smooth and skillful writing, although to this reviewer the combination of organ and strings is not the happiest sort of tonal mating. The effect is better in the quiet Prelude than in the bracing vigor of the Allegro, where the organ sonorities seem to fight rather than to contrast or complement those of the massed strings. At the keyboard yesterday was E. Power Biggs, who gave one of his characteristic able performances. Mr. Piston bowed from the stage.

Gabriel Faure might have had recognition befitting the 100th anniversary of his birth, and that would have been more than a brace of movements from one composition. Better this than no Faure, however, and this is very good Faure. Both the "Pelleas and Melisande" excerpts and D'Indy's excellent "Istar" Variations were derived more or less from Wagner, but they are essentially Gallic, distinguished by the best technical craftsmanship, representative of salient if minor musical personalities of the late 19th Century. They ought not to be allowed to slip out of the repertory.

In them, as in Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody (which makes you think of a lot of other Ravel, including the "Mother Goose" Suite) Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were at the top of their form. With his sense of detail, of contrast, color and effect, Mr. Koussevitzky can make of such music a good deal more than many conductors are able to do. Yesterday afternoon offered a prime demonstration of great orchestral playing.

Among the guests was Pierre Monteux, who was conductor of the Boston Symphony when Mr. Burgin came to this country in 1920, and who is now conductor of the San Francisco Symphony. Mr. Monteux was en route to his Summer home in Maine. He happened to drop in at Symphony Hall and discovered that his former colleague was to be honored.

The members of the Boston Symphony will give a dinner for Mr. Burgin Monday evening.

Herald MUSIC Apr.

SYMPHONY HALL

Sunday Symphony

Yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, presented the sixth and last of the Sunday afternoon series of concerts. The Harvard Glee Club assisted and the program was as follows:

Symphony in B-flat, No. 102 . . . . . . Haydn "Testament of Freedom"
Randall Thompson
"Rhapsody Espagnole" . . . . Ravel
"Til Eulenspiegel" . . . . Strauss

By ELINOR HUGHES

If there is any more enchanting musical experience than to listen to the Boston Symphony Orchestra play Haydn's Symphony in B-flat as it was played yesterday afternoon at the sixth and last of the Sunday afternoon series of concerts, I can only say that I should like to be present. The exquisite precision of the performance matches the sprightly grace and symmetrical beauty of the music, which might find its analogy in the perfection of a formal garden in which everything is exactly right in pattern but in which the flowers are so lovely that the formality serves but to enhance them.

In equally excellent vein was the concluding offering, Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel," which went with excellent wit and fine pace, Til's musical pranks achieving their full contrast with the solemn pomposities of the forces which he mocked but which eventually overcame him. And Valkenier's performance of the horn part was particularly felicitous throughout. As Koussevitsky's way with Ravel is too well known to require further discussion here—and the Rhapsody Espagnole was done also at the Friday and Saturday concerts, too—the only remaining point for discussion is the hotly debated "Testament of Freedom" by Randall Thompson.

Mr. Thompson's work, performed at Symphony Hall two weeks ago, and then played in New York at a concert dedicated to the memory of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, places the listener who is not wholeheartedly enthusiastic in the ungracious position of seeming to disagree with Thomas Jefferson, whose writings are the heart of the Thompson work. Careful examination of the text—sung once again very eloquently by the Harvard Glee Club—reveals one definite cause for dissatisfaction: many of Jefferson's phrases, his actual words, indeed, are extremely difficult to set to music—they don't sing well, in short. And rather than do violence to the author of the Declaration of Independence, Randall Thompson has written an underscoring of significant statements, rather than a musical expression of them. Sometimes it seems as though it would have been better had the Jefferson quotations been spoken against an orchestral background rather than sung. Then the conflict between the lofty quality of the text and the over-simplified, deliberately muted quality of the music would not be so marked.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

Boston Symphony Back

Victor's first symphonic album since the recording ban has lifted, and the first recording by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in five years appears on the Red Seal release for April. It is the Berlioz "Harold in Italy" which actually is sort of a concerto for viola featuring the well known William Primrose.

A work entirely unfamiliar to this columnist we found it enjoyable and romantically lovely. The performance by the Boston Orchestra, much too long absent from records, is a welcome treat, especially when it is embellished by the beautiful descriptive passages for the viola, so ably performed by Primrose. The engineers, also deserve praise for a technically perfect recording. Something new has been added to the Victor catalogue, something we recommend highly for your own collection!

Shortly after the release of this album Victor issued a single disc by the Boston Orchestra, a coupling of Grieg's "The Last Spring," and Tchaikovsky's "Waltz Serenade." This is something a little lighter, but full of gaiety and charm.

St. Joseph, Mo
News, Press

APR 23 1945

Mitropoulos Has Ready Answer for All Rumors

Dimitri Mitropoulos, he of the gutta-percha arms, was approached yesterday morning in Hotel Robidoux coffee shop on behalf of Time magazine, which had heard a report that he was going to become conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra.

"I don't know why that should be said," remarked the Minneapolis symphony conductor, between bites of toast, "when I have already signed a contract for the Attu symphony."

"Attu!"

"Oh, yes. Quite a cultured place." When would he leave? October—"That's the best time to go there." Across the table, First Violin looked glum; First Oboe continued to eat.

What about Alessandro of the Oklahoma City symphony; would he go to Minneapolis? Yes. Was Sergei Koussevitzky of the Boston symphony going to retire, as reported? No. Stalin wanted him.

"Maestro," inquired Oboe, "will you need any flutes in the Attu orchestra?"

"No," said Mitropoulos. "Mostly horns. Get them straight from the deer."

The whole table exploded, loose-jointed Maestro laughing louder than anybody. He had to have some fun, he explained, in the midst of transportation troubles and worry over the second oboe player's illness. But he wasn't leaving the Minneapolis orchestra.

With that he rushed off to make last-minute changes in the program.

"Does he pull those stunts often?" the oboe player was asked.

"All the time," said the oboe player, fondly.

Col MUSIC Apr 23

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

You'd never know it by this rugged March weather, but the music season is almost over. The Boston Symphony ended their Sunday series yesterday, and the final pair of concern, will be next Friday and Saturday.

For the concluding Sabbath matinee, Serge Koussevitzky repeated Randall Thompson's "The Testament of Freedom," with the Harvard Glee Club again assisting. This was preceded by the B-flat Symphony, No. 102, of Haydn, and followed by Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody, and "Till Eulenspiegel" by Richard Strauss.

Unless I miss my guess, "The Testament of Freedom" is going to wear well as patriotic music. In most respects the setting of Thomas Jefferson's prose writings is highly effective, and certainly it is professional. The plainness, the austerity and conservatism of the style was both deliberate and well-advised. Mr. Thompson knew what he was doing.

The work is perhaps too long, and the third section the least suited, musically, to the tenor of high resolution in Jefferson's words. But the musical mood of each section is different and that of the third does provide necessary contrast to the others. The Glee Club men sang more evenly and clearly than they did two weeks ago.

Apart from a few ragged entrances in the first two movements of the Haydn Symphony, the whole concert represented orchestral playing of great distinction. "Till Eulenspiegel" seemed a little tense, but the texture was remarkably clear and Mr. Koussevitzky did not bear down so hard on volume as sometimes he does in this work. In short, the Sunday audience heard a definitely rewarding concert.

[85]

MORE ABOUT "NINTH"

Symphony Orchestra Closes Season This Saturday With Great Beethoven Work

Apr. 22

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

SATURDAY evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last of the current season, will begin not at 8:30 but at 8:10. Because the program is unusually long? Not at all. In fact, it is unusually short, consisting only of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which consumes about an hour and a quarter. The reason is the hour-long broadcast. Heretofore this has always included the first part of the concert which, incidentally, must be planned to fit it. But since the whole of the Ninth cannot be put on the air, Dr. Koussevitzky has decided in favor of the last three, not the first three movements, thus enabling the radio audience to hear the choral finale in which the orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society and these solo singers: Valentina Vishnevska, soprano; Jean Watson, contralto; William Hain, tenor, and Robert Hall Collins, bass.

(In one of many respects) you have to hand it to Beethoven. When you say "the Fifth Symphony" you mean his, not that of Tchaikovsky or Sibelius. And when you say "the Ninth," you do not mean Bruckner's No. 9 nor Mahler's, though they are very great works, both of them. Nor will those words ever come to signify the Ninth of Shostakovitch, by report now taking shape in the composer's mind before being committed to paper.

* * *

Important as is the "Ninth Symphony" in its own right and great as it is from a purely musical standpoint (although there will always be disagreement over the actual worth and the artistic propriety of the fourth movement), it is quite as important historically. The influence of Beethoven on the music of the last three-quarters of the 19th century and the first decade of the present one was very great, but the "Ninth Symphony" has more to answer for than any other single work of his, not excepting the "Pastoral," which gave a new impulse and a new dignity to program music, or the "Fifth," in which was introduced the subsequently popular symphonic scheme of man's struggle with and triumph over fate, destiny or besetting circumstances, however you chose to put it.

The vague, mysterious beginnings of the first movement, with its open fifths, its string tremolos and its chief theme gradually taking shape before it is launched like a thunderbolt by the full orchestra, was something new under the sun. So impressed was Bruckner with the tremolo idea that he hardly ever began a symphony any other way, while both in the matter of key (D minor) and the general character of the chief theme, and even of the movement as a whole, the first division of the Austrian master's Third and Ninth stem directly from this mightiest of Beethoven's symphonic utterances.

* * *

It may have been the operas of Weber that started Wagner on his great career, but it was Beethoven who supplied the chief urge in that direction, first in Leipzig and then in Paris, where the rehearsals of the Ninth at the Conservatoire, as Ernest Newman puts it, "purged his soul of all the musical frivolities and baseness to which he had surrendered himself for so many wild and wasteful years." His subsequent devotion to the symphony, his valuable editing of the score, his discerning exposition of the music's inner meaning and his triumphant performance of it at Dresden in 1846, where up to that time it had remained, if not exactly unheard at least uncomprehended, are matters of record. Of course he was twisting facts to suit his particular purpose when he saw in the choral finale an admission on Beethoven's part that instrumental music had gone as far as it could without the aid of poetry.

To the general idea of a symphony with chorus and solo singers we owe the Second and Eighth Symphonies of Mahler, not to mention his Third and Fourth and "The Song of the Earth." But it is as the first and very possibly still the greatest expression of Titanism in music that the Ninth has the most significance. Our modern esthetes, "musical Puritans," you might call them, who shrink not only from a too outspoken beauty but from any violence or "excess," from any and all attempts at the musically cosmic and colossal (from "The Rink of the Nibelung" to Mahler's Eighth, most unhappily miscalled "The Symphony of the Thousand"), should address their complaints to Beethoven. With the resources at his command he "shot the works." He wrote what is still one of the longest of symphonies and in the finale he created all the sonority that he was capable of imagining. I have as yet said nothing about Brahms' debt to the Ninth in his own First Symphony, including a thematic resemblance that he cheerfuly acknowledged. In fact, once launched upon this discussion it is difficult to stop.

* * *

This afternoon's Symphony concert offers Haydn's Symphony No. 102, Randall Thompson's "The Testament of Freedom" again with the Harvard Glee Club, Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER
APR 22 1945

Symphonic Music Wins Large Radio Audience

By SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

I am extremely interested in the progress of the radio. I often listen to our principal orchestras on the air—even to my own orchestra on those Saturday nights when there is a guest conducting. I am impressed by the excellent quality of broadcasting at its best. And I am greatly interested in the letters which come from all parts of the country. There is but one possible conclusion from all this: Symphonic music, which thanks to radio, has been brought to numberless people who were strange to it, is continually gaining a larger audience.

CHOICE OF PROGRAMS

As a conductor I am made aware of the importance of a wise choice of programs for this vast and mixed audience. When a conductor plans his programmes, he does not simply write down what first occurs to him, or some music he happens personally to prefer. If he did that he would be neglecting the responsibilities of his position. He is responsible not only for the performance of a hundred men, but for what the thousands are to hear who constitute his concert audiences and the millions who constitute his radio audiences. He is a leader in the broadest sense of the word—a leader of his public no less than of his orchestra. He must choose what they shall hear, and if his reading of certain music carries his own conviction in the interpretation, he becomes a director of general opinion.

I feel this as more than a responsibility. It is a privilege, and a privilege which I could never take lightly. That is why the problem of making a programme is always for me a matter of great care and thought.

How shall I choose between new music and old music? If I decide to programme the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, there will be some who have heard it too often and others who have not heard it often enough, either because they are young or because they are new converts to symphonic music, or because they live in musically remote communities. They are very imortant and they have every consideration. If I decide to play a new work which departs from the lines of custom and convention, those very ones who must want to hear Beethoven's Fifth Symphony or Brahm's First will be less interested.

The letters which come to me from all sides after a broadcast interest me especially because they are an indication of what the great radio audience wants. Of course it would be impossible to give all of these letter writers what they want, because, for one reason, they are always contradicting each other. I would answer those who complain of too many repetitions of the classical symphonies, that, as many times as I have heard and performed the symphonies of Beethoven or Brahms or Tchaikovsky, they hold for me a fresh stimulation.

WHAT LISTENERS WANT

To those who have written saying that they would rather not hear music of today, I would answer with the reassurance that there is music of such great beauty being written by our composers that the man who dismisses it is seriously depriving himself. The majority of the important composers of today are now in America. Some of them were born here, and others have come from Europe and made America their home. Not all of their music, but the best of their music, which I try to single out for my programmes, is the inspired voice of a new and growing art which, when it reaches its full flowering, may stand comparison with any past epoch in musical history. If some of it sounds strange to you, if it seems to violate the traditional rules of what constitutes beautiful combinations of sound, I ask you to be patient and listen with an open mind.

The duty of every conductor now is no different from what it has been in the past. A conductor must be a prophet—not a mystical but a very practical one, who can look into the future far enough to see that what audiences now reject they will soon be begging for. An example of this is the Fifth Symphony by Shostakovitch, which was greeted with little attention and many objections when it was first heard. My answer to these objections was to repeat the symphony again and again until it became one of the most popular of contemporary symphonies in our repertory. The conductor's function as a "leader" is to bring about that change; to make the unpopular music of today the popular music of tomorrow, and always to have that tomorrow in his plans.

(Reprinted courtesy Radio Daily.)

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 23 1945

GUGGENHEIM FUND MAKES 96 AWARDS

41 of Its Fellowships Go to Men in Armed Forces or War-Allied Activity

The John Simon Guggenheim Memorial Foundation announced yesterday the awarding of ninety-six fellowships with a value totaling $230,000, forty-one of which will go to those in the armed forces or in war-allied activity in line with the policy adopted last year of making special awards to those serving the nation at war.

Of the award winners, only seven are women. None of these is in the war-service category. Five former winners repeated in this year's awards, including Dr. Johannes F. K. Holtfreter, a German refugee and one of the world's leading experimental geneticists, who will continue his investigation of the causal factors involved in the embryonic development of vertebrates.

Dr. Holtfreter, who is now working at McGill University is one of four scholars from Canada to whom awards were made.

Notable among the winners this year is Lukas Foss, composer and pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose work has been played by many of the major orchestras of the nation. A winner at the age of 23, he is the youngest composer ever to win a Guggenheim fellowship.

Among the interesting work proposed under the fellowships is that planned by Lieut. (jg) Robert King Hall, former assistant director of the Commission on English Language Studies at Harvard, who contemplates a study with a view to formualting recommendations for the rehabilitation of the Japanese educational system.

Foundation Marking 20th Year

The foundation, which is marking its twentieth anniversary, was established in 1925 by the late United States Senator Simon Guggenheim and Mrs. Guggenheim as a memorial to their son, John. Fellowships are designed to further the work of promising scholars and artists between the ages of 25 and 40. Stipends usually are $2,500 a year.

Trustees of the foundation, in addition to Mrs. Guggenheim, are Francis H. Brownell, Carroll A. Wilson, Charles D. Hilles, Roger W. Straus, John C. Emison, Medley G. B. Whelpley and Charles Merz.

Members of the committee on selection are Dr. Frank Aydelotte, director of the Institute for Advanced Study at Princeton, N. J., chairman; Dr. Florence R. Sabin of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, Professor Edwin Bidwell Wilson of the Harvard University School of Public Health, Professor Linus Pauling of the California Institute of Technology, and Professor Wallace Notestein of Yale.

This committee was assisted in selecting winners in the field of art by an advisory jury made up of Gifford Beal and Charles E. Burchfield, painters; James Earle Fraser and Mahonri M. Young, sculptors, and Carl Zigrosser, curator of prints in the Philadelphia Museum of Art.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

Salute to a Talent

VIRGINIANS may not be fully aware of the great acclaim which has come, of late, to RANDALL THOMPSON, head of the University of Virginia's division of music, by virtue of his choral work for men's voices and orchestra, "A Testament of Freedom." Composed by him in honor of the 200th anniversary of THOMAS JEFFERSON's birth, and given its premiere at the university at that time, the work has just won national recognition.

"A Testament of Freedom" is deemed to be addressed almost as appropriately to the career of ROOSEVELT as to that of JEFFERSON. Hence the Office of War Information short-waved it by radio after the President's death for over 24 hours to all parts of the world. And simultaneously the composition was rendered as part of the ROOSEVELT memorial concert in Carnegie Hall, New York, along with works by BEETHOVEN and SHOSTAKOVITCH.

OLIN DOWNES, the music critic of the New York Times, pronounced the program "unforgettable." He made it clear in his critique that he feared an anticlimax when RANDALL THOMPSON'S composition was rendered near the close under the baton of DR. KOUSSEVITZKY, and with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club. But there was no anticlimax. He described the work of DR. THOMPSON as "admirably proportioned, climaxed and carried through," and added: "It was with a thrill that yesterday's audience discovered one of the most convincingly American scores that this period has produced."

THE TIMES-DISPATCH joins with many others in saluting the great musical talent which has made itself manifest at the University of Virginia.

SEASON 1945-1946

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, CONDUCTOR

Five Friday Evenings

Nov. 16 · Jan. 11 · Feb. 15 · Mar. 15 · Apr. 12

SUBSCRIPTION, INCLUDING 20% TAX

Institute Member's Seat: $7.20, $9.60, $12, $15. All Other Seats: $8.40, $10.80, $13.20, $16.20.

OPERA HOUSE BROOKLYN ACADEMY OF MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

From the standpoint of performance, yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert, the last of the newly created Sunday Series, was one of the most remarkable of the entire season. In Haydn's Symphony in B-flat, No. 102, Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra fairly outdid themselves. In addition to these familiar numbers there was a further performance of Randall Thompson's "The Testament of Freedom," in which the men's chorus, as on the two previous occasions, was the Harvard Glee Club.

Though we have no such standards by which to judge it, the performance of Mr. Thompson's piece was probably quite as extraordinary as that of the other numbers. If the Austrian, the Frenchman and the Bavarian were fortunate yesterday in their interpreters, so was the American. And he was even more dependent upon them, since his own contribution was far slighter. A rehearing of "The Testament of Freedom" merely strengthened the first impression that the music itself, while written in a devotional spirit, is all too often trite, pedestrian and unimaginative. There are fleeting moments in which Thomas Jefferson's words have been given a musical counterpart almost worthy of their eloquence, but these on the whole are few and far between. Yesterday, as before, even more than before, it was the text that prevailed, while the music seemed little more than a humble handmaiden. There are some things in poetry that could not adequately be put into music, and there is much inspired prose that will defy the efforts of any composer. Let us hope that Mr. Thompson's partial success will not tempt some rash music maker to lay hands on the Gettysburg Address and the Second Inaugural.

MORE ABOUT "NINTH"

Symphony Orchestra Closes Season This Saturday With Great Beethoven Work

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

SATURDAY evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last of the current season, will begin not at 8:30 but at 8:10. Because the program is unusually long? Not at all. In fact, it is unusually short, consisting only of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which consumes about an hour and a quarter. The answer is the hour-long broadcast. Heretofore this has always included the first part of the concert which, incidentally, must be planned to fit it. But since the whole of the Ninth cannot be put on the air, Dr. Koussevitzky has decided in favor of the last three, not the first three movements, thus enabling the radio audience to hear the choral finale in which the orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society and these solo singers; Valentina Vishnevska, soprano; Jean Watson, contralto; William Hain, tenor, and Robert Hall Collins, bass.

In one (of many respects) you have to hand it to Beethoven. When you say "the Fifth Symphony" you mean his, not that of Tchaikovsky or Sibelius. And when you say "the Ninth," you do not mean Bruckner's No. 9 nor Mahler's, though they are very great works, both of them. Nor will those words even come to signify the Ninth of Shostakovitch, by report now taking shape in the composer's mind before being committed to paper.

* * *

Important as is the "Ninth Symphony" in its own right and great as it is from a purely musical standpoint (although there will always be disagreement over the actual worth and the artistic propriety of the fourth movement), it is quite as important historically. The influence of Beethoven on the music of the last three-quarters of the 19th century and the first decade of the present one was very great, but the "Ninth Symphony" has more to answer for than any other single work of his, not excepting the "Pastoral," which gave a new impulse and a new dignity to program music, or the "Fifth," in which was introduced the subsequently popular symphonic scheme of man's struggle with and triumph over fate, destiny or besetting circumstances, however you chose to put it.

The vague, mysterious beginnings of the first movement, with its open fifths, its string tremolos and its chief theme gradually taking shape before it is launched like a thunderbolt by the full orchestra, was something new under the sun. So impressed was Bruckner with the tremolo idea that he hardly ever began a symphony any other way, while both in the matter of key (D minor) and the general character of the chief theme, and even of the movement as a whole, the first division of the Austrian master's Third and Ninth stem directly from this mightiest of Beethoven's symphonic utterances.

* * *

It may have been the operas of Weber that started Wagner on his great career, but it was Beethoven who supplied the chief urge in that direction, first in Leipzig and then in Paris, where the rehearsals of the Ninth at the Conservatoire, as Ernest Newman puts it, "purged his soul of all the musical frivolities and baseness to which he had surrendered himself for so many wild and wasteful years." His subsequent devotion to the symphony, his valuable editing of the score, his discerning exposition of the music's inner meaning and his triumphant performance of it at Dresden in 1846, where up to that time it had remained, if not exactly unheard at least uncomprehended, are matters of record. Of course he was twisting facts to suit his particular purpose when he saw in the choral finale an admission on Beethoven's part that instrumental music had gone as far as it could without the aid of poetry.

To the general idea of a symphony with chorus and solo singers we owe the Second and Eighth Symphonies of Mahler, not to mention his Third and Fourth and "The Song of the Earth." But it is as the first and very possibly still the greatest expression of Titanism in music that the Ninth has the most significance. Our modern esthetes, "musical Puritans," you might call them, who shrink not only from a too outspoken beauty but from any violence or "excess," from any and all attempts at the musically cosmic and colossal (from "The Rink of the Nibelung" to Mahler's Eighth, most unhappily miscalled "The Symphony of the Thousand"), should address their complaints to Beethoven. With the resources at his command he "shot the works." He wrote what is still one of the longest of symphonies and in the finale he created all the sonority that he was capable of imagining. I have as yet said nothing about Brahms' debt to the Ninth in his own First Symphony, including a thematic resemblance that he cheerfuly acknowledged. In fact, once launched upon this discussion it is difficult to stop.

* * *

This afternoon's Symphony concert offers Haydn's Symphony No. 102, Randall Thompson's "The Testament of Freedom" again with the Harvard Glee Club, Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

APR 22 1945

Salute to a Talent

VIRGINIANS may not be fully aware of the great acclaim which has come, of late, to RANDALL THOMPSON, head of the University of Virginia's division of music, by virtue of his choral work for men's voices and orchestra, "A Testament of Freedom." Composed by him in honor of the 200th anniversary of THOMAS JEFFERSON's birth, and given its premiere at the university at that time, the work has just won national recognition.

"A Testament of Freedom" is deemed to be addressed almost as appropriately to the career of ROOSEVELT as to that of JEFFERSON. Hence the Office of War Information short-waved it by radio after the President's death for over 24 hours to all parts of the world. And simultaneously the composition was rendered as part of the ROOSEVELT memorial concert in Carnegie Hall, New York, along with works by BEETHOVEN and SHOSTAKOVITCH.

OLIN DOWNES, the music critic of the New York Times, pronounced the program "unforgettable." He made it clear in his critique that he feared an anticlimax when RANDALL THOMPSON's composition was rendered near the close under the baton of DR. KOUSSEVITZKY, and with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club. But there was no anticlimax. He described the work of DR. THOMPSON as "admirably proportioned, climaxed and carried through," and added: "It was with a thrill that yesterday's audience discovered one of the most convincingly American scores that this period has produced."

THE TIMES-DISPATCH joins with many others in saluting the great musical talent which has made itself manifest at the University of Virginia.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
DAILY WORKER

APR 22 1945

Symphonic Music Wins Large Radio Audience

By SERGE KOUSSE

I am extremely interested in the progress of the radio. I often listen to our principal orchestras on the air—even to my own orchestra on those Saturday nights when there is a guest conducting. I am impressed by the excellent quality of broadcasting at its best. And I am greatly interested in the letters which come from all parts of the country. There is but one possible conclusion from all this: Symphonic music, which thanks to radio, has been brought to numberless people who were strange to it, is continually gaining a larger audience.

CHOICE OF PROGRAMS

As a conductor I am made aware of the importance of a wise choice of programs for this vast and mixed audience. When a conductor plans his programmes, he does not simply write down what first occurs to him, or some music he happens personally to prefer. If he did that he would be neglecting the responsibilities of his position. He is responsible not only for the performance of a hundred men, but for what the thousands are to hear who constitute his concert audiences and the millions who constitute his radio audiences. He is a leader in the broadest sense of the word—a leader of his public no less than of his orchestra. He must choose what they shall hear, and if his reading of certain music carries his own conviction in the interpretation, he becomes a director of general opinion.

I feel this as more than a responsibility. It is a privilege, and a privilege which I could never take lightly. That is why the problem of making a programme is always for me a matter of great care and thought.

How shall I choose between new music and old music? If I decide to programme the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, there will be some who have heard it too often and others who have not heard it often enough, either because they are young or because they are new converts to symphonic music, or because they live in musically remote communities. They are very imortant and they have every consideration. If I decide to play a new work which departs from the lines of custom and convention, those very ones who must want to hear Beethoven's Fifth Symphony or Brahm's First will be less interested.

The letters which come to me from all sides after a broadcast interest me especially because they are an indication of what the great radio audience wants. Of course it would be impossible to give all of these letter writers what they want, because, for one reason, they are always contradicting each other. I would answer those who complain of too many repetitions of the classical symphonies, that, as many times as I have heard and performed the symphonies of Beethoven or Brahms or Tchaikovsky, they hold for me a fresh stimulation.

WHAT LISTENERS WANT

To those who have written saying that they would rather not hear music of today, I would answer with the reassurance that there is music of such great beauty being written by our composers that the man who dismisses it is seriously depriving himself. The majority of the important composers of today are now in America. Some of them were born here, and others have come from Europe and made America their home. Not all of their music, but the best of their music, which I try to single out for my programmes, is the inspired voice of a new and growing art which, when it reaches its full flowering, may stand comparison with any past epoch in musical history. If some of it sounds strange to you, if it seems to violate the traditional rules of what constitutes beautiful combinations of sound, I ask you to be patient and listen with an open mind.

The duty of every conductor now is no different from what it has been in the past. A conductor must be a prophet—not a mystical but a very practical one, who can look into the future far enough to see that what audiences now reject they will soon be begging for. An example of this is the Fifth Symphony by Shostakovitch, which was greeted with little attention and many objections when it was first heard. My answer to these objections was to repeat the symphony again and again until it became one of the most popular of contemporary symphonies in our repertory. The conductor's function as a "leader" is to bring about that change; to make the unpopular music of today the popular music of tomorrow, and always to have that tomorrow in his plans.

(Reprinted courtesy Radio Daily.)

Bulletin — April - 1945

SEASON 1945-1946

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, CONDUCTOR

Five Friday Evenings

Nov. 16 Jan. 11 Feb. 15 Mar. 15 Apr. 12

SUBSCRIPTION, INCLUDING 20% TAX

Institute Member's Seat: $7.20, $9.60, $12, $15. All Other Seats: $8.40, $10.80, $13.20, $16.20.

OPERA HOUSE ❦ ❦ ❦ ❦ ❦ BROOKLYN ACADEMY OF MUSIC

TIMES

APR 2

GUGGENHEIM FUND MAKES 96 AWARDS

41 of Its Fellowships Go to Men in Armed Forces or War-Allied Activity

The John Simon Guggenheim Memorial Foundation announced yesterday the awarding of ninety-six fellowships with a value totaling $230,000, forty-one of which will go to those in the armed forces or in war-allied activity in line with the policy adopted last year of making special awards to those serving the nation at war.

Of the award winners, only seven are women. None of these is in the war-service category. Five former winners repeated in this year's awards, including Dr. Johannes F. K. Holtfreter, a German refugee and one of the world's leading experimental geneticists, who will continue his investigation of the causal factors involved in the embryonic development of vertebrates.

Dr. Holtfreter, who is now working at McGill University is one of four scholars from Canada to whom awards were made.

Notable among the winners this year is Lukas Foss, composer and pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose work has been played by many of the major orchestras of the nation. A winner at the age of 23, he is the youngest composer ever to win a Guggenheim fellowship.

Among the interesting work proposed under the fellowships is that planned by Lieut. (jg) Robert King Hall, former assistant director of the Commission on English Language Studies at Harvard, who contemplates a study with a view to formualting recommendations for the rehabilitation of the Japanese educational system.

Foundation Marking 20th Year

The foundation, which is marking its twentieth anniversary, was established in 1925 by the late United States Senator Simon Guggenheim and Mrs. Guggenheim as a memorial to their son, John. Fellowships are designed to further the work of promising scholars and artists between the ages of 25 and 40. Stipends usually are $2,500 a year.

Trustees of the foundation, in addition to Mrs. Guggenheim, are Francis H. Brownell, Carroll A. Wilson, Charles D. Hilles, Roger W. Straus, John C. Emison, Medley G. B. Whelpley and Charles Merz.

Members of the committee on selection are Dr. Frank Aydelotte, director of the Institute for Advanced Study at Princeton, N. J., chairman; Dr. Florence R. Sabin of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, Professor Edwin Bidwell Wilson of the Harvard University School of Public Health, Professor Linus Pauling of the California Institute of Technology, and Professor Wallace Notestein of Yale.

This committee was assisted in selecting winners in the field of art by an advisory jury made up of Gifford Beal and Charles E. Burchfield, painters; James Earle Fraser and Mahonri M. Young, sculptors, and Carl Zigrosser, curator of prints in the Philadelphia Museum of Art.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

From the standpoint of performance, yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert, the last of the newly created Sunday Series, was one of the most remarkable of the entire season. In Haydn's Symphony in B-flat, No. 102, Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody" and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra fairly outdid themselves. In addition to these familiar numbers there was a further performance of Randall Thompson's "The Testament of Freedom," in which the men's chorus, as on the two previous occasions, was the Harvard Glee Club.

Though we have no such standards by which to judge it, the performance of Mr. Thompson's piece was probably quite as extraordinary as that of the other numbers. If the Austrian, the Frenchman and the Bavarian were fortunate yesterday in their interpreters, so was the American. And he was even more dependent upon them, since his own contribution was far slighter. A rehearing of "The Testament of Freedom" merely strengthened the first impression that the music itself, while written in a devotional spirit, is all too often trite, pedestrian and unimaginative. There are fleeting moments in which Thomas Jefferson's words have been given a musical counterpart almost worthy of their eloquence, but these on the whole are few and far between. Yesterday, as before, even more than before, it was the text that prevailed, while the music seemed little more than a humble handmaiden. There are some things in poetry that could not adequately be put into music, and there is much inspired prose that will defy the efforts of any composer. Let us hope that Mr. Thompson's partial success will not tempt some rash music maker to lay hands on the Gettysburg Address and the Second Inaugural.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 22 1945

NEW TRENDS IN COMPOSITION

Thompson's 'Testament of Freedom' Seen as an Expression of Our National Traditions and Spirit

By OLIN DOWNES

THIS writer is still under the strong impression made upon him by Randall Thompson's setting of Jeffersonian texts given the collective title of "Testament of Freedom" and first heard here at the recent concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, aided by the Harvard Glee Club, in Carnegie Hall. The work as it stands on its own feet is significant; it is also significant because of its indication of a certain trend now perceptible in American music.

That trend is in the direction, at least, of making articulate national traditions and spirit. It goes without saying that in wartime there are musical pretences at national expression after formulas which mean worse than nothing, since they are simply catchpots to secure the applause and the profits of the hour. Then there are the many whose intentions are perfectly honorable but whose emotions, or realization of what the experiences of their nation mean, are superficial. But there is more than that in this looking homeward of our composers—a fact to which Mr. Thompson's composition bore testimony.

Religious Atmosphere

It is true that this score was heard under particularly impressive circumstances. The concert was dedicated to the spirit of the great President who had passed, who had lived and died for the ideals that Jefferson and his nation have cherished. The atmosphere was that almost of a religious observance. The emotions of the hour were intense and transcended any that would have been aroused by purely esthetic considerations. For that very reason, if the intrinsic quality of the music had been false, the falseness would have been detected. It was significant after a movement from the Shostakovich Eighth Symphony, which had never sounded so greatly, and directly following the Funeral March from the "Eroica" symphony.

It rang true because it was the sincere and artistic expression of the convictions of the composer. Did these convictions surpass in their strength the inherent value of the music itself? Was the audience that listened in turn carried away, not by the actual sounds, but by the emotions so intense at the moment? Actual values of these kinds are ascertained only afterward, but it is tribute to the composer that he too was caught up by something far greater than himself, as his composition demonstrated.

Big Effects Sought

The music was written palpably for big and simple effects, for great choruses to sing, and audiences to grasp. It was astonishing to us that Mr. Thompson, with his native sensitiveness and refinement of style, had been able to paint with such broad strokes, "and walk with kings, nor lose the common touch." The result made more clear the integrity of his purpose. He was writing for his fellow-men and the great ideas which have united them. These ideas, one would say, have a religious truth for him. It is neither surprising nor inappropriate that the score should have the pomp of ceremonial in the proper places and almost the flavor of ritual in others.

Truths we hold to be self-evident! Self-evident, likewise, the score, and this without an error of taste or banality. On the artistic side the work has an architecture which is self-sustaining, and a musical vocabulary not self-consciously in one or another of the current styles, but very natural with the composer and flexible and adequate for its objectives.

Again it is shown how little terminology, as such, matters in any art. A young musician was complaining to an older one that he could not for the life of him understand the current homage to Mozart, whose phrases have such likelihood and whose musical sentences ended always in a few cadences which could be prophesied before they were heard. "Yes," said the senior artist, "and so you would condemn Shakespeare for using the word 'and'!"

Mr. Thompson has written other important pages than these. Sometimes his style has been rather slender, though always characterized by thought and a fine workmanship and unostentatious sincerity. The "Testament of Freedom" is his nearest approach to the directly popular. One remembers an evening not long ago at the dinner given Dr. Koussevitzky by a group of American composers, when his "Alleluia," composed in terms of almost Palestrinian polyphony, surpassed all the other music of the evening. It did not matter that other music on the program was written in advanced harmonic idioms, while Mr. Thompson's procedure could have been termed conventional or old-fashioned. Mr. Thompson happens to write after long accepted models. He does not take the attitude of a path-breaker, which would be foreign to him. Sooner or later we will have great path-breakers in American music. How could it be otherwise, from such a nation of pioneers? But there is one method of search for that path. It is complete honesty with one's self and one's art—which is rare. But that is the alpha and omega of the productive composer.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony

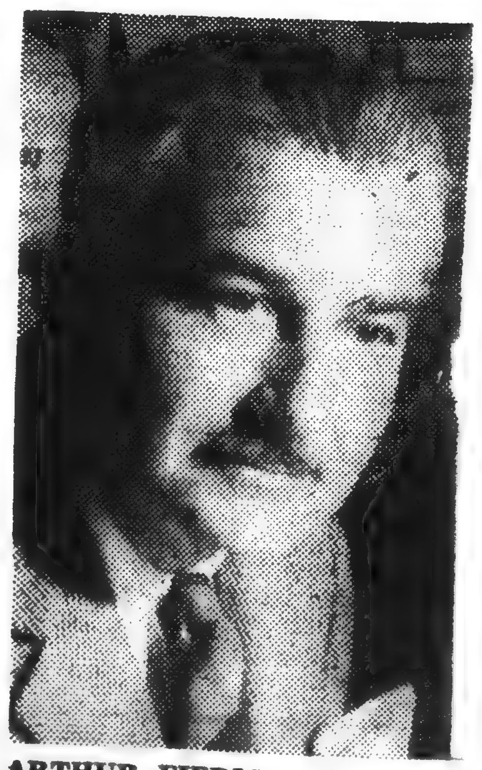
Yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the 24th and last of the 1944-1945 Friday afternoon series of concerts; the orchestra was assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, and by the following soloists: Valentina Vishnevska, soprano; Jean Watson, contralto; William Hain, tenor; and Robert Hall Collins, bass. The program was as follows:
Beethoven—Symphony No. 9 in D minor, with final chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," Op. 125.

By ELINOR HUGHES

There are two ways to enjoy being in the right: one is to crawl out on a limb, stuff cotton in your ears and then announce loudly, without fear of hearing any contradiction, that So-and-So has written the greatest musical composition in the last hundred years, and that anyone who doesn't agree with you can come right out on the limb and fight it out—or possibly would prefer to resort to pistols and coffee at dawn in the Boston Public Garden. The other, and less belligerent method is to select some world famous composition which annoys certain persons because the fact that they don't like it fails to alter its reputation, and climb firmly onto the bandwagon with the announcement that you are on the side of the angels. An equal amount of inner satisfaction can attend both procedures. All of which leads up to the statement that of all the musical works I have yet heard, I most deeply admire and enjoy Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in D minor, the performance of which yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall brought the 64th season of Friday afternoon concerts to a triumphant close, and that my admiration and enjoyment definitely includes the final movement, which displeases many Beethoven idolators.

Considering the monumental proportions and exalted standing of this symphony, it is interesting to find people who don't like it and who say so, quite frankly. On the other hand, it is definitely more stimulating to find the late Sir Donald Tovey remarking quitely, and firmly, that "there are listeners to whom it is a cause of nervous irritability that the Ninth Symphony is recognized by orthodoxy as the most sublime musical composition known." And in the same article he comes to the defense of the loudly debated choral ending by saying: "There is no part of Beethoven's Choral Symphony that does not become clearer to us when we assume that the choral finale is right, and hardly a point that does not become difficult and obscure as soon as we fall into the habit that assumes the choral finale is wrong."

Mr. Koussevitzky, the orchestra, the choruses and the soloists gave the tremendous work the performance it deserves: the three orchestral movements had a large magnificence and pervasive eloquence, the choral section was sung with the clarity precision and controlled volume for which the Harvard and Radcliffe groups are justly famous. Best of the soloists (partly because he had the best of the solos) was Robert Hall Collins, the bass; though William Hain managed the "On to victory" passage commendably, and Miss Vishnevska and Miss Watson did quite well in the soprano and contralto parts. The huge audience was most demonstrative at the close, as it should have been. Tonight's concert, owing to the broadcast, will begin at 8:10.



ARTHUR FIEDLER, conductor of the Pops, which open their 60th season at Symphony Hall on Tuesday evening. Her. Apr. 29

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

[illegible] 22 [illegible]

Boston Symphony to Play Four Concerts This Summer

Program Will Be Given in Theater — Music Shed Will Not Be Opened — Today Is White Sunday in Berkshire Hills — Apple Blossoms in Full Bloom

Special Dispatch to The Sunday Union and Republican

BERKSHIRE HILLS, April 21—According to present plans Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orhcestra, is to give four concerts at Tanglewood this summer, the same number as last season at the Mozart festival. If present arrangements are carried out the Koussevitzky School foundation will omit its sessions, but the conductor will have students at Seranak, his Richmond mountain summer home at Lenox. The four concerts this summer will be given by Boston symphony players in the theater, which has a seating capacity of about 1500. The music shed, with seats for 6000, will not be opened.

First Festival in 1934

The initial Berkshire Symphonic festival was held in August, 1934, in the open air at the Dan R. Hanna farm, Stockbridge. The idea was the brain child of the late Dr Henry Hadley, New York Philharmonic conductor, who sent an emissary to Berkshire to arouse interest and co-operation. Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith of New York and Stockbridge, was alert to its possibilities and she helped to perfect the organization, of which later she was elected president and has held the office continuously since then. Underwriters the first year of uncertainty were Mrs Bruce Crane of Dalton, Mrs John Bross Lloyd and Norval H. Busey, Jr., of Lee, Mrs Charles C. Griswold, John R. Hopkins and Clark W. Tobin, Stockbridge; Mrs Halstead Lindsley, Mrs Arthur Frederic Schermerhorn, Lenox. While no official report was published it is understood the venture cost them $50 apiece.

Dr Hadley again was engaged to give three concerts in 1935 "under the moon" at the Hanna farm. Showers dampened the final program. Mrs Margaret Emerson gave the use of her lawn at Holmwood for the third festival in 1936 and it was held under a tent. In December, 1936, Mrs Gorham Brooks, Boston, the present Mrs Andrew Hopewell Hepburn, gave Tanglewood to the Boston Symphony orchestra and the festival took place there in 1937 beneath a larger tent. So famous had the Berkshire festival become that 32 states, Canada and Europe were represented in the audience. The climax of the festival came that season when a cloudburst vied with an all-Wagnerian program and the storm won out, making it necessary for Dr Koussevitzky to curtail the final number.

Thus Nature helped to crystalize plans for a music shed and $80,000 was raised in a few months. It was ready for the 1938 festival. The shed has been closed since 1942. In 1935 Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith said: "We see no reason why the Berkshire Symphonic festival should not be permanent. We will present the best musicians under notable leadership at the lowest admission figure possible. It is high time America had its own Salsburg and we are taking a long step in that direction."

MUSIC

Apr-27

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Boston Symphony concerts this week are the last of the 64th season. The program is short and unconventional, consisting entirely of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. There is no intermission. For the radio broadcast the final concert will begin at 8:10 tonight, 20 minutes earlier than usual. This is the first time in Serge Koussevitzky's regime as conductor that the orchestra has finished a season with the "Mighty Ninth."

The choruses for the finale on Schiller's "Ode to Joy" (sung in English) are the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth. The four soloists are Valentina Vishnevska, soprano; Jean Watson, contralto; William Hain, tenor, and Robert Hall Collins, bass.

There is always something ritualistic about the beginning and end of a Symphony season. For one thing, the audience always rises when Mr. Koussevitzky first appears. For another, there is in the atmosphere an especial sort of tension. At the end of a season the tension is mingled with a sense of regret that such extraordinary pleasures as the music of the Boston Symphony will not be ours again until the Autumn.

On such occasions, too, Mr. Koussevitzky and the virtuosi he conducts always receive an ovation of more than usual intensity. After the last unison D had sounded yesterday, the audience broke into a storm of applause, in which hand-clapping was mingled with stamping and a cheer and whistle or two. All on the stage were the object of this demonstration, including Mr. Woodworth, who was brought forward by Mr. Koussevitzky. But the greater share was directed at the man who for more than 20 years has maintained the Boston orchestra at a peak of supreme artistic achievement.

Orchestrally the Ninth Symphony had the same luminous beauty of tone, the same rhythmic vitality, the same emotional fire and an exaltation of expression that Mr. Koussevitzky had summoned each time he had conducted the work here before. At the end one felt the usual emotion of seeming quite small and humble in the presence of a master work.

The chorus, somewhat reduced from that of the Red Cross performance of the Ninth a fortnight ago, sang competently, if not with so much body of tone. Nor were they always as clear as could be desired. Some of the entrances for altos and tenors could not be heard. The soloists managed to navigate their extraordinarily difficult parts, but the distinction, in tone and technique, of the remarkable Metropolitan Opera quartet heard two weeks ago, just was not there. Even so, the concert was impressive. Mr. Koussevitzky traversed the Symphony in exactly one hour. 9½ minutes.

BRISTOL, CONN.
PRESS

APR 28 1945

BOSTON SYMPHONY WITH HARVARD-RADCLIFFE CHORUS AIRS BEETHOVEN NINTH

The present season of broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will close next Saturday with a traditionally impressive program. At this time the sympthony will perform Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with the Harvard and Radcliffe glee clubs singing the final choral movement.

The college choral societies first performed the Beethoven work with the Boston Symphony in 1924, Dr. Koussevitzky's first year with ~~the orchestra. It~~ was done again in 1927 in honor of the centenary of Beethoven's death, and several times subsequently; but Saturday evening will mark its first time on the air with the Harvard and Radcliffe groups participating.

Soloists for the evening will be Valentina Vishnevska, soprano; Jean Watson, alto; William Hain, tenor; and Robert Hall Collins, baritone.

The Boston Symphony is heard over the BLUE network, 8:30-9:30 p. m., EWT.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

96 Guggenheim Awards Made By Foundation

41 in Services or War Work Share in $230,000 Gifts; 18 New Yorkers Chosen

The John Simon Guggenheim Memorial Foundation announced yesterday the award of fellowships to fifty-five civilians and forty-one service men or war-occupied civilians to finance achievement in writing, research, science, art, poetry and music composition.

The fellowships, of about $2,500 each, total $230,000. The fifty-five to civilians will be awarded immediately, while those designated for men in war service will be held until the recipients can return to pursuits of peace.

Of the total of ninety-six, eighteen went to residents of New York City.

Among the service men honored in this twentieth annual award by the Guggenheim Foundation are decorated combat soldiers, men with wound stripes, and Navy and merchant marine personnel still at sea.

The foundation was established and endowed by the late Simon Guggenheim, former United States Senator, of Colorado, and Mrs. Guggenheim as a memorial to their son John. It is dedicated to building the world's cultural wealth by enabling creators of proved ability and talent to devote more time to study and work.

Following is a list of the forty-one fellowship winners who are now in service or who are busy as civilians in some government war service:

HISTORY AND LITERATURE

Dr. Richard Poate Stebbins, research analyst, Office of Strategic Services, Washington, who will make a historical study of art patronage.

Lieutenant Commander Lawrance Thompson, U. S. N., curator of special collections, Princeton University Library, who plans a biography of Robert Frost.

Dale L. Morgan, of Salt Lake City, with the Office of Price Administration, Washington, who plans a history of Mormonism and the Mormons, with particular reference to the influence of the Mormons upon American life since 1830.

Staff Sergeant James Emerson Phillips Jr., U. S. A., instructor in English, University of California, Los Angeles, who plans the preparations of a book on the legend of Mary, Queen of Scots, from the point of view of the influence of imaginative literature upon historical perspective.

Lieutenant Gordon H. Ray, formerly instructor in English at Harvard University, who plans to write a bography of William Makepeace Thackeray.

Private Edward Rosen, U. S. A., instructor in history, College of the City of New York, who plans a study of the place of Copernicus in the development of modern thought.

Lieutenant Harry Bober, U. S. N., tutor at the College of the City of New York, who plans a study of the printed "Books of Hours," their development, style, schools, iconography and influences.

Private Claude Willis Barlow, U. S. A., instructor in Latin, Mount Holyoke College, who plans a critical edition of the works of St. Martin de Braga, sixth-century Spanish archbishop.

Captain Donald Eugene McCown, U. S. A., research assistant, Oriental Institute, University of Chicago, who plans historical studies of the early cultures of Baluchistan and of the relationships of the civilizations of the Indus Valley and Mesopotamia during the third millennium.

Lieutenant Barnaby Conrad Keeney, U. S. A., formerly instructor in history, Harvard University, who plans a study of the origin and development of the feudal institution of judgment by peers on the continent of Europe and in England.

Lieutenant C. Vann Woodward, U. S. N., professor of history, Scripps College, Claremont, Calif., who plans to complete a book to be entitled "Origins of the New South, 1880-1913."

Warrant Officer (j. g.) William Farr Church, U. S. A., instructor of history, University of Kentucky, Lexington, who plans a study of political thought in seventeenth-century France.

Lieutenant Commander Henry Ladd Smith, U. S. N., formerly assistant professor of journalism, University of Minnesota, who plans to carry on, during his post-Service Fellowship year, studies of America's part in the development of world air routes and of the history of our foreign air policy.

Major Hodding Carter, U. S. A., writer and publisher of "The Democrat Times," Greenville, Miss., who plans to write a book on the establishment of the West Florida Republic in territory taken from Spain in 1810 by American colonists from Spanish Florida.

Corporal Stanley J. Kunitz, U. S. A., poet, of New Hope, Pa., who plans to write a book of poetry based on his war-time experiences.

Jerre Mangione, writer, of Rochester, now doing war work in the Office of the Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, Department of Justice, Philadelphia, who plans the preparation of a book on the reconstruction of Sicily, treating of its political, spiritual and economic rehabilitation.

PAINTING

Lieutenant Edward A. Reep, U. S. A., of Monterey, Calif.

Lieutenant Rudolph von Ripper, U. S. A., of New Canaan, Conn.

Technician Fourth Grade Frank D. Duncan jr., U. S. A., of New Rochelle, N. Y.

Technical Sergeant Mitchell Siporin, U. S. A., of Chicago.

Edward Laning, of New York.

Lieutenant Edward Millman, U. S. N., of Chicago.

Technical Sergeant Jack Levine, U. S. A., of Boston.

Frank Vavruska, of Chicago.

Seaman Donald W. Burns, United States Merchant Marine, of Buffalo.

SCIENCE

Dr. John Williams Calkin, professor of mathematics, Illinois Institute of Technology, Chicago, now doing war work in Office of Chief of Naval Operations, Washington.

Dr. Edwin Hewitt, operations analyst, Army Air Forces.

Dr. Leo Leroy Beranek, director of research on sound, Harvard University, now engaged upon war research under the Office of Scientific Research and Development.

Dr. Chandler McCuskey Brooks, associate professor of physiology, Johns Hopkins School of Medicine, now engaged upon war research under the Office of Scientific Research and Development.

Dr. Seymour Stanley Cohen, biochemist at the University of Pennsylvania, now engaged upon war research under the Office of Scientific Research and Development.

Dr. Dean Stanley Tarbell, assistant professor of organic chemistry, University of Rochester, now engaged upon war research under the Office of Scientific Research and Development.

Lieuteant Edward Novitski, U. S. A., geneticist, of San Marino, Calif.

Apprentice Seaman Ellsworth Charles Dougherty, specialist training program, U. S. A., research fellow in zoology, University of California, Berkeley.

MUSIC COMPOSITION

Corporal Dai-Keong Lee, U. S. A., of Honolulu.

Corporal Samuel Barber, U. S. A., of Philadelphia.

Elliott Cook Carter jr., recently music consultant, Office of Wor Information (Overseas Branch).

Charles Faulkner Bryan, assistant coordinator of the Tennessee State Defense Council, Tennessee.

JAPANESE STUDIES

Lieutenant (j. g.) Robert Kng Hall, U. S. N., formerly assistant director of the Commission on English Language Studies, Harvard University.

Bradford Smith, chief of Central Pacific operations of the Office of War Information, Honolulu.

PHOTOGRAPHY

Private Brett Weston, U. S. A., Signal Corps photographer, of Santa Monica, Calif.

INDUSTRIAL PLANNING

Master Sergeant Henry William Spiegel, U. S. A., on leave from Duquesne University, Pittsburgh.

Following is a list of the fifty-five civilian fellowship winners:

AMERICAN HISTORY

Dr. Richard Gordon Lillard, instructor in English, Indiana University.

Dr. Merrill Jensen, associate professor of American history, University of Wisconsin.

Dr. William Clement Eaton, professor of history, Lafayette College, Easton, Pa.

Dr. Paul Henry Giddens, professor of history and political science, Allegheny College, Meadville, Pa.

Henry F. Pringle, writer, of Washington.

BIOGRAPHY

Mrs. Marie Kimball, curator, Thomas Jefferson Memorial Foundation, Charlottesville, Va.

Dr. Ralph Leslie Rusk, professor of English, Columbia University.

Dr. Frederick Pottle, professor of English, Yale University.

Dr. Jacques Barzun, associate professor of history, Columbia University.

Dr. Alrik Gustafson, assistant professor of Scandinavian, University of Minnesota.

FICTION AND POETRY

Miss Marianne Moore, poet, of Brooklyn, N. Y.

Theodore Roethke, poet, of Bennington College, Vermont.

Mrs. Jean Stafford Lowell, novelist, of Westport, Conn.

Robert Pick, novelist, of New York.

OTHER HISTORY AND LITERATURE

Dr. George Kumler Anderson, associate professor of English, Brown University.

Dr. Charles Grant Loomis, assistant professor of German, University of California, Berkeley.

Dr. Mary Hatch Marshall, associate professor of English, Colby College, Waterville.

Dr. Thomas Robert Shannon Broughton, associate professor of Latin, Bryn Mawr College.

Dr. Israel E. Drabkin, historian, of New York.

Dr. John William Shirley, associate professor of English, Michigan State College.

Dr. Benjamin N. Nelson, historan, lecturer, Y. M. H. A., New York.

Dr. Charles W. Jones, associate professor of English, Cornell University.

Dr. Hans Rosenberg, assistant professor of history, Brooklyn College.

BIOLOGY

Dr. Carlos Eugenio Chardon, director of the Institute of Tropical Agriculture, Mayaguez, Puerto Rico.

Dr. Denis Llewellyn Fox, associate professor of marine biochemistry, Scripps Institution, La Jolla, Calif.

Dr. Kenneth Willard Cooper, assistant professor of bology, Princeton University.

Dr. Aaron J. Sharp, associate professor of botany, University of Tennessee.

Dr. Damon Boynton, associate professor of pomology, Cornell University.

Dr. Theodore C. Schneirla, associate professor of psychology, New York University, and associate curator of animal behavior, American Museum of Natural History.

MUSIC COMPOSITION

Lukas Foss, composer and pianist to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Norman Dello Joio, composer, of New York.

Nikolai Lopatnikoff, composer, of New York.

Arthur Kreutz, composer and assistant professor of music theory, University of Texas.

PHILOSOPHY

Dr. Frederick Brenton Fitch, assistant professor of philosophy, Yale University.

Dr. Charles Leslie Stevenson, assistant professor of philosophy, Yale University.

Dr. Frederick Ludwig Will, assistant professor of philosophy, University of Illinois.

Dr. Abraham Kaplan, instructor in philosophy, New York University.

FINE ARTS

Dr. Otto Benesch, Fogg Museum of Art, Harvard University.

Miss Elizabeth Wilder, assistant keeper, Archive of Hispanic Culture, Library of Congress.

Dr. Siegfried Kracauer, writer, of New York.

Henry-Russell Hitchcock, associate professor of art, Wesleyan University, and technical author, Pratt & Whitney aircraft division, United Aircraft Corporation, Hartford, Conn.

SCULPTURE

Miss Eleanor Louise Platt, sculptor, of New York.

Donal Albert Hord, sculptor, of San Diego, Calif.

Adolphe Dieda, sculptor, of West Aliquippa, Pa.

PAINTING

Fred Kabotie, artist, of Hopi Indian Reservation, Oraibi, Ariz.

Ellis Wilson, painter, of New York.

SOCIAL SCIENCES

Dr. C. Wright Mills, associate professor of sociology, University of Maryland.

Dr. Leonid Hurwicz, economist, of Chicago.

MUSIC LIBRARIES

Richard Sloane Angell, assistant professor of library service and music librarain, Columbia University.

NAVIGATION

Dr. Samuel Herrick, assistant professor of astronomy, University of California, Los Angeles.

MATHEMATICS

Dr. Paul Erdos, of Ann Arbor, Mich.

The following four Canadians were among those receiving civilian fellowships this year:

Dr. Mabel Frances Timlin, assistant professor of economics, University of Saskatchewan, Saskatoon, Sask., who plans a study of the development of welfare economics in the period following 1929 to approximately 1945.

Louis Alexander MacKay, associate professor of classics, University of British Columbia, Vancouver, B. C., who plans a study of the structure and compositon of Homer's "Iliad."

Dr. Roger Yate Stanier, penicillin production manager for Merck & Co., Ltd., Montreal, who plans studios on the nature, relationships and biological activities of bacteria, particularly of the myxobacteria.

Dr. Johannes F. K. Holtfreter, department of genetics, McGill University, who plans investigations of the causal factors involved in the embryonic development of vertebrates.

The committee which selected the fellows to be honored this year was made up of Dr. Frank Aydelotte, director of the Institute for Advanced Study, Princeton, N. J., chairman; Dr. Florence R. Sabin, of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research; Professor Edwin Bidwell Wilson, of the Harvard University School of Public Health; Professor Linus Pauling, of the California Institute of Technology, and Professor Wallace Notestein, of Yale University.

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony Constitutes Final Program

Monitor   April 28

By L. A. Sloper

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closes its sixty-fourth season with this week's pair of concerts, for which Beethoven's Ninth Symphony constitutes the program. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky completes with tonight's concert his twenty-first year as musical director. His continuance in the post next fall has been announced.

Under his supervision the orchestra remains at its peak of technical virtuosity and eloquence of expression. The programs still range freely over the classical repertory and the field of modernism. If there seems to be less excitement about them, on the average, that may be because less of exciting experiment has been carried on by composers in recent years, and because what used to seem daring now seems commonplace. The idioms which once startled us by their novelty now cannot hold our interest unless there is a real creative impulse behind their use.

* * *

Of a total of 80 works performed, seven were played for the first time anywhere, 11 for the first time "at these concerts." Of the first group, David Diamond's Second Symphony and Schönberg's Theme and Variations for Orchestra left the strongest impression, though Hill's Music for English Horn and Orchestra and Lopatnikoff's Concertino for Orchestra were agreeable.

Of the works played for the first time by this orchestra the most substantial was Hindemith's Theme and Variations According to the Four Temperaments, which was introduced by Richard Burgin, the associate conductor. Scholarship, imagination, emotion and even humor are reflected in the score, which is notable for musical content and design.

Several of this group of works had been inspired by the war: Still's "In Memoriam: the Colored Soldiers Who Died for Democracy"; Schuman's "Prayer in Time of War," and Thompson's "Testament of Freedom." They all seemed to me more remarkable for their sincerity of emotion than for their strictly musical qualities.

* * *

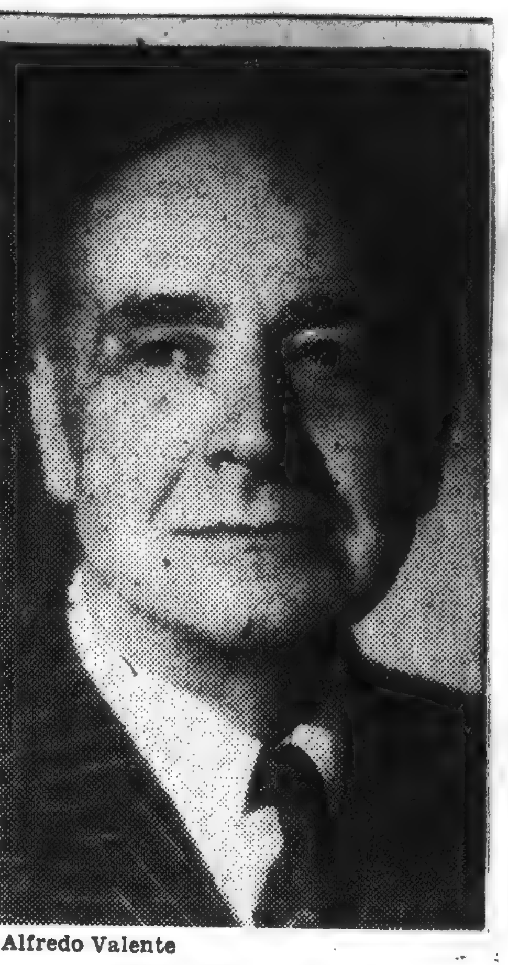
Strange names to see among the composers of works new to the Boston orchestra were those of Mozart (the Overtures to "Idomeneo" and "Der Schauspieldirektor") and Schumann (Symphony No. 2 in B flat).

Of the standard repertory the distribution of choice among the masters was fairly orthodox: Mozart, 6; Beethoven, 5; Brahms and Ravel, four each. Seldom heard works included Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony, and Mahler's Fourth Symphony (introduced by Mr. Burgin for its first complete performance in Boston). Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," neglected here for many years, had its third performance in four seasons.

Guest conductors included Leonard Bernstein, Dmitri Mitropoulos, George Szell and Heitor Villa-Lobos. All were well received, and Mr. Villa-Lobos attracted much attention because of the three compositions of his own which he offered.

In the final program of the season the orchestra was assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, and by Valentina Vishnevska, soprano; Jean Watson, contralto; William Hain, tenor, and Robert Hall Collins, bass.

It is always an exciting experience to hear Dr. Koussevitzky's intensely dramatic reading of the Ninth, especially when the orchestra is assisted by the eager voices of the undergraduate choruses and by such an exceptionally well-balanced quartet as was heard on this occasion. Mr. Collins' recitative was delivered with a fine authority, and Mr. Hains sang his solo effectively. The two ladies brought musical feeling to their contributions. Miss Vishnevska confirmed the good impression she had made earlier. Miss Watson has a voice of notable beauty.



Alfredo Valente

Serge Koussevitzky
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who was greeted on Friday by a standing audience and orchestra, received at the end of the concert an ovation which he shared generously with his collaborators.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

APR 29 1945

Off the Records

By Fredson Bowers

FOR the first of its new recordings, the Boston Symphony has chosen to issue with Victor a five-record set of the little-known Berlioz work "Harold in Italy" a symphony with solo viola played by the virtuoso Primrose (VM-989). Obviously suggested by Byron's poem, "Childe Harold," Berlioz has written a form of picture symphony, with viola part which was first intended for Paganini. The first movement is entitled "Harold in the Mountains." It features a melancholy, rather obvious theme which is heard in modified form in later movements, like the Beloved Theme in the Fantastic Symphony. There is much animation, however, representing Harold the Byronic exile torn between fiery emotions of grief, pride and resentment. The second movement, "The Procession of the Pilgrims," represents a marching band appearing and trailing off in the distance singing a haunting medieval hymn. In the third movement, "Serenade," a mountaineer serenades his love with a lovely but rather obvious theme, which becomes ingeniously intermingled with the Harold theme. In the finale, "Orgy of Brigands," there is much brilliance and again an expert intermingling of themes.

This cannot be said to be great music (but then I have a blind spot where Berlioz is concerned), but it will certainly please all who want tuneful, easily comprehended music wonderfully orchestrated and telling a story. Koussevitsky's conducting has all his usual magic, and Primrose gives a telling performance of the viola part. The new recording represents a great stride forward over previous Boston records. There is now a good firm bass in sufficient balance, and the famous Boston strings can now be heard in their real purity. The balance and the full body of the recording is superb and makes one look forward eagerly to further new Boston albums. If one were to be captious, one could say that there is a trifle too much hall echo which has the effect of slightly muddying the music after a crescendo, but this seems to be the present fashion and is liked by many as promoting realism. It is to be hoped that this tendency will not be carried to extremes.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Apr. 28
Post

This week's Symphony program, which brings to a close the orchestra's 64th season, consists of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, that and nothing more. This evening's concert, by the way, begins at 8:10, and at 8:30 the Scherzo, Adagio and choral finale will go on the air to fill the hour-long broadcast. But for this complication some other number might have preceded the Ninth. There is nothing that could very well follow it.

On April 8 last the Ninth Symphony was performed in a special concert in aid of the Red Cross. The chorus then, as in the current performances, was made up of the combined forces of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. In the Red Cross concert the solo singers came from the Metropolitan Opera Company. In these performances they are Valentina Vishnevska, soprano; Jean Watson, contralto; William Hain, tenor, and Robert Hall Collins, bass. Mr. Hain and Mr. Collins, upon whom fell the heaviest burden, performed their respective tasks yesterday with complete adequacy. The blending of the four voices in the two quartets was satisfactory. Mr. Woodworth's singers, excellent before, were, if anything, better than before.

When Ernest Newman came to Boston in 1927 to deliver an address at the Symphony Orchestra's Beethoven celebration he privately praised the orchestra in the highest terms but regarding the chorus he said: "In England we are used to hearing men and women." He might have felt yesterday that the collegiate voices lacked a little in ripeness and solidity, but he hardly could have failed to respond to their enthusiasm.

ANNISTON, ALA.
STAR

APR 27 1945

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will conclude their current season's activities over the Blue and WHMA tomorrow night at 7:30 o'clock with the playing of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. In the Beethoven score, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, both conducted by G. Wallace Woodworth, will provide the chorus for Dr. Koussevitsky. Soloists for the evening will be Valentina Vishnevska, soprano, Jean Watson, alto, William Hain, tenor, and Robert Hall Collins, baritone. The college choral societies first performed the Beethoven work with the Boston Symphony in 1924, Dr. Koussevitsky's first year with the orchestra.

Edward Tomlinson will have as his guest Dr. Ezequiel Padilla, Mexican foreign minister and president of the recent inter-American conference in Mexico on his tomorrow afternoon program at 5:30 o'clock.

The Spotlight Band program will open tonight at 8:30 with four minutes of San Francisco conference news by the commentator David Wills and then will feature Tommy Dorsey's orchestra playing from Rhoads General Hospital, Utica, New York. Tomorrow night, in addition to conference news, Ray Baudac's orchestra will be heard.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 30 1945

Boston Orchestra Season Ends

BOSTON, April 29 (AP)—Symphony Hall was the scene of eighteen musical "world premieres" this year, Serge Koussevitzky, director, announced yesterday as the Boston Symphony Orchestra finished its season. "Seven of these first-performed works were by American composers," said the conductor, who now has completed twenty-one years with the orchestra.

[88]

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

APR 29 1945

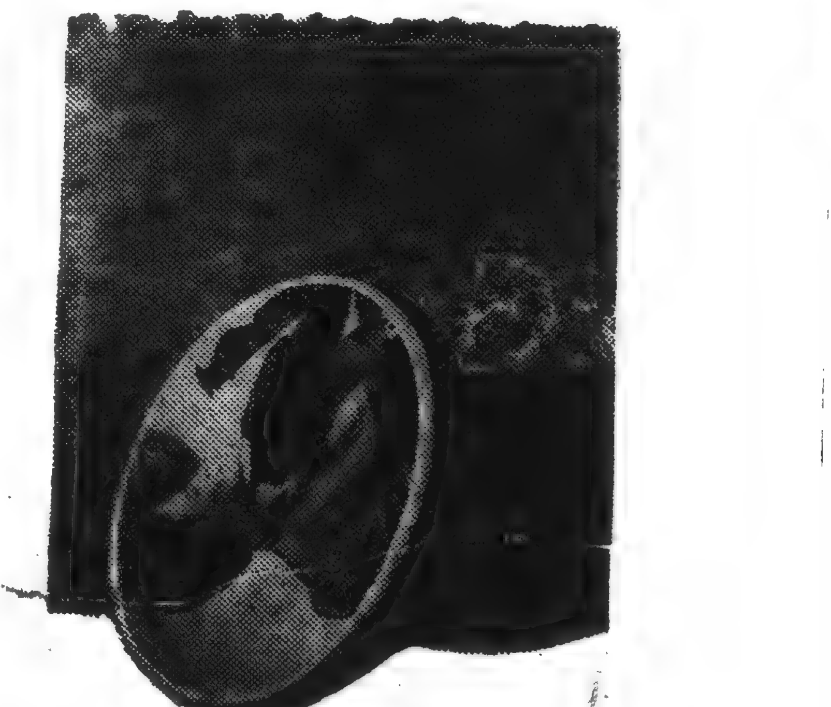
The World of MUSIC

by Edward P. Halline

IN MOST tragedies the hero dies in the last act. In Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, the hero's funeral march is the second movement. He is dead before half of the symphony is finished. Logically a funeral march would be the concluding event, but Beethoven continues for two more movements, thereby upsetting those who live by logic alone and giving the world one of the greatest of all epic poems.

The "Eroica" is magnificent any time. It never is more magnificent than when it is played in the middle of historic days. For the music of Beethoven has the gallantry and courage which always have stirred the hearts of men. It has that humane spirit, that vision of better worlds ahead, which has fired men's imaginations in every age.

In the "Eroica," more than in any other music, you sense that eternal driving force, that divine discontent, which whips the human race out of its lethargy and has it scaling the battlements of the heavens and the horizons which lie just beyond.



Napoleon inspired the "Eroica," but, alas, he couldn't match the music. Perhaps, if he had heard it, he might have been moved to translate his power into something approaching the ideals that beset the soul of the poor, deaf composer, Ludwig van Beethoven.

The "Eroica" never was more stirring than when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it over the radio the other night. Without blustering, the first movement sent its challenging cries through eternity. The funeral march laid its wreaths and asked resounding questions of God. The scherzo sounded its hunting horns, sad and yet exultant, the finale propounded musical riddles, solved them deftly and then thundered onward.

Death was not the stopping point. There was a pause while the hero was saluted and the music moved on.

It was eminently fitting that the "Eroica" should be played after a President of the United States had died in the midst of his fight to realize the dream of Ludwig van Beethoven. It is not often that men are of that caliber, or that the days befit the music. When that happens, the "Eroica" streams through the heavens with all the majesty of these awe inspiring figures of Revelation. The heroes it sings are mortal, but the music is deathless.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

APR 29 1945

18 'PREMIERES' BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony Director Boasts That Seven Scores Were Written by American Composers

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston, April 28—(AP)—Symphony hall was the scene of 18 musical "world premieres" this year, Boston Symphony Director Serge Koussevitzky announced today as the orchestra finished its season.

"And seven of these first-performed works were by American composers," said the Russian-born conductor who tonight concludes 21 years with the orchestra.

Koussevitzky is more proud of his adopted countrymen's musical prowess than anything else the orchestra has accomplished under his direction.

If all the young American composers helped to a hearing by "Koussy" were gathered together—they'd give him a testimonial banquet.

They did, too, some months ago in New York. And there were so many milling around the Boston conductor couldn't count them.

"But it was a formidable list," he declared. "I don't believe any other country has produced so many in such a space of time."

Although his tenure of office falls just short of Leopold Stokowski's 22 years as conductor of the Philadelphia orchestra, the 70-year-old Koussevitzky is stripling-slim and bubbling over with postwar plans.

"I hope to see every state with its own symphony orchestra," said Boston's long-term batoneer, who recently suggested a 50-cents-a-year income tax supplement for government-supported music.

Proud of the fact that more than a third of the musicians he first directed in 1924 are still with him, Koussevitzky said: "Many have had offers from other American orchestras, but where would they find such audiences as Boston has?"

GREENSBORO, N. C.
NEWS

APR 29 1945

THIS WEEK ON WAX

probably acts accordingly.—W.

HAROLD IN ITALY by Hector Berlioz. Performed by William Primrose, violinist, with the Boston Symphony [illegible] directed by Serge Koussevitzky. Victor album (989—10 sides).

This ambitious piece of program literature is Victor's first major release since the record ban was dissolved. It merits considerable attention.

Berlioz wrote "Harold In Italy" at the request of Pagannini himself, who wanted a solo piece to perform in public on an exquisite Stradivarius viola he had acquired. Though declaring himself thrilled to the core with the finished work, the string virtuoso for some reason never played the music written for him.

The composer thus explained the titling: "I wished to put the viola in the midst of poetic recollections left me by my wanderings in the Abruzzi and make it a sort of melancholy dreamer after the manner of Bryon's Childe Harold."

He borrowed no more than the name and the idea from Bryon, labeled the four movements with programmatic titles and created the Italian scenes with an impressionistic treatment forerunning modern musical methods.

Movements are named as follows: "Harold in the Mountains, Scenes of Melancholy, Happiness and Joy"; "March of Pilgrims Singing Their Evening Hymn"; "Serenade of a Mountaineer of the Abruzzi to His Mistress"; "Orgy of Brigands, Recollections of the Preceding Scenes."

Violist William Primrose gives an admirable performance of the solo part, the effect of which is endowed with greater interest through only sporadic use of the instrument. Effulgent orchestration builds striking backgrounds for the intermittent viola parts.

Victor has celebrated the advent of this unusual release by giving its five records one of the most attractive pictorial album covers yet brought out.—D. M. P.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, tight-lipped conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony, denying rumors that he would replace Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony, playfully started a rumor of his own: "I am [illegible] conduct a symphony . . . in th[illegible] ans, and Koussevitzky is going to [illegible]

OSTON POPS ORCHESTRA BEGINS 60TH YEAR—(left)—Arthur Fiedler will celebrate his 16th season as conductor of the Pops when the orchestra opens its 60th year tom ow night at Symphony Hall. (Center)—Playing to a packed house each night, the Pops draws crowds who sit at tableson the floor and eat, drink an dsmoke during the prog (Right) Only woman member of the Pops orchestra is Anne de Gunchard of 922 Hyde Park avenue. Hyde Park, who plays second bassoon.

April 30

Trav.

SENTINEL

APR 29 1945

The World of MUSIC

by Edward P. Halline

IN MOST tragedies the hero dies in the last act. In Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, the hero's funeral march is the second movement. He is dead before half of the symphony is finished. Logically a funeral march would be the concluding event, but Beethoven continues for two more movements, thereby upsetting those who live by logic alone and giving the world one of the greatest of all epic poems.

The "Eroica" is magnificent any time. It never is more magnificent than when it is played in the middle of historic days. For the music of Beethoven has the gallantry and courage which always have stirred the hearts of men. It has that humane spirit, that vision of better worlds ahead, which has fired men's imaginations in every age.

In the "Eroica," more than in any other music, you sense that eternal driving force, that divine discontent, which whips the human race out of its lethargy and has it scaling the battlements of the heavens and the horizons which lie just beyond.

Napoleon inspired the "Eroica," but, alas, he couldn't match the music. Perhaps, if he had heard it, he might have been moved to translate his power into something approaching the ideals that beset the soul of the poor, deaf composer, Ludwig van Beethoven.

The "Eroica" never was more stirring than when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it over the radio the other night. Without blustering, the first movement sent its challenging cries through eternity. The funeral march laid its wreaths and asked resounding questions of God. The scherzo sounded its hunting horns, sad and yet exultant, the finale propounded musical riddles, solved these deftly and then thundered onward.

Death was not the stopping point. There was a pause while the hero was saluted and the music moved on.

It was eminently fitting that the "Eroica" should be played after a President of the United States had died in the midst of his fight to realize the dream of Ludwig van Beethoven. It is not often that men are of that caliber, or that the days befit the music. When that happens, the "Eroica" streams through the heavens with all the majesty of these awe inspiring figures of Revelation. The heroes it sings are mortal, but the music is deathless.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

APR 29 1945

18 'PREMIERES' BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Symphony Director Boasts That Seven Scores Were Written by American Composers

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston, April 28—(AP)—Symphony hall was the scene of 18 musical "world premieres" this year, Boston Symphony Director Serge Koussevitzky announced today as t[illegible]estra finished its season.

"And seven of these first-performed works were by American composers," said the Russian-born conductor who tonight concludes 21 years with the orchestra.

Koussevitzky is more proud of his adopted countrymen's musical prowess than anything else the orchestra has accomplished under his direction.

If all the young American composers helped to a hearing by "Koussy" were gathered together—they'd give him a testimonial banquet.

They did, too, some months ago in New York. And there were so many milling around the Boston conductor couldn't count them.

"But it was a formidable list," he declared. "I don't believe any other country has produced so many in such a space of time."

Although his tenure of office falls just short of Leopold Stokowski's 22 years as conductor of the Philadelphia orchestra, the 70-year-old Koussevitzky is stripling-slim and bubbling over with postwar plans.

"I hope to see every state with its own symphony orchestra," said Boston's long-term batoneer, who recently suggested a 50-cents-a-year income tax supplement for government-supported music.

Proud of the fact that more than a third of the musicians he first directed in 1924 are still with him, Koussevitzky said: "Many have had offers from other American orchestras, but where would they find such audiences as Boston has?"

GREENSBORO, N. C.
NEWS

APR 29 1945

THIS WEEK ON WAX

probably acts accordingly.—W.

HAROLD IN ITALY by Hector Berlioz. [illegible]ed by William Pri[illegible]inist, with the Bo[illegible]ony orchestra [illegible]ction of Serge Kouss[illegible]. Victor album (989—10 sides).

This ambitious piece of program literature is Victor's first major release since the record ban was dissolved. It merits considerable attention.

Berlioz wrote "Harold In Italy" at the request of Pagannini himself, who wanted a solo piece to perform in public on an exquisite Stradivarius viola he had acquired. Though declaring himself thrilled to the core with the finished work, the string virtuoso for some reason never played the music written for him.

The composer thus explained the titling: "I wished to put the viola in the midst of poetic recollections left me by my wanderings in the Abruzzi and make it a sort of melancholy dreamer after the manner of Bryon's Childe Harold."

He borrowed no more than the name and the idea from Bryon, labeled the four movements with programmatic titles and created the Italian scenes with an impressionistic treatment forerunning modern musical methods.

Movements are named as follows: "Harold in the Mountains, Scenes of Melancholy, Happiness and Joy"; "March of Pilgrims Singing Their Evening Hymn"; "Serenade of a Mountaineer of the Abruzzi to His Mistress"; "Orgy of Brigands, Recollections of the Preceding Scenes."

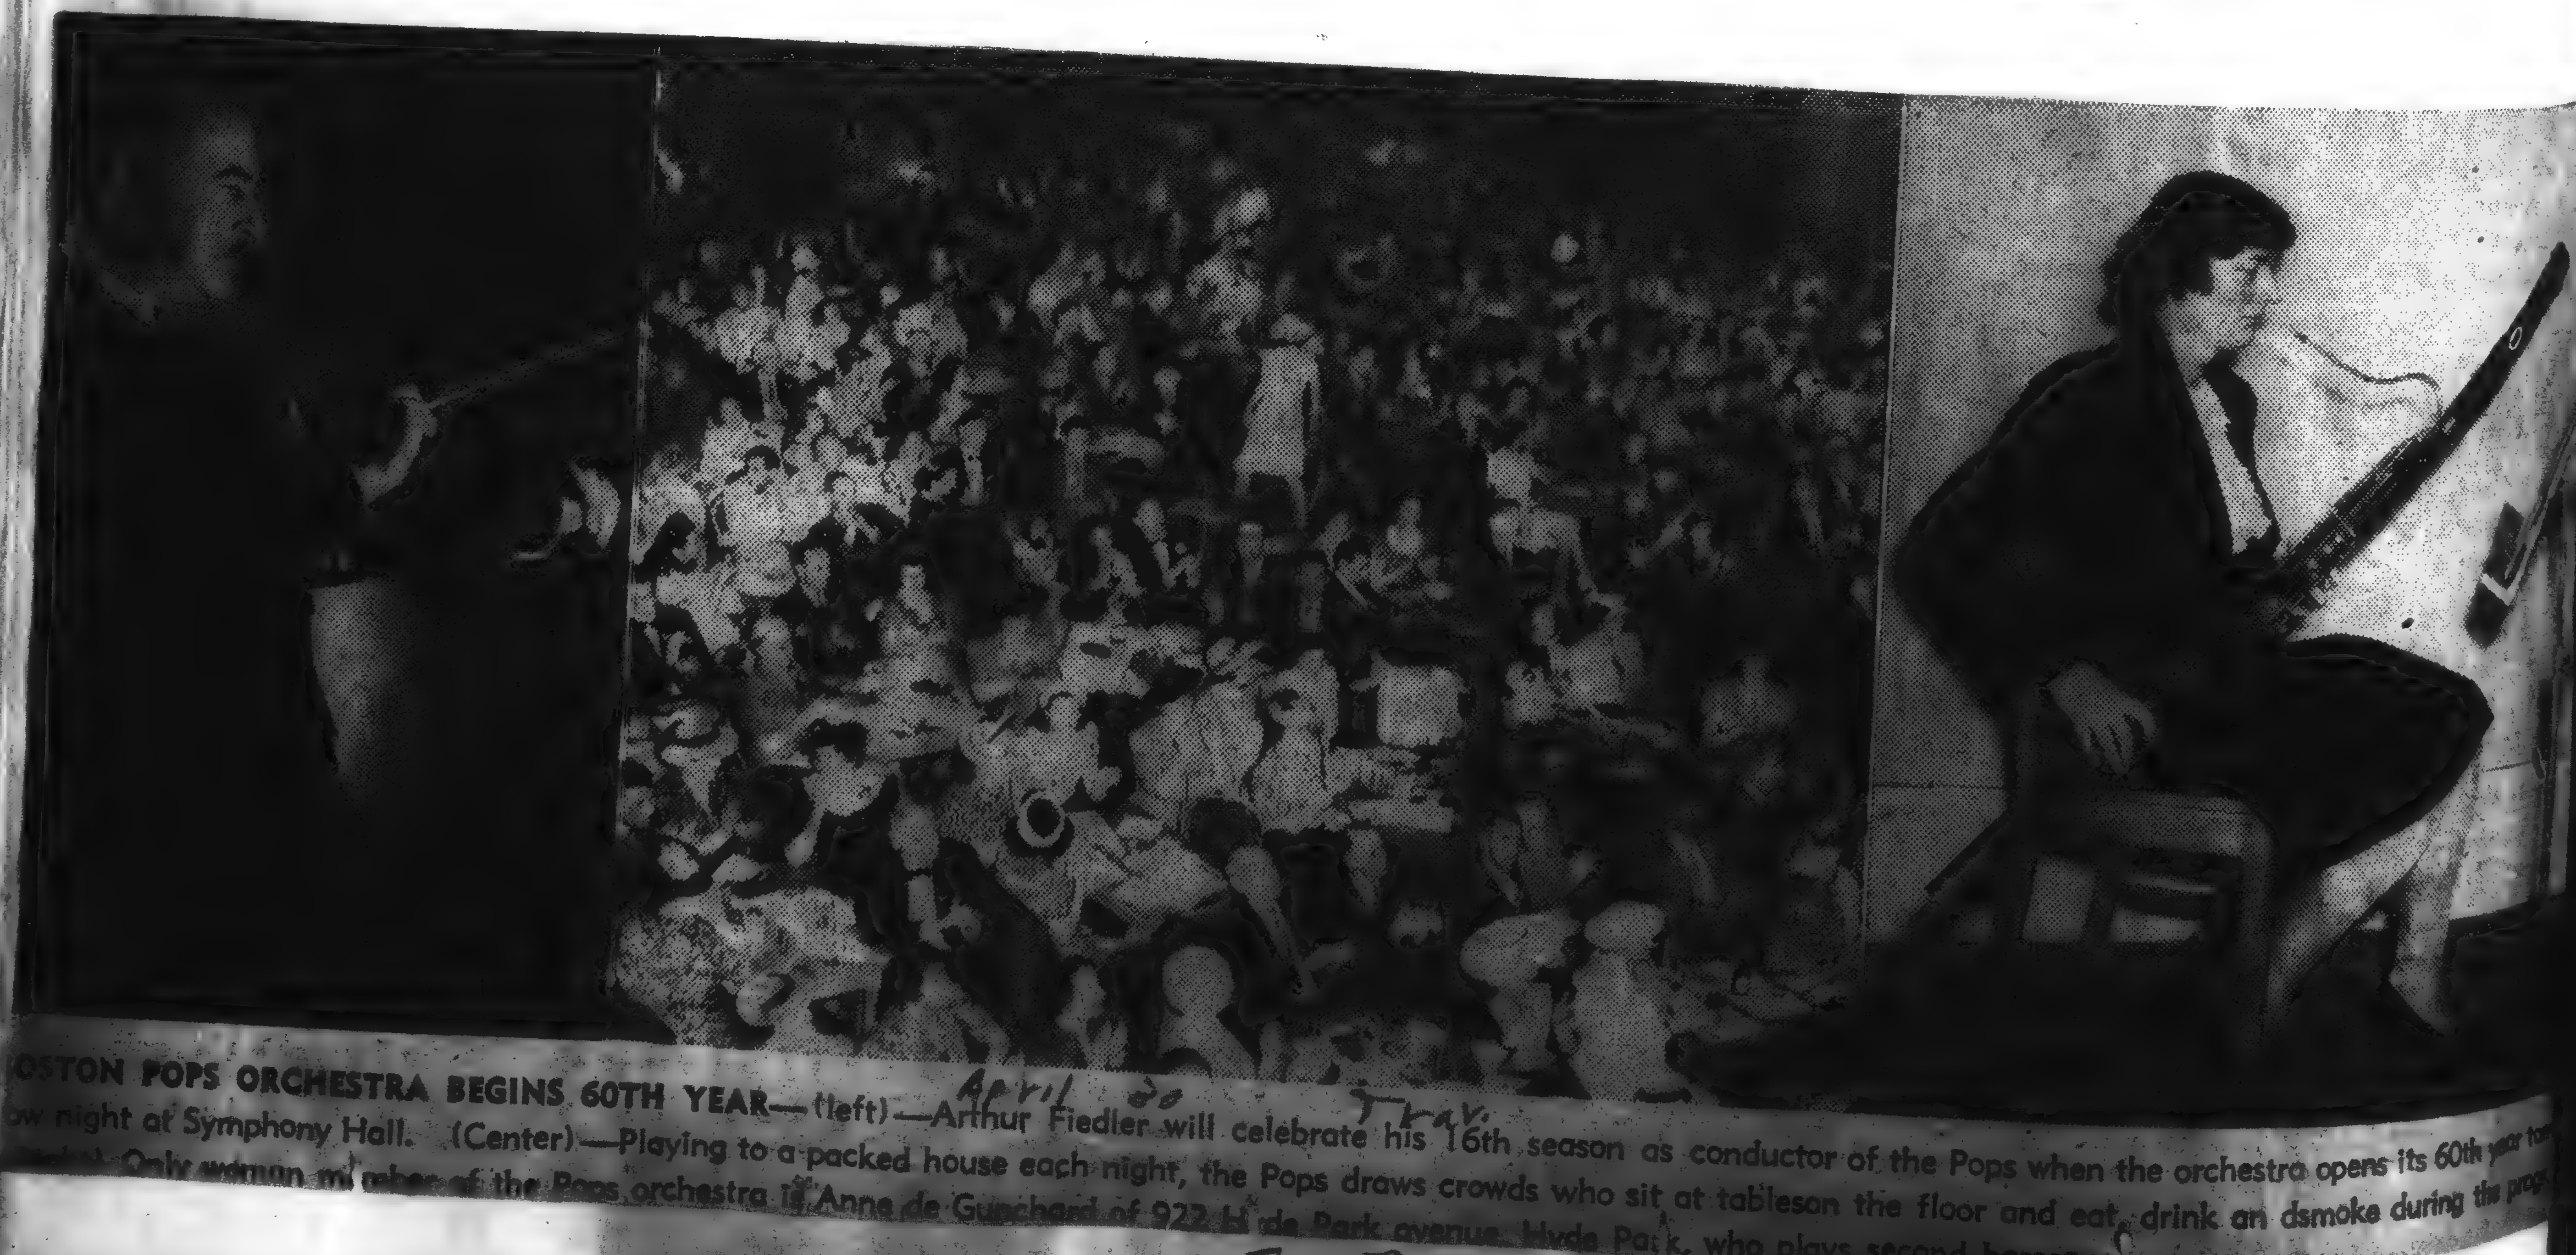
Violist William Primrose gives an admirable performance of the solo part, the effect of which is endowed with greater interest through only sporadic use of the instrument. Effulgent orchestration builds striking backgrounds for the intermittent viola parts.

Victor has celebrated the advent of this unusual release by giving its five records one of the most attractive pictorial album covers yet brought out.—D. M. P.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

APR 30 1945

Dimitri Mitropoulos, tight-lipped conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony, denying rumors that he would replace Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony, playfully started a rumor of his own: "I am going to conduct a symphony . . . in the Aleutians, and Koussevitzky is going to Berlin."



OSTON POPS ORCHESTRA BEGINS 60TH YEAR—(left)—Arthur Fiedler will celebrate his 16th season as conductor of the Pops when the orchestra opens its 60th year tom ow night at Symphony Hall. (Center)—Playing to a packed house each night, the Pops draws crowds who sit at tableson the floor and eat, drink an dsmoke during the prog
Only woman member of the Pops orchestra is Anne de Guichard of 922 Hyde Park avenue, Hyde Park, who plays second bassoon.

April 30
Trav.

DURHAM, N. C.
HERALD-SUN

APR 45

The Realm Of Music

ON THE AIR

An invitation which is issued and gratefully received by millions of Americans is the one extended by the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Company to radio listeners when they present the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the air, under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, each week. This hour's concert by America's foremost orchestra is one program that comes to us minus all the usual radio production trimmings. It isn't cluttered up with the run-of-the-mine radio advertising, the music hasn't been "edited," and thus, listeners who are not present physically in Symphony Hall where it originates are brought figuratively into the same capacity subscription audience seated before the large group of musicians there.

Most radio productions have a "theme" announcing their presence on the air, and to mark the closing of their performance. But the Allis-Chalmers Company has taken great pains to eliminate these extra features in the presentation of the Boston Symphony. And what a relief, having no intermission feature added to destroy the mood the music has created! It makes a listener feel that he is really attending a concert by this famous symphony, hearing the music of the masters of yesterday and of leading contemporary composers, while seated comfortably in his own home, or home surroundings. One can almost see the distinguished Dr. Koussevitsky, his clearly-defined features and white hair, as he lifts the baton, as he continues to direct the concert.

There are three men appointed to see that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is heard in its weekly radio concert exactly as it is heard in Symphony Hall in Boston. They are Gene Hamilton, who announces; Oliver Daniel, producer; and Arthur Austin, supervisor for the sponsor's representative. They are musicians themselves, trained in radio, who work with a number of radio engineers to bring the music of the orchestra to the air. Frequently, when a musical program is broadcast, the seating of the orchestra is changed to meet the demands of the microphone. Not so with the Boston Symphony. It is seated exactly as it plays at its regular concerts. And Mr. Hamilton, a veteran in the field of radio, spends a large part of each week in New York, planning for the broadcast, with particular attention to the timing of numbers and arranging the announcer's script. Mr. Daniel and Mr. Austin attend the Thursday rehearsal of the orchestra in Symphony Hall. They adjust the microphone if a chorus or a soloist is to participate. This is done during the rehearsal intermission. Ordinarily, one microphone is suspended over the wood-winds and the other, an over-all microphone, is suspended in the front part of the auditorium.

Symphony Hall was built in 1901, long before broadcasting was ever dreamed of. Yet, the acoustics, according to Daniel, are perfect. The Hall is designed after the Gewandhaus in Leipsig, and Mr. Daniel describes it as "bright" in technical language. On his first visit there, he discovered that the over-all microphone was placed too far out in the auditorium over the audience, and that the "bright" quality caused an echo. The "mike" was immediately brought to a position closer to the orchestra, and the echo was eliminated.

When the regular Friday concert is presented there, Daniel and Austin are both seated in the sound booth from which the Saturday radio broadcast is controlled. Through the small window that looks down upon the orchestra, they listen to the music of this program as it comes to them through the microphones, "monitoring" it for the proper sound levels, tone quality and timing, in order to use the same music on the Saturday radio program. It is important in the timing to mark the score carefully, so that "waits" between movements of a suite, concerto or symphony may be taken into consideration.

On Saturday morning, Hamilton joins Austin and Daniel in Boston, to make final plans, and to make adjustments in script to conform to the timing noted on Daniel's score. Early Saturday evening the three men take their positions for the broadcast; Daniel and Austin in the control booth with the network's control-room engineer; Hamilton in a separate sound-proof announcer's booth adjoining the control room. A system of buzzers conveys to Hamilton any message from the other two. As the time approaches, Daniel takes his master script which is a complete synopsis of music cues, timing, pauses and other details. He signals Hamilton; He signals for the timing of the house lights. With the latter, Dr. Koussevitsky knows it is time to make his entrance. And the applause greeting him as he moves to the podium tells the invisible audience that another Boston Symphony broadcast is underway.

But the job isn't over when the final notes are played. The following Monday in New York, a meeting is held. A recording of the concert is played. Technical problems are discussed; the events of the concert come in for a thorough round-up. There is but one thought in the minds of all the persons attending this meeting, and that is, how they may be able to make it a better concert the next week. To most of us who listen in over the radio, who are benefitted by the beauty and inspiration of the program, there is little thought of what goes on beyond the group of musicians and their conductor, Dr. Koussevitsky.

Herald MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL May 2

The Pops

Last night at Symphony Hall, Arthur Fiedler conducted the opening concert of the 60th season of the Boston Pops; there was a capacity audience present and the program was as follows:

"Semper Fidelis," March ....Sousa
Overture to "Die Flodermaus" ....Straus
Toccata ....Frescobaldi-Kindler
The Ride of the Valkries........Wagner
"Roses from the South," Waltzes Strauss
Danza Piemontese No. 1.......Sinigalia
Gaite Parisienne..............Offenbach
"Going Bing's Way"
"Hawaiian War Chant"
"Salute to Our Fighting Forces".

By ELINOR HUGHES

Whatever the calendar may have to say about it, not to say the weatherman, summer is just around the corner when the Pops begin, and last night the customary capacity crowd was definite present at Symphony Hall when Arthur Fiedler raised his baton to open the 60th season of these famous concerts with Sousa's "Semper Fidelis." It was, naturally, a very festive and much-as-expected sort of evening, with Strauss, Offenbach, Wagner and Bing Crosby dividing up the program, an audience in the mood to enjoy everything, including a Frescobaldi Toccata, but most particularly anything suggestive of dance music. The music was tried and true, the refreshments well up to par, and the only observable novelty was the new cover to the Pops program, designed by Alajalov and emphasizing the fact that these concerts, thanks to the Saturday night broadcasts, are now a matter for world-wide rather than merely for local enjoyment.

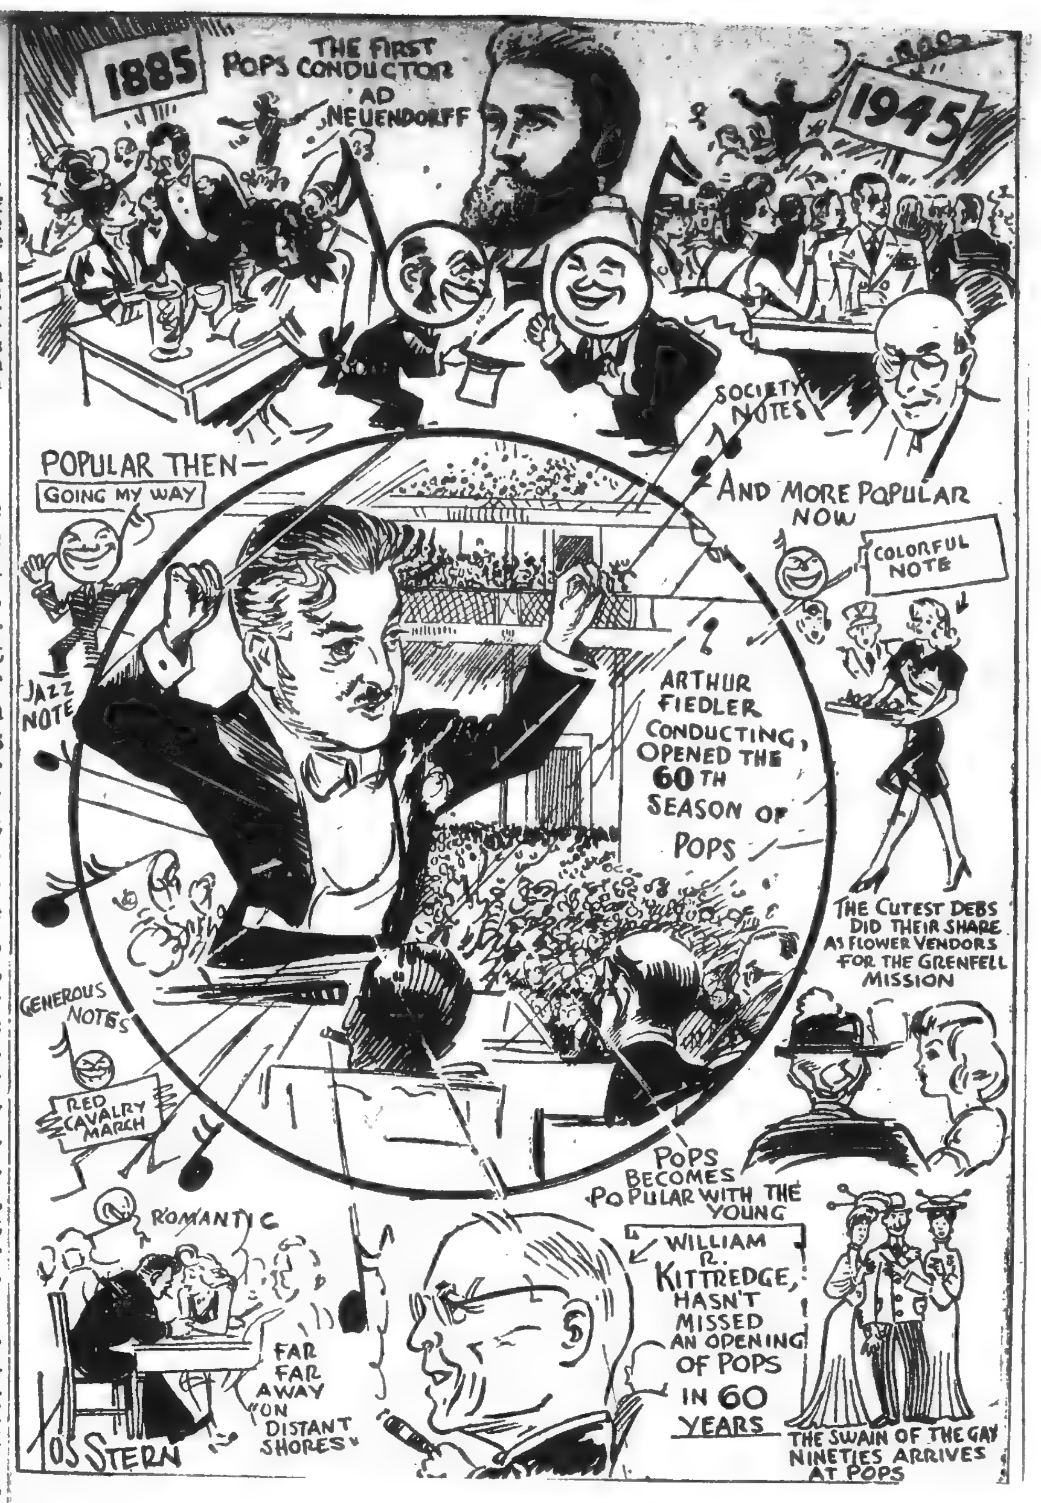
The occasion was one for celebration on a good many counts—the evening paper's headlines being one of them—for 660 years is a long time for a musical institution of this sort to endure, and 16 years is, by a wide margin, the longest period that any man has conducted the Pops. So it should be a year of special celebration for Arthur Fiedler as well as for the Pops orchestra, and last night the musicians played as though they fully realized that fact and were making the most of it.

The Strauss waltzes had the audience practically dancing in its seats, and "Gaite Parisienne" recalled recent and pleasant impressions of the Monte Carlo Ballet. New to the program this season was "Going Bing's Way," an arrangement of songs from two popular Bing Crosby pictures, which the indefatigable Bodge has arranged with such success that it will undoubtedly become a standby. Encores, naturally, were numerous, with the rhumba, "Tico Tico," proving so well liked that it had to be repeated. (Query: why not a waltz and rhumba night in Symphony Hall with the Pops Orchestra officiating?) The program ended with the always popular "Salute to Our Fighting Forces," members of which were present and definitely appreciative.

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Starting this evening at 8:30, Arthur Fiedler will conduct an orchestra of 85 Boston Symphony players in the second concert of the Pops' 60th year. The program will be as follows:

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg from "Tannhauser" ....Wagner
"Romeo and Juliet," Overture-Fantasy ....Tchaikovsky
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ....Mendelssohn
Hungarian Dance No. 5..........Brahms
"Tales from the Vienna Woods." Waltzes ....Strauss
"Spring," for Strings..............Grieg



1885
THE FIRST POPS CONDUCTOR AD NEUENDORFF
1945 SOCIETY NOTES AND MORE POPULAR NOW COLORFUL NOTE
POPULAR THEN—GOING MY WAY
JAZZ NOTE
ARTHUR FIEDLER CONDUCTING, OPENED THE 60TH SEASON OF POPS
THE CUTEST DEBS DID THEIR SHARE AS FLOWER VENDORS FOR THE GRENFELL MISSION GENEROUS NOTES
RED CAVALRY MARCH
POPS BECOMES POPULAR WITH THE YOUNG ROMANTIC
WILLIAM R. KITTREDGE, HASN'T MISSED AN OPENING OF POPS IN 60 YEARS FAR FAR AWAY ON DISTANT SHORES
THE SWAIN OF THE GAY NINETIES ARRIVES AT POPS OS STERN

'POPS' OPENS 60TH SEASON

Post May 2

Symphony Hall Filled for Initial Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Last evening the Symphony Hall Pop Concerts were successfully launched upon their 60th season, while at the same time Arthur Fiedler began his 16th as their conductor. The opening night of the Pops is hardly the formal affair that once it was, and the weatherman failed to contribute the proper spring-like atmosphere, but thees were matters of little moment. It was more important that the hall was filled with a contented, happy throng, as it will be every evening for weeks to come.

Other programs, tonight's for example, will have a more classical flavor than that of last evening, when the accent was on gaiety and good humor, whether Viennese, by way of Strauss "Fledermaus" Overture and "Roses From the South" waltzes, French, through an Offenbach medley ("Gaite Parisienne"), or American. This native note was sounded in a Bing Crosby potpourri, "Going Bing's Way," the newly popular "Tico-Tico," played as an encore, and the almost inevitable "Salute to Our Fighting Forces." This last classification should also include the opening number, Sousa's "Semper Fidelis" march.

As for the more substantial music, there was the Frescobaldi-Kindler Toccata, introduced last season; Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries," and an attractive "Danza Piemontese" by Sinigaglia. Somewhere in between was the one remaining number, an Hawaiian War Chant arranged by Peter Bodge, who likewise put together the Crosby melange. This was hardly a program to tax the Symphony men as they are taxed during the winter season. However, they were on the alert, one and all, and Mr. Fiedler, looking very fit, was his usual energetic self.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

APR 29 1945

Koussevitzky Ends 21 Years With Hub Symphony

BOSTON, April 28 (AP)—Symphony Hall was the scene of 18 musical "world premieres" this year, Boston Symphony Director Serge Koussevitzky announced today as the orchestra finished its season.

"And seven of these first-performed works were by American composers," said the Russian-born conductor who tonight concluded 21 years with the orchestra.

Koussevitzky is more proud of his adopted countrymen's musical prowess than anything else the orchestra has accomplished under his direction.

Proud of the fact that more than a third of the musicians he first directed in 1924 are still with him, Koussevitzky said: "Many have had offers from other American orchestras, but where would they find such audiences as Boston has?"

Arthur Fiedler Leads Pops Orchestra as 60th Season Opens

Globe May 2

By CYRUS DURGIN

The beginning of the 60th season of Pops at Symphony Hall last night was almost a fur-coat opening.

But no matter how chill and raw it was outside, Symphony Hall was warm with the glow of music and friendly conversation and refreshments. The stand where Arthur Fiedler will preside for his 16th season as conductor was banked with gladioli. The lower walls of the auditorium were tinted their Pops pastel green.

The rousing Sousa march, "Semper Fidelis," led off the opening night program, followed by Strauss' Overture to "Die Fledermaus," the Frescobaldi-Kindler Toccata and Wagner's "The Ride of the Valkyries." Hardly a night at the Pops fails to offer a Strauss Waltz; last night it was "Roses from the South." Then there were Sinigaglia's "Piedmontese Dance" No. 1, and Offenbach's "Gaite Parisienne" Suite.

Although no symphonic orchestra really can dig into the syncopations and the jazz swing of popular music, Mr. Fiedler is careful to keep up with the new developments of Tin Pan Alley and the soundtracks of Hollywood. New to the Pops lists is "Going Bing's Way," which really ought to have a baritone croon in "Ac-cen-tchu-ate the Positive," at least, to make it sound right. For windup, there were a couple more of the prolific Mr. Peter Bodge's arrangements, "Hawaiian War Chant" (which sounded more like a nice time on Waikiki Beach) and the resounding "Salute to Our Fighting Forces."

Apart from certain of the music, the only thing new about this year's Pops is that there are two main aisles between the tables instead of one.

Yet out in the lobby, a display of pictures and other objects—including a "God Bless Our Home" sign and a mustache cup—testified to the alterations which have taken place in the appearance of Pops audiences over the years. One thing that has not altered, however, is their enthusiasm. Pops-goers in 1945, it is safe to bet, are just as warm in their applause as their grammas and grandads were in the 1880's.

Herald

Opening of Pops' 60th Season Confirms Fact Spring Is Here

May 2

Boston's east wind may blow, but spring is here as irrevocably as the lilacs. For last night the 60th season of the Pops opened and every seat in Symphony Hall was filled. The Pops, born and bred in Boston, are exclusive to this city, which is as strict as any other about musical standards in the winter season. But when May arrives and the buds are bursting, the more serious music is put into summer storage as tenderly as one's very special fur coat. For gay colors and bright rhythms are in order.

The familiar peach colored gladioli made a festive fan in front of the orchestra as Arthur Fiedler lifted his baton to direct the stirring "Semper Fidelis" march, which opened the program. His attractive wife, the former Ellen Bottomley, sat with her mother, Mrs. John T. Bottomley, and her post-debutante sister, May, in their usual seats in the first balcony and applauded enthusiastically.

STRAUSS, OFFENBACH

There were Strauss waltzes as delicate as a spring breeze, and Offenbach's "Gaite Parisienne," which Bostonians have just heard at the ballet. And offerings from Bing Crosby's popular picture, "Going My Way," proved popular. Two small boys in the audience let out whoops of joy at "Accentuate the Positive" and beat time with gusto, and there were squeals of approval when "Tico Tico" was announced as an extra. The loudest applause came at the end when the medley was played including the "Halls of Montezuma," "Semper Paratus," the Army Air Corps song and "Anchors Aweigh." And it was difficult to tell which was received with the most enthusiasm.

As is the case with nearly every Pop Concert nowadays, blocks of seats were reserved for benefits. The New England Grenfell Association shared these with the alumnae association of the Beaver Country Day School last evening. And a group of attractive debutantes and post-debs sold corsages, maple sugar candies in the shape of Labrador dog teams, and picturesque Grenfell Christmas cards.

CHAIRMAN OF GROUP

Mrs. Peter Hayden Clark was chairman of this group and other pretty young matrons, many of them mothers of small children, but looking like girls of sixteen, were Mrs. David B. Arnold, Jr., Mrs. Arthur T. Lyman, Jr., Mrs. Edward B. Long, and Mrs. Warren D. Arnold, Jr.

Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, who headed the Grenfell committee, wore with her trim suit a tiny toque of flowers. With her were Mrs. A. W. K. Billings and Miss Gertrude Peabody, also members of the committee. Chatting together during an intermission were Mr. and Mrs. Augustus W. Soule, Mr. and Mrs. Rufus Hale and Major and Mrs. John Radford Abbot.

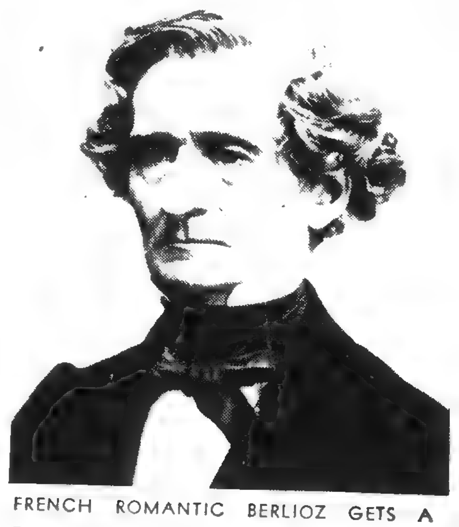
Wearing the hat of the evening, a Paris model of navy blue with a puffy crown and two deep red roses, was Mrs. Walter Merriam Pratt. Mr. Crosby Hodgman, headmaster of the Beaver Country Day School, attended with Mrs. Hodgman, and among the many others present were Mrs. Francis B. Lothrop, Mr. and Mrs. Atherton Loring, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Toppan, Mrs. J. Gardner Coolidge, 2d, Mrs. Basil Gavin, Mrs. Harold Sears, Mrs. John L. Grandin, Mr. and Mrs. Merrill Griswold, Mrs. Charles Collens, Mr. Delcevare King, Mr. Frederick Bowditch, Mrs. Frederic W. Mattheis, Mrs. John Alles, Mrs. Edward Harding, Mrs. M. Bernard Fox, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Townsend and Mrs. Robert G. Stone.

MADEMOISELLE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

MAY [illegible]

RECORDS By Colin McPhee

After five long years the Boston Symphony is heard once more on wax. Koussevitzky's first release is something to delight in, for he gives us the first complete recording of the Byronic symphony of Berlioz, Harold in Italy. For lovers of romantic music, and in particular, the dazzling and adventurous orchestra of Berlioz, this album is an absolute must. Byron's poem served only as a point of departure for Berlioz, and we may be astonished at the movements entitled Pilgrim's March or Orgy of the Brigands. But then, in his opera Faust, Berlioz thought nothing of whisking his hero off to Hungary for a scene, as an excuse to introduce a glittering orchestration of the national Rakóczy March. In the present work the moody Harold is portrayed by a solo viola, darker and richer in hue than the violin, and the whole is a sort of concerto or grand soliloquy. Strauss used this idea later in his orchestral poem Don Quixote, actually a tabloid opera for cello (Don Quixote) and viola (Sancho Panza). All this we accept as part of nineteenth-century music, certainly no stranger than Wagner's Ring. Berlioz' Harold is a major work by a great master; it has all the French genius for luminous, clarified sound (Victor, $5.78).



CULVER

FRENCH ROMANTIC BERLIOZ GETS A FINE KOUSSEVITZKY FIRST READING

In spite of surface noise and dated recording, I'll stick to my old Koussevitzky performance of Tchaikovsky's Pathétique, rather than the latest close-up version by Rodzinsky which Columbia has just released ($5.78). For warmth, tenderness and perfection of detail there is no comparison. Under Rodzinsky this sensitive music is given a brilliant but relentless third degree. Ormandy conducts the Philadelphia Orchestra in a vigorous, (Continued on page 245) straightforward reading of Beethoven's exuberant Seventh Symphony. The reading is a bit familiar and athletic for my taste, but the recording is excellent ($5.78). Victor reissues the famous Horowitz-Toscanini recording of the Brahms Second Piano Concerto. The orchestra, of course, is magnificent; but Horowitz' performance is fire without warmth and seems strangely lacking in the mystery and romantic glow that is sounded at the opening in the lovely solo for horn ($6.83). Lovers of the heldentenor will probably welcome the Melchior album, Scenes from Wagner Operas (Victor, $5.78), although the contents are all reissues, selected from past sets and single disks. My preference is for the duet from the second act of Tristan with Flagstad (four sides). The orchestra, however, is consistently suppressed in these recordings in a way that would never have been approved at Bayreuth.

It is with some relief that we turn from these towering masterpieces to more intimate music, such as the charming album of Bach Two-Part Inventions for piano (Asch $4.73). Erno Balogh plays these relaxed and abstract miniatures with a cool, impersonal clarity that is a pleasure to listen to. Charming, too, is the new album of music by Albeniz and Granados, played by Andrés Segovia, brilliant Spanish guitarist who interprets everything from Scarlatti to Stravinsky. The pieces in the present album are more or less salon music but Segovia's tone is velvet, and his style has great elegance and grace (Decca, $3.68). Heard after Segovia, Carlos Montoya's flamenco guitar sounds taut as a coiled spring. Montoya is a Spanish gypsy and his playing is both florid and rhythmically exciting. The new Asch album, however, will appeal more as music to be danced to rather than listened to, for the actual melodies are pretty undistinguished ($3.68).

BRAHMS: Symphony No. 4 in E Minor, Opus 98—Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra. [f] GM #7602. $5.77 (five 12" records in album) (C).

Before the appearance of this set, there were already two recordings of this work in the Columbia catalog, both of fairly recent date, one by Weingartner and the London Symphony orchestra, the other by Stokowski and the All American Orchestra. Two versions are listed in the "prun d" Victor catalog which normally lists four: the two currently available are by Walter and the BBC orchestra, and by Koussevitzky with the Boston. Ormandy gives a good performance which has been well recorded. Yet, three of the previous recordings have definite marks of distinction which must be taken into account when choosing between them

---

May 2

Pops To Feature Latin American Suite By Back Bay Composer

Keith Brown Writes Second Suite Following Last Year's Success Of "Bostonia" Another Pops First

Arthur Fiedler, who began his sixteenth season as conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra Tuesday evening, will raise his baton at another first performance of a suite by Keith Crosby Brown, Back Bay composer, at the eighth night Pops next Wednesday. In keeping with his purpose of introducing the work of contemporary American composers while keeping before the public the best-loved familiar works of the masters, Mr. Fiedler will introduce at next Wednesday's concert Keith Brown's "Latin American Suite," orchestrated by Jacobus Langendoen of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and dedicated to the Pan American Society of Boston and Northern New England.

Approximately enough, the evening of the opening performance will also be Mount Ida Night, as Mr. Brown heads the music department at this school. Mount Ida Night last year witnessed the successful introduction of Mr. Brown's "Bostonia Suite," which has since received many request performances by the Pops Odchestra and has been played by other symphonic groups. The following Wednesday, May 16 "On the Esplanade," the last movement of Bostonia, will be featured by the United States Navy Band at its annual spring concert in Constitutional Hall, Washington, D. C. This is a march in which familiar tunes from the repertory of Arthur Fiedler's concerts on the Esplanade are introduced by the composition.

The Latin American Suite is divided into three parts; "Green Skirt." (Fiesta), "Black Ochid,', (tango), and "Paprika," (rhumba). "Green Skirt" gives a musical picture of a dancer entertaining a crowd of people, opening in a gay fiesta tempo, followed by a languorous waltz and ending in a wild flourish of gaiety.

"Black Ochid" in a tango rhythm suggests a tropical night on the campas with a song of guachos riding along echoed by other groups in the distance. The celeste chimes notes of convent bells far off, and finally the full song of the tango breaks through with the full sweep of the orchestra.

"Paprika" is a lilting dance with a surprise ending after a wild outburst of rhythm and countermelodies.

The suite was written with the intention of strengthening the musical friendship between the Latin American nations and the United States. Two other compositions by Mr. Brown, "Manana," a tango, and "Quitana,' a bolero, have been performed previously by the Pops Orchestra.

Next in Br. Brown's plans is a Canadian Suite to be written in four movements. When this suite has been completed, Mr. Brown will have written a suite for each large division of the western hemisphere.

Other "firsts" announced by Mr. Fiedler for this Pops season are an arrangement of Crosby hits by Peter titled "Going Bing's Way"; a concerto by Dmitri Kabalevsky, a Russian composer, and the "American Concerto" by Lukas Foss, young pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Herald May 6

Tanglewood to Have Bach-Mozart Festival

A summer festival comprising music of Mozart and Johann Sebastian Bach is announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky at Tanglewood this summer. Dr. Koussevitzky will lead an orchestra of players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including all the principals. Famous soloists will assist at each concert. There will be six different programs, to be given on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 28-29, Aug. 4-5, Aug. 11-12. The soloists will be announced shortly.

Each program will contain music of both composers and will consist, from the music of Bach, of Brandenburg Concertos, orchestral suites and piano concertos. There will be several piano concertos by Mozart, the Concertante for Violin and Viola, the three final symphonies and other symphonies, divertimenti, serenades and "Night Music." Fuller details and subscription information, with address for mail orders, will be announced next week.

Globe May 7

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Pops Orchestra

Dimitri Kabalevsky's Second Concerto in G Minor for Piano was launched by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra last night, with Bernhard Weiser as soloist, in its first concert performance in America. For all the newness of the occasion, the idiom of the concerto had a familiar to it.

Reminiscent of Shostakovitch in the brisk and beguiling rhythms of the first movement, the concerto proceeds with echoes of Rachmaninoff and Tschaikovsky. The concerto displays its scheme as openly as a film score, reepats its themes for the benefit of listeners caught unawares as the introductionless allegro began, and affords the soloist several dramatic moments.

Bernhard Weiser made the most of the contrasts between major and minor phrases and the orchestra followed the thin outlines of the score with gusto.

Friends of the South End Music School, the sponsoring agency which Lt. Gov. Robert F. Bradford described as "one of the littlest of Boston's organizations with one of the biggest ideas, "heard a highly eclectic program. There was Rimsky-Korsakov's colorful Wedding March from "The Golden Cockerel," sharing the first half of the evening with Foote's "Suite for Strings" and Chabrier's Espana Rhapsody. There was Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" rubbing elbows with Komzak's "Girls of Baden" waltzes. Mabel Daniels' "Deep Forest" made way for the Hawaiian War Chant. The popular Rodgers "Surrey with the Fringe on Top" appeared with new sound effects by Gould, and the Knightsbridge March topped off the evening. P. W.

PEOPLE'S WORLD
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

MAY 4 - 1945

RECORD RACK

Berlioz's 'Harold in Italy' brilliantly recorded

By PAUL ANTHONY

Hector Berlioz's "Harold in Italy." Opus 16. Played by William Primrose, violinist, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conductor. Price, $5.77.

"Harold in Italy" is the third symphony of Hector Berlioz. We are all more or less familiar with the first or "Symphonie Fantastique"—Episodes in the Life of an Artist—Opus 14. The second, "Symphonie funebre et triomphale"—Opus 15, is almost completely neglected. The same is true of the fourth symphony, "Romeo et Juliette," although there is an excerpt from it which can be found on records in the Columbia History of Music, Vol. IV (Col. M234). However, with the present recording of "Harold in Italy," we see signs of a revival of interest in the music of Berlioz.

This is not accidental. In the first place, Berlioz does not speak only to musicians. He is not, nor ever was a "salon composer." He does not appeal to the musical intellectual, his music is too rough in spirit and technically uneven for that; he makes too many so-called mistakes; he alternates between violent extremes, sometimes his contracts are so sudden and so severe as to be shocking in more than a tonal sense; he is not at all genteel or well-mannered about his emotions—they spill luxuriously and unrestrainedly out over the world for all to hear.

The unwary and ill-prepared listener is apt to be embarrassed by the force and directness of Berlioz' emotional power, not because it's Berlioz, but because it's the listener's own emotions translated into other terms, stripped bare and shown in all their true colors.

Secondly, I am of the opinion that this 20th century has done a considerable amount of work in sweeping away the cobwebs from a large section of human activity. Once these hinderances toward understanding ourselves were removed, we could begin to appreciate those who showed us essential truths in a straightforward manner.

Berlioz was one of these, and only now are we beginning to understand his music.

By listening to "Harold in Italy" one can easily see what I mean by this. It is typical Berlioz; literal, strong, direct and true. The work is in four movements with the titles: I.—Harold in the Mountains, Scenes of Melancholy, Happiness and Joy; II.—March of the Pilgrims Singing Their Evening Hymn; III.—Serenade of a Mountaineer of the Abruzzi to his Mistress, and IV.—Orgy of Brigands; Recollections of the Preceding Scenes.

The music is a magnificent transcription of this program. The unfamiliarity of the musical idiom might turn some listeners away at first, but those who overcome the violence of that idiom will be more than richly rewarded. Performance and recording are a real triumph for all who had anything to do with it. Highly recommended.

MADEMOISELLE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAY - - 1942

RECORDS By Colin McPhee

After five long years the Boston Symphony is heard once more on wax. Koussevitzky's first release is something to delight in, for he gives us the first complete recording of the Byronic symphony of Berlioz, Harold in Italy. For lovers of romantic music, and in particular, the dazzling and adventurous orchestra of Berlioz, this album is an absolute must. Byron's poem served only as a point of departure for Berlioz, and we may be astonished at the movements entitled Pilgrim's March or Orgy of the Brigands. But then, in his opera Faust, Berlioz thought nothing of whisking his hero off to Hungary for a scene, as an excuse to introduce a glittering orchestration of the national Rakóczy March. In the present work the moody Harold is portrayed by a solo viola, darker and richer in hue than the violin, and the whole is a sort of concerto or grand soliloquy. Strauss used this idea later in his orchestral poem Don Quixote, actually a tabloid opera for cello (Don Quixote) and viola (Sancho Panza). All this we accept as part of nineteenth-century music, certainly no stranger than Wagner's Ring. Berlioz' Harold is a major work by a great master; it has all the French genius for luminous, clarified sound (Victor, $5.78).

CULVER

FRENCH ROMANTIC BERLIOZ GETS A FINE KOUSSEVITZKY FIRST READING

In spite of surface noise and dated recording, I'll stick to my old Koussevitzky performance of Tchaikovsky's Pathétique, rather than the latest close-up version by Rodzinsky which Columbia has just released ($5.78). For warmth, tenderness and perfection of detail there is no comparison. Under Rodzinsky this sensitive music is given a brilliant but relentless third degree. Ormandy conducts the Philadelphia Orchestra in a vigorous, (Continued on page 245) straightforward reading of Beethoven's exuberant Seventh Symphony. The reading is a bit familiar and athletic for my taste, but the recording is excellent ($5.78). Victor reissues the famous Horowitz-Toscanini recording of the Brahms Second Piano Concerto. The orchestra, of course, is magnificent; but Horowitz' performance is fire without warmth and seems strangely lacking in the mystery and romantic glow that is sounded at the opening in the lovely solo for horn ($6.83). Lovers of the heldentenor will probably welcome the Melchior album, Scenes from Wagner Operas (Victor, $5.78), although the contents are all reissues, selected from past sets and single disks. My preference is for the duet from the second act of Tristan with Flagstad (four sides). The orchestra, however, is consistently suppressed in these recordings in a way that would never have been approved at Bayreuth.

It is with some relief that we turn from these towering masterpieces to more intimate music, such as the charming album of Bach Two-Part Inventions for piano (Asch $4.73). Erno Balogh plays these relaxed and abstract miniatures with a cool, impersonal clarity that is a pleasure to listen to. Charming, too, is the new album of music by Albeniz and Granados, played by Andrés Segovia, brilliant Spanish guitarist who interprets everything from Scarlatti to Stravinsky. The pieces in the present album are more or less salon music but Segovia's tone is velvet, and his style has great elegance and grace (Decca, $3.68). Heard after Segovia, Carlos Montoya's flamenco guitar sounds taut as a coiled spring. Montoya is a Spanish gypsy and his playing is both florid and rhythmically exciting. The new Asch album, however, will appeal more as music to be danced to rather than listened to, for the actual melodies are pretty undistinguished ($3.68).

BRAHMS: Symphony No. 4 in E Minor, Opus 98—Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra. [f] GM #7602. $5.77 (five 12" records in album) (C).

Before the appearance of this set, there were already two recordings of this work in the Columbia catalog, both of fairly recent date, one by Weingartner and the London Symphony orchestra, the other by Stokowski and the All American Orchestra. Two versions are listed in the "pruned" Victor catalog which normally lists four; the two currently available are by Walter and the BBC orchestra, and by Koussevitzky with the Boston. Ormandy gives a good performance which has been well recorded. Yet, three of the previous recordings have definite marks of distinction which must be taken into account when choosing between them

---

May

Pops To Feature Latin American Suite By Back Bay Composer

Keith Brown Writes Second Suite Following Last Year's Success Of "Bostonia" Another Pops First

Arthur Fiedler, who began his sixteenth season as conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra Tuesday evening, will raise his baton at another first performance of a suite by Keith Crosby Brown, Back Bay composer, at the eighth night Pops next Wednesday. In keeping with his purpose of introducing the work of contemporary American composers while keeping before the public the best-loved familiar works of the masters, Mr. Fiedler will introduce at next Wednesday's concert Keith Brown's "Latin American Suite," orchestrated by Jacobus Langendoen of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and dedicated to the Pan American Society of Boston and Northern New England.

Approximately enough, the evening of the opening performance will also be Mount Ida Night, as Mr. Brown heads the music department at this school. Mount Ida Night last year witnessed the successful introduction of Mr. Brown's "Bostonia Suite," which has since received many request performances by the Pops Odchestra and has been played by other symphonic groups. The following Wednesday, May 16 "On the Esplanade," the last movement of Bostonia, will be featured by the United States Navy Band at its annual spring concert in Constitutional Hall, Washington, D. C. This is a march in which familiar tunes from the repertory of Arthur Fiedler's concerts on the Esplanade are introduced by the composition.

The Latin American Suite is divided into three parts; "Green Skirt" (Fiesta), "Black Ochid," (tango), and "Paprika," (rhumba). "Green Skirt" gives a musical picture of a dancer entertaining a crowd of people, opening in a gay fiesta tempo, followed by a languorous waltz and ending in a wild flourish of gaiety.

"Black Ochid" in a tango rhythm suggests a tropical night on the campas with a song of guachos riding along echoed by other groups in the distance. The celeste chimes notes of convent bells far off, and finally the full song of the tango breaks through with the full sweep of the orchestra.

"Paprika" is a lilting dance with a surprise ending after a wild outburst of rhythm and countermelodies.

The suite was written with the intention of strengthening the musical friendship between the Latin American nations and the United States. Two other compositions by Mr. Brown, "Manana," a tango, and "Quitana," a bolero, have been performed previously by the Pops Orchestra.

Next in Br. Brown's plans is a Canadian Suite to be written in four movements. When this suite has been completed, Mr. Brown will have written a suite for each large division of the western hemisphere.

Other "firsts" announced by Mr. Fiedler for this Pops season are an arrangement of Crosby hits by Peter titled "Going Bing's Way"; a concerto by Dmitri Kabalevsky, a Russian composer, and the "American Concerto" by Lukas Foss, young pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Herald May 6

Tanglewood to Have Bach-Mozart Festival

A summer festival comprising music of Mozart and Johann Sebastian Bach is announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be conducted by Serge Koussevitsky at Tanglewood this summer. Dr. Koussevitsky will lead an orchestra of players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including all the principals. Famous soloists will assist at each concert. There will be six different programs, to be given on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 28-29, Aug. 4-5, Aug. 11-12. The soloists will be announced shortly.

Each program will contain music of both composers and will consist, from the music of Bach, of Brandenburg Concertos, orchestral suites and piano concertos. There will be several piano concertos by Mozart, the Concertante for Violin and Viola, the three final symphonies and other symphonies, divertimenti, serenades and "Night Music." Fuller details and subscription information, with address for mail orders, will be announced

---

Glb MUSIC May

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Pops Orchestra

Dimitri Kabalevsky's Second Concerto in G Minor for Piano was launched by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra last night, with Bernhard Weiser as soloist, in its first concert performance in America. For all the newness of the occasion, the idiom of the concerto had a familiar to it.

Reminiscent of Shostakovitch in the brisk and beguiling rhythms of the first movement, the concerto proceeds with echoes of Rachmaninoff and Tschaikovsky. The concerto displays its scheme as openly as a film score, reepats its themes for the benefit of listeners caught unawares as the introductionless allegro began, and affords the soloist several dramatic moments.

Bernhard Weiser made the most of the contrasts between major and minor phrases and the orchestra followed the thin outlines of the score with gusto.

Friends of the South End Music School, the sponsoring agency which Lt. Gov. Robert F. Bradford described as "one of the littlest of Boston's organizations with one of the biggest ideas, "heard a highly eclectic program. There was Rimsky-Korsakov's colorful Wedding March from "The Golden Cockerel," sharing the first half of the evening with Foote's "Suite for Strings" and Chabrier's Espana Rhapsody. There was Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" rubbing elbows with Komzak's "Girls of Baden" waltzes. Mabel Daniels' "Deep Forest" made way for the Hawaiian War Chant. The popular Rodgers "Surrey with the Fringe on Top" appeared with new sound effects by Gould, and the Knightsbridge March topped off the evening. P. W.

PEOPLE'S WORLD
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
MAY 4 - 1945

RECORD RACK

Berlioz's 'Harold in Italy' brilliantly recorded

By PAUL ANTHONY

Hector Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," Opus 16. Played by William Primrose, violinist, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conductor. Price, $5.77.

"Harold in Italy" is the third symphony of Hector Berlioz. We are all more or less familiar with the first or "Symphonie Fantastique"—Episodes in the Life of an Artist—Opus 14. The second, "Symphonie funebre et triomphale"—Opus 15, is almost completely neglected. The same is true of the fourth symphony, "Romeo et Juliette," although there is an excerpt from it which can be found on records in the Columbia History of Music, Vol. IV (Col. M234). However, with the present recording of "Harold in Italy," we see signs of a revival of interest in the music of Berlioz.

This is not accidental. In the first place, Berlioz does not speak only to musicians. He is not, nor ever was a "salon composer." He does not appeal to the musical intellectual, his music is too rough in spirit and technically uneven for that; he makes too many so-called mistakes; he alternates between violent extremes, sometimes his contracts are so sudden and so severe as to be shocking in more than a tonal sense; he is not at all genteel or well-mannered about his emotions—they spill luxuriously and unrestrainedly out over the world for all to hear.

The unwary and ill-prepared listener is apt to be embarrassed by the force and directness of Berlioz' emotional power, not because it's Berlioz, but because it's the listener's own emotions translated into other terms, stripped bare and shown in all their true colors.

Secondly, I am of the opinion that this 20th century has done a considerable amount of work in sweeping away the cobwebs from a large section of human activity. Once these hinderances toward understanding ourselves were removed, we could begin to appreciate those who showed us essential truths in a straightforward manner.

Berlioz was one of these, and only now are we beginning to understand his music.

By listening to "Harold in Italy" one can easily see what I mean by this. It is typical Berlioz; literal, strong, direct and true. The work is in four movements with the titles: I.—Harold in the Mountains, Scenes of Melancholy, Happiness and Joy; II.—March of the Pilgrims Singing Their Evening Hymn; III.—Serenade of a Mountaineer of the Abruzzi to his Mistress, and IV.—Orgy of Brigands; Recollections of the Preceding Scenes.

The music is a magnificent transcription of this program. The unfamiliarity of the musical idiom might turn some listeners away at first, but those who overcome the violence of that idiom will be more than richly rewarded. Performance and recording are a real triumph for all who had anything to do with it. Highly recommended.

First Concert Performance Of Suite by Keith Brown

Monitor May 10

Mt. Ida Junior College and the Municipal Women's Association went on record with a reunion at the Symphony Hall Pops last night, giving a particular mood and character to the occasion, gay and at the same time a little pensive. Attention was bestowed on the music seriously or casually, according to values delivered by the artists on the platform, who comprised the usual large assemblage of Boston Symphony players, with Arthur Fiedler conducting all through, and with Leo Litwin, pianist, taking part at one point of the program in a solo role.

A piece that caught uncommonly intent listening was the "Goyescas" Intermezzo of Granados, a study in genuine Spanish style and in the most aristocratic tradition, if an awfully true yet entirely correct phrase will pass critical censorship. For most music that goes for something in the Spanish manner is mere tricked-out masquerade and possesses no true Iberian quality. "Goyescas" has a politeness of attitude and a nobility of gait that is never found in things invented in a Parisian garret. The executants of the Pops Orchestra and their conductor know the difference well enough and never fail to show it. They have recorded the Intermezzo, too, and are consequently rehearsed in the Granados melodies, harmonies, and instrumental combinations to something like perfection.

But a Pops promenade must have secondary aspects, and indeed must move chiefly on an unexalted plane; for that is the main idea anyway. The interest is hearing musicians of surpassing ability play with all the after-season freedom and let-go they like. Nor need they be too sensitive about performing pieces of small account, provided the result is some amusing sound, exciting rhythm, and whistleable tune.

For novelty out came on Mount Ida Night the Latin American Suite of Keith C. Brown, a Mount Ida teacher, arranged by Jacobus Langendoen, a member of the Boston Symphony. The Suite comprises three pieces, Fiesta, Tango, and Rhumba, every one of them marked by a pleasurable dance-like activity suitable to its name, though none of them remarkable for striking melody or surprising harmony. What they display as much as anything else is Mr. Brown's happy choice of a collaborator in Mr. Langendoen. Both the composer from the floor and the arranger from the platform stood up to acknowledge applause after the performance.

Mr. Litwin gave pleasure of a kind in bringing back to notice, with some help from the accompanying forces, the work by Weber known as Concertstück. Passages in the florid style that prevailed in the early years of the Romantic period, when the pianoforte was preparing itself for the coming of Liszt and Chopin, alternate with moments of ensemble charm for the orchestra—a very desirable Pops revival.

W. P. T.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAY 2 1945

BOSTON POPS ADDS MODERN MEDLEY

Boston, May 2.—(AP)—Boston's famed pops orchestra added a modern note to its 60th season opening last night with "Ac-cen-tchu-ate the Positive" in a medley called "Going Bing's Way."

A retrospective account of the concerts printed in the program booklet told of the "formidable rivalry" the first pops—called promenade concerts—were up against.

Bostonians of that era were flocking to see "The Count of Monte Cristo" with James O'Neil (father of Eugene) and "Polly, the Pet of the Regiment," introducing Lillian Russell.

"The promenade concerts outlasted all of these," the account noted, "and only on October 3 were they obliged to cease, to make way for another Winter season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Her

MUSIC

May 7

POPS CONCERT

The Boston Pops Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler conducting and with Bernhard Weiser as soloist, was heard at Symphony Hall last night in the following program:

Wedding March from "The Golden Cockerel" .... Rinsky-Korsakov
Overture to "Egmont" ...... Beethoven
Pizzicato and Adagietto from "Suite for Strings" .... Foote.
Espana, Rhapsody ....Chabrier

The Star-Spangled Banner
Deep Forest .... Mabel Daniels
Concerto No. 2, in G minor, Op. 23, for Piano .... D. Kabalevsky.
Soloist: Bernhard Weiser
(First Concert Performance in America)

Girls of Baden, Waltzes .... Komzak
The Surrey with the Fringe on Top .... Rodgers-Gould
Knightbridge March from "London Suite" .... Coates.

The South End Music School, a member of the Greater Boston Community Fund, was sponsor of last night's Pops concert at Symphony Hall. And in memory of the school's first president, Arthur Foote, Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra played the Pizzicato and Adagietto from his "Suite for Strings." The suite is a popular selection of the regular symphony season, and the portion which the orchestra played last night was well done.

The novelty on last night's program was the first American concert performance of Dmitri Kabalevsky's Second Piano Concerto, with Bernhard Weiser as soloist. The concerto should become popular with the Pops audiences, because it has the advantage of brevity and is easy to listen to, but there is not much else to be said in its favor. It has little originality or inspiration, being reminiscent of too many late romantic composers. The first movement marches right along in the path of Tchaikovsky, the second is lushly melodic, with solo passages for English and French horns, and the finale has much of Shostakovitch's less inspired bombast. Mr. Weiser gave a workmanlike performance at the piano, but could not do much to raise the selection above mediocrity.

During the second intermission Lt.-Gov. Bradford spoke on the aims of the music school, and a drawing was held for the winner of a benefit raffle.

D. W. S.

Globe May 7

Fiedler and Orchestra Observe V-E Day at Pops

By CYRUS DURGIN

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra dedicated the last part of the concert at Symphony Hall last night to V-E Day. Setting aside the previously-scheduled numbers, the conductor put on Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" march for the British, the Valerius-Kremser "Prayer of Thanksgiving" for the Netherlanders, and for the Russians, Morton Gould's "Red Cavalry March."

The climax of this observance came at the very end, when, orchestra and audience launched into "The Star Spangled Banner," a large American flag unrolled from the ceiling of Symphony Hall. The United States portion also included the Sousa march, "Stars and Stripes Forever," and Peter Bodge's medley of service songs, "Salute To Our Fighting Forces."

Until this part of the evening was reached, there was no extraordinary tension among the capacity audience, and until this point the evening went along like any other Pops concert. The patriotic music was broadcast from 10 to 10:30 over the Blue Network.

The earlier numbers of the program included a competent traversal of Richard Strauss' rarely-heard "Burleske," with Audrey Kupperstein at the solo piano. Three movements from the "Classical" Symphony by Prokofieff, the "Semper Fidelis" March of Sousa, Thomas' Overture to "Mignon," Dvorak's Fifteenth Slavonic Dance, and the Waltz Scene from Gounod's "Faust" completed the evening.

Post May 7

POPS CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Three years ago Arthur Fiedler and Bernhard Weiser created a considerable stir in local musical circles by introducing at a Pop Concert the Piano Concerto of Aram Khatchatourian. A Pops performance the next season, followed by two at the Symphony Concerts, when the pianist was William Kapell, had collectively a somewhat deflating effect, but the fact remains that the work in question had certain individual as well as racial qualities that made the hearing of it both an entertaining and profitable experience. Last evening Messrs. Fiedler and Weiser made a second and distinctly less successful adventure into contemporary Russian music by way of the Second Piano Concerto of Dmitri Kabalevsky, a composer previously known here only through the brilliant overture to his opera "Colas Breugnon." While not conspicuously original, the overture gives the impression that Kabalevsky could hold attention even when he had nothing in particular to impart. In the concerto of last evening he has little to say and he fails to say that little convincingly. Conductor and soloist gave of their best and it was easy to feel that the answering applause was for them rather than for the music.

This first Sunday Pop concert of the season, sponsored by the South End Music School, brought to a hearing two well-known American pieces, the Pizzicato and Adagietto from the E Major Suite for Strings by Arthur Foote, first president of the school, and Mabel Daniels' impressionistic "Deep Forest." Seated at one of the tables, Miss Daniels received the plaudits of her fellow listeners. For the rest the concert ranged from Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture to a number from "Oklahoma," a perfectly proper Pops procedure.

Pops Opens 60th Season

Trav. May 2

By NATALIE GORDON

IT'S SPRING AGAIN, WEATHER OR NOT, for the Pops Concerts opened last night in Symphony Hall for the 60th season, and Picardy gladioli bloomed in front of the podium where handsome Arthur Fiedler ruled the roost for his 16th season as conductor of these popular concerts, beloved by Bostonians. The "Sold Out" sign hung in the lobby, as it will each night for the 60-odd nights of the current season, and whether or not the rumored death of Hitler is a fact, Boston, nevertheless, was celebrating.

The program, which began with Sousa's "Semper Fidelis" March and ended with Peter Bodge's popular arrangement of the medley "Salute to the Fighting Forces", was generously interspersed with five encores, among which were Morton Gould's "Red Cavalry March" and "When Johnny Comes Marching Home", and Bodge's "Tico-Tico". The opening night audience did everything but stamp its feet in tribute to the Symphony Orchestra members and their conductor, Arthur Fiedler. Popping corks, which gave the informal concerts their name, accented the merry mood of the opening night audience, which filled every seat in Symphony Hall from the tables on the floor to the last row in the second balcony.

An added attraction this year at the Pops is an exhibit, hung in the lobby galleries, of pictures depicting the first nights of six generations of Pops, and mementoes of the passing years, including mustache cups; meticulously embroidered "God Bless Our Home" samplers; a photo of Lillian Russell at the Pops opening in 1885, it's first year, when she was appearing here in "Polly the Pal of the Regiment;" and portraits of Ad Neuendorff, the first conductor of the concerts, and John C. Mullaly, the second conductor, who was also musical director of the Globe Theater.

Most distinguished member of last night's audience was William R. Kittredge, who hasn't missed an opening night of Pops for 60 years; and in her customary seat in the first row of the first balcony was lovely Mrs. Arthur Fiedler, one of the Hub's most truly gracious ladies. The former Ellen Bottomley, she was accompanied by her mother, Mrs. John T. Bottomley, who wore a black print flowered in pink apple blossoms, and by her post-debutante sister, May, in emerald-green wool. Mrs. Fiedler chose a green print frock with white flowers for the opening, and an Irene Dunne hat with a huge white rose, more alluring on gentle Ellen Fiedler than it was on even the pretty cinema actress.

According to precedent, the New England Grenfell Association had taken a large block of seats for the opening, as a benefit to its splendid work; and in the front of the hall were 20 tables occupied by Beaver Country Day School alumnae, proceeds from which benefited the school's Teachers' Retirement Fund. Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, chairman of the Grenfell group, wearing a smart little hat fashioned like an old-fashioned lace-edged bouquet, was accompanied by her husband and had at her table Mrs. A. W. K. Billings, who wore pink roses in her hair. A Newton Hospital group, whose members have never missed a Grenfell night at Pops, included Miss Greta Ferris, who formerly served with the Grenfell Mission in Labrador; Mrs. Lisbian Smith, and the Misses Esther Storey, Florence Flores and Mable McVicker. Others occupying Grenfell tables were Mr. and Mrs. Walter Merriam, Dr. and Mrs. E. Parker Hayden, with their daughter, Carol, and Lisa Faulkner; Dr. and Mrs. R. S. Titus, sitting with Dr. and Mrs. Howard Sisson and their son, Thomas, an ensign who has just won his wings in the Naval Air Force; the Mason T. Whitings, the Philip R. Allens, Mrs. Reginald Heath, and Mr. and Mrs. Charles Collens; Mr. and Mrs. C. Lloyd Thomas, sitting with Mrs. Julian Leonard and Mrs. S. Abbott Smith; Mrs. Lola K. Kenney, from Rutland, Vt., with her son and daughter-in-law, Sgt. (USA) and Mrs. Richard M. Kenney; and Naval Reserve officers, Lt. Harvey Picker and Ensign John D. Eaton, with Ruth Beveridge and Cordelia Galt.

Service uniforms sprinkled the audience. Sgt. Francis Mahand, USMCR, sat at a table with Mrs. Ralph Bryden, Edith Greifen and J. Randolph Campbell; and with Lt. William Stout, USNR, and his wife, Capt. Harriet Stout, WAC, were Mrs. Stout's mother, Mrs. Edward B. Cracraft of Indianapolis, wife of Capt. Cracraft, serving in the Philippines with the Army; Lt. Benjamin Irvin, USA, and Lt. (j.g.) A Nyholm Larsen, USNR, escorting Sonia Gordon. Others at the Pops premiere were pretty Mrs. William W. Phelps, Jr. (Olive Perry), hoping her husband, who's been serving in Italy for three years, will soon be home; Mr. and Mrs. Stephen R. Casey; Crosby Hodgman, headmaster of Beaver Country Day School, and Mrs. Hodgman; Mr. and Mrs. Delphin Young; Post-deb Jane Ferguson, with Russell Codman; Dr.

The Symphony Season: A Statistical Summary

By ELINOR HUGHES

Though a strictly musical summing up of the 64th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should be handled by someone who is more of a musicologist than the present writer, there is still room for something in the nature of a statistical summary of the events that have taken place between the first week in October, 1944, and the first of May, 1945. The most casual glance at your program or the last of the Friday afternoon and Saturday services will reveal the industry and variety of the season, and more careful study makes the details even more impressive.

Take for example, the number of concerts given in Boston alone; there were as usual the forty-eight Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings (the Sunday afternoons replaced the previous Tuesday afternoon series), which did not duplicate one another as the Monday and Tuesday series once did; this makes 60 in all. Then there were six concerts at Sanders Theater in Cambridge (in place of the usual eight and given on Wednesday instead of on Thursday evenings, and at the highly inconvenient hour of eight o'clock); five concerts in Providence at the Metropolitan Theater (Tuesday evenings); ten in Carnegie Hall, New York City, on Wednesday nights and Saturday afternoons; five in the Academy of Music in Brooklyn; a Western tour that included Cleveland, Akron, Toledo, Chicago (2), Milwaukee, and Ann Arbor; and engagements nearer home that took in New Haven, New Brunswick, Hartford, Washington, D. C., New London, Newark, Worcester, Northampton, Philadelphia and Springfield. Three of these concerts, that of April 12 in Philadelphia, April 13 in Brooklyn and April 14 in New York were dedicated to the memory of Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

In addition, there was a Pension Fund concert last June by the Pops Orchestra, a meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 16, 1945, with a musical program; the 10-week season of the Pops from May 2 to July 15, 1944; the Esplanade Concerts (16th season) for four weeks, from July 20 to Aug. 16; six Youth Concerts, conducted by Wheeler Beckett; a War Bond concert at the Boston Garden on Dec. 14, 1944; a Red Cross Concert at Symphony Hall April 8; a concert at the United States Military Academy at West Point on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 19, 1944; and a series of voluntary weekly programs for wounded servicemen and women inaugurated by members of the orchestra on Jan. 18, 1945, and given at Cushing General Hospital, Chelsea Naval Hospital, Lovell General Hospital, Myles Standish Station Hospital and Waltham Regional Hospital.

In addition (are you still following me?), Serge Koussevitsky, the principals and other members of the Boston Symphony, gave a Mazart Festival at Tanglewood, on two Saturday evenings and two Sunday afternoons, July 29 and 30 and August 5 and 6 with Dorothy Maynor, Luboshutz and Nemenoff, Ruth Posselt and Robert Casadesus as soloists and there was a series of four pairs of concerts by the principals and other players in the New England Mutual Hall on Sunday and Monday evenings during the last three weeks in August and the first week in September. Bernard Zighera, G. Wallace Woodworth and Richard Burgin were the conductors.

There have been five guest conductors, Dmitri Mitropoulos, for two pair of concerts in December; George Szell, for two pair of concerts in January; Leonard Bernstein for one pair of concerts in November; Villa-Lobos for one pair of concerts in February; and Richard Burgin, concert master and associate conductor, conducted the orchestra in one pair of concerts in October, one pair in November, one pair in February and one pair in March. He also celebrated his 25th year as concert master on April 22 and 23.

Including Mr. Burgin, there were 10 soloists, the others being Robert Casadesus, Zino Francescatti, Jascha Heifetz, Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff; Witold Malcuzynski, Mona Paulee, Ruth Posselt, William Primrose and Jesus Maria Sanroma. Five of them made their first appearance at these concerts. The Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and six members of the Symphony have also assisted in several performances.

There were seven first concert performances at the Friday and Saturday concerts of works by Bartok (Concerto for Orchestra), Diamond (Symphony No. 2), Hill (Music for English Horn and Orchestra, No. 2); Lopatnikoff (Concertino for Orchestra, Op. 30); Lourie ("The Feast During the Plague"), Schonberg (Theme and Variations for Orchestra, Op. 43B), and Villa-Lobos (Choros No. 12). Fourteen other works were performed for the first time at these concerts, such widely contrasted talents as those of Martinu and Mozart, Schubert and Schuman (William), Villa-Lobos and Edward Burlinghame Hill being included.

Firty-one composers contributed to this same series, at which 80 works in all were played. Mozart led the list with six compositions, Beethoven came next with five, Brahms and Ravel followed with four; among the thrice-present were Mendelssohn, Rachmaninoff, Tchaikovsky, Shostakovitch and Villa-Lobos, while Richard Strauss, Hindemith, Rimsky-Korsakov and Schumann (Robert) were heard twice each.

Among those heard at one pair of concerts only were Bach, Bartok, Berlioz, Bloch, Chopin, Copland, Corelli, Creston, Diamond, Dubensky, Faure, Foote, Franck, Gould, Hanson, Haydn, Hill, D'Indy, Krenek, Lalo, Liodov, Lopatnikoff, Lourie, Mahler, Martinu, Moussorgsky, Paganini, Piston, Schonberg, Schubert, Schuman, Sibelius, Smetana, Still, Thompson, Toch, Wagner and Vaughan Williams.

It seems idle as well as superfluous to comment on the work involved and the pleasure bestowed, as neither can be estimated by any known form of calculation. But we are neither ungrateful nor lacking in appreciation.

[92]

Monitor May 10

First Concert Performance Of Suite by Keith Brown

Mt. Ida Junior College and the Municipal Women's Association went on record with a reunion at the Symphony Hall Pops last night, giving a particular mood and character to the occasion, gay and at the same time a little pensive. Attention was bestowed on the music seriously or casually, according to values delivered by the artists on the platform, who comprised the usual large assemblage of Boston Symphony players, with Arthur Fiedler conducting all through, and with Leo Litwin, pianist, taking part at one point of the program in a solo role.

A piece that caught uncommonly intent listening was the "Goyescas" Intermezzo of Granados, a study in genuine Spanish style and in the most aristocratic tradition, if an awfully trite yet entirely correct phrase will pass critical censorship. For most music that goes for something in the Spanish manner is mere tricked-out masquerade and possesses no true Iberian quality. "Goyescas" has a politeness of attitude and a nobility of gait that is never found in things invented in a Parisian garret. The executants of the Pops Orchestra and their conductor know the difference well enough and never fail to show it. They have recorded the Intermezzo, too, and are consequently rehearsed in the Granados melodies, harmonies, and instrumental combinations to something like perfection.

But a Pops promenade must have secondary aspects, and indeed must move chiefly on an unexalted plane; for that is the main idea anyway. The interest is hearing musicians of surpassing ability play with all the after-season freedom and let-go they like. Nor need they be too sensitive about performing pieces of small account, provided the result is some amusing sound, exciting rhythm, and whistleable tune.

For novelty out came on Mount Ida Night the Latin American Suite of Keith C. Brown, a Mount Ida teacher, arranged by Jacobus Langendoen, a member of the Boston Symphony. The Suite comprises three pieces, Fiesta, Tango, and Rhumba, every one of them marked by a pleasurable dance-like activity suitable to its name, though none of them remarkable for striking melody or surprising harmony. What they display as much as anything else is Mr. Brown's happy choice of a collaborator in Mr. Langendoen. Both the composer from the floor and the arranger from the platform stood up to acknowledge applause after the performance.

Mr. Litwin gave pleasure of a kind in bringing back to notice, with some help from the accompanying forces, the work by Weber known as Concertstück. Passages in the florid style that prevailed in the early years of the Romantic period, when the pianoforte was preparing itself for the coming of Liszt and Chopin, alternate with moments of ensemble charm for the orchestra—a very desirable Pops revival. W. P. T.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAY 2 - 1945

BOSTON POPS ADDS MODERN MEDLEY

Boston, May 2.—(AP)—Boston's famed pops orchestra added a modern note to its 60th season opening last night with "Ac-cen-tchu-ate the Positive" in a medley called "Going Bing's Way."

A retrospective account of the concerts printed in the program booklet told of the "formidable rivalry" the first pops—called promenade concerts—were up against.

Bostonians of that era were flocking to see "The Count of Monte Cristo' with James O'Neil (father of Eugene) and "Polly, the Pet of the Regiment," introducing Lillian Russell.

"The promenade concerts outlasted all of these," the account noted, "and only on October 3 were they obliged to cease, to make way for another Winter season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Her

MUSIC

May

POPS CONCERT

The Boston Pops Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler conducting and with Bernhard Weiser as soloist, was heard at Symphony Hall last night in the following program:

Wedding March from "The Golden Cockerel" ....Rinsky-Korsakov
Overture to "Egmont" .... Beethoven
Pizzicato and Adagietto from "Suite for Strings" .... Foote.
Espana, Rhapsody ....Chabrier

The Star-Spangled Banner
Deep Forest .... Mabel Daniels
Concerto No. 2, in G minor, Op. 23, for Piano .... D. Kabalevsky.
Soloist: Bernhard Weiser
(First Concert Performance in America)

Girls of Baden, Waltzes .... Komzak
The Surrey with the Fringe on Top .... Rodgers-Gould
Knightbridge March from 'London Suite" .... Coates.

The South End Music School, a member of the Greater Boston Community Fund, was sponsor of last night's Pops concert at Symphony Hall. And in memory of the school's first president, Arthur Foote, Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra played the Pizzicato and Adagietto from his "Suite for Strings." The suite is a popular selection of the regular symphony season, and the portion which the orchestra played last night was well done.

The novelty on last night's program was the first American concert performance of Dmitri Kabalevsky's Second Piano Concerto, with Bernhard Weiser as soloist. The concerto should become popular with the Pops audiences, because it has the advantage of brevity and is easy to listen to, but there is not much else to be said in its favor. It has little originality or inspiration, being reminiscent of too many late romantic composers. The first movement marches right along in the path of Tchaikovsky, the second is lushly melodic, with solo passages for English and French horns, and the finale has much of Shostakovitch's less inspired bombast. Mr. Weiser gave a workmanlike performance at the piano, but could not do much to raise the selection above mediocrity.

During the second intermission Lt.-Gov. Bradford spoke on the aims of the music school, and a drawing was held for the winner of a benefit raffle. D. W. S.

Globe May 7

Fiedler and Orchestra Observe V-E Day at Pops

By CYRUS DURGIN

Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra dedicated the last part of the concert at Symphony Hall last night to V-E Day. Setting aside the previously-scheduled numbers, the conductor put on Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" march for the British, the Valerius-Kremser "Prayer of Thanksgiving" for the Netherlanders, and for the Russians, Morton Gould's "Red Cavalry March."

The climax of this observance came at the very end, when, orchestra and audience launched into "The Star Spangled Banner," a large American flag unrolled from the ceiling of Symphony Hall. The United States portion also included the Sousa march, "Stars and Stripes Forever," and Peter Bodge's medley of service songs, "Salute To Our Fighting Forces."

Until this part of the evening was reached, there was no extraordinary tension among the capacity audience, and until this point the evening went along like any other Pops concert. The patriotic music was broadcast from 10 to 10:30 over the Blue Network.

The earlier numbers of the program included a competent traversal of Richard Strauss' rarely-heard "Burleske," with Audrey Kupperstein at the solo piano. Three movements from the "Classical" Symphony by Prokofieff, the "Semper Fidelis" March of Sousa, Thomas' Overture to "Mignon," Dvorak's Fifteenth Slavonic Dance, and the Waltz Scene from Gounod's "Faust" completed the evening.

Post May 7

POPS CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Three years ago Arthur Fiedler and Bernhard Weiser created a considerable stir in local musical circles by introducing at a Pop Concert the Piano Concerto of Aram Khatchatourian. A Pops performance the next season, followed by two at the Symphony Concerts, when the pianist was William Kapell, had collectively a somewhat deflating effect, but the fact remains that the work in question had certain individual as well as racial qualities that made the hearing of it both an entertaining and profitable experience. Last evening Messrs. Fiedler and Weiser made a second and distinctly less successful adventure into contemporary Russian music by way of the Second Piano Concerto of Dmitri Kabalevsky, a composer previously known here only through the brilliant overture to his opera "Colas Breugnon." While not conspicuously original, the overture gives the impression that Kabalevsky could hold attention even when he had nothing in particular to impart. In the concerto of last evening he has little to say and he fails to say that little convincingly. Conductor and soloist gave of their best and it was easy to feel that the answering applause was for them rather than for the music.

This first Sunday Pop concert of the season, sponsored by the South End Music School, brought to a hearing two well-known American pieces, the Pizzicato and Adagietto from the E Major Suite for Strings by Arthur Foote, first president of the school, and Mabel Daniels' impressionistic "Deep Forest." Seated at one of the tables, Miss Daniels received the plaudits of her fellow listeners. For the rest the concert ranged from Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture to a number from "Oklahoma," a perfectly proper Pops procedure.

Trav. May 2

Pops Opens 60th Season

By NATALIE GORDON

IT'S SPRING AGAIN, WEATHER OR NOT, for the Pops Concerts opened last night in Symphony Hall for the 60th season, and Picardy gladioli bloomed in front of the podium where handsome Arthur Fiedler ruled the roost for his 16th season as conductor of these popular concerts, beloved by Bostonians. The "Sold Out" sign hung in the lobby, as it will each night for the 60-odd nights of the current season, and whether or not the rumored death of Hitler is a fact, Boston, nevertheless, was celebrating.

The program, which began with Sousa's "Semper Fidelis" March and ended with Peter Bodge's popular arrangement of the medley "Salute to the Fighting Forces", was generously interspersed with five encores, among which were Morton Gould's "Red Cavalry March" and "When Johnny Comes Marching Home", and Bodge's "Tico-Tico". The opening night audience did everything but stamp its feet in tribute to the Symphony Orchestra members and their conductor, Arthur Fiedler. Popping corks, which gave the informal concerts their name, accented the merry mood of the opening night audience, which filled every seat in Symphony Hall from the tables on the floor to the last row in the second balcony.

An added attraction this year at the Pops is an exhibit, hung in the lobby galleries, of pictures depicting the first nights of six generations of Pops, and mementoes of the passing years, including mustache cups; meticulously embroidered "God Bless Our Home" samplers; a photo of Lillian Russell at the Pops opening in 1885, it's first year, when she was appearing here in "Polly the Pal of the Regiment;" and portraits of Ad Neuendorff, the first conductor of the concerts, and John C. Mullaly, the second conductor, who was also musical director of the Globe Theater.

Most distinguished member of last night's audience was William R. Kittredge, who hasn't missed an opening night of Pops for 60 years, and in her customary seat in the first row of the first balcony was lovely Mrs. Arthur Fiedler, one of the Hub's most truly gracious ladies. The former Ellen Bottomley, she was accompanied by her mother, Mrs. John T. Bottomley, who wore a black print flowered in pink apple blossoms, and by her post-debutante sister, May, in emerald-green wool. Mrs. Fiedler chose a green print frock with white flowers for the opening, and an Irene Dunne hat with a huge white rose, more alluring on gentle Ellen Fiedler than it was on even the pretty cinema actress.

According to precedent, the New England Grenfell Association had taken a large block of seats for the opening, as a benefit to its splendid work; and in the front of the hall were 20 tables occupied by Beaver Country Day School alumnae, proceeds from which benefited the school's Teachers' Retirement Fund. Mrs. Robert M. P. Kennard, chairman of the Grenfell group, wearing a smart little hat fashioned like an old-fashioned lace-edged bouquet, was accompanied by her husband and had at her table Mrs. A. W. K. Billings, who wore pink roses in her hair. A Newton Hospital group, whose members have never missed a Grenfell night at Pops, included Miss Greta Ferris, who formerly served with the Grenfell Mission in Labrador; Mrs. Lisbian Smith, and the Misses Esther Storey, Florence Flores and Mable McVicker. Others occupying Grenfell tables were Mr. and Mrs. Walter Merriam, Dr. and Mrs. E. Parker Hayden, with their daughter, Carol, and Lisa Faulkner; Dr. and Mrs. R. S. Titus, sitting with Dr. and Mrs. Howard Sisson and their son, Thomas, an ensign who has just won his wings in the Naval Air Force; the Mason T. Whitings, the Philip R. Allens, Mrs. Reginald Heath, and Mr. and Mrs. Charles Collens; Mr. and Mrs. C. Lloyd Thomas, sitting with Mrs. Julian Leonard and Mrs. S. Abbott Smith; Mrs. Lola K. Kenney, from Rutland, Vt., with her son and daughter-in-law, Sgt. (USA) and Mrs. Richard M. Kenney; and Naval Reserve officers, Lt. Harvey Picker and Ensign John D. Eaton, with Ruth Beveridge and Cordelia Galt.

Service uniforms sprinkled the audience. Sgt. Francis Mahand, USMCR, sat at a table with Mrs. Ralph Bryden, Edith Greifen and J. Randolph Campbell; and with Lt. William Stout, USNR, and his wife, Capt. Harriet Stout, WAC, were Mrs. Stout's mother, Mrs. Edward B. Cracraft of Indianapolis, wife of Capt. Cracraft, serving in the Philippines with the Army; Lt. Benjamin Irvin, USA, and Lt. (j.g.) A Nyholm Larsen, USNR, escorting Sonia Gordon. Others at the Pops premiere were pretty Mrs. William W. Phelps, Jr. (Olive Perry), hoping her husband, who's been serving in Italy for three years, will soon be home; Mr. and Mrs. Stephen R. Casey; Crosby Hodgman, headmaster of Beaver Country Day School and Mrs. Hodgman; Mr. and Mrs. Delphin Young; Post-deb Jane Ferguson, with Russell Codman; Dr.

Herald May 6

The Symphony Season: A Statistical Summary

By ELINOR HUGHES

Though a strictly musical summing up of the 64th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should be handled by someone who is more of a musicologist than the present writer, there is still room for something in the nature of a statistical summary of the events that have taken place between the first week in October, 1944, and the first of May, 1945. The most casual glance at your program or the last of the Friday afternoon and Saturday services will reveal the industry and variety of the season, and more careful study makes the details even more impressive.

Take for example, the number of concerts given in Boston alone; there were as usual the forty-eight Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings (the Sunday afternoons replaced the previous Tuesday afternoon series), which did not duplicate one another as the Monday and Tuesday series once did; this makes 60 in all. Then there were six concerts at Sanders Theater in Cambridge (in place of the usual eight and given on Wednesday instead of on Thursday evenings, and at the highly inconvenient hour of eight o'clock); five concerts in Providence at the Metropolitan Theater (Tuesday evenings); ten in Carnegie Hall, New York City, on Wednesday nights and Saturday afternoons; five in the Academy of Music in Brooklyn; a Western tour that included Cleveland, Akron, Toledo, Chicago (2), Milwaukee, and Ann Arbor; and engagements nearer home that took in New Haven, New Brunswick, Hartford, Washington, D. C., New London, Newark, Worcester, Northampton, Philadelphia and Springfield. Three of these concerts, that of April 12 in Philadelphia, April 13 in Brooklyn and April 14 in New York were dedicated to the memory of Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

In addition, there was a Pension Fund concert last June by the Pops Orchestra, a meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 16, 1945, with a musical program; the 10-week season of the Pops from May 2 to July 15, 1944; the Esplanade Concerts (16th season) for four weeks, from July 20 to Aug. 16; six Youth Concerts, conducted by Wheeler Beckett; a War Bond concert at the Boston Garden on Dec. 14, 1944; a Red Cross Concert at Symphony Hall April 8; a concert at the United States Military Academy at West Point on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 19, 1944; and a series of voluntary weekly programs for wounded servicemen and women inaugurated by members of the orchestra on Jan. 18, 1945, and given at Cushing General Hospital, Chelsea Naval Hospital, Lovell General Hospital, Myles Standish Station Hospital and Waltham Regional Hospital.

In addition (are you still following me?), Serge Koussevitsky, the principals and other members of the Boston Symphony, gave a Mazart Festival at Tanglewood, on two Saturday evenings and two Sunday afternoons, July 29 and 30 and August 5 and 6 with Dorothy Maynor, Luboshutz and Nemenoff, Ruth Posselt and Robert Casadesus as soloists and there was a series of four pairs of concerts by the principals and other players in the New England Mutual Hall on Sunday and Monday evenings during the last three weeks in August and the first week in September. Bernard Zighera, G. Wallace Woodworth and Richard Burgin were the conductors.

There have been five guest conductors, Dmitri Mitropoulos, for two pair of concerts in December; George Szell, for two pair of concerts in January; Leonard Bernstein for one pair of concerts in November; Villa-Lobos for one pair of concerts in February; and Richard Burgin, concert master and associate conductor, conducted the orchestra in one pair of concerts in October, one pair in November, one pair in February and one pair in March. He also celebrated his 25th year as concert master on April 22 and 23.

Including Mr. Burgin, there were 10 soloists, the others being Robert Casadesus, Zino Francescatti, Jascha Heifetz, Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff; Witold Malcuzynski, Mona Paulee, Ruth Posselt, William Primrose and Jesus Maria Sanroma. Five of them made their first appearance at these concerts. The Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and six members of the Symphony have also assisted in several performances.

There were seven first concert performances at the Friday and Saturday concerts of works by Bartok (Concerto for Orchestra), Diamond (Symphony No. 2), Hill (Music for English Horn and Orchestra, No. 2); Lopatnikoff (Concertino for Orchestra, Op. 30); Lourie ("The Feast During the Plague"), Schonberg (Theme and Variations for Orchestra, Op. 43B), and Villa-Lobos (Choros No. 12). Fourteen other works were performed for the first time at these concerts, such widely contrasted talents as those of Martinu and Mozart, Schubert and Schuman (William), Villa-Lobos and Edward Burlinghame Hill being included.

Firty-one composers contributed to this same series, at which 80 works in all were played. Mozart led the list with six compositions, Beethoven came next with five, Brahms and Ravel followed with four; among the thrice-present were Mendelssohn, Rachmaninoff, Tchaikovsky, Shostakovitch and Villa-Lobos, while Richard Strauss, Hindemith, Rimsky-Korsakov and Schumann (Robert) were heard twice each.

Among those heard at one pair of concerts only were Bach, Bartok, Berlioz, Bloch, Chopin, Copland, Corelli, Creston, Diamond, Dubensky, Faure, Foote, Franck, Gould, Hanson, Haydn, Hill, D'Indy, Krenek, Lalo, Liodov, Lopatnikoff, Lourie, Mahler, Martinu, Moussorgsky, Paganini, Piston, Schonberg, Schubert, Schuman, Sibelius, Smetana, Still, Thompson, Toch, Wagner and Vaughan Williams.

It seems idle as well as superfluous to comment on the work involved and the pleasure bestowed, as neither can be estimated by any known form of calculation. But we are neither ungrateful nor lacking in appreciation.

[92]

Next Week at the Pops

Monitor May 11

Lukas Foss, Jan Smeterlin, and Harold Rubens will appear as piano soloists with the Boston Pops Orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, the coming week. Mr. Foss will play his own Piano Concerto. Mr. Smeterlin takes part in a presentation of a concerto by Mozart, and Mr. Rubens in a work in the same form by Shostakovitch. Other soloists will be Katharine Foy, pianist, and Lucille Wetherbee and Margaret Torbert, violinists. Conductors relieving Mr. Fiedler for the whole or part of an evening are Paul Cherkassky, Malcolm Holmes, and Rolland Tapley. The hour of the concerts is 8:30 p. m.

Programs are announced as follows:

Sunday, May 13

Polonaise from "Eugen Onégin" ... Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Oberon" ... Weber
Adagio from Violin Sonata No. 3 .. Bach
Scherzo from "Pathetic" Symphony ... Tchaikovsky
La Valse ... Ravel
Concerto for Piano ... Lukas Foss
Soloist: Lukas Foss
"Voices of Spring" Waltzes .... Strauss
Russian Sailors' Dance from "The Red Poppy" ... Glière
Salute to Our Fighting Forces . arr. Bodge

Monday, May 14

Processional of Bacchus from "Sylvia" ... Delibes
Overture to "Mignon" ... Thomas
Largo from "Xerxes" ... Handel
Ride of the Valkyries ... Wagner
Variations on "Pop Goes the Weasel" ... Cailliet
Ballet of the Hours from "La Gioconda" ... Ponchielli Emmanuel College Glee Club
Directed by Emma Ecker
Accompanist: Maria Mazzone
Orpheus with his Lute . Edward German Andalucia ... Lecuona
Regina Coeli ... Grassi
Alma Mater
Victor Herbert Favorites .. arr. Sanford
Hawaiian War Chant .... Abreu-Bodge
"Knightsbridge" March ... Coates

Tuesday, May 15

"Washington Post" March ... Sousa
Overture to "Der Freischütz" .... Weber
Minuet for Strings ... Bolzoni
Polovetzian Dances from "Prince Igor" ... Borodin
Ballet Suite from "Le Cid" .. Massenet
Symphonic Variations for Piano and Orchestra ... Franck
Soloist: Katharine Foy
Going Bing's Way ... arr. Bodge
Andalucia ... Lecuona-Gould
Yankee Doodle Went to Town .. Gould

Wednesday, May 16

"Only One Vienna" March .. Schrammel
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" ... R Strauss
Ballet Music from "Rosamunde" ... Schubert
Overture to "The Beautiful Galatea" ... Suppé
Overture to "Die Fledermaus" . Strauss
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in A major (K. 488) ... Mozart Soloist: Jan Smeterlin
"Wine, Woman and Song," Waltzes ... Strauss
The Old Refrain ... Kreisler
Salute to Our Fighting Forces arr. Bodge

Thursday, May 17

"Pomp and Circumstance," March Elgar
Romanian Rhapsody ... Enesco
Polka from "Schwanda, the Bagpipe Player" ... Weinberger
"Roses from the South," Waltzes Strauss
Concerto in D minor for Two Violins and String Orchestra ... Bach
Soloists:
Lucille Wetherbee, Wellesley, '45; and Margaret Torbert, Wellesley, '46
Bolero ... Ravel
Going Bing's Way ... arr. Bodge
Tico Tico ... arr. Bodge
"Knightsbridge" March ... Coates

Friday, May 18

Malcolm Holmes, Conducting
"Pomp and Circumstance," March Elgar
"The Roman Carnival," Overture ... Berlioz
Hora Staccato ... Dinicu-Heifetz
Finale, Fourth Symphony .. Tchaikovsky
Triumphal March from "Peter and the Wolf" ... Prokoviev
"The Incredible Flutist" ... Piston
"When Johnny Comes Marching Home" ... Gould
"Emperor" Waltzes ... Strauss
Holiday for Strings ... Rose
"Oklahoma!" Selection ... Rodgers-Bodge

Saturday, May 19

Processional of Bacchus from "Sylvia" ... Delibes
Overture to "Oberon" ... Weber
Largo from "Xerxes" ... Handel
Variations on "Pop Goes the Weasel" ... Cailliet
Bolero ... Ravel
Rolland Tapley, Conducting
"Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltzes ... Strauss
Ave Maria ... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Song Fest, Medley
Salute to Our Fighting Forces ... arr. Bodge

Sunday, May 20

Paul Cherkassky, Conducting
Red Cavalry March .... Morton Gould
Overture to "Ruy Blas" .. Mendelssohn
Berceuse from "The Firebird" ... Stravinsky
"The Moldau," Symphonic Poem ... Smetana
Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, op. 35 .... Shostakovitch Soloist: Harold Rubens
Trumpet: Marcel Lafosso
Bolero ... Ravel
"Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltzes ... Strauss
"Jealousy," Gypsy Tango ... Gade
Gershwiniana ... arr. Bodge

Herald MUSIC May 14

SYMPHONY HALL

Foss Concerto at Pops

Last night at Symphony Hall, Arthur Fiedler conducted the Boston Pops orchestra in a program featuring the first concert performance of Lukas Foss's concerto for piano and orchestra, with the composer at the piano. The program follows:

Polonaise from "Eugene Onegin" ... Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Oberon" ... Weber
Adagio from Violin Sonata No. 3 .... Bach
Scherzo from "Pathetic" Symphony ... Tchaikovsky
La Valse ... Ravel
Concerto for Piano ... Lukas Foss
I. Allegro
II. Andante
III. Allegro
Soloist: LUKAS FOSS
(First Concert Performance)
"Voices of Spring," Waltzes ... Strauss
Russian Sailors' Dance from "The Red Poppy" ... Gliere
Salute to Our Fighting Forces
Arranged by Bodge

By ELINOR HUGHES

The news at Symphony Hall last night was the first concert performance of Lukas Foss's Concerto for Piano in three movements, with the composer as soloist. Young Mr. Foss, now the Boston Symphony's official pianist, is know to audiences as the composer of "The prairies," a vocal and orchestral work heard in its entirety in New York during the past season—a portion of it was done previously in Boston—and he has also written a symphony which has attracted considerable pre performance attention. Yesterday evening, however, marked his first apperance here as composer-soloist.

The concerto, written in three movements, is lively, agreeable to hear, a littel indefinite—on a first hearing—as to plan, and suggests the influence upon Mr. Foss of Gershwin's jazz idiom, a touch of Hindemith here and there, and a general impression that the composer is still assimilating outside influence without having quite an independent expression of his own. There is a noticable tendency to emphasize the orchestral rather than the solo part; indeed, most of the time the piano plays with the orchestra rather than by itself, certainly not due to any lack of virtuosity on the part of Mr. Foss—who gave a fine account of himself—but rather to the composer's greater interest in instrumental effects rather than in his own opportunities. The first and last movements are lively, strongly rhythmic and make considerable use of wind and brass; the second movement, the andante, is melodious, without being sentimental, gently paced, with emphasis on the strings. The capacity house found the work greatly to its liking and gave Mr. Foss a real ovation.

The remained of the program included mostly familiar friends, but it was interesting to hear Mr. Fiedler's crisp, dramatic rendering of "La Valse," and the Adagio from Bach's Violin Sonata No. 3, played by the string section. There were, as always, numerous encores.

PARKERSBURG, W. VA.
NEWS

MAY 6 - 1945

Berlioz Work

Victor's first major symphonic release since the recording ban was lifted last November is also the first recording made in nearly five years by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra. Starring William Primrose, acclaimed by common consent as the greatest living master of the viola, the work is the first complete and only American recording of Hector Berlioz' "Harold In Italy, Op. 16." Housed in a handsome picture album, it is being released by Victor as a national special.

Musically, the work might be described as a concerto for viola; the title of the opus was suggested by Byron's wandering hero, but the four movements do not follow musically the action of the poem. Some index to the nature of this lush nineteenth-century French romanticism may be found in the names of the movements: I. Harold in the Mountains, Scenes of Melancholy, Happines and Joy; II. March of Pilgrims Singing their Evening Hymn; III. Serenade of a Mountaineer of the Abruzzito to his Mistress, a sweetly sentimental passage; and IV. the turbulent and richly orchestrated final movement, subtitled Orgy of Brigands.

Of the performance, it is enough to say that the Boston Symphony orchestra maintains that high standard which has made it one of America's finest musical organizations. On the technical side, Victor's engineers, who recorded the work in Boston's Symphony Hall less than a week after the ban was lifted, have outdone themselves to do justice to the perfect balance between Primrose and the orchestra, to record for all time the sonorities of a performance which was one of the high spots of the Boston Symphony's current season.

The composition itself has a fantastic history, since it was commissioned by the ailing Paganini, whose fame as a virtuoso on his famous Stradivarius viola was second only to his glamour as the most famous violinist of his time. When the work was completed, Paganini—who had not discussed prices with Berlioz—sent the composer twenty thousand francs, on which the grateful Berlioz supported his family while he wrote his "Romeo and Juliet Symphony". Oddly, Paganini never performed "Harold In Italy"—presumably because he was in ill health when the work was completed, and because he died a little more than a year after Berlioz turned over the score to him.

For the Ameircan record debut of "Harold In Italy", Primrose, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra give this unusual work a stunning, stirring performance.

By a Staff Photographer

Lukas Foss

Soloist in his own Piano Concerto at the Pops Sunday night.

COLUSA, CAL.
SUN-HERALD

MAY 5 1945

Pops Concert Offers Music In Lighter Vein

THE BOSTON POPS ORCHESTRA, with Arthur Fiedler conducting, will replace the Winter series of Boston Symphony concerts on KFBK at 5:30 o'clock today. Music in a lighter vein will be featured, today's concert including the Military Polonaise of Chopin, a favorite Waldteufel waltz, two works by Leroy Anderson, Jazz Legato and Jazz Pizzicato, and a medley from the musical, Oklahoma. . .

Arthur Fiedler

Ella Mae Morse, who first rocketed to fame with her recording of the Cow Cow Boogie, will sing her latest hit, Captain Kidd on the ANDY RUSSELL show tonight at 7 o'clock on KFBK. Backed by Lou Bring's orchestra, Russell will feature another of his popular Spanish-American songs, plus several late hit tunes.

Besides his main job as a naval pilot, Lieutenant Eddie Osborne has taken on extra duty as morale booster on the ships which have carried him. A portable organ always goes aboard with him and his playing has proved invaluable in cheering and relieving battle tension among the crew. Tonight on the MEET YOUR NAVY show, at 9 o'clock, he will play some of the tunes which proved so popular aboard ship.

POP CONCERT

Post May 14

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Pops Concerts do not go in for symphonies, but they do specialize in concertos both old and new. Last night's concert brought that of Lukas Foss, hiterto heard only over the air, with the gifted young composer as soloist. Although Mr. Foss is now the official pianist of the Boston Symphony we have had but little chance as yet to take his measure as a creative artist. The one piece we have heard, the tone poem, "The Prairie," based on a cantata subsequently heard in its entirety in New York, was derivitive in style and so is this Concerto. Mr. Foss is still in the blotting paper stage, more occupied with absorbing than with giving out.

For that reason the Concerto kept one busy spotting influences. The background is prevailingly jazzy, turning to blues in the slow division. Yet in addition to what might be called these Gershwinisms, there are hints of Hindemith and suggestions of Ravel. Anyway, the work, though slight and none too firmly knit, is clever and entertaining and says a good deal for Mr. Foss' resourcesfulness, if not much for his originality. Arthur Fiedler conducted the music with evident sympathy for it. It is, in fact, the sort of thing in which he particularly excells. And, of course, Mr. Foss was quite at home with the piano part. In the matter of Sunday Pops, this concert inclined toward the serious side and the composers of the evening also included Tchaikovsky, Weber, Bach and Ravel. The customary capacity audience received Mr. Foss warmly.

NEWARK, N.J.
STATE TIMES
5/26/45

When asked what his favorite compositions are, Dr. Koussevitzky, 70-year-old conductor of "The Boston Symphony Orchestra" (Saturday evening, Blue Network), always replies in favor of the selection he is about to perform. His skill at programming for 21 years of concerts with the orchestra shows his love for all music.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAY 1 9 1945

Mozart and Bach Festival Scheduled for Tanglewood

A summer festival comprising music of Mozart and Johann Sebastian Bach is announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given at Tanglewood in the Berkshires this summer. Serge Koussevitzky will be the conductor, and the orchestra will consist of players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including all the principals. Famous soloists will assist at each concert. There will be six concerts on three weekends, with six different programs, to be given on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 28-29, August 4-5, August 11-12. The soloists will be announced shortly.

Certain of the works of Mozart will be repeated from last year's festival, and others will be added. The instrumental music of Bach, originally all of chamber scope, is likewise perfectly suited to a hall and group of this size.

The festival will follow the general scheme of the Mozart festival presented by Dr. Koussevitzky and members of his orchestra last summer.

Programs will include music of Bach's, Brandenburg Concerto, orchestral suites and piano concertos. There will be several piano concertos by Mozart, the Concertante for Violin and Viola, the three final symphonies and other symphonies, divertimenti, serenades and "Night Music." Fuller details and subscription information will be announced next week.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

MAY 1 8 1945

Bach and Mozart Festival At Tanglewood This Summer

Serge Koussevitzky, who is now at Seranak, his estate at Lenox, in recess from his activities as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a festival of the music of Bach and Mozart at Tanglewood this summer. This will be the only interruption to his vacation, since he has refused a number of invitations, here and abroad.

The general plan of the festival held at Tanglewood last summer will be adhered to, but will be extended to three weeks instead of two, with six concerts on three week ends, each with a different program, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 28-29, Aug. 4-5, and Aug. 11-12. The repertory will be broadened by the addition of music of Bach. There will be a distinguished soloist at each concert, and the list of artists is to be announced shortly.

The concerts, as previously, will be given in the opera-concert hall. This small auditorium, which seats 1150, has proved ideal for music of chamber orchestra combinations. The orchestra is to consist of players of the Boston Symphony, including all the principals. Like Mozart's, the instrumental music of Bach, originally all of chamber scope, is perfectly suited to a hall and orchestra of this size.

Each program will contain music of both composers and will consist, from the music of Bach, of Brandenburg Concertos, Orchestral suites and piano concertos. There will be several piano concertos by Mozart, the Concertante for Violin and Viola, the three final symphonies and other symphonies, divertimenti, serenades and "Night Music." Fuller details and subscription information, with address for mail orders, will be announced next week.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEWS

MAY 15 1945

Broadway

By DANTON WALKER

Broadway Underground

Ezra Pound, the American poet who broadcast propaganda for the Fascists, will be flown here from Italy to stand trial for treason. . . . Indalecio Prieto, the refugee Spanish Republican leader now in San Francisco, is trying to get an okay to set up a Provisional Spanish Government in Mexico. . . . Eight Nazi submarines in all are due to surrender here. . . . The FBI and Scotland Yard are cooperating in a hunt for leaders of an international black market ring which has been working in cahoots with harbor pirates who rob supply ships both here and in Europe. . . . Corliss Lamont, the left-of-center son of Thomas Lamont, is penning a rebuttal to William L. White's book on Soviet Russia. . . . A Philadelphia movie house, baffled by a mob demanding free admissions, finally learned the reason. Three years ago there was an announcement on the marquee offering free seats to everybody the day Hitler died.

* * *

Brig. Gen. Harold N. Gilbert has the inside track to become head of the Veterans Administration, if and when Gen. Frank T. Hines steps down. . . . Economists are trying to persuade Congress that war bonuses, if they are voted, should be paid off in weekly or monthly allotments, to insure prosperity over a longer period. . . . The National Council of American-Soviet Friendship, as part of its "intensive educational program," is holding a giant rally at Madison Square Garden May 31, called a Salute to the GIs of the United Nations. Gen. Stilwell will be the main speaker for the U. S., and the Soviet Armies will be represented by Maj. Gen. I. Saraev. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Infantry Combat Band and Paul Robeson will sing. . . . Josephine Baker, in London doing Army camp shows, is giving a special Victory Concert this week with Noel Coward. The former Harlem gal is now a Sous-Lieutenant, Auxiliaire Feminine, the French version of the WAC.

* * *

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

MAY 1 3 1945

Boston "Pop" Concerts Pioneered In Bringing Good Music To Many

THE American "Pop" Concert—which made its first New Haven appearance May 9 in the Arena—had its debut in Boston, like many other good old customs in this country.

The Boston "Pops", which this Summer will celebrate their 17th season, are known to hundreds of thousands of music-lovers who listen to them regularly on a national radio hook-up. They are known even more intimately to the thousands who each week during the Summer make up the regular audience, which ranges from 5.000 to 25,000 people.

The "Pops", given by 85 members of the Boston Symphony and directed by Arthur Fiedler, are presented on a wide expanse of green grass along Boston's Charles River Esplanade. The ten-week series follows the regular schedule of the Boston Symphony.

Financial support for the Boston "Pops" comes from a variety of sources. It comes from an annual subscription letter, from voluntary deposits made by the audience in return for the programs, and from a share of the very nominal chair rental fees. If it becomes necessary, additional financial strength is drawn from the orchestra treasury. This has seldom happened.

The series is known in Boston as "The Go-As-You-Please Symphonies", and the shirt-sleeved audience with its families and dogs and Sunday papers is in sharp contrast to the stiff formalism of a normal symphony concert. There are no gates, no barriers, no ticket-windows—in fact, no tickets.

The Esplanade "Pops" have not always enjoyed their present popularity. When Edward Fiedler, first broached his scheme almost 20 years ago, there was considerable opposition from conservative, tradition-proud Boston.

"The public only likes jazz," Fiedler was told. "You'll lose thousands of dollars. Your orchestral tone will be destroyed by the wind from the river."

MUSIC shell for Robin Hood Dell concerts in Philadelphia is typical of settings for most outdoor "Pop" concerts which stemmed from Boston, finally reached here.

Fiedler, however, thought he had something, and with the help of a few supporters he launched his first season. And as many have since discovered, Fiedler found that the public does not reserve its approval for jazz alone. Fiedler's program of light classics was heartily applauded.

The possibility of tone-distortion in the open air was solved by the erection of a large orchestral shell, similar to that of the Robin Hood Dell "Pops" in Philadelphia.

Fiedler's Boston "Pops" were so successful that his temporary orchestral housing was replaced by the City with the Edward Hatch Memorial shell, made of teak-lined granite and costing $250,000. Erection of the shell was made possible by the municipal discovery of a 20-year-old fund, which had never been applied, for "the erection of a public beauty spot."

Success of the Boston "Pops" soon stirred considerable interest in other American cities. In Chicago, 14 "Pop" concerts are now given in Orchestral Hall, which seats almost 3,000.

The Robin Hood Dell concerts, in Philadelphia, are a seven-week series, held, as in Boston, in the open. The Dell is set in a green, tree-lined glade. The Philadelphia concerts have featured such nationally-known conductors as Sigmund Romberg, Andre Kostelanetz, George Szell, Pierre Monteux, and Vladimir Golschmann.

In Newark, New Jersey, similar concerts are held each Summer in Lewisohn Stadium, with equal success.

The New Haven "Pop" concerts, like those in the other cities, are designed to bring good music to a wider audience. The concert May 9 in the Arena was the first in the local series, the majority of which will be given during the Summer in the Yale Bowl.

The second "Pop" concert here will be presented Memorial Day Eve, May 29, again in the Arena. The night before Memorial Day has been chosen as one particularly appropriate in this fourth year of American participation in the war, and symphony officials hope too that the holiday May 30 will enable many music-lovers to take advantage of the concert. The University Glee Club will participate in this concert.

Indicative of the informal character of New Haven's coming "Pop" concerts is the seating layout at the Arena. There are three types of seats—unreserved and reserved seats, and reserved tables. Be[illegible], soft drinks and refreshments will be served at tables on the Arena floor during intermissions. As in Boston, the series will be "Go-As-You-Please Symphonies."

A number of guest artists will appear with the New Haven Symphony Orchestra. The New Haven "Pop" series are being sponsored by the Junior Chamber of Commerce, with arrangements in charge of a Junior Chamber committe headed by Ogden D. Miller and Roland M. Bixler. The plan itself was developed by an over-all committee headed by Judge Carroll C. Hincks, president of the New Haven Orchestra Association.

"POP" planners include Ogden D. Miller, Yale athletic director; Judge Carroll C. Hincks, president New Haven Orchestra Association; Roland M. Bixler, Junior Chamber director.

JACKSON, TENN.
SUN

MAY 1 8 1945

Variations "Pop Goes the Weasel" by Lucien Gailliet will be played tomorrow on the third Boston "Pops" Orchestra program over WTJS from 7:30 to 8:30. Arthur Fiedler, conductor, however, will not play it as dance orchestras did in the days of the Virginia Reel.

Gailliet, noted arranger, whose works include an orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures At An Exhibition," has taken the old dance tune and set it as a fugue, a minuet as though it were played by a music box, as it might sound "in Jerusalem" and finally, "A la Jazz."

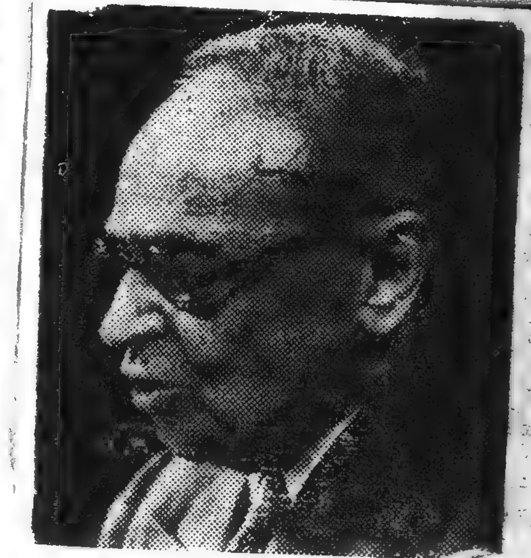
The program also will be include Ravel's "Bolero," Handel's "Largo," from Delizes' ballet, "Sylvia."

The broadcast is another in the series sponsored by the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Company. Oliver Daniel, producer, and Gene Hamilton, announcer-commentator, for the winter concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, continue in these assignments for the "Pops" series.

CHARLIE McMILLIN.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER

MAY 1 5 1945



Serge Koussevitsky, famous conductor, will lead a fifty-six piece Combat Infantry Band at the "Salute to the G.I.'s of the United Nations" rally May 31, in Madison Square Garden.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

MAY 1 9 1945

Boston Symphony Will Give Festival at Tanglewood

A SUMMER festival of music of Mozart and Johann Sebastian Bach, to be given at Tanglewood in the Berkshires, is announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be conductor, and the orchestra will consist of players from the Boston organization, including all of the principals. Famous soloists will assist at each concert. Six concerts on three week-ends, with six different programs, will be given on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 28-29, Aug. 4-5 and Aug. 11-12.

Certain of the Mozart works given at last summer's festival will be repeated and others added. The instrumental music of Bach, originally all of chamber scope, will be represented by selections from the Brandenburg Concertos, orchestral suites and piano concertos. The concerts will be held in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood, which seats 1150 and has proved ideal for music of chamber orchestra proportions.

Soloists and further details concerning subscription information will be announced soon.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

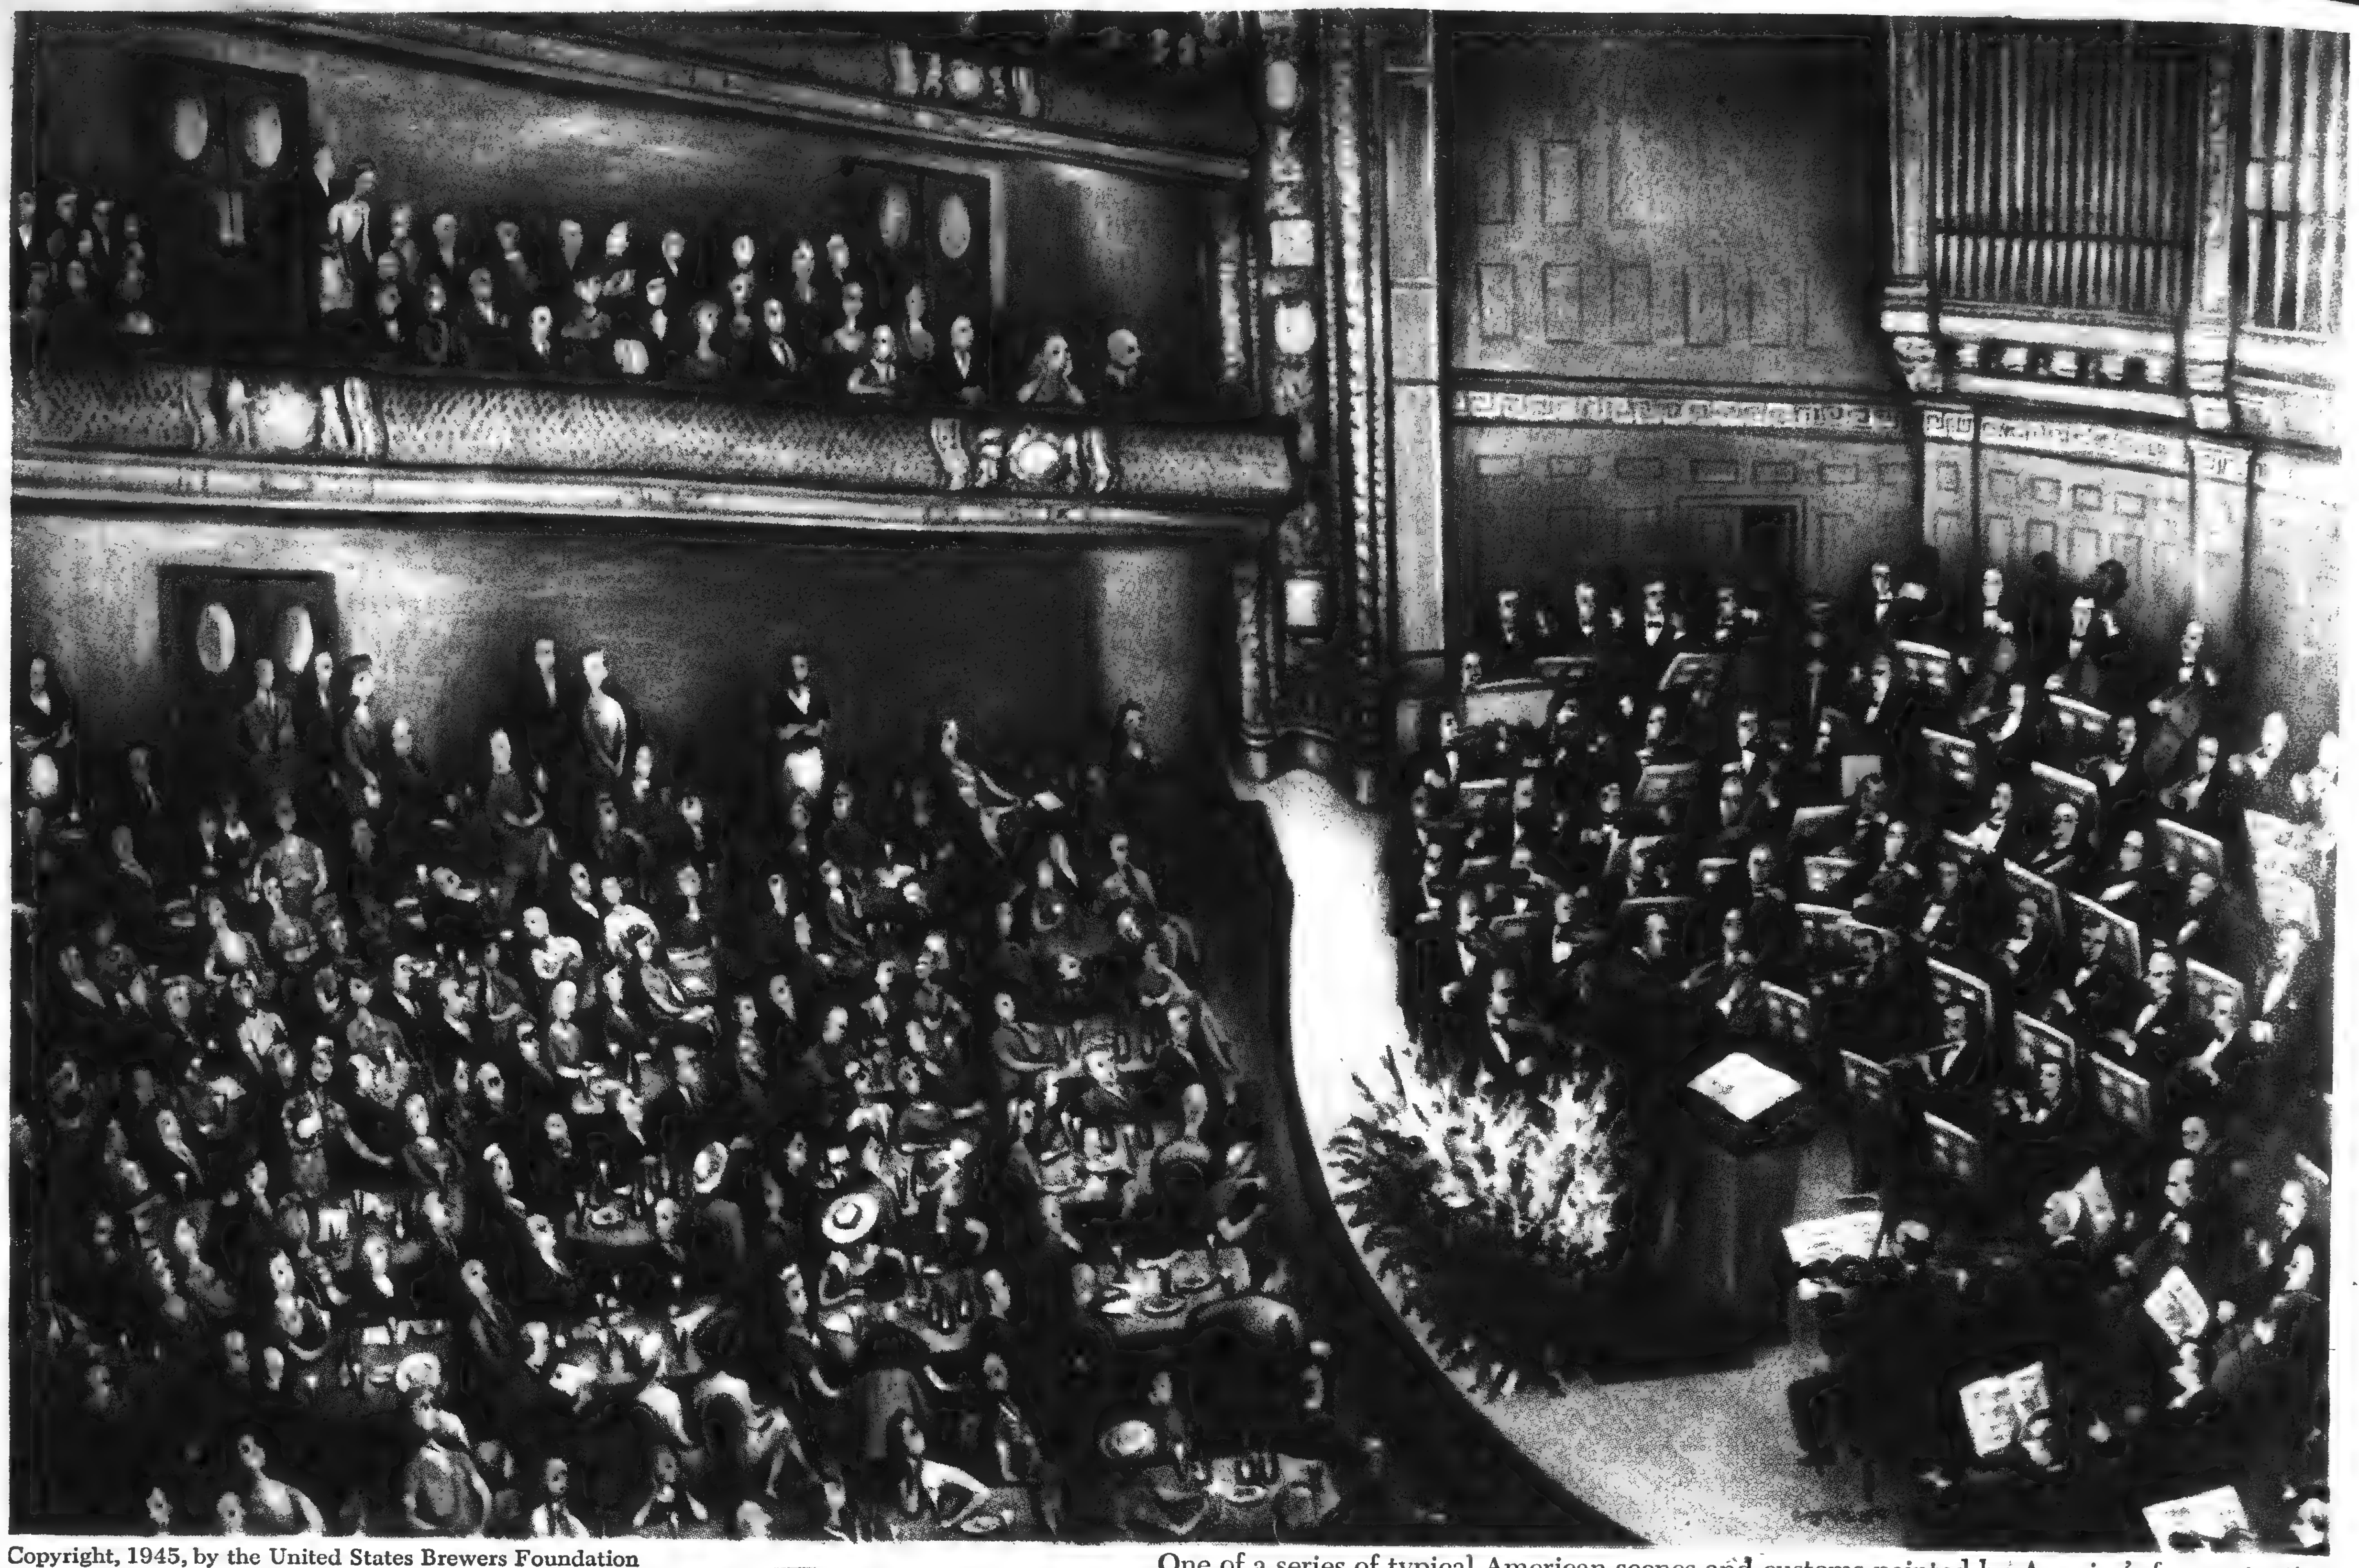
MAY 2 0 1945

Bach-Mozart Festival At Tanglewood

A summer festival comprising music of Mozart and Johann Sebastian Bach is announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given at Tanglewood in the Berkshires this summer. Serge Koussevitzky will be the conductor, and the orchestra will consist of players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including all the principals. Famous soloists will assist at each concert. There will be six concerts on three week-ends, with six different programmes, to be given on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 28-29, August 4-5, August 11-12. The soloists will be announced shortly.

Each programme will contain music of both composers and will consist, from the music of Bach, of Brandenburg Concertos, orchestral suites and piano concertos. There will be several piano concertos by Mozart, the Concertante for Violin and Viola, the three final symphonies and other symphonies, divertimenti, serenades and "Night Music."

[01]



Copyright, 1945, by the United States Brewers Foundation

One of a series of typical American scenes and customs painted by America's foremost artists.

Life May 21

Boston "Pops" Concert . . . painted by Lucille Corcos

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY 20 1945

THE BOSTON 'POPS'

By WILLIAM M. BLAIR

BOSTON, Mass.

MANY of Boston's peculiarities often baffle the stranger. Seeking explanations for local phenomena, he gets wholly unsatisfactory answers.

Such is the case of the Boston "Pops" concerts, now in progress. If the visitor asks why the "Pops" has rolled on through a record fifty-nine-year spring and summer series, he is likely to get this answer: "Why, we have the 'Pops,' just as we have the Symphony."

It's still a debatable question whether the "Pops" took its name from "popular" or the popping corks of wine bottles so conspicuous on the tables scattered over the main floor of Symphony Hall. The early concerts appear to have been as much noted for the beer and stimulating conversation as for the waltzes and other light music then in vogue. When no liquor license was obtained in 1890 the concerts were omitted as a matter of course. But a change in emphasis may be indicated by the fact that during prohibition the "Pops" went up in public esteem.

Ad Neuendorf, who later became conductor at the Metropolitan Opera, conducted the first "Pops" concert on July 11, 1885, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was four years old. The first concerts were called "Promenade Concerts," after the old London concerts, and were more or less an experiment. There was plenty of rivalry in town that hot summer night. The people flocked to the Boston Museum to see " 'Polly, the Pet of the Regiment,' introducing the charming prima donna, Lillian Russell." But the "Proms," which became the "Pops" in 1900, outlasted all rivals.

Another strange bit of "Pops" history is that the concerts drew a new impetus from a conductor brought up in the serious musical tradition. Arthur Fiedler, who is starting his sixteenth season with the baton, came on the scene in 1930, and it appears that under his direction the "Pops" meet the conflict between the "jazz hounds" and the "highbrows."

The only requirement for admission to a "Pops" program is that a piece have a sparkle of its own, and under this standard Mr. Fiedler weaves in Johann Strauss, Offenbach, Bizet, Brahms and the moderns, Gershwin, Kern, Porter, Robert McBride and Morton Gould, to the increasing delight of his devoted followers.

The stranger may be startled to come across the wine and beer list next to a résumé of Brahms' "Academic Festival" Overture in the program, but Bostonians feel he'll enjoy both.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

MAY 20 1945

Bach, Mozart Festival

A summer festival comprising music of Mozart and Johann Sebastian Bach is announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood in the Berkshires this summer. Serge Koussevitzky will be the conductor ~~and the or-~~chestra will consist of players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including all the principals. Famous soloists will assist at each concert. There will be six concerts on three week ends, with six different programs, to be given on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 28-29, August 4-5 and August 11-12. The soloists will be announced shortly. The festival will follow the general scheme of the Mozart festival presented by Dr. Koussevitzky and members of his orchestra last summer.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 20 1945

Berkshire Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra. under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. will give a summer festival ~~at~~ Tanglewood in the Berkshires on Saturday evenings and Sunday evenings July 28-29, Aug. 4-5 and Aug. 11-12. Works by Mozart and Bach will be performed. The soloists will be announced later.

Each program will contain music of both composers and will consist from the music of Bach of Brandenburg Concertos. orchestral suites and piano concertos. There will be several piano concertos by Mozart, the Concertante for Violin and Viola, the three final symphonies and other symphonies. divertimenti. serenades and "Night Music." Fuller details and subscription information, with address for mail orders, will be announced next week.

Gx May 20

ON SUMMER MUSIC

Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood In July-Aug. by Symphony Principals Players

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

OUR great symphony orchestras are the size they are because much of the music they play cannot be handled adequately by a smaller aggregation. The gradual doubling, tripling and even quadrupling of the wind choir (not to mention the percussion department) necessitated more and more strings for counterbalance. Besides, the latter are often elaborately subdivided. And as the orchestras have expanded so has the concert hall, the ancestor of which was a room in someone's palace. This is another way of saying that we currently hear the music of Bach, Haydn and Mozart under conditions very different from those in which it was first given to the world. We are not unfamiliar with the compromise effected by reducing the number of strings in a Haydn or Mozart symphony or even in the First and Second of Beethoven, which respond well to such treatment. More often than not, however, conductors blaze away with the full string band and, if they are so disposed, double the winds in the so-called "tutti" passages. And it must be admitted that there are symphonies by these 18th century masters that rise to the occasion when they are set forth in this way. So much so, in fact, that a small-scaled performance seems to take from them something essential, as though what the composer wrought was bigger than he himself had realized.

The above variations on a not entirely unfamiliar theme were designed to serve as preface for the announcement that Dr. Koussevitzky, the Symphony principals and other members of the orchestra will present a Bach-Mozart festival at Tanglewood (near Lenox), the seat of the orchestra's summer activities in the Berkshires, on three week ends during July and August. Specifically, the six concerts will fall on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 28 and 29, Aug. 4 and 5, and 11 and 12. The real Berkshire Festival in the large auditorium with the full orchestra participating is to be abandoned for yet another season because of transportation difficulties, and the orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood again goes by the board for the same reason. Last summer Dr. Koussevitzky tried the experiment of a Mozart festival with these players in the theatre-concert hall, which seats 1150 persons, and its exceedingly successful outcome prompted the one now projected. Incidentally, these six concerts will mark the conductor's only emergence from a well-earned rest and retirement, though he has had invitations to appear as guest not only in this country but abroad.

* * *

The actual programs have not yet been decided upon nor is Symphony Hall yet ready to announce the soloists, of which there will be one at each concert.

This much has been disclosed: Both composers will figure on each program. From Bach will come some of the Brandenburg concertos, orchestral suites and concertos for piano with orchestra while Mozart will be represented by his three last and greatest symphonies, certain of the other symphonies, divertimenti, serenades and piano concertos. Last year there were operatic arias and overtures but there is no mention of these in the present announcement and there seems to be material enough for six lists without them.

For two summers, the Symphony "principals and others" have given concerts in Boston and, in the first season, in Boston and Cambridge. These "seersucker symphonies," as an inspired colleague dubbed them after a sweltering afternoon in Harvard's Sanders Theatre, will not be presented this summer unless present plans are changed. This news undoubtedly will be a disappointment to those stay-at-homes who found pleasure in these often delightful affairs, though it is not entirely unwelcome to the music critics, who were becoming somewhat terrified by the growing extension of the Symphony Orchestra's activities.

To get back to Beethoven, a rare item of his, the Second Piano Concerto in B-flat major, will be presented at Wednesday evening's Pops Concert, with Evelyn Barry, Radcliffe '46, as the soloist. This concerto, actually the first in point of composition, and dating from 1794-95, has never been played at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The only performance of it which this reviewer recalls was given by the People's Symphony with Ethel Leginska officiating both as pianist and conductor. On this same program, the annual Radcliffe night, Arthur Fiedler will present another curiosity, Berlioz' Overture to the opera "Beatrice and Benedict." Tomorrow evening the entire house has been taken over by Boston University.

* * *

This afternoon in Jordan Hall, Anna Kaskas, Metropolitan Opera contralto, and Ralph Jusko, basso, will appear in joint recital, assisted by Albina Anthony, violin; Mary Louise Homer, 'cello, and Elizabeth Harnett, piano. Darbininkas Radio is the sponsor.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

Festival At Tanglewood

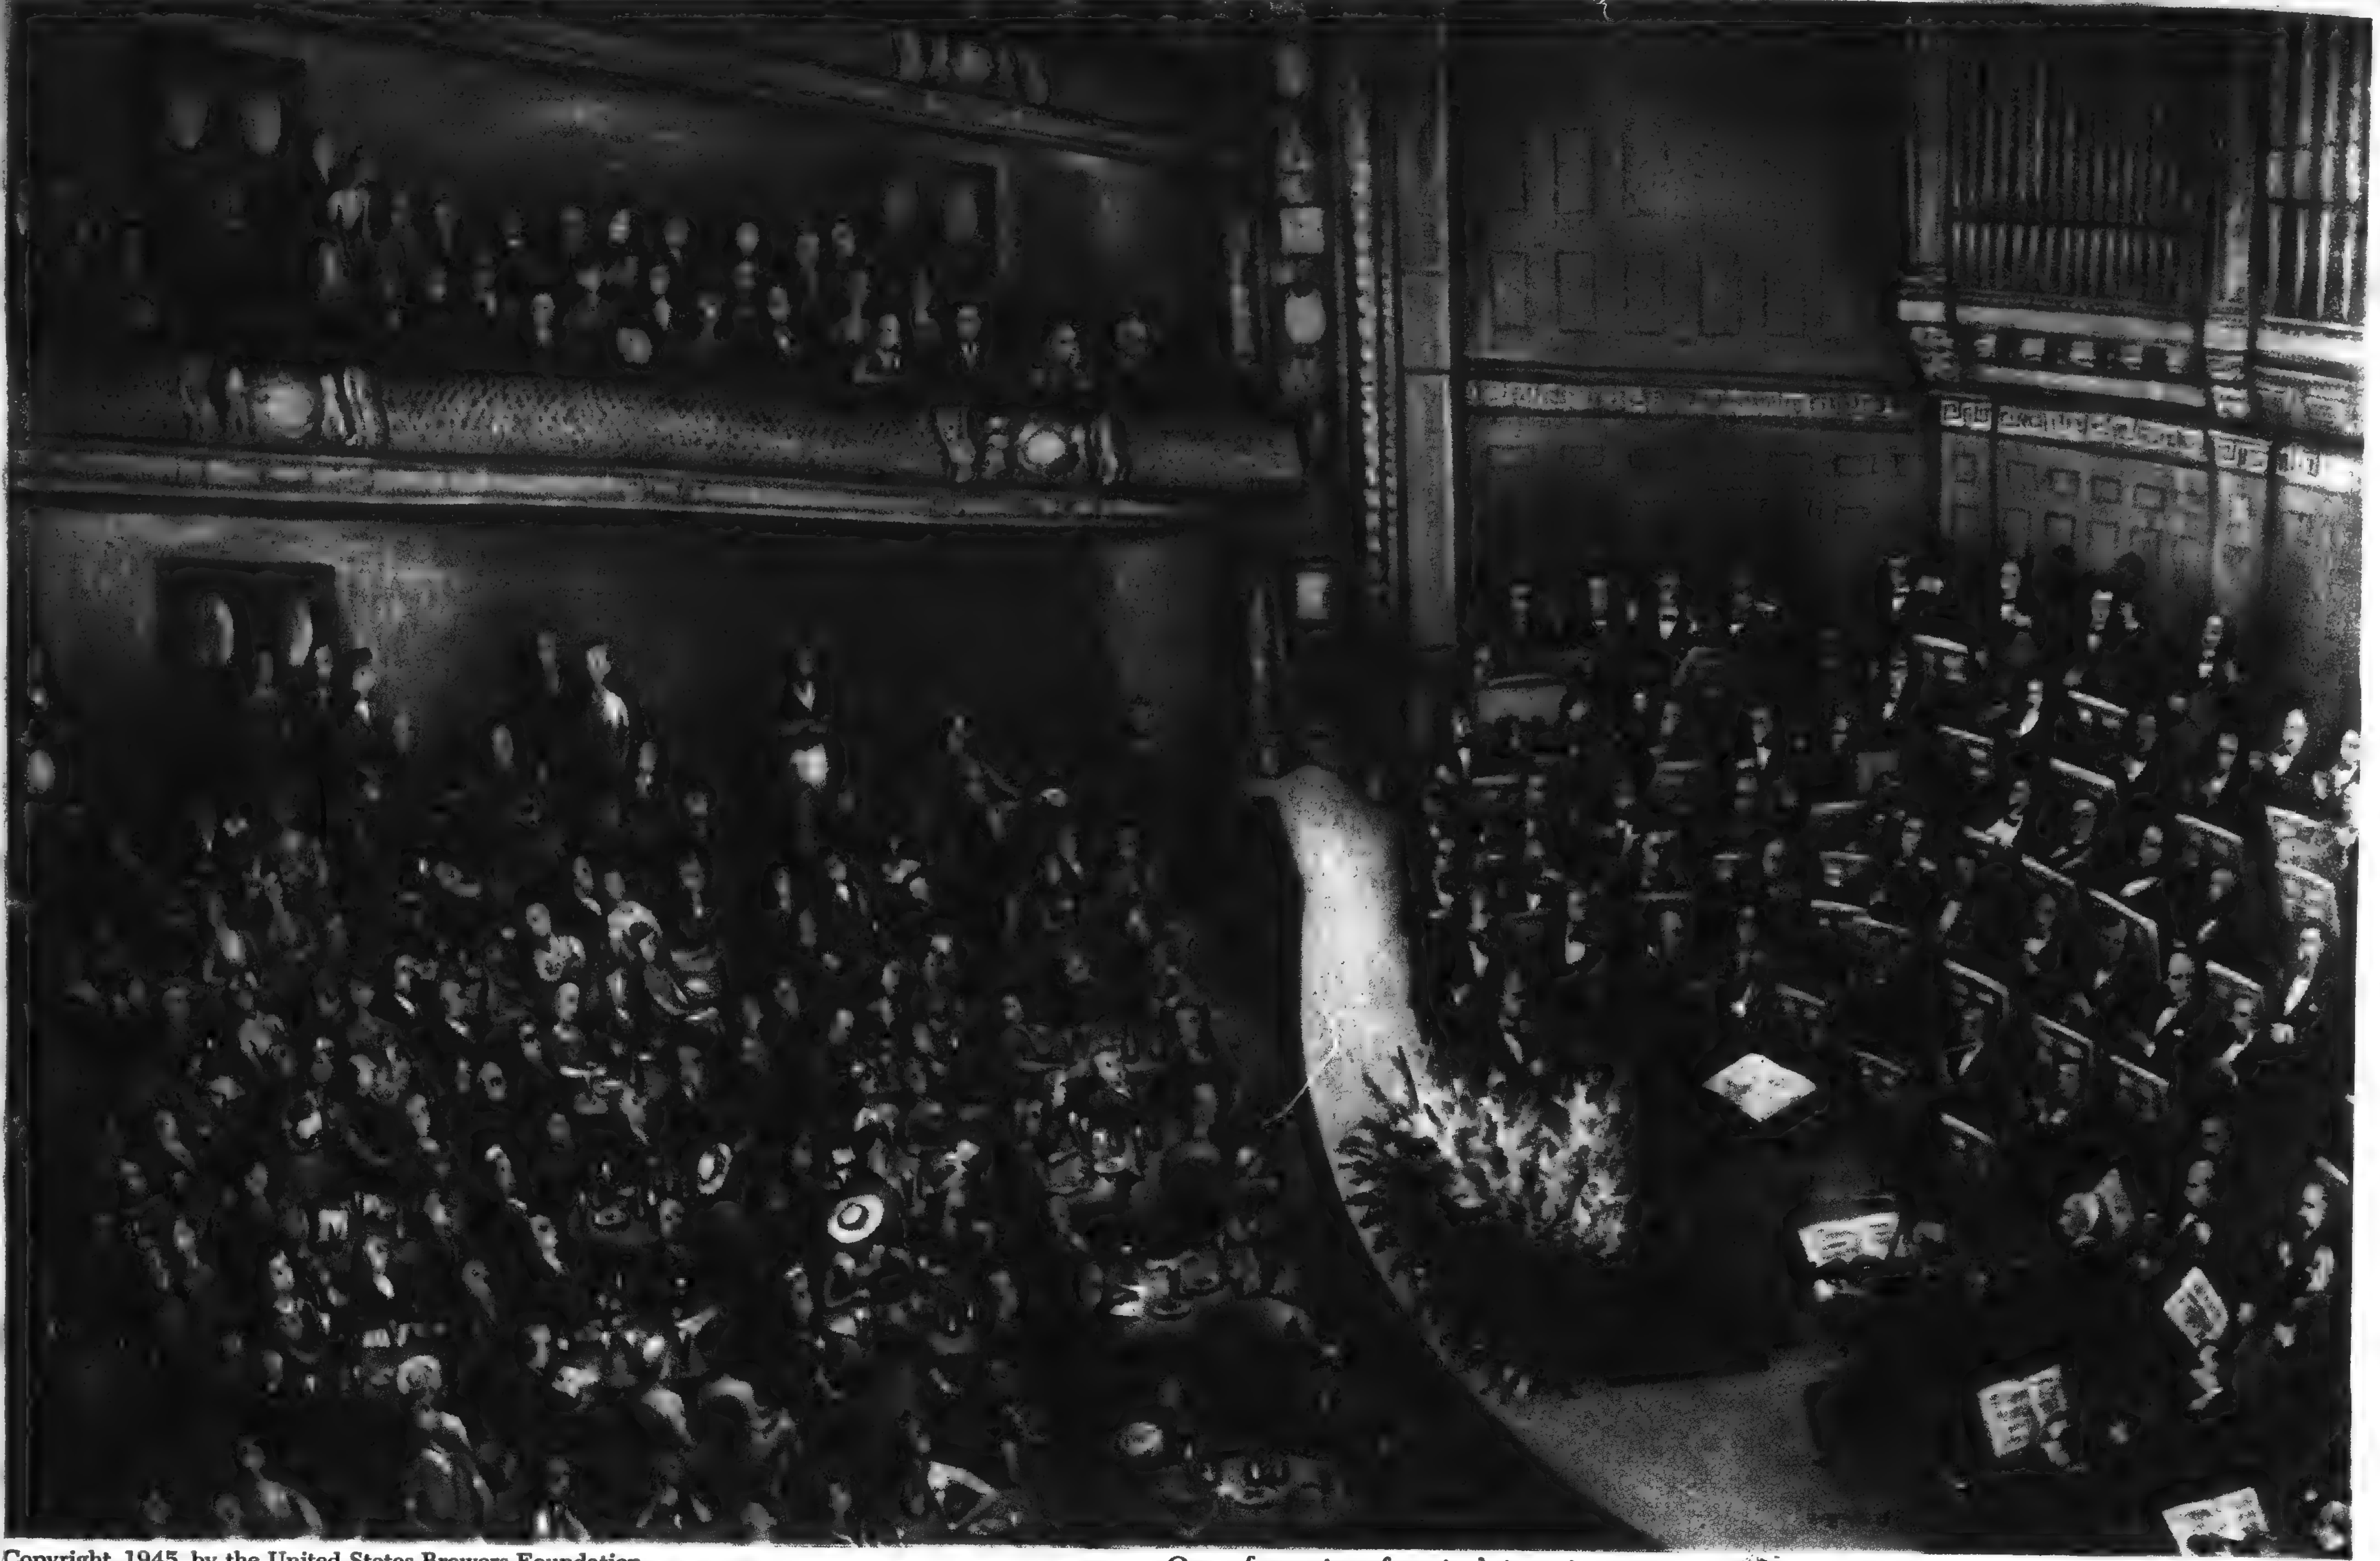
A SUMMER festival comprising music of Mozart and Johann Sebastian Bach is announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given at Tanglewood in the Berkshires this summer. Serge Koussevitzky will be the conductor and the orchestra will consist of players of the Boston Symphonic Orchestra, including all the principals. Famous soloists will assist at each concert. There will be six concerts on three week-ends, with six different programs, to be given on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 28-29, Aug. 4-5, Aug. 11-12. The soloists will be announced shortly.

Certain of the works of Mozart will be repeated from last year's festival and others will be added. The instrumental music of Bach, originally all of chamber scope, is likewise perfectly suited to a hall and group of this size. Dr. Koussevitzky will make a single interruption in his summer's rest to conduct the festival.

The festival will follow the general scheme of the Mozart festival presented by Dr. Koussevitzky and members of his orchestra last summer. The concerts will again be given at Tanglewood (between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass.) in the theater-concert hall, which seats 1150 and has proved ideal for music of chamber orchestra proportions.

Each program will contain music of both composers and will consists, from the music of Bach, of Brandenburg Concertos, orchestral suites and piano concertos. There will be several piano concertos by Mozart, the Concertante for Violin and Viola, the three final symphonies and other symphonies, divertimenti, serenades and "night music." Fuller details and subscription information, with address for mail orders, will be announced next week.

[95]



Copyright, 1945, by the United States Brewers Foundation

One of a series of typical American scenes and customs painted by America's foremost artists.

Life May 21

Boston "Pops" Concert . . . painted by Lucille Corcos

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAY 20 1945

THE BOSTON 'POPS'

By WILLIAM M. BLAIR

BOSTON, Mass.

MANY of Boston's peculiarities often baffle the stranger. Seeking explanations for local phenomena, he gets wholly unsatisfactory answers.

Such is the case of the Boston "Pops" concerts, now in progress. If the visitor asks why the "Pops" has rolled on through a record fifty-nine-year spring and summer series, he is likely to get this answer: "Why, we have the 'Pops,' just as we have the Symphony."

It's still a debatable question whether the "Pops" took its name from "popular" or the popping corks of wine bottles so conspicuous on the tables scattered over the main floor of Symphony Hall. The early concerts appear to have been as much noted for the beer and stimulating conversation as for the waltzes and other light music then in vogue. When no liquor license was obtained in 1890 the concerts were omitted as a matter of course. But a change in emphasis may be indicated by the fact that during prohibition the "Pops" went up in public esteem.

Ad Neuendorf, who later became conductor at the Metropolitan Opera, conducted the first "Pops" concert on July 11, 1885, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was four years old. The first concerts were called "Promenade Concerts," after the old London concerts, and were more or less an experiment. There was plenty of rivalry in town that hot summer night. The people flocked to the Boston Museum to see " 'Polly, the Pet of the Regiment,' introducing the charming prima donna, Lillian Russell." But the "Proms," which became the "Pops" in 1900, outlasted all rivals.

Another strange bit of "Pops" history is that the concerts drew a new impetus from a conductor brought up in the serious musical tradition. Arthur Fiedler, who is starting his sixteenth season with the baton, came on the scene in 1930, and it appears that under his direction the "Pops" meet the conflict between the "jazz hounds" and the "highbrows."

The only requirement for admission to a "Pops" program is that a piece have a sparkle of its own, and under this standard Mr. Fiedler weaves in Johann Strauss, Offenbach, Bizet, Brahms and the moderns, Gershwin, Kern, Porter, Robert McBride and Morton Gould, to the increasing delight of his devoted followers.

The stranger may be startled to come across the wine and beer list next to a résumé of Brahms' "Academic Festival" Overture in the program, but Bostonians feel he'll enjoy both.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

MAY 20 1945

Bach, Mozart Festival

A summer festival comprising music of Mozart and Johann Sebastian Bach is announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood in the Berkshires this summer. Serge Koussevitzky will be the conductor and the orchestra will consist of players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including all the principals. Famous soloists will assist at each concert. There will be six concerts on three week ends, with six different programs, to be given on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 28-29, August 4-5 and August 11-12. The soloists will be announced shortly. The festival will follow the general scheme of the Mozart festival presented by Dr. Koussevitzky and members of his orchestra last summer.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAY 20 1945

Berkshire Festival

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give a summer festival at Tanglewood in the Berkshires on Saturday evenings and Sunday evenings July 28-29, Aug. 4-5 and Aug. 11-12. Works by Mozart and Bach will be performed. The soloists will be announced later.

Each program will contain music of both composers and will consist from the music of Bach of Brandenburg Concertos, orchestral suites and piano concertos. There will be several piano concertos by Mozart, the Concertante for Violin and Viola, the three final symphonies and other symphonies, divertimenti, serenades and "Night Music." Fuller details and subscription information, with address for mail orders, will be announced next week.

[illegible] May 20

ON SUMMER MUSIC

Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood In July-Aug. by Symphony Principals Players

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

OUR great symphony orchestras are the size they are because much of the music they play cannot be handled adequately by a smaller aggregation. The gradual doubling, tripling and even quadrupling of the wind choir (not to mention the percussion department) necessitated more and more strings for counterbalance. Besides, the latter are often elaborately subdivided. And as the orchestras have expanded so has the concert hall, the ancestor of which was a room in someone's palace. This is another way of saying that we currently hear the music of Bach, Haydn and Mozart under conditions very different from those in which it was first given to the world. We are not unfamiliar with the compromise effected by reducing the number of strings in a Haydn or Mozart symphony or even in the First and Second of Beethoven, which respond well to such treatment. More often than not, however, conductors blaze away with the full string band and, if they are so disposed, double the winds in the so-called "tutti" passages. And it must be admitted that there are symphonies by these 18th century masters that rise to the occasion when they are set forth in this way. So much so, in fact, that a small-scaled performance seems to take from them something essential, as though what the composer wrought was bigger than he himself had realized.

The above variations on a not entirely unfamiliar theme were designed to serve as preface for the announcement that Dr. Koussevitzky, the Symphony principals and other members of the orchestra will present a Bach-Mozart festival at Tanglewood (near Lenox), the seat of the orchestra's summer activities in the Berkshires, on three week ends during July and August. Specifically, the six concerts will fall on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 28 and 29, Aug. 4 and 5, and 11 and 12. The real Berkshire Festival in the large auditorium with the full orchestra participating is to be abandoned for yet another season because of transportation difficulties, and the orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood again goes by the board for the same reason. Last summer Dr. Koussevitzky tried the experiment of a Mozart festival with these players in the theatre-concert hall, which seats 1150 persons, and its exceedingly successful outcome prompted the one now projected. Incidentally, these six concerts will mark the conductor's only emergence from a well-earned rest and retirement, though he has had invitations to appear as guest not only in this country but abroad.

* * *

The actual programs have not yet been decided upon nor is Symphony Hall yet ready to announce the soloists, of which there will be one at each concert.

This much has been disclosed: Both composers will figure on each program. From Bach will come some of the Brandenburg concertos, orchestral suites and concertos for piano with orchestra while Mozart will be represented by his three last and greatest symphonies, certain of the other symphonies, divertimenti, serenades and piano concertos. Last year there were operatic arias and overtures but there is no mention of these in the present announcement and there seems to be material enough for six lists without them.

For two summers, the Symphony "principals and others" have given concerts in Boston and, in the first season, in Boston and Cambridge. These "seersucker symphonies," as an inspired colleague dubbed them after a sweltering afternoon in Harvard's Sanders Theatre, will not be presented this summer unless present plans are changed. This news undoubtedly will be a disappointment to those stay-at-homes who found pleasure in these often delightful affairs, though it is not entirely unwelcome to the music critics, who were becoming somewhat terrified by the growing extension of the Symphony Orchestra's activities.

To get back to Beethoven, a rare item of his, the Second Piano Concerto in B-flat major, will be presented at Wednesday evening's Pops Concert, with Evelyn Barry, Radcliffe '46, as the soloist. This concerto, actually the first in point of composition, and dating from 1794-95, has never been played at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The only performance of it which this reviewer recalls was given by the People's Symphony with Ethel Leginska officiating both as pianist and conductor. On this same program, the annual Radcliffe night, Arthur Fiedler will present another curiosity, Berlioz' Overture to the opera "Beatrice and Benedict." Tomorrow evening the entire house has been taken over by Boston University.

* * *

This afternoon in Jordan Hall, Anna Kaskas, Metropolitan Opera contralto, and Ralph Jusko, basso, will appear in joint recital, assisted by Albina Anthony, violin; Mary Louise Homer, 'cello, and Elizabeth Harnett, piano. Darbininkas Radio is the sponsor.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

MAY 20 1945

Festival At Tanglewood

A SUMMER festival comprising music of Mozart and Johann Sebastian Bach is announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given at Tanglewood in the Berkshires this summer. Serge Koussovitzky will be the conductor and the orchestra will consist of players of the Boston Symphonic Orchestra, including all the principals. Famous soloists will assist at each concert. There will be six concerts on three week-ends, with six different programs, to be given on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 28-29, Aug. 4-5, Aug. 11-12. The soloists will be announced shortly.

Certain of the works of Mozart will be repeated from last year's festival and others will be added. The instrumental music of Bach, originally all of chamber scope, is likewise perfectly suited to a hall and group of this size. Dr. Koussevitzky will make a single interruption in his summer's rest to conduct the festival.

The festival will follow the general scheme of the Mozart festival presented by Dr. Koussevitzky and members of his orchestra last summer. The concerts will again be given at Tanglewood (between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass.) in the theater-concert hall, which seats 1150 and has proved ideal for music of chamber orchestra proportions.

Each program will contain music of both composers and will consists, from the music of Bach, of Brandenburg Concertos, orchestral suites and piano concertos. There will be several piano concertos by Mozart, the Concertante for Violin and Viola, the three final symphonies and other symphonies, divertimenti, serenades and "night music." Fuller details and subscription information, with address for mail orders, will be announced next week.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
45

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Mozart and Bach Programs Planned for Festival at Tanglewood This Summer

A SECOND wartime Berkshire Music Festival will be given this summer at Tanglewood, with Serge Koussevitzky once more presiding over an orchestra made up of members of the Boston Symphony. This year's festival will include the music of Mozart and Bach, and will last for three week-ends, July 28-29, Aug. 4-5 and Aug. 11-12. Each week-end will include one Saturday evening and one Sunday afternoon concert, and many distinguished soloists have been engaged for the occasion.

The festival will follow the pattern established by last year's Mozart programs, with concerts being given in the intimate Theatre-Concert Hall at Tanglewood. Some of Mozart's works heard last summer will be repeated, and others will be added. The instrumental music of Bach, much of it designed for small concerts, was chosen as being well suited to the dimensions of the festival and of the hall, which seats 1,150.

Though detailed programs have not as yet been announced, each program will include music of both composers. Bach will be represented by the Brandenburg Concertos, orchestral suites and piano concertos. There will be several piano concertos of Mozart, the Concertante for Violin and Viola, the three last symphonies and divertimentos, serenades and the "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik."

The New York première of "The Quiet Don," the opera by the Soviet composer, Ivan Dzerzhinsky, will be given at Carnegie Hall next Sunday by the Russian Grand Opera Company. The performance will be repeated Monday and Tuesday of next week, and all three performances are dedicated to the Red Army.

The libretto for the opera is based on the famous novel, "And Quiet Flows the Don," by the Soviet writer, Mikhail Sholokhov, which had an extensive sale in this country a few years ago. The opera is dedicated to Dimitri Shostakovich.

Music by French composers who participated in the resistance movement, and by American composers, will be presented at a Town Hall concert Tuesday evening. Claude Delvincourt, director of the Paris Conservatoire and an ardent anti-Vichyite, will be represented by his "Danceries." Other Frenchmen whose music will be played include Poulenc, Satie, Chabrier and Milhaud. The American contingent will be represented by Theodore Chanler and Arthur Berger, music editor of The Sun. Mr. Berger will accompany Romolo De Spirito, tenor, in his own "Words for Music Perhaps," a setting of three poems by Yeats.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the American première of Prokofieff's "March for Victory," Op. 99, at Madison Square Garden May 31. The new piece will be played by the Infantry Combat Band at a "Salute to the GI's of the United Nations," sponsored by the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship.

HARRISBURG, PA.
TELEGRAPH
MAY 29 1945

Anniversaries

Arthur Fiedler joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1915 as a fiddler, then switched to viola. Son of a prominent violinist, Arthur took over conducting the famed Boston "Pops" in 1930—thus this year marks his 15th year with the group. The "Pops" start their 60th year on May 1. The music of this great organization will be heard, as usual, over the Blue on Saturday evenings, commencing May 5.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
MAY 27 1945

Koussevitzky Widely Hailed As Conductor

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will lead his famous band in one of its two Bushnell Memorial concerts next season, has been acclaimed as one of the greatest symphony leaders of all time.

The Boston concerts are included in the six orchestra programs that make up the unique Bushnell series, which brings here also the Cleveland, National, Philadelphia and New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestras.

The celebrated Britisher, Sir Adrian Boult, will conduct the other Boston concert. Rudolf Firkusny and Beryly Rubinstein, outstanding pianists, will be guest soloists with the National and Cleveland orchestras, respectively.

Typical of the acclaim given to Dr. Koussevitsky, is the following excerpt from an article about the famous Russian by Arthur Lourie in the Musical Quarterly last July. Mr. Louie writes:—

"Before his Boston Symphony Orchestra stand, Serge Koussevitzky is at one and the same time the engineer who raises the sound-edifice of a modern score, the hypnotizer of crowds who imbues them with his own varying emotions, and the teacher who constantly improves the powers of executive of his instrumentalists—for daily drill is, after a fashion, the indispensable prose of music.

"For Koussevitzky, symphonic performance is like architectural creation. Starting out with the style of chamber music—that is, focusing his attention on what would be the requirements of a small space—he gradually amplifies that style with respect to conditions of both form and space, paying particular attention to details, whether assigned to a flute, a single violin, or a group of instruments. He ends by seeming to suggest the dissolution of the three dimensions and the liberation of music from their confining framework in order that it may soar into a space that is limitless. When he reaches this point, everything seems inadequate to him, all the units of measurement fall by the wayside, he wishes the music to be breathed forth in ever broader and broader phrases, the resonance to become ever more and more powerful; it is this which explains his characteristic skill in building up climaxes and his attraction towards monumental forms. In this kind of interpretation, one sees how the sensuous lyricism of his youth has become transformed, in the course of the years, into a grand lyrico-dramatic style. One might say that this style, apparently spontaneous but always carefully thought out and at times bearing the impress of meditation and even of pathos, strongly marks the three great schools of the symphony—the Russian, the French and the German—of which he is equally a master."

GREAT BARRINGTON,
MASS
COURIER
5/24/45

CONCERTS TO BE HELD

At Tanglewood, Lenox, July 28, 29 and Aug. 4, 5, 11 and 12

There will be concerts at Tanglewood in Lenox the latter part of July and the first part of August, according to a release made recently by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Dr. Serge Koussevitzki of Baldhead, Lenox, is the conductor. The concerts will be held on Saturday and Sunday evenings, July 28 and 29, August 4 and 5 and August 11 and 12.

Works by Mozart and Bach will be performed and the soloists will be announced at a later date. Each program will contain music of both composers and will consist of the music of Bach of the Brandenburg concertos, orchestral suites and piano concertos. There will also be several piano concertos by Mozart, the concertante for violin, the three final symphonies and other symphonies, and "Night Music."

Last year's Mozart festival, held at the Tanglewood theatre, was attended by a large number of music-lovers and this year's attendance is expected to be even larger.

BACH - MOZART FESTIVAL

At Tanglewood

(Between Lenox and Stockbridge, Massachusetts)

July 28-29, Aug. 4-5, 11-12

(Six Different Programs)

Directed by

Serge Koussevitsky

With the Assistance of the Principals and Other Members of the

BOSTON SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

(Six Soloists to be announced)

Reserved Season tickets available for 6 or for 4 concerts

If you wish tickets for six concerts fill in the following and mail to:—

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts

($27 inc. tax)
Please send .... tickets at ($18 inc. tax) for all six concerts for the Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, July 28, 29, August 4-5, 11-12, for which I enclose my check or money order for $.......

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
....

If you wish tickets for four concerts fill in the following and mail to:—

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts

($18 inc. tax)
Please send .... tickets at ($12 inc. tax) for four concerts for the Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, for which I enclose my check or money order for $......

(check)
(any)——July 28-29
(two)——August 4-5
(pair)——August 11-12

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
....

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAY 20 1945

~~Music, Festival~~ At Tanglewood Of Bach-Mozart

A Summer festival comprising music of Mozart and Johann Sebastian Bach is announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given at Tanglewood in the Berkshires. Serge Koussevitzky will be the conductor, and the orchestra will consist of players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including all the principals. Famous soloists will assist at each concert. There will be six concerts on three weekends, with six different programs, to be given on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 28-29, August 4-5, August 11-12. The soloists will be announced shortly.

Certain of the works of Mozart will be repeated from last year's Festival, and others will be added. The instrumental music of Bach, originally all of chamber scope, is likewise perfectly suited to a hall and group of this size.

The Festival will follow the general scheme of the Mozart Festival presented last Summer. The concerts will again be given at Tanglewood (between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass.) in the Theater-Concert Hall, which seats 1150 and has proved ideal for music of chamber orchestra proportions.

Each programme will contain music of both composers and will consist, from the music of Bach, of Brandenburg Concertos, orchestral suites and piano concertos. There will be several piano concertos by Mozart the Concertante for violin and Viola, the three final symphonies and other symphonies, divertimenti, serenades and "Night Music."

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
MAY 20 1945

Bach-Mozart Festival At Tanglewood

A Summer festival comprising music of Mozart and Johann Sebastian Bach is announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given at Tanglewood in the Berkshires this Summer. Serge Koussevitzky will be the conductor, and the orchestra will consist of players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including all the principals. Famous soloists will assist at each concert. There will be six concerts on three week-ends, with six different programs, to be given on Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, July 28-29, Aug. 4-5, Aug. 11-12. The soloists will be announced shortly.

Certain of the works of Mozart will be repeated from last year's Festival, and others will be added. The instrumental music of Bach, originally all of chamber scope, is likewise perfectly suited to a hall and group of this size. Dr. Koussevitzky will make a single interruption in his Summer's rest to conduct the Festival.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD
MAY 27 1945

Programs of the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, under Serge Koussevitzky, will be devoted this summer to the works of Bach and Mozart. No one has explained just what these concerts are supposed to do for American culture. Perhaps, like most other concerts, they are just given to make money.

ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION
MAY 20 1945

Music

By Edgar S. Van Olinda

A SUMMER festival, comprising music of Mozart and Johann Sebastian Bach, is announced by the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be held at Tanglewood, in the Berkshires, this year. Serge Koussevitzky will be the conductor and the orchestra will consist of players of the Boston Symphony orchestra, including all the principals. Famous guest soloists will appear at each concert.

There will be six concerts on three week-ends with six different programs, to be given on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 28-29, August 4-5, August 11-12. Certain of the works of Mozart will be repeated from last year's festival, and others will be added. The instrumental music of Bach, originally of chamber scope, is likewise perfectly suited to a hall and group of this size.

Each program will contain music of both composers, and will consist, from the works of Bach, of Brandenburg concertos, orchestral suites and piano concertos. There will also be several piano concertos by Mozart; the "Concertante" for violin and viola; the three final symphonies, divertimenti, serenades and "Night Music."

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

MAY 28 1945

Music Festival Is Scheduled At Tanglewood This Summer

By Helen Havener

NEW YORK, May 28—Music lovers are rejoicing in the announceement that there will be a second Wartime Music Festival at Tanglewood this Summer, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky on the podium and the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the music-makers. The dates set are the week-ends of July 28-29, August 4-5 and August 11-12. Concerts will be given in the Theater-Concert Hall and Mozart and Bach will be featured with Bach's Brandenburg Concerto scheduled for performance, and the Concertante for Violin and Viola, the last three symphonies and the Eine Kleine Nachtmusik among the contemplated Mozart offerings.

Dr. Koussevitzky will present first hearing in the United States of Prokofieff's March for Victory. This is to be given at Madison Square Garden Thursday evening under the distinguished Bostonian's baton as a part of a "Salute to the GI's of the United Nations" sponsored by the American Council of Soviet Friendship, of which Dr. Koussevitzky is music chairman, with Mrs. Guy Patterson Gannett of Portland as a member of his committee. The march will be played by the Infantry Combat Band

Two young women had an introduction Friday to Dr. Frank Black, conductor of the General Motors Symphony of the Air summer series, presented by the NBC Symphony Orchestra. They were Paula Lenchner 21-year-old dramatic soprano, of Cincinnati, and Eunice Podis, 23-year-old pianist of Cleveland Heights, Ohio who less than 24 hours previously had won the $1,000 Young Artists Awards of the National Federation of Music Clubs for voice and piano respectively.

Their presence at the National Broadcasting Company for an audition with Dr. Black and the head of NBC's music division, Samuel Chotzinoff, for choice of selections they are to perform with the NBC Symphony later in the season. September is the probable date for their appearances.

Two $1,000 award winners only were chosen in the Young Artists finals held Thursday afternoon in Carnegie Chamber Music Hall. The competing violinists, Miss Mariam Burroughs of Niantic, Connecticut, and Robert Rudie of Denver, Colorado, received prizes of $250 each.

The voice winner, Miss Lenchner, is a pupil of Mme. Lottie Leonard, who coached Nan Merriman, the 1943 winner, now a radio singing star. Miss Podis, in private life Mrs. Robert Wieskopf, wife of a young Cleveland conductor, now in the Philippines, has studied recently with Arthur Rubinstein and Leonard Shure. She is a true child of the National Federation of Music Clubs, having belonged first to a juvenile and then a junior club and having competed in junior events where she was many times a prize winner. She is a member of the Fortnightly Musical Club of Cleveland. She did not consider music as a career until her teens when, after winning an award she appeared as soloist with the Cleveland Women's Symphony under the baton of Hyman Schandler. She has played with the Cleveland Orchestra under Rudolph Ringwall and Dr. Artur Rodzinski, and on June 23 will, for the fifth successive season, make a solo appearance with the Cleveland Orchestra in the summer "pops." She expects to invest most of her $1,000 in additional piano instruction.

Miss Lenchner won this year's Naumburg award, which entitles her to a Town Hall debut in the Fall. She is a naturalized citizen, but a native of Vienna, and the first foreign born artist to receive the Federation's Young Artists award. Her early musical education was at the High School of Music and Art, New York City. Since September, 1942, she has studied at the Cincinnati College of Music. She is leaving shortly for Mexico to sing Micaela in Carmen with the Mexico City Opera—as big a thrill as capturing two major awards within a few-weeks' period.

Finalists competing with Miss Lenchner and Miss Podis were Miss Carol Earnhardt Jones of Hixson, Tennessee, in voice, and Eugene Gash of Denver, Colorado, in piano. The roster of judges included Conductors Alexander Smallens of the Stadium Concerts in New York City, Massimo Frescia of the New Orleans Symphony, Wilfred Pelletier of the Metropolitan Auditions of the Air, and Mishel Piastro of the Longines Symphonette; Violinists Erica Morini and Xino Francescatti; Pianists Nadia Reisenberg and Pierre Luboshutz; Vocalist Mabel Garrison; Ernest La Prade, music editor of the National Broadcasting Company; Dr. A. H. Morton of the National Concert and Artists Corporation; Ward French of Columbia Concerts, and Charles L. Wagner, dean of American managers.

WCOP Becomes Outlet for Major Net June 15

Station WCOP is going bigtime next Friday.

On the air since Aug. 26, 1935, as a small independent radio station, WCOP becomes a major network outlet for the first time June 15. It will be the Boston affiliate of the "Blue Network," a tagline to be dropped permanently Friday to become "the American Broadcasting Company."

WCOP was purchased last October by the Cowles Brothers, who own four other radio stations and are owners and publishers of Des Moines and Minneapolis newspapers and of Look Magazine.

VALLEJO, CALIF.
MORNING TIMES-HERALD

MAY 27 1945

Music Poll

Tops in America Music Decided

The four days of music on all networks honoring the death of Franklin D. Roosevelt on April 12, 13, 14 and 15 were chosen collectively as the outstanding musical event of the radio year in the second annual poll of music on the air conducted among the music editors of the daily newspapers in the United States and Canada by Musical America, international news magazine. The results are announced in the May issue.

Winning programs and performers in 17 other classifications also were chosen in this unique poll in which more than 500 men and women of the press in every state in the union and in the principal cities of Canada expressed their preferences among current radio fare. They picked the following winners:

Metropolitan Opera broadcast: Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," Feb. 10.

Symphony Orchestra: tie between the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (CBS), Boston Symphony (Blue).

Program of operatic character: Metropolitan Opera, USA, sponsored by Opera Guild (Blue).

Symphony conductor: Arturo Toscanini (NBC).

Opera conductor: Bruno Walter (Blue).

Program conductor: Frank Black (NBC).

Orchestra with featured soloists: Telephone Hour (NBC).

Musical variety program: Texaco Star Theatre, James Melton (CBS).

Woman singer, regularly featured: Gladys Swarthout.

Woman singer, occasionally featured: Marion Anderson.

Man singer, regulary featured: John Charles Thomas NBC).

Man singer, occasionally featured: Ezio Pinza.

Small ensemble: Stradivari orchestra (CBS).

Instrumental soloist: Robert Casadesus, pianist.

Instrumental soloist, regularly heard: Alec Templeton, pianist (CBS).

Educational: symphonies for youth, Alfred Wallenstein and Los Angeles Philharmonic (MBS).

Announcer, commentator: Milton Cross (Blue).

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JUN 3 - 1945

Bach and Mozart At Tanglewood

A Summer festival comprising music of Mozart and Bach is announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given at Tanglewood in the Berkshires this Summer. Serge Koussevitsky will be the conductor, and the orchestra will consist of players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including all the principals. Famous soloists will assist at each concert. There will be six concerts on three weekends, with six different programs, to be given on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 28-29, Aug. 4-5, Aug. 11-12.

"PREMIERE" RECORDINGS The end of the recording ban has made possible the recording of new scores and major works of the past not previously available on records. Two cases in point will be found among this month's releases, reviewed in this issue: "Scenes de Ballet" by Stravinsky and "Harold in Italy" by Berlioz.

CHARLESTON, W. VA.
MAIL

JUN 10 1945

THIS year marks the 60th season of the Boston "Pops" orchestra's concerts in far-famed Symphony Hall, at which food and drink are served and smoking is permitted while the orchestra—recruited from one of the nation's finest, the Boston Symphony — runs through the repertory of popular classics and semi-classics.

To mark the "Pops" 60th season, Victor releases a new recording of Felix Mendelssohn's ever-popular "Fingal's Cave Overture" by this orchestra, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, who is celebrating his 60th season as conductor. This is the fourth post-ban Boston "Pops" recording released by Victor, following a medley of hits from "Oklahoma!" and the more recent "American Salute" coupled with "Yankee Doodle Went to Town" and "Salute to Our Fighting Forces."

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

JUN 5 - 1945

Henry B. Cabot To Speak Here

Committee of 1000 Chairman Guest of Women's Club Group

Henry B. Cabot of Boston, chairman of the Massachusetts Committee of 1000, will speak Monday evening at the annual meeting of the Women's Club Monday Book Club. Mr. Cabot is one of the founders of the committee, which is the representation in this state of Americans United for World Organization, Inc. He is treasurer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and while here Monday, he will confer with Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, the director, at his summer home in Lenox.

The program Monday will be the final meeting of the Monday Book Club for the season. Miss Ida Lussier, chairman, Mrs. John F. Mendel and Miss Anna Spaniol are in charge of the programs. Dinner will be served at 6.15, and reservations should be made by Monday noon. Those unable to attend the banquet are invited to hear Mr. Cabot at 7.30.

Universal Language

Monitor June 9

IN an atmosphere of subdued gaiety at a Pops concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, I watched two Wellesley girls of the classes of '45 and '46 play exquisitely Bach's Concerto in D Minor for two violins and string orchestra. One accentuated the positive, her head, body, and limbs swinging in unison with every stroke of the bow. The other leaned toward the negative, her sure, calm, and sublime tone leaving you beggared of words.

Together they had a compelling effect. So much so that the audience laid aside its Swiss cheese and crackers, its lemonade, its chocolate ice cream, its conversation, and relaxed. Flower girls unburdened themselves and sat down. Ushers stood, hushed. And the music had unhampered scope in the crowded hall, locked in silence. It took us into a different sphere.

Everyone was caught up in the elusive wave which swept the house. I question if the girls realized the effect they produced. Scarcely a murmur from the tables, not a whisper from the closely packed balconies. The audience presumably had a heavy sprinkling of Dutch, French, Spanish, Scots, English, Irish, Swedes, Canadians, Norwegians. Had anything been said in the spoken word it is doubtful if all would have understood, for want of a common tongue. But no difficulty seemed to arise in understanding the meaning of the message from the stage. Eloquent girls, simple, wholesome, inspiring without a word. Wonderful language is music!

BERLIOZ: Harold in Italy, Opus 16. William Primrose, viola; Serge Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony. [ff] GM = 760. $5.77 (five 12" records in album) (V).

The first recording which the Boston symphony has made in nearly five years would be an important event it itself. But it becomes even more important and exciting when we find that it presents the first performance on records of the Symphony for viola and orchestra "Harold in Italy" by Berlioz is a significant instance of the unique contribution which the phonograph can make to musical life, namely by presenting rate performances of important works we only rarely have opportunity to hear the concert hall.

In his autobiography "The Life of He Berlioz, as written by himself" (a fascinati book which we higly recommend and therefore list below as "companion reading") the composer reports that the idea and title o the work were suggested by his recollections of wanderings in the Abruzzi mountains and that he introduced the viola as solo instrument in the role of "a melancholy dreamer in the style of Byron's Childe Harold." However, while the work takes its title and perhaps some of its character from Byron, the incidents described are Berlioz' own invention. Sir Donald Tovey once coined the witty remark "there is a 'B' in Byron and a 'B' in Berlioz, and that is just about the size of it."

The work is in the customary four movements which have descriptive and very apt titles, "Harold in the mountains—scenes of sadness, happiness and joy," "March of the Pilgrims singing their evening prayer," "Serenade of a Mountaineer in the Abruzzi to his mistress" and "Orgy of the Brigands, Memories of Past Scenes."

As you will discover when you read Berlioz' autobiography, he was not only a brilliant composer, but also a skilled and imaginative writer. Here, for instance is his own description of the contents and effect of the last movement:

> "... furious orgies, where wine, blood, joy, rage, all combined, parade their intoxication, where the rhythms sometimes seem to stumble along, sometimes to rush on in fury, where the brasses seem to vomit forth curses and to answer prayers with blasphemies, where they laugh, drink, fight, destroy, slay, violate and utterly run riot: in this brigand scene, the orchestra becomes a regular pandemonium, while from the solo viola—the dreamy Harold—some trembling notes of the evening hymn are still heard in the distance as he flees in terror."

As you may gather from this description, the work makes enormous demands upon soloist, orchestra—and last but not least the recording engineers. After a performance of the 'Orgy of the Brigands" which came off especially well, Berlioz turned to the orchestra and cried "Gentlemen, you are sublime! You are stupendous brigands!" We feel that he might repeat those words were he able to hear this performance. Of course one could quarrel over minor details tempo and execution (as Haggin, for stance, does with great gusto), but in of the over-all quality and effect of this formance this seems to us a little petty

A special word about the quality of the cording. The complex orchestral son are reproduced with exceptional rea balance between soloist and orchest carefully calculated that it is maintained this latest version. (Only the Stok is without comparable merits eith ly or technically). Koussevitzky ha orchestra and splendid recording. ner's is the most "classic" reading, well recorded; Walter imbues the greater warmth than we find in other interpretations.

Needless to say, the work is great masterpieces in the symp ture and any of the four recordin ed above will represent it well lection. (J. L.)

LINCOLN, NEB.
STAR

JUN 3 1945

FOR THOSE WORRY BIRDS who have been raising eyebrows over the popularity of such novelties as Spike Jones or the Hoosier Hot Shots—relax. If the pulse of the music editors of America is any criterion, the tastes of radio listeners of the country is as good as it ever was. Poll results show that the Sunday night "Star Theatre" program, with James Melton at the helm is in first place among the musical variety shows. Alec Templeton was voted the best regularly featured instrumentalist. Paul Lavalle's Stradivari orchestra was voted the best small ensemble; CBS Philharmonic and Blue's Boston Symphony, best symphony; and Arturo Toscanini, best conductor.

POP CONCERT

BY WARREN STORY SM

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

MAY 2 8 1945

Music Festival Is Scheduled At Tanglewood This Summer

By Helen Havener

NEW YORK, May 28—Music lovers are rejoicing in the announcement that there will be a second Wartime Music Festival at Tanglewood this Summer, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky on the podium and the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the music-makers. The dates set are the week-ends of July 28-29, August 4-5 and August 11-12. Concerts will be given in the Theater-Concert Hall and Mozart and Bach will be featured with Bach's Brandenburg Concerto scheduled for performance, and the Concertante for Violin and Viola, the last three symphonies and the Eine Kleine Nachtmusik among the contemplated Mozart offerings.

Dr. Koussevitzky will present first hearing in the United States of Prokofieff's March for Victory. This is to be given at Madison Square Garden Thursday evening under the distinguished Bostonian's baton as a part of a "Salute to the GI's of the United Nations" sponsored by the American Council of Soviet Friendship, of which Dr. Koussevitzky is music chairman, with Mrs. Guy Patterson Gannett of Portland as a member of his committee. The march will be played by the Infantry Combat Band.

Two young women had an introduction Friday to Dr. Frank Black, conductor of the General Motors Symphony of the Air summer series, presented by the NBC Symphony Orchestra. They were Paula Lenchner, 21-year-old dramatic soprano, of Cincinnati, and Eunice Podis, 23-year-old pianist of Cleveland Heights, Ohio, who less than 24 hours previously had won the $1,000 Young Artists Awards of the National Federation of Music Clubs for voice and piano respectively.

Their presence at the National Broadcasting Company for an audition with Dr. Black and the head of NBC's music division, Samuel Chotzinoff, for choice of selections they are to perform with the NBC Symphony later in the season. September is the probable date for their appearances.

Two $1,000 award winners only were chosen in the Young Artists finals held Thursday afternoon in Carnegie Chamber Music Hall. The competing violinists, Miss Mariam Burroughs of Niantic, Connecticut, and Robert Rudie of Denver, Colorado, received prizes of $250 each.

The voice winner, Miss Lenchner, is a pupil of Mme. Lottie Leonard, who coached Nan Merriman, the 1943 winner, now a radio singing star. Miss Podis, in private life Mrs. Robert Wieskopf, wife of a young Cleveland conductor, now in the Philippines, has studied recently with Arthur Rubinstein and Leonard Shure. She is a true child of the National Federation of Music Clubs, having belonged first to a juvenile and then a junior club and having competed in junior events where she was many times a prize winner. She is a member of the Fortnightly Musical Club of Cleveland. She did not consider music as a career until her teens when, after winning an award she appeared as soloist with the Cleveland Women's Symphony under the baton of Hyman Schandler. She has played with the Cleveland Orchestra under Rudolph Ringwall and Dr. Artur Rodzinski, and on June 23 will, for the fifth successive season, make a solo appearance with the Cleveland Orchestra in the summer "pops." She expects to invest most of her $1,000 in additional piano instruction.

Miss Lenchner won this year's Naumburg award, which entitles her to a Town Hall debut in the Fall. She is a naturalized citizen, but a native of Vienna, and the first foreign born artist to receive the Federation's Young Artists award. Her early musical education was at the High School of Music and Art, New York City. Since September, 1942, she has studied at the Cincinnati College of Music. She is leaving shortly for Mexico to sing Micaela in Carmen with the Mexico City Opera—as big a thrill as capturing two major awards within a few-weeks' period.

Finalists competing with Miss Lenchner and Miss Podis were Miss Carol Earnhardt Jones of Hixson, Tennessee, in voice, and Eugene Gash of Denver, Colorado, in piano. The roster of judges included Conductors Alexander Smallens of the Stadium Concerts in New York City, Massimo Frescia of the New Orleans Symphony, Wilfred Pelletier of the Metropolitan Auditions of the Air, and Mishel Piastro of the Longines Symphonette; Violinists Erica Morini and Zino Francescatti; Pianists Nadia Reisenberg and Pierre Luboshutz; Vocalist Mabel Garrison; Ernest La Prade, music editor of the National Broadcasting Company; Dr. A. H. Morton of the National Concert and Artists Corporation; Ward French of Columbia Concerts, and Charles L. Wagner, dean of American managers.

VALLEJO, CALIF.
MORNING TIMES-HERALD

MAY 27 19

Music Poll

Tops in America Music Decided

The four days of music on all networks honoring the death of Franklin D. Roosevelt on April 12, 13, 14 and 15 were chosen collectively as the outstanding musical event of the radio year in the second annual poll of music on the air conducted among the music editors of the daily newspapers in the United States and Canada by Musical America, international news magazine. The results are announced in the May issue.

Winning programs and performers in 17 other classifications also were chosen in this unique poll in which more than 500 men and women of the press in every state in the union and in the principal cities of Canada expressed their preferences among current radio fare. They picked the following winners:

Metropolitan Opera broadcast: Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," Feb. 10.

Symphony Orchestra: tie between the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (CBS), Boston Symphony (Blue).

Program of operatic character: Metropolitan Opera, USA, sponsored by Opera Guild (Blue).

Symphony conductor: Arturo Toscanini (NBC).

Opera conductor: Bruno Walter (Blue).

Program conductor: Frank Black (NBC).

Orchestra with featured soloists: Telephone Hour (NBC).

Musical variety program: Texaco Star Theatre, James Melton (CBS).

Woman singer, regularly featured: Gladys Swarthout.

Woman singer, occasionally featured: Marion Anderson.

Man singer, regulary featured: John Charles Thomas NBC).

Man singer, occasionally featured: Ezio Pinza.

Small ensemble: Stradivari orchestra (CBS).

Instrumental soloist: Robert Casadesus, pianist.

Instrumental soloist, regularly heard: Alec Templeton, pianist (CBS).

Educational: symphonies for youth, Alfred Wallenstein and Los Angeles Philharmonic (MBS).

Announcer commentator: Milton Cross (Blue).

WCOP Becomes Outlet for Major Net June 15

Station WCOP is going bigtime next Friday.

On the air since Aug. 26, 1935, as a small independent radio station, WCOP becomes a major network outlet for the first time June 15. It will be the Boston affiliate of the "Blue Network," a tagline to be dropped permanently Friday to become "the American Broadcasting Company."

WCOP was purchased last October by the Cowles Brothers, who own four other radio stations and are owners and publishers of Des Moines and Minneapolis newspapers and of Look Magazine.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JUN 3 - 1945

Bach and Mozart At Tanglewood

A Summer festival comprising music of Mozart and Bach is announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given at Tanglewood in the Berkshires this Summer. Serge Koussevitzky will be the conductor, and the orchestra will consist of players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, including all the principals. Famous soloists will assist at each concert. There will be six concerts on three weekends, with six different programs, to be given on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, [illegible]

"PREMIERE" RECORDINGS The end of the recording ban has made possible the recording of new scores and major works of the past not previously available on records. Two cases in point will be found among this month's releases, reviewed in this issue: "Scenes de Ballet" by Stravinsky and "Harold in Italy" by Berlioz.

CHARLESTON, W. VA.
MAIL

JUN 1 0 1945

THIS year marks the 60th season of the Boston "Pops" orchestra's concerts in far-famed Symphony Hall, at which food and drink are served and smoking is permitted while the orchestra—recruited from one of the nation's finest; the Boston Symphony — runs through the repertory of popular classics and semi-classics.

To mark the "Pops" 60th season, Victor releases a new recording of Felix Mendelssohn's ever-popular "Fingal's Cave Overture" by this orchestra, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, who is celebrating his 60th season as conductor. This is the fourth post-ban Boston "Pops" recording released by Victor, following a medley of hits from "Oklahoma!" and the more recent "American Salute" coupled with "Yankee Doodle Went to Town" and "Salute to Our Fighting Forces."

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

JUN 5 - 1945

Henry B. Cabot To Speak Here

Committee of 1000 Chairman Guest of Women's Club Group

Henry B. Cabot of Boston, chairman of the Massachusetts Committee of 1000, will speak Monday evening at the annual meeting of the Women's Club Monday Book Club. Mr. Cabot is one of the founders of the committee, which is the representation in this state of Americans United for World Organization, Inc. He is treasurer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and while here Monday, he will confer with Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, the director, at his summer home in Lenox.

The program Monday will be the final meeting of the Monday Book Club for the season. Miss Ida Lussier, chairman, Mrs. John F. Mendel and Miss Anna Spaniol are in charge of the programs. Dinner will be served at 6.15, and reservations should be made by Monday noon. Those unable to attend the banquet are invited to hear Mr. Cabot at 7.30.

Universal Language

Monitor June 9

IN an atmosphere of subdued gaiety at a Pops concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, I watched two Wellesley girls of the classes of '45 and '46 play exquisitely Bach's Concerto in D Minor for two violins and string orchestra. One accentuated the positive, her head, body, and limbs swinging in unison with every stroke of the bow. The other leaned toward the negative, her sure, calm, and sublime tone leaving you beggared of words.

Together they had a compelling effect. So much so that the audience laid aside its Swiss cheese and crackers, its lemonade, its chocolate ice cream, its conversation, and relaxed. Flower girls unburdened themselves and sat down. Ushers stood, hushed. And the music had unhampered scope in the crowded hall, locked in silence. It took us into a different sphere.

Everyone was caught up in the elusive wave which swept the house. I question if the girls realized the effect they produced. Scarcely a murmur from the tables, not a whisper from the closely packed balconies. The audience presumably had a heavy sprinkling of Dutch, French, Spanish, Scots, English, Irish, Swedes, Canadians, Norwegians. Had anything been said in the spoken word it is doubtful if all would have understood, for want of a common tongue. But no difficulty seemed to arise in understanding the meaning of the message from the stage. Eloquent girls, simple, wholesome, inspiring without a word.

On the Record

BERLIOZ: Harold in Italy, Opus 16—William Primrose, viola; Serge Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony. [ff] GM #7600. $5.77 (five 12" records in album) (V).

The first recording which the Boston symphony has made in nearly five years would be an important event it itself. But it becomes even more important and exciting when we find that it presents the first performance on records of the Symphony for viola and orchestra "Harold in Italy" by Berlioz. Here is a significant instance of the unique contribution which the phonograph can make to musical life, namely by presenting first rate performances of important works which we only rarely have opportunity to hear in the concert hall.

In his autobiography "The Life of Hector Berlioz, as written by himself" (a fascinating book which we higly recommend and therefore list below as "companion reading") the composer reports that the idea and title of the work were suggested by his recollections of wanderings in the Abruzzi mountains and that he introduced the viola as solo instrument in the role of "a melancholy dreamer in the style of Byron's Childe Harold." However, while the work takes its title and perhaps some of its character from Byron, the incidents described are Berlioz' own invention. Sir Donald Tovey once coined the witty remark "there is a 'B' in Byron and a 'B' in Berlioz, and that is just about the size of it."

The work is in the customary four movements which have descriptive and very apt titles, "Harold in the mountains—scenes of sadness, happiness and joy," "March of the Pilgrims singing their evening prayer," "Serenade of a Mountaineer in the Abruzzi to his mistress" and "Orgy of the Brigands, Memories of Past Scenes."

As you will discover when you read Berlioz' autobiography, he was not only a brilliant composer, but also a skilled and imaginative writer. Here, for instance is his own description of the contents and effect of the last movement:

> " . . . furious orgies, where wine, blood, joy, rage, all combined, parade their intoxication, where the rhythms sometimes seem to stumble along, sometimes to rush on in fury, where the brasses seem to vomit forth curses and to answer prayers with blasphemies, where they laugh, drink, fight, destroy, slay, violate and utterly run riot; in this brigand scene, the orchestra becomes a regular pandemonium, while from the solo viola—the dreamy Harold—some trembling notes of the evening hymn are still heard in the distance as he flees in terror."

As you may gather from this description, the work makes enormous demands upon soloist, orchestra—and last but not least—the recording engineers. After a performance of the 'Orgy of the Brigands" which came off especially well, Berlioz turned to the orchestra and cried "Gentlemen, you are sublime! You are stupendous brigands!" We feel that he might repeat those words were he able to hear this performance. Of course, one could quarrel over minor details of tempo and execution (as Haggin, for instance, does with great gusto), but in view of the over-all quality and effect of this performance this seems to us a little petty.

A special word about the quality of the recording. The complex orchestral sonorities are reproduced with exceptional realism, the balance between soloist and orchestra is so carefully calculated that it is maintained [illegible] this latest version. (Only the Stokowski set is without comparable merits either musically or technically). Koussevitzky has the [illegible] orchestra and splendid recording; Wagner's is the most "classic" reading, also well recorded; Walter imbues the music with greater warmth than we find in any of the other interpretations.

Needless to say, the work is one of the great masterpieces in the symphonic literature and any of the four recordings mentioned above will represent it well in your collection. (J. L.)

LINCOLN, NEB.
STAR

JUN 3 1945

FOR THOSE WORRY BIRDS who have been raising eyebrows over the popularity of such novelties as Spike Jones or the Hoosier Hot Shots—relax. If the pulse of the music editors of America is any criterion, the tastes of radio listeners of the country is as good as it ever was. Poll results show that the Sunday night "Star Theatre" program, with James Melton at the helm is in first place among the musical variety shows. Alec Templeton was voted the best regularly featured instrumentalist. Paul Lavalle's Stradivari orchestra was voted the best small ensemble; CBS Philharmonic and Blue's Boston Symphony best symphony; and Arturo Toscanini, best conductor.

THE PHILA. FORUM
PHILA., PA
, 1945

Koussevitzky's Dedication

THE PHILADELPHIA FORUM is proud to have been one of the first to honor, through great music greatly played, the memory of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Exactly four hours after the President passed away at Warm Springs at 4:35 on the afternoon of Thursday, April 12, Serge Koussevitzky opened our Boston Symphony Concert with these words:

"Our great President is no more with us. Let us all stand in his memory. We will play music appropriate to this tragic moment. We will begin the program with the first movement of Shostakovitch's Eighth Symphony because when he composed it he had in mind to express the greatest tragedy of our time. In the second half we will perform the Eroica Symphony of Beethoven, who composed this work in tribute to a great man. This performance will be dedicated to the greatest man of our time. The program will conclude with the National Anthem."

POP CONCERT

BY WARREN STORY SMITH

[illegible]

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAY 20 1945

MUSIC'S OVERTONES

Copland's Pulitzer Prize Score Brings Home Accomplishments of Native Son

By MILES KASTENDIECK

How much Aaron Copland's winning of the Pulitzer Prize in Music this year will make the people of Brooklyn aware that several prominent contemporary composers have been born in this borough is worth considering. Perhaps we may have given due honor to George Gershwin, but we probably know little about Roger Sessions and not much about Copland. Yet their names loom large in the contemporary field. Copland has been producing some interesting work for a long time, but it will probably take a citation like this to awaken the interest of his native community. Those who follow the most recent musical trends recognize already that Copland has been considerably honored by his imitators. Whether he has created a particular American style is beside the point, but the fact that he has stamped his own individuality on his music speaks well for the independence of his creative work.

That Copland should have won the prize for a ballet score highlights his work in writing music for the theater, as well as emphasizes a distinctive trend in American composition in that direction. It takes only one hearing of the music for "Appalachian Spring" which Martha Graham introduced at the National Theater last Monday night to recognize how true all this is. The Pulitzer Prize Committee made no mistake: the score is one of his finest creations, perhaps his finest.

To his credit now he has three excellent ballet scores: "Billy the Kid," which may mark the origin of true American ballet; "Rodeo," which carries on in the same vein, and "Appalachian Spring," which may establish his style. It is the third score which has been singled out for special merit, but the other two are worthy of honorable mention. Yet these are only a part of his writing for the theater, for his "Quiet City" grew out of that atmosphere, and his music for such films as "The City," "Of Mice and Men" and "Our Town" are akin to these.

The first composer to be honored with a Guggenheim Fellowship, Copland has a number of firsts to his credit, among them the American Festivals of Contemporary Music at Yaddo, Saratoga Springs, New York. Also not to be overlooked is his writing of the first book on musical appreciation, "What to Listen For in Music," which actually gave the reader what he was looking for. He has done as much in furthering interest and influence in contemporary American music as, perhaps, any other composer, if not more.

The work which has been most recently heard in Brooklyn is "A Lincoln Portrait," written in 1942 and played in two successive seasons by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concerts at the Academy of Music. This music might also be classified with his theatrical works because of the use of a speaker to heighten the dramatic effect. Koussevitzky's keen appreciation of the score only anticipated the award which has finally come.

It behooves Brooklyn to recognize and to appreciate its native son.

[98]

THE PHILA. FORUM
PHILA., PA
MAY, 1945

Koussevitzky's Dedication

THE PHILADELPHIA FORUM is proud to have been one of the first to honor, through great music greatly played, the memory of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Exactly four hours after the President passed away at Warm Springs at 4:35 on the afternoon of Thursday, April 12, Serge Koussevitzky opened our Boston Symphony Concert with these words:

"Our great President is no more with us. Let us all stand in his memory. We will play music appropriate to this tragic moment. We will begin the program with the first movement of Shostakovitch's Eighth Symphony because when he composed it he had in mind to express the greatest tragedy of our time. In the second half we will perform the Eroica Symphony of Beethoven, who composed this work in tribute to a great man. This performance will be dedicated to the greatest man of our time. The program will conclude with the National Anthem."

POP CONCERT

BY WARREN STORY SMITH

While the principal purpose of the op Concerts is the purveying of light usical entertainment for those on easure bent, they still manage be-een times to bring to a hearing a orthwhile soloist or conductor, or rchance new music of interest.
Last evening, for example, there was e first performance in the United ates of the Violin Concerto of Aram hatchaturian, the half Armenian, half ussian composer whose Piano Conrto was a Pops sensation a few sea-ns ago. The soloist, and he proved mself a violinist of parts, was Elie ivak, concert master of the Toronto mphony Orchestra.
The exotic element looms large in hatchaturian's music, particularly in s slow movements, but he does not pend entirely upon this element. He s a knack of writing salient themes d his first and last movements have enty of rhythmic energy. On a first aring the most successful division last evening's Concerto seemed to in the finale, the chief theme of hich is a really captivating tune.
More might have been made of this aterial than has been made of it and e orchestra plays an unduly subordi-te role. In fact, the whole Concerto ould sound quite well with piano acmpaniment and violin recitalists on e lookout for new material might ell take heed of it.
Our thanks again to Arthur Fiedler r seeing to it that the Pops keep eir end up in the matter of new and portant music.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAY 20 1945

MUSIC'S OVERTONES

Copland's Pulitzer Prize Score Brings Home Accomplishments of Native Son

By MILES KASTENDIECK

How much Aaron Copland's winning of the Pulitzer Prize in Music this year will make the people of Brooklyn aware that several prominent contemporary composers have been born in this borough is worth considering. Perhaps we may have given due honor to George Gershwin, but we probably know little about Roger Sessions and not much about Copland. Yet their names loom large in the contemporary field. Copland has been producing some interesting work for a long time, but it will probably take a citation like this to awaken the interest of his native community. Those who follow the most recent musical trends recognize already that Copland has been considerably honored by his imitators. Whether he has created a particular American style is beside the point, but the fact that he has stamped his own individuality on his music speaks well for the independence of his creative work.

That Copland should have won the prize for a ballet score highlights his work in writing music for the theater, as well as emphasizes a distinctive trend in American composition in that direction. It takes only [illegible]

Martha Graham introduced at the National Theater last Monday night to recognize how true all this is. The Pulitzer Prize Committee made no mistake: the score is one of his finest creations, perhaps his finest.

To his credit now he has three excellent ballet scores: "Billy the Kid," which may mark the origin of true American ballet; "Rodeo," which carries on in the same vein, and "Appalachian Spring," which may establish his style. It is the third score which has been singled out for special merit, but the other two are worthy of honorable mention. Yet these are only a part of his writing for the theater, for his "Quiet City" grew out of that atmosphere, and his music for such films as "The City," "Of Mice and Men" and "Our Town" are akin to these.

The first composer to be honored with a Guggenheim Fellowship, Copland has a number of firsts to his credit, among them the American Festivals of Contemporary Music at Yaddo, Saratoga Springs, New York. Also not to be overlooked is his writing of the first book on musical appreciation, "What to Listen For in Music," which actually gave the reader what he was looking for. He has done as much in furthering interest and influence in contemporary American music as, perhaps, any other composer, if not more.

The work which has been most recently heard in Brooklyn is "A Lincoln Portrait," written in 1942 and played in two successive seasons by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concerts at the Academy of Music. This music might also be classified with his theatrical works because of the use of a speaker to heighten the dramatic effect. Koussevitzky's keen appreciation of the score only anticipated the award which has finally come.

It behooves Brooklyn to recognize and to appreciate its native son.

[98]

MODULATION MONITORING
A-M TRANSMITTERS

Electrical Merchandising
NEW YORK, N. Y.

NEW LITERATURE AND SALES HELPS

Ansley Radio Corp.

To assist dealers in increasing interest and demand for symphonic records, the Ansley Radio Corp., Long Island City, N. Y., has inaugurated another in its continuous series of dealer promotional helps. It has secured the services of John N. Burk, program annotator of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will provide informative, interesting program notes for a series of booklets which will be distributed to Ansley dealers for give-away to customers. Each booklet contains descriptive material on one of the world's great symphonies and its composer, including biographical sketch, background on composition and musical analysis by Mr. Burk.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER

Bach-Mozart Festival Summer Broadcast

The Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzy, will be broadcast on three Saturday evenings by WJZ - American. The programs will be heard from 8:30 to 9:30 p. m. on July 28, Aug. 4 and Aug. 11.

---

abs. Springfield
News Republican

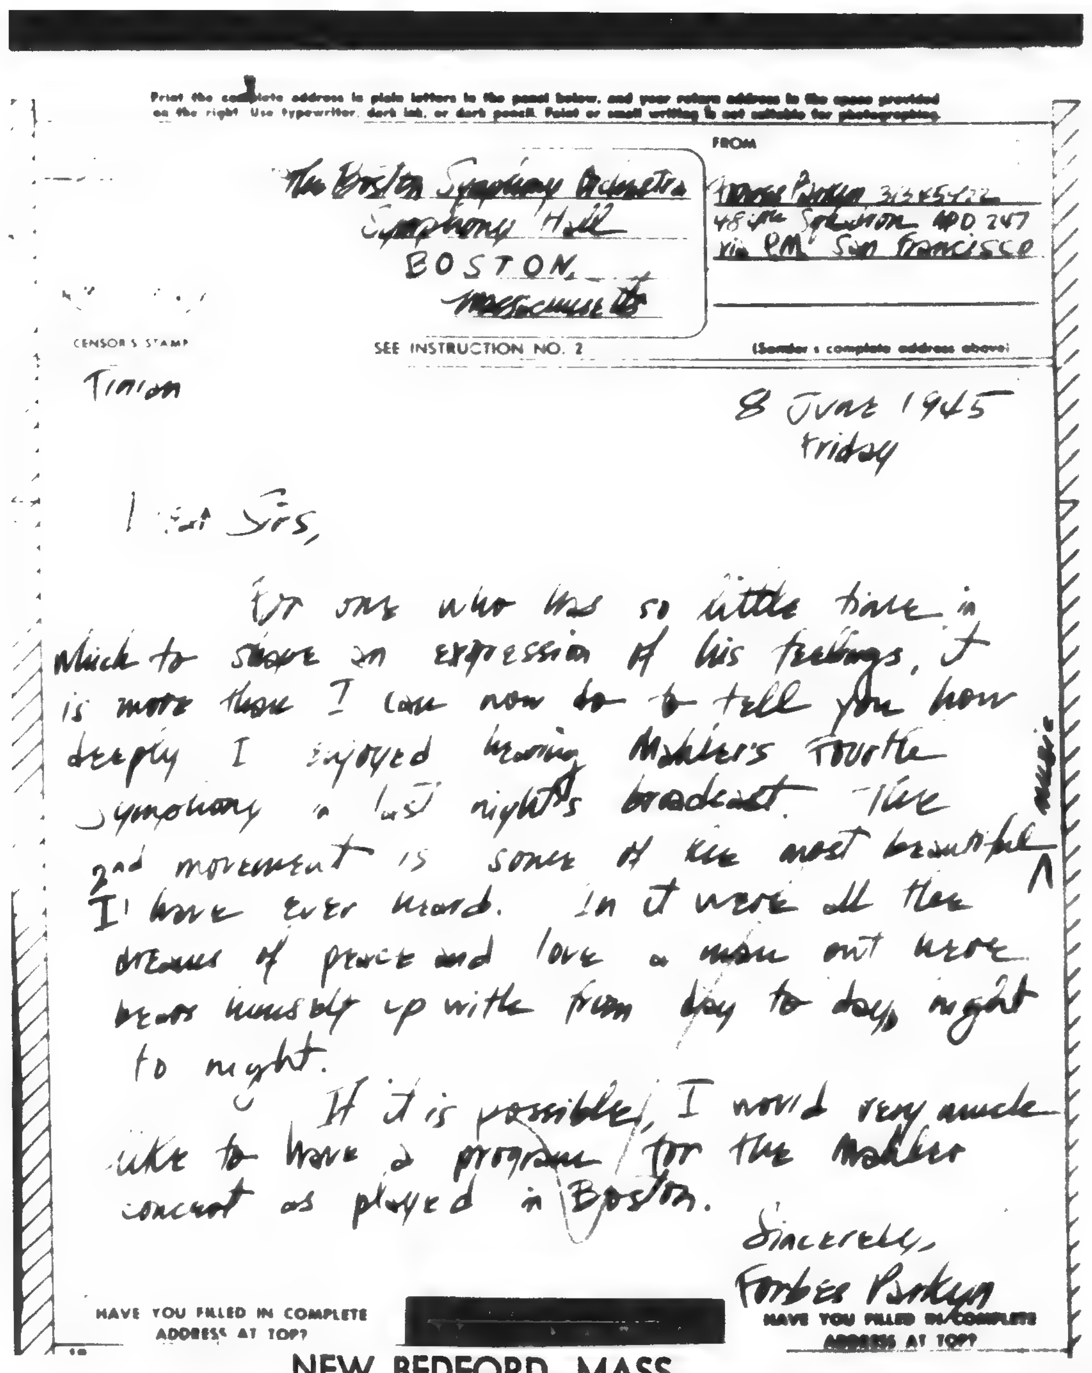
Bach-Mozart Festival At Tanglewood

Serge Koussevitzky Directs Boston Symphony; Soloists To Be Announced

A Bach-Mozart Festival, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, is to be given in the Berkshires this summer. Tanglewood ,the scenic estate of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will again be reopened for the purpose. The Orchestra will consist of the principals and other players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Six soloists will be announced at a later date.

There will be six concerts, each with a different program, on the Saturday evenings of July 28, August 4 and August 11 at 8:30, and the Sunday afternoons of July 29, August 5 and August 12 at 3:30.

Season tickets for the six concerts or for four concerts of the Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood may be obtained by application to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts, at $27 and $18 for series of six concerts, and $18 and $12 for series of four concerts. Tax is included in all prices.



Print the complete address in plain letters in the panel below, and your return address in the space provided on the right. Use typewriter, dark ink, or dark pencil. Faint or small writing is not suitable for photographing.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra
Symphony Hall
BOSTON, Massachusetts

FROM
Forbes Parkyn 31345422
48th Sta. Hospital APO 247 via PM San Francisco

CENSOR'S STAMP

SEE INSTRUCTION NO. 2

(Sender's complete address above)

Tinian

8 June 1945
Friday

Dear Sirs,

For one who has so little time in which to shape an expression of his feelings, it is more than I can now do to tell you how deeply I enjoyed hearing Mahler's Fourth Symphony in last night's broadcast. The 3rd movement is some of the most beautiful music I have ever heard. In it were all the dreams of peace and love a man out here bears himself up with from day to day, night to night.

If it is possible, I would very much like to have a program for the Mahler concert as played in Boston.

Sincerely,
Forbes Parkyn

HAVE YOU FILLED IN COMPLETE ADDRESS AT TOP?

HAVE YOU FILLED IN COMPLETE ADDRESS AT TOP?

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

JUN 24 1945

Broadcast from Tanglewood

The Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, under direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will be broadcast three Saturday nights by WNBH-American, 8:30 to 9:30. The first chair men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard under Dr. Koussevitzky's baton. The first of the three successive programs will be heard July 28.

Bernard Weiser, pianist, will be guest soloist when Arthur Fielder conducts the 9th Boston Pops Orchestra concert from 8:30 to 9, WNBH-American, next Saturday night. He will play the "Concertino for Piano and Orchestra" by Francaix.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

JUN 24 1945

THE BACH-MOZART

. . . Festival at T[illegible] under the direc[illegible] Koussevitsky will [illegible] three Saturday [illegible] August 4 and A[illegible] American Br[illegible] The Boston Sym[illegible] ing the festival [illegible] will be composed [illegible] men of the Bo[illegible] The Pops conc[illegible] orchestra are [illegible] on Saturday [illegible] clude on July 14. Be[illegible] Saturday, July 21, the "Es[illegible] concerts of the Boston [illegible] will be broadcast. The Pops and Esplanade orchestras are made up of men from the Boston Symphony.

MODULATION MONITORING
A-M TRANSMITTERS

Electrical Merchandising
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JUN - 1945

NEW LITERATURE AND SALES HELPS

Ansley Radio Corp.

To assist dealers in increasing interest and demand for symphonic records, the Ansley Radio Corp., Long Island City, N. Y., has inaugurated another in its continuous series of dealer promotional helps. It has secured the services of John N. Burk, program annotator of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will provide informative, interesting program notes for a series of booklets which will be distributed to Ansley dealers for give-away to customers. Each booklet contains descriptive material on one of the world's great symphonies and its composer, including biographical sketch, background on composition and musical analysis by Mr. Burk.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER
JUN 2

Bach-Mozart Festival Summer Broadcast

The B[illegible]Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will be broadcast on three Saturday evenings by WJZ - American. The programs will be heard from 8:30 to 9:30 p. m. on July 28, Aug. 4 and Aug. 11.

MILLERTON, N.Y.
NEWS
6/7/45 also Springfield News Republican

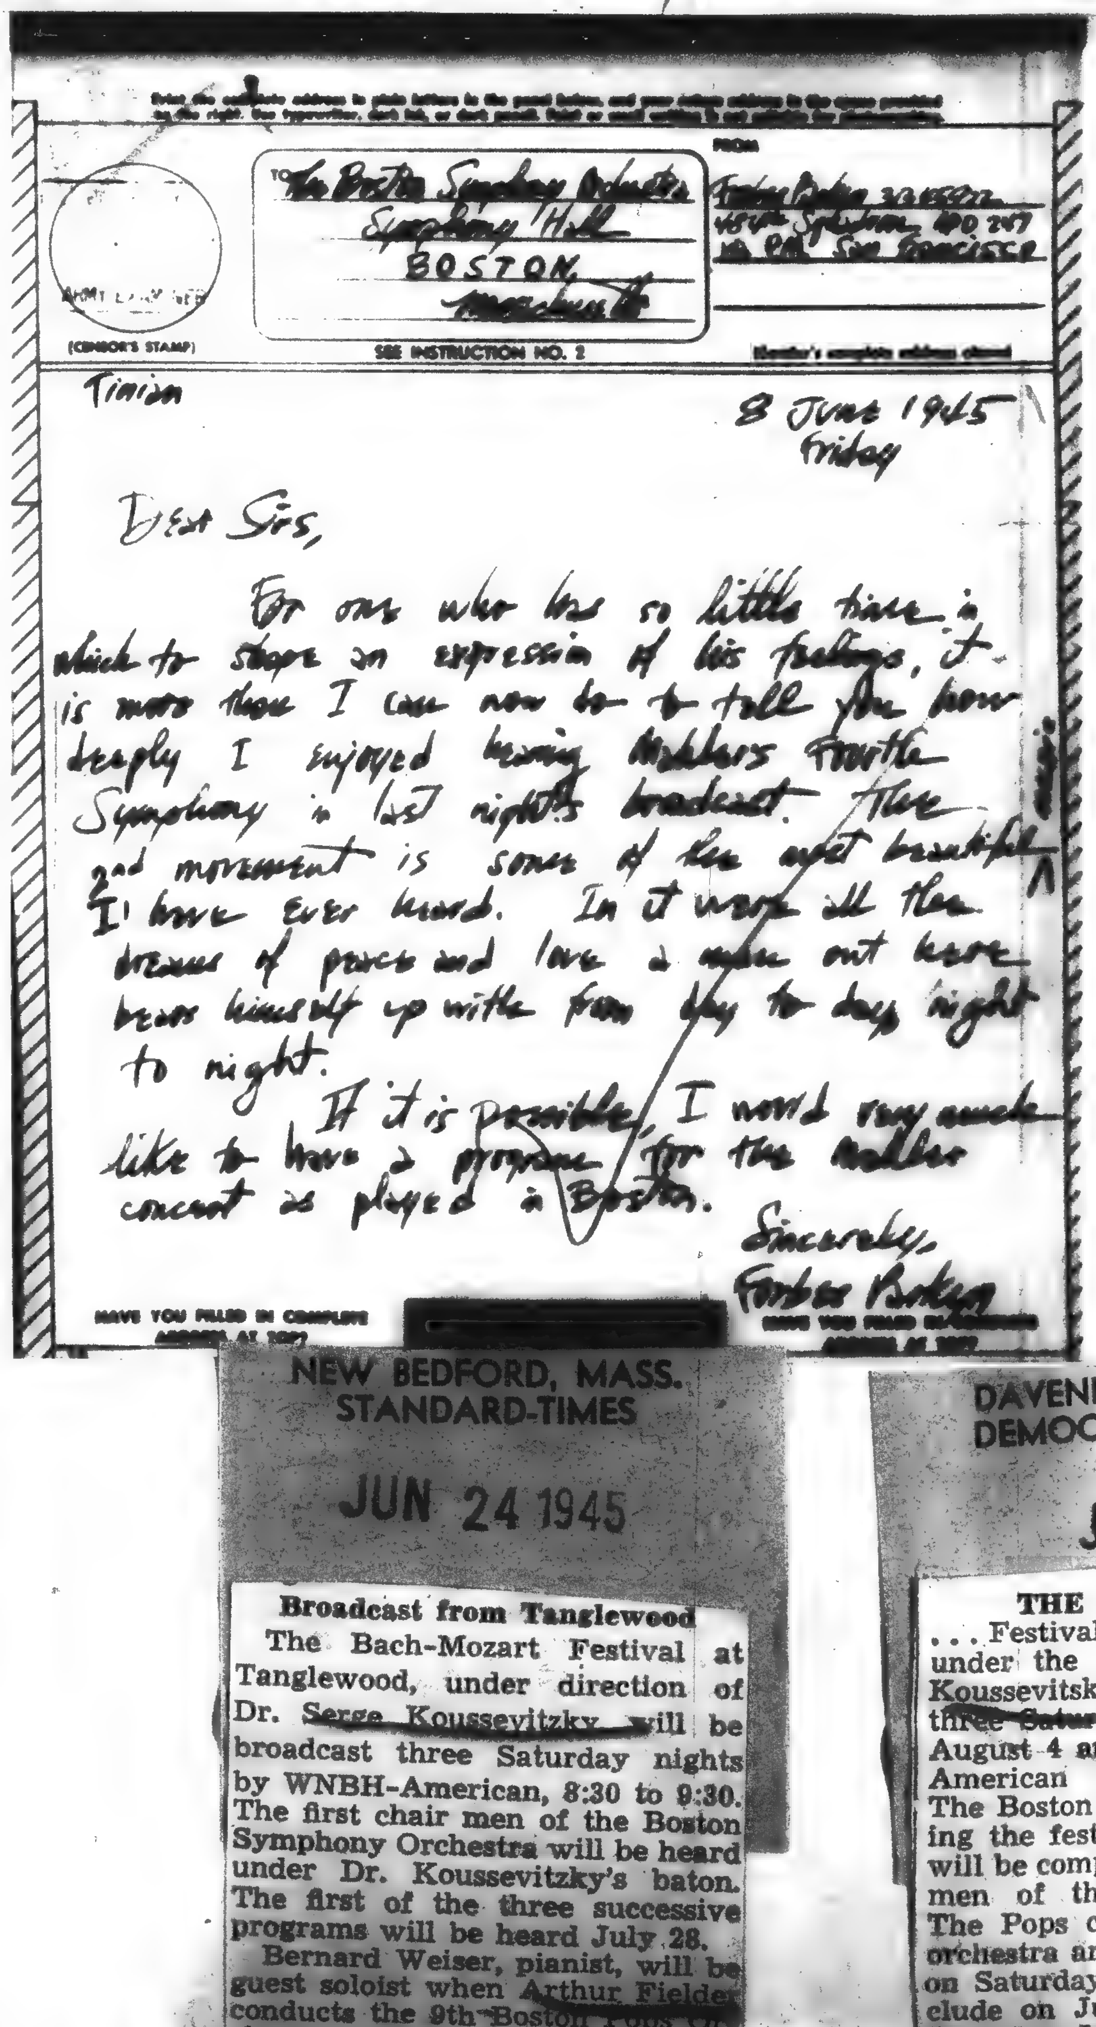
Bach-Mozart Festival At Tanglewood

Serge Koussevitzky Directs Boston Symphony; Soloists To Be Announced

A Bach-Mozart Festival, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, is to be given in the Berkshires this summer. Tanglewood, the scenic estate of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will again be reopened for the purpose. The Orchestra will consist of the principals and other players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Six soloists will be announced at a later date.

There will be six concerts, each with a different program, on the Saturday evenings of July 28, August 4 and August 11 at 8:30, and the Sunday afternoons of July 29, August 5 and August 12 at 3:30.

Season tickets for the six concerts or for four concerts of the Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood may be obtained by application to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts, at $27 and $18 for series of six concerts, and $18 and $12 for series of four concerts. Tax is included in all prices.



TO The Boston Symphony Orchestra
Symphony Hall
BOSTON
Massachusetts

FROM Forbes Parker
458th Sqdn APO 247
c/o PM San Francisco

(CENSOR'S STAMP) SEE INSTRUCTION NO. 2

Tinian

8 June 1945
Friday

Dear Sirs,

For one who has so little time in which to shape an expression of his feelings, it is more than I can now do to tell you how deeply I enjoyed hearing Mahler's Fourth Symphony in last night's broadcast. The 3rd movement is some of the most beautiful [illegible] I have ever heard. In it were all the dreams of peace and love a man out here bears himself up with from day to day, night to night.

If it is possible, I would very much like to have a program for the Mahler concert as played in Boston.

Sincerely,
Forbes Parker

HAVE YOU FILLED IN COMPLETE ADDRESS AT TOP?

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
JUN 24 1945

Broadcast from Tanglewood

The Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, under direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be broadcast three Saturday nights by WNBH-American, 8:30 to 9:30. The first chair men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard under Dr. Koussevitzky's baton. The first of the three successive programs will be heard July 28.

Bernard Weiser, pianist, will be guest soloist when Arthur Fielder conducts the 9th Boston Pops Orchestra concert from 8:30 to 9 WNBH-American, next Saturday night. He will play the "Concertino for Piano and Orchestra" by Francaix.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT-LEADER
JUN 24 1945

THE BACH-MOZART

. . . Festival at Tanglewood, Mass under the direction of Dr. Serg Koussevitsky will be broadcast o three Saturday evenings, July 2 August 4 and August 11 over th American Broadcasting system The Boston Symphony is sponsor ing the festival and the orchestr will be composed of the first chair men of the Boston Symphony The Pops concerts of the Boston orchestra are now being broadcas on Saturday nights and will conclude on July 14. Beginning o Saturday, July 21, the "Esplanade" concerts of the Boston orchestra will be broadcast. The Pops and Esplanade orchestras are made up of men from the Boston Symphony

REDUCTION
RATIO
18x

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

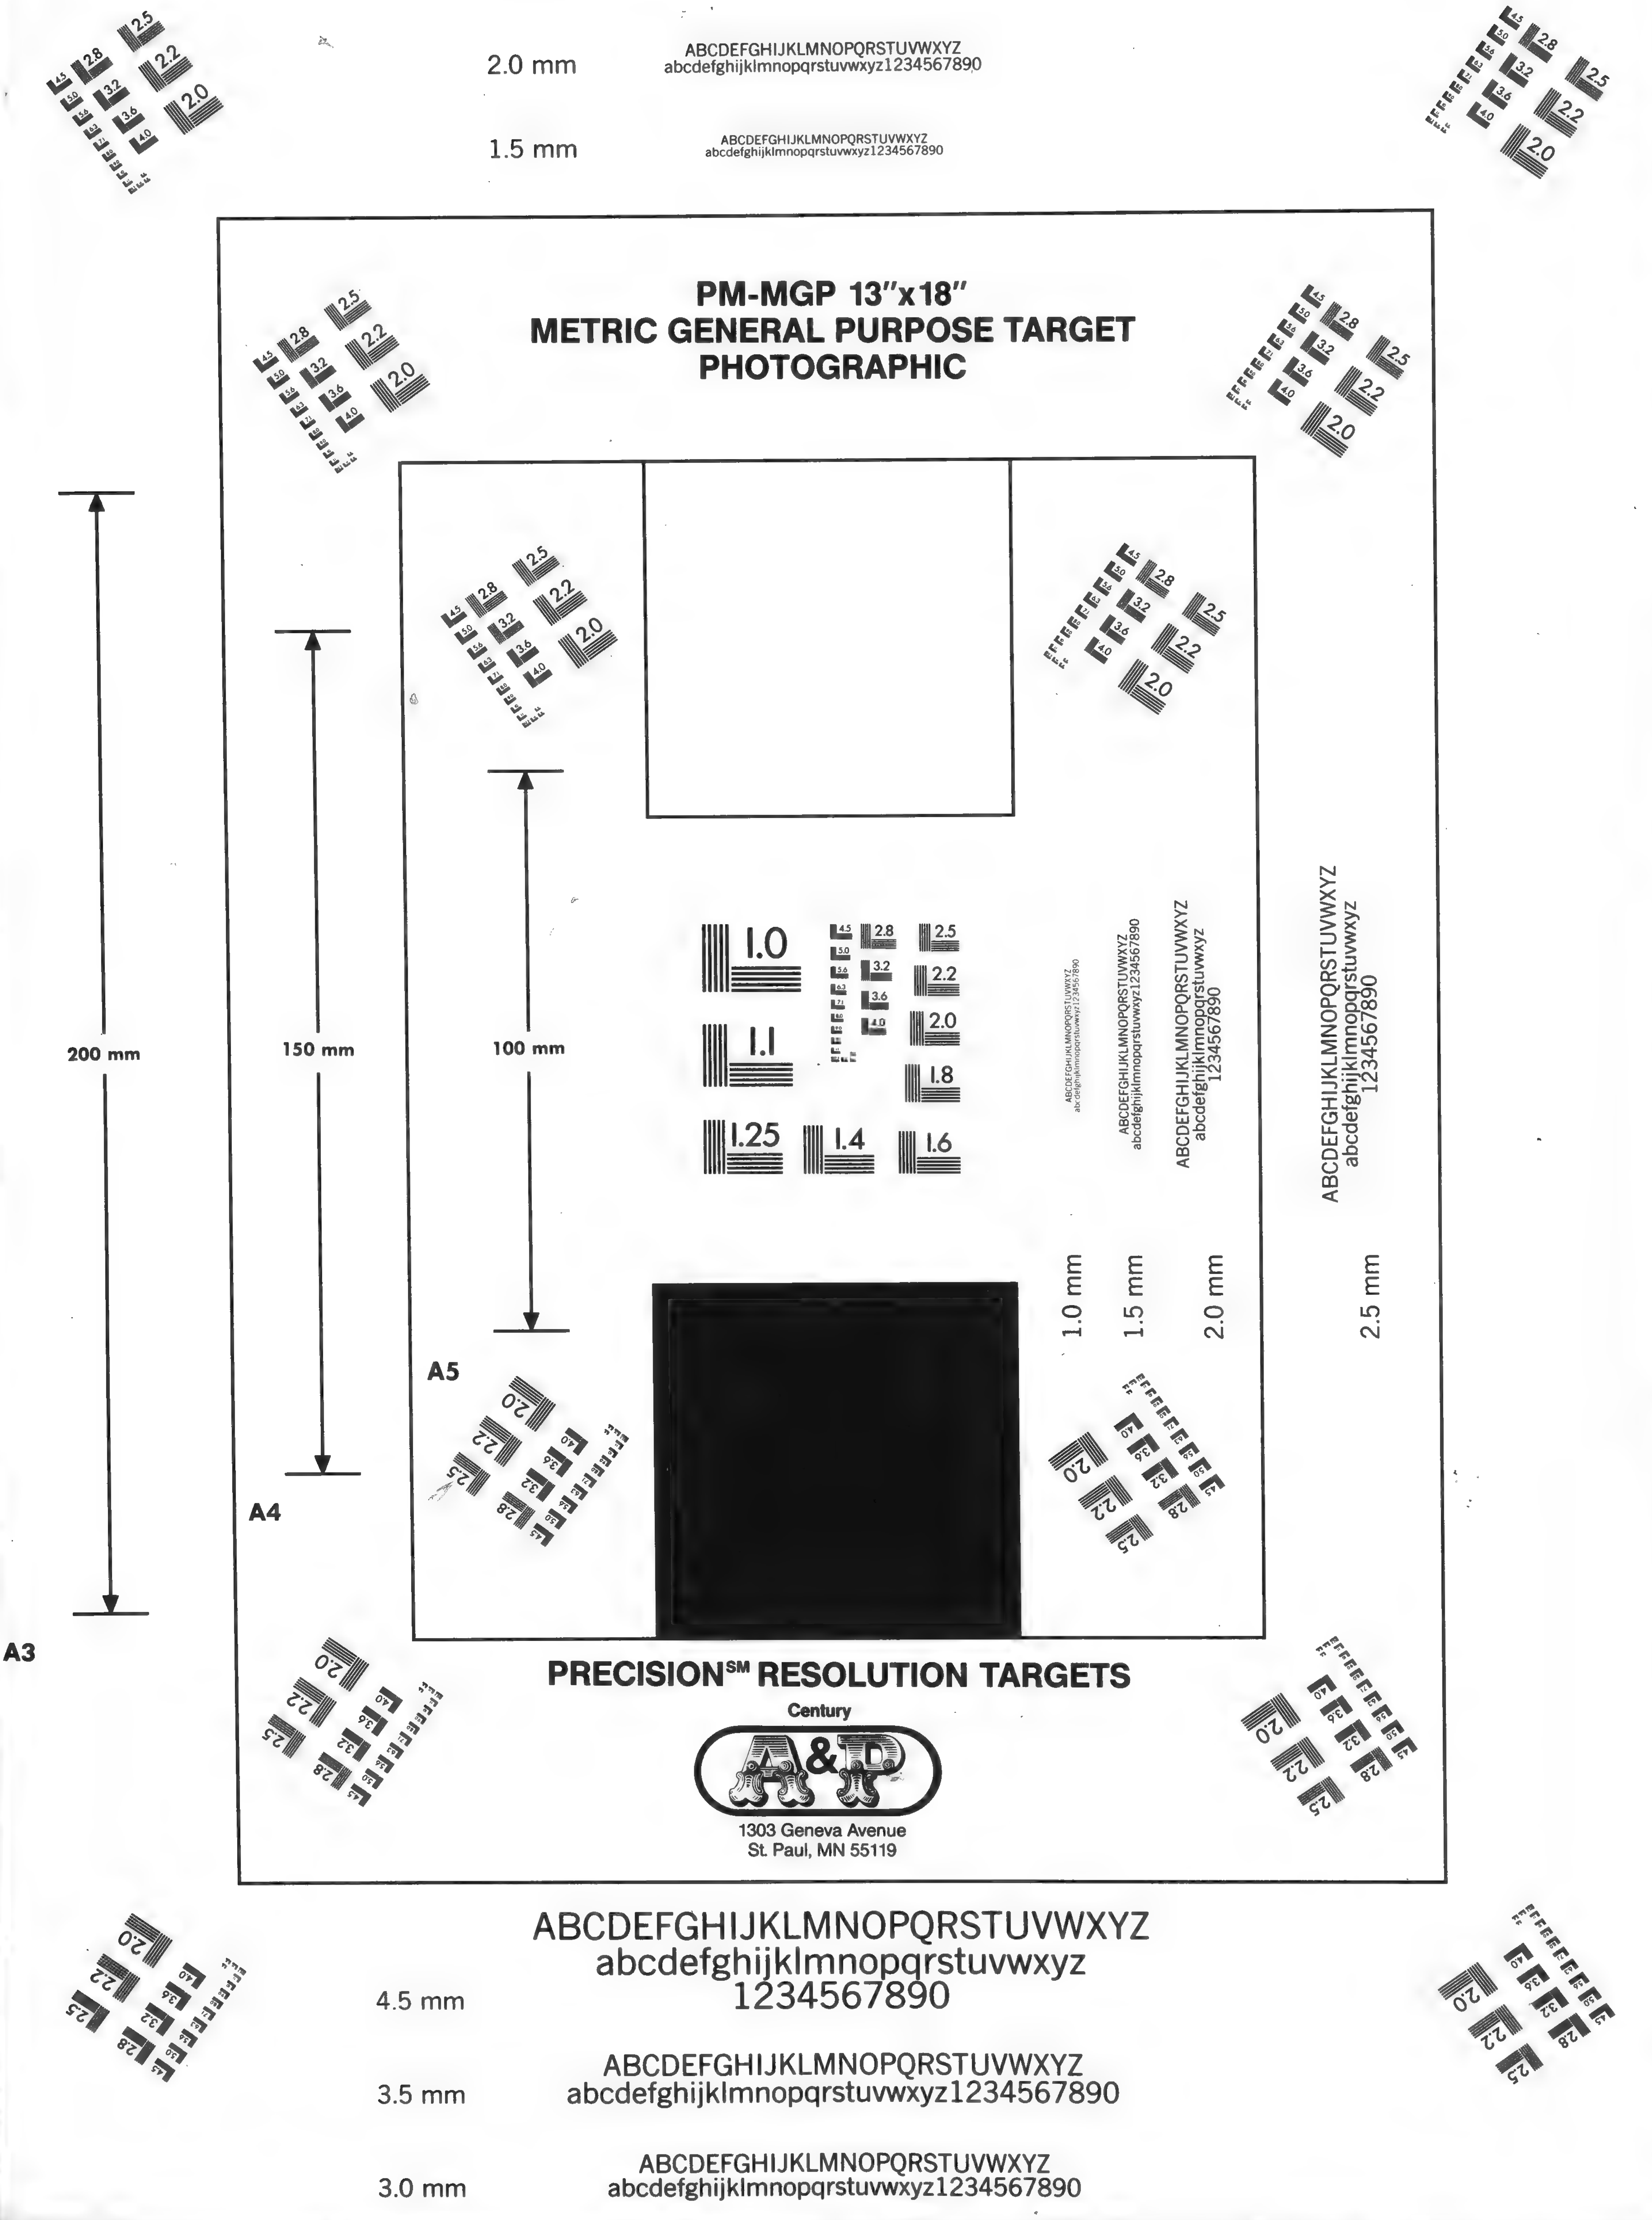
2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P 1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

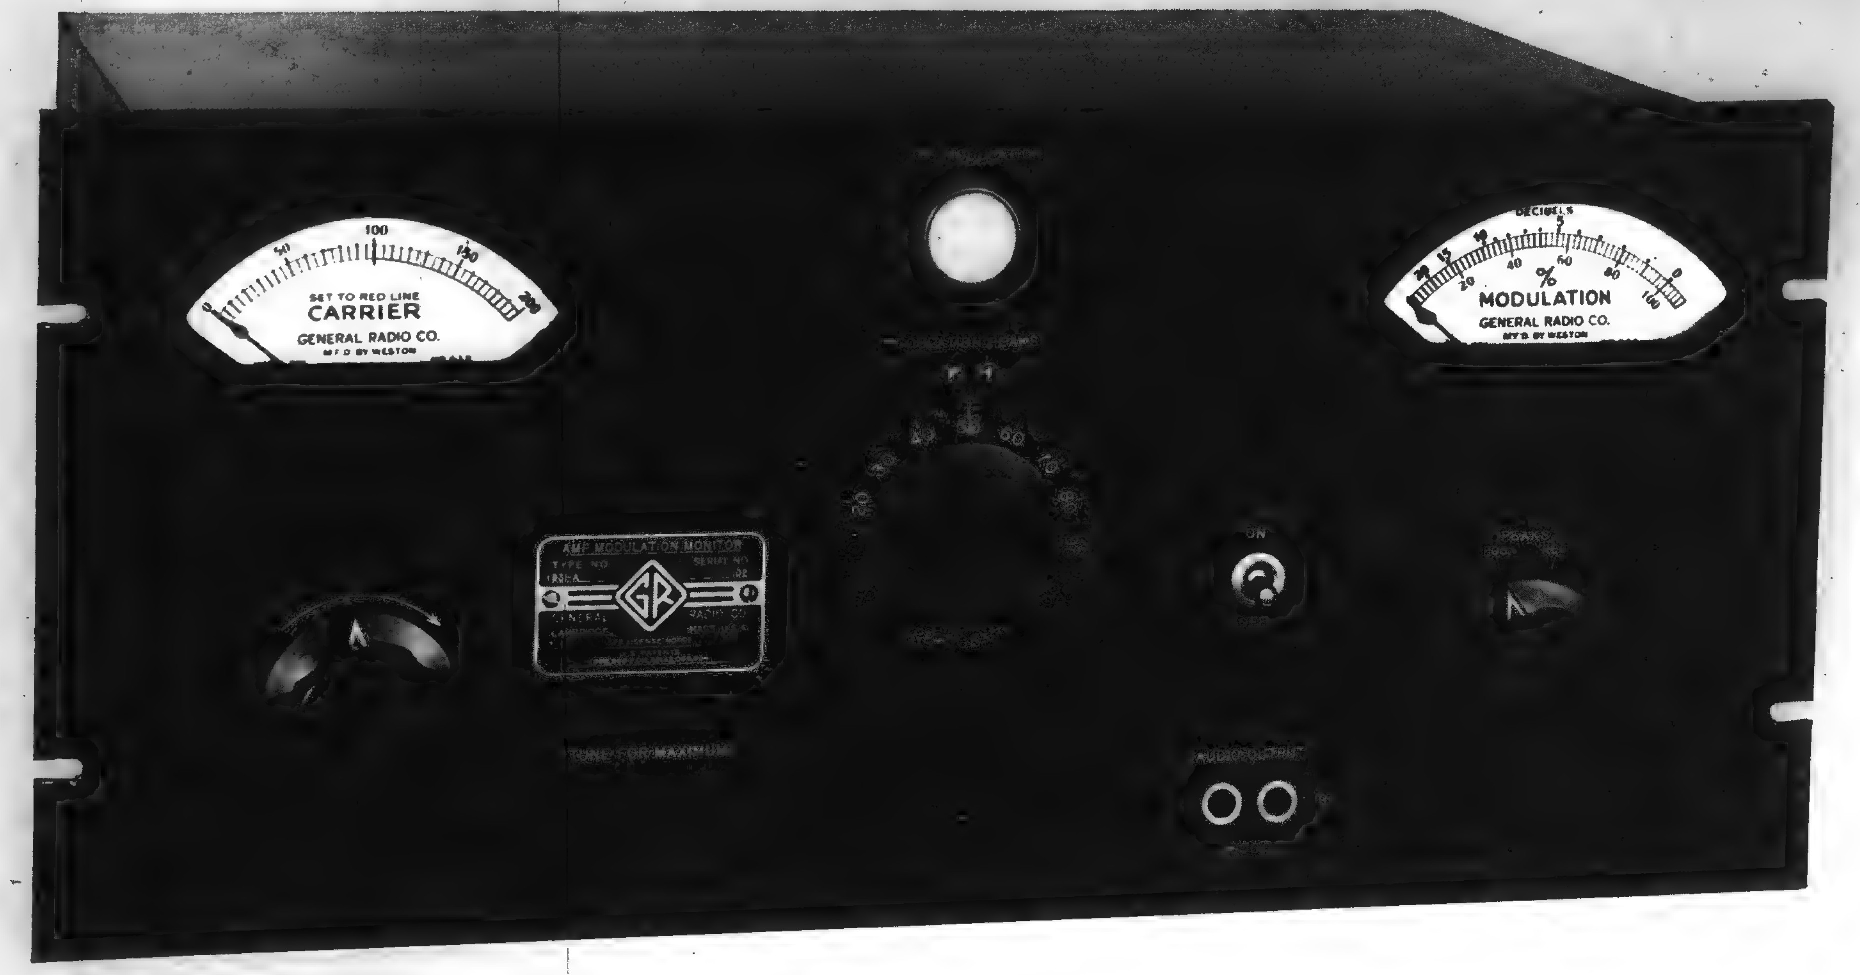
3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890



FOR MONITORING A-M TRANSMITTERS

TYPE 1931-A MODULATION MONITOR This modulation monitor indicates continuously the percentage amplitude modulation of broadcast and other radio telephone transmitters. It meets the requirements for modulation monitors specified in Rule 139, amended, of the Federal Communications Commission.

SPECIFIC MEASUREMENTS The following specific measurements can be made with the Type 1931-A Modulation Monitor: ★ Percentage modulation on either positive or negative peaks. ★ Program-level monitoring. ★ Measurement of carrier amplitude shift when modulation is applied. ★ Indication, by means of a flashing lamp, of any modulation peaks exceeding a predetermined value. ★ Transmitter audio-frequency response.

TRIPLE CIRCUIT DESIGN FEATURES The Type 1931-A Modulation Monitor consists of three circuits: (1) a linear diode rectifier which gives an instantaneous output voltage proportional to the carrier envelope; (2) a voltmeter, which gives a continuous indication of the peak modulation on either positive or negative peaks; (3) a trigger circuit to flash the over-modulation lamp. In addition, two auxiliary audio output circuits are provided to give a faithful reproduction of the carrier envelope with less than 0.1% distortion. One of these, at 600 ohms, is intended for audible monitoring; the other, a high-impedance circuit, can be used for distortion and noise-level measurements.

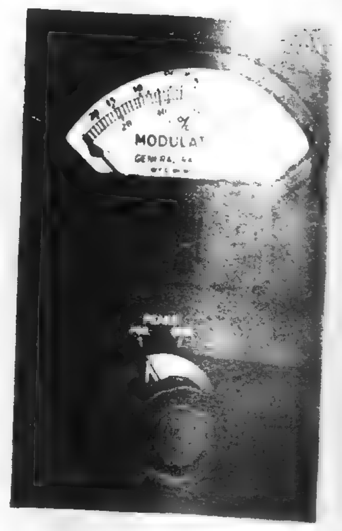
The linear rectifier is designed for operation at a low power level, which greatly simplifies coupling to the transmitter. The meter in the linear rectifier circuit shows any shift in carrier amplitude which may take place during modulation.

Terminals are provided for the connection of remote indicators for percentage modulation.

This monitor supersedes the well-known Type 731-B and embodies the latest circuits and developments that have become available through advances in the art.

GENERAL RADIO COMPANY • 275 Massachusetts Ave., Cambridge 39, Mass.

Branch Engineering Offices: 90 West St., New York 6 • 920 So. Michigan Ave., Chicago 5 • 1000 No. Seward St., Los Angeles 38



CONTINUOUS INDICATION of modulation percentage on either positive or negative peaks.

HIGH-SPEED MOVEMENT for percentage-modulation meter; easily read scale, illuminated; large pointer.

READS BOTH percentage modulation and decibels.

CARRIER SHIFT, when modulation is applied, is shown on this meter.

OVER-MODULATION LAMP flashes instantly whenever modulation peaks exceed a predetermined value set by the dial.

Electrical Merchandising
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JUN - 1945

NEW LITERATURE AND SALES HELPS

Ansley Radio Corp.

To assist dealers in increasing interest and demand for symphonic records, the Ansley Radio Corp., Long Island City, N. Y., has inaugurated another in its continuous series of dealer promotional helps. It has secured the services of John N. Burk, program annotator of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will provide informative, interesting program notes for a series of booklets which will be distributed to Ansley dealers for give-away to customers. Each booklet contains descriptive material on one of the world's great symphonies and its composer, including biographical sketch, background on composition and musical analysis by Mr. Burk.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER
JUN

Bach-Mozart Festival Summer Broadcast

The Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will be broadcast on three Saturday evenings by WJZ - American. The programs will be heard from 8:30 to 9:30 p. m. on July 28, Aug. 4 and Aug. 11.

MILLERTON,
NEWS
6/7/45 also Springfield News Republican

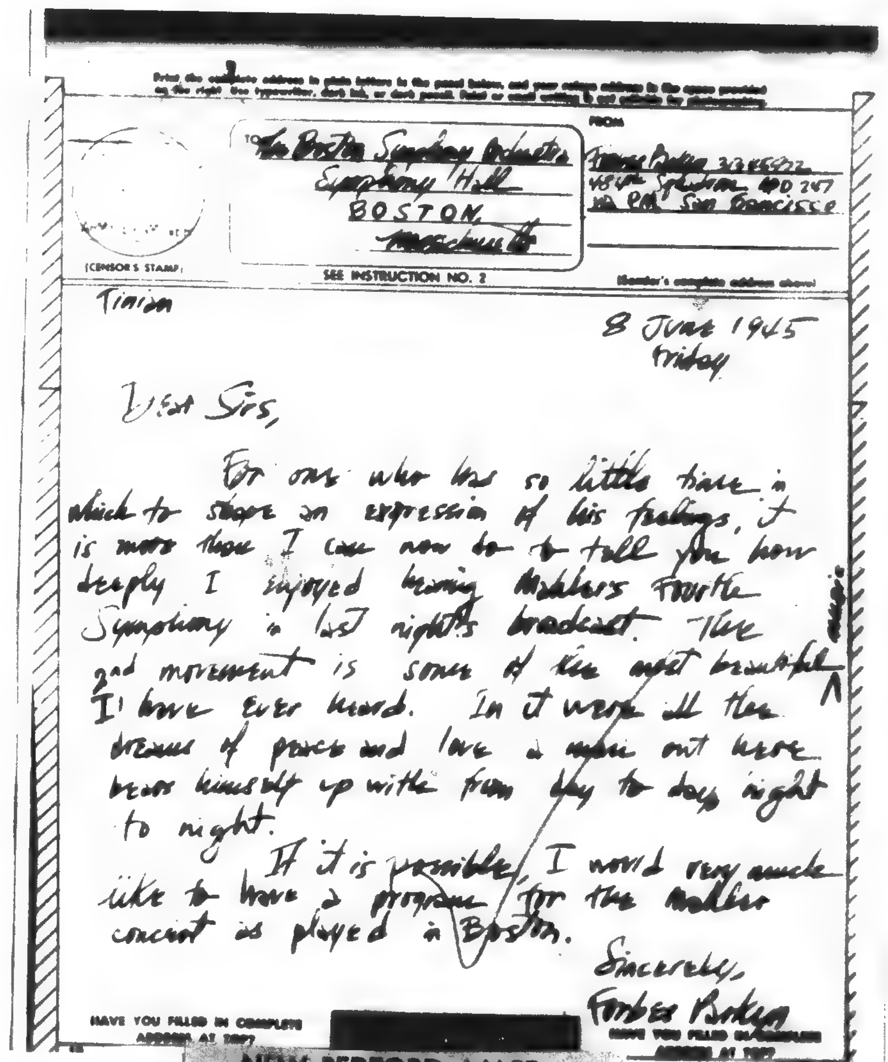
Bach-Mozart Festival At Tanglewood

Serge Koussevitzky Directs Boston Symphony; Soloists To Be Announced

A Bach-Mozart Festival, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, is to be given in the Berkshires this summer. Tanglewood ,the scenic estate of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will again be reopened for the purpose. The Orchestra will consist of the principals and other players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Six soloists will be announced at a later date.

There will be six concerts, each with a different program, on the Saturday evenings of July 28, August 4 and August 11 at 8:30, and the Sunday afternoons of July 29, August 5 and August 12 at 3:30.

Season tickets for the six concerts or for four concerts of the Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood may be obtained by application to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts, at $27 and $18 for series of six concerts, and $18 and $12 for series of four concerts. Tax is included in all prices.



TO The Boston Symphony Orchestra
Symphony Hall
BOSTON
Massachusetts

FROM Forbes Parker
45th Squadron APO 247
c/o PM San Francisco

(CENSOR'S STAMP)

SEE INSTRUCTION NO. 2

(Sender's complete address above)

Tinian

8 June 1945
Friday

Dear Sirs,

For one who has so little time in which to shape an expression of his feelings, it is more than I can now do to tell you how deeply I enjoyed hearing Mahler's Fourth Symphony in last night's broadcast. The 3rd movement is some of the most beautiful I have ever heard. In it were all the dreams of peace and love a man out here bears himself up with from day to day, night to night.

If it is possible, I would very much like to have a program for the Mahler concert as played in Boston.

Sincerely,
Forbes Parker

HAVE YOU FILLED IN COMPLETE ADDRESS AT TOP?

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
JUN 24 1945

Broadcast from Tanglewood

The Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, under direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be broadcast three Saturday nights by WNBH-American, 8:30 to 9:30. The first chair men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard under Dr. Koussevitzky's baton. The first of the three successive programs will be heard July 28.

Bernard Weiser, pianist, will be guest soloist when Arthur Fielder conducts the 9th Boston Pops Orchestra concert from 8:30 to 9, WNBH-American, next Saturday night. He will play the "Concertino for Piano and Orchestra" by Francaix.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT-LEADER
JUN 24 1945

THE BACH-MOZART

. . . Festival at Tanglewood, Ma under the direction of Dr Se
Koussevitsky will be broadcast
three Saturday evenings, July
August 4 and August 11 over
American Broadcasting syste
The Boston Symphony is spons
ing the festival and the orchest will be composed of the first chai men of the Boston Symphon
The Pops concerts of the Bos orchestra are now being broadc on Saturday nights and will co clude on July 14. Beginning Saturday, July 21, the "Esplana concerts of the Boston orchest will be broadcast. The Pops an Esplanade orchestras are made of men from the Boston Symph

[17]

REDUCTION RATIO
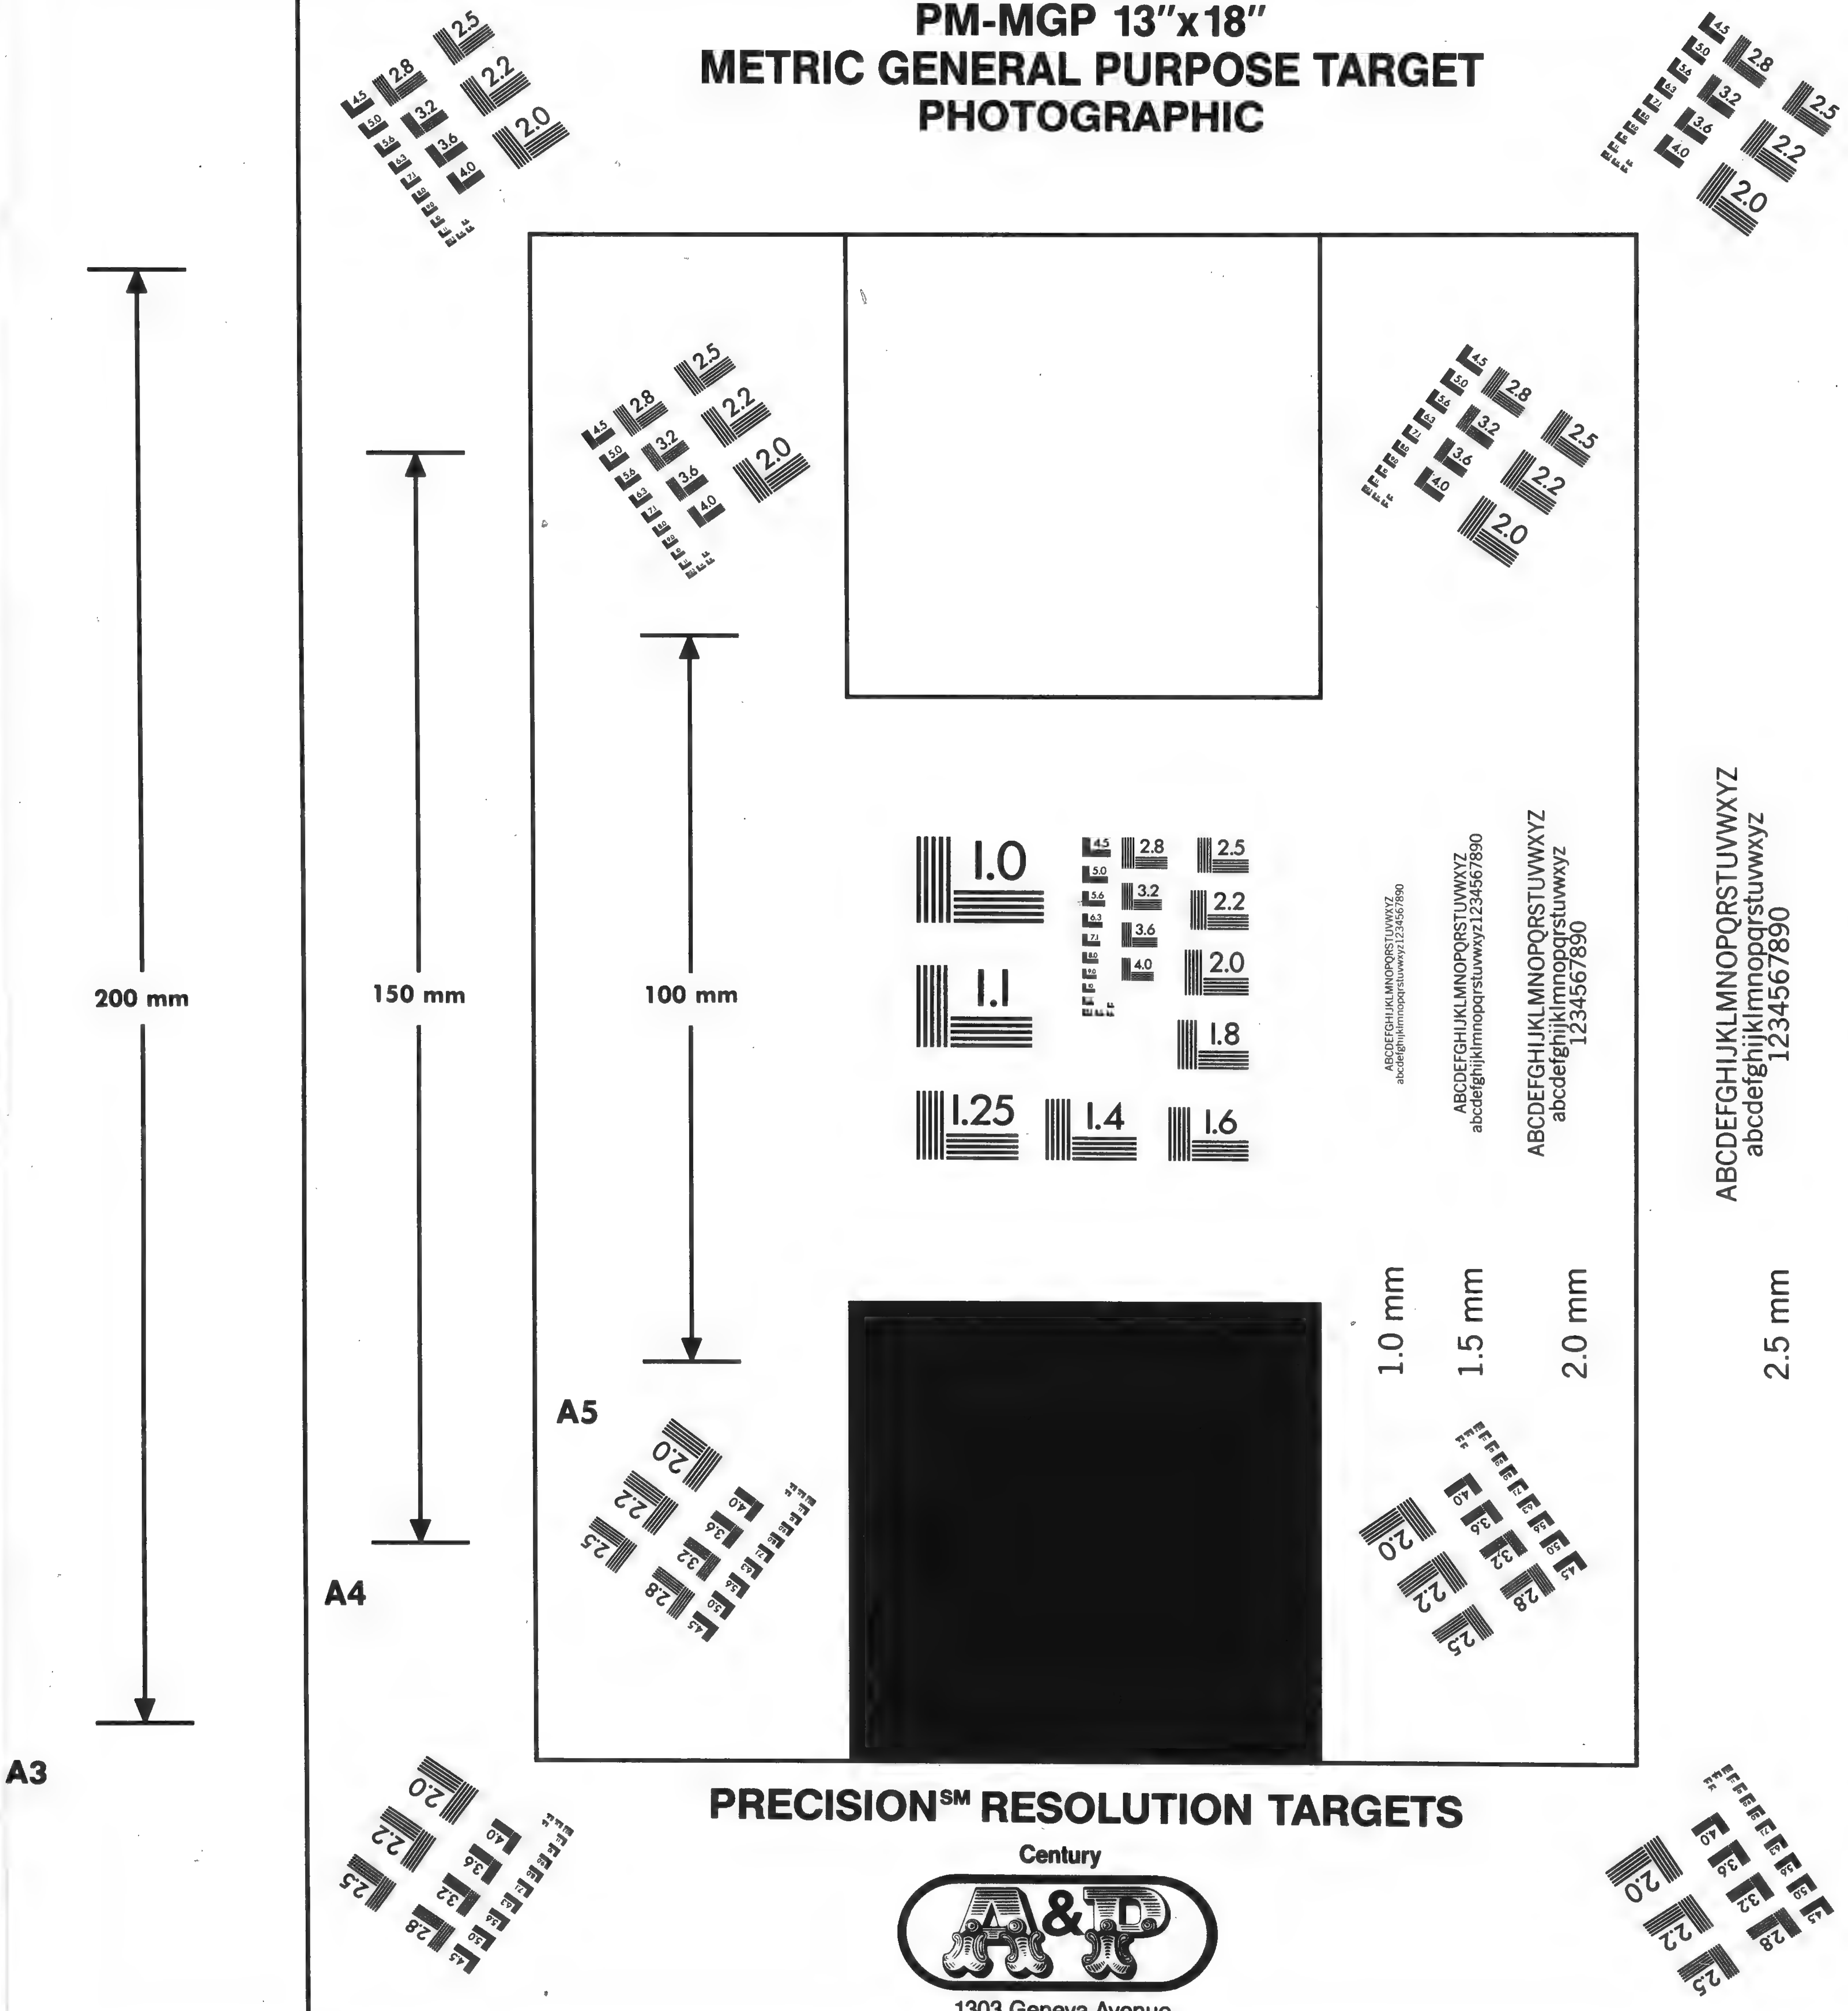
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P 1303 Geneva Avenue
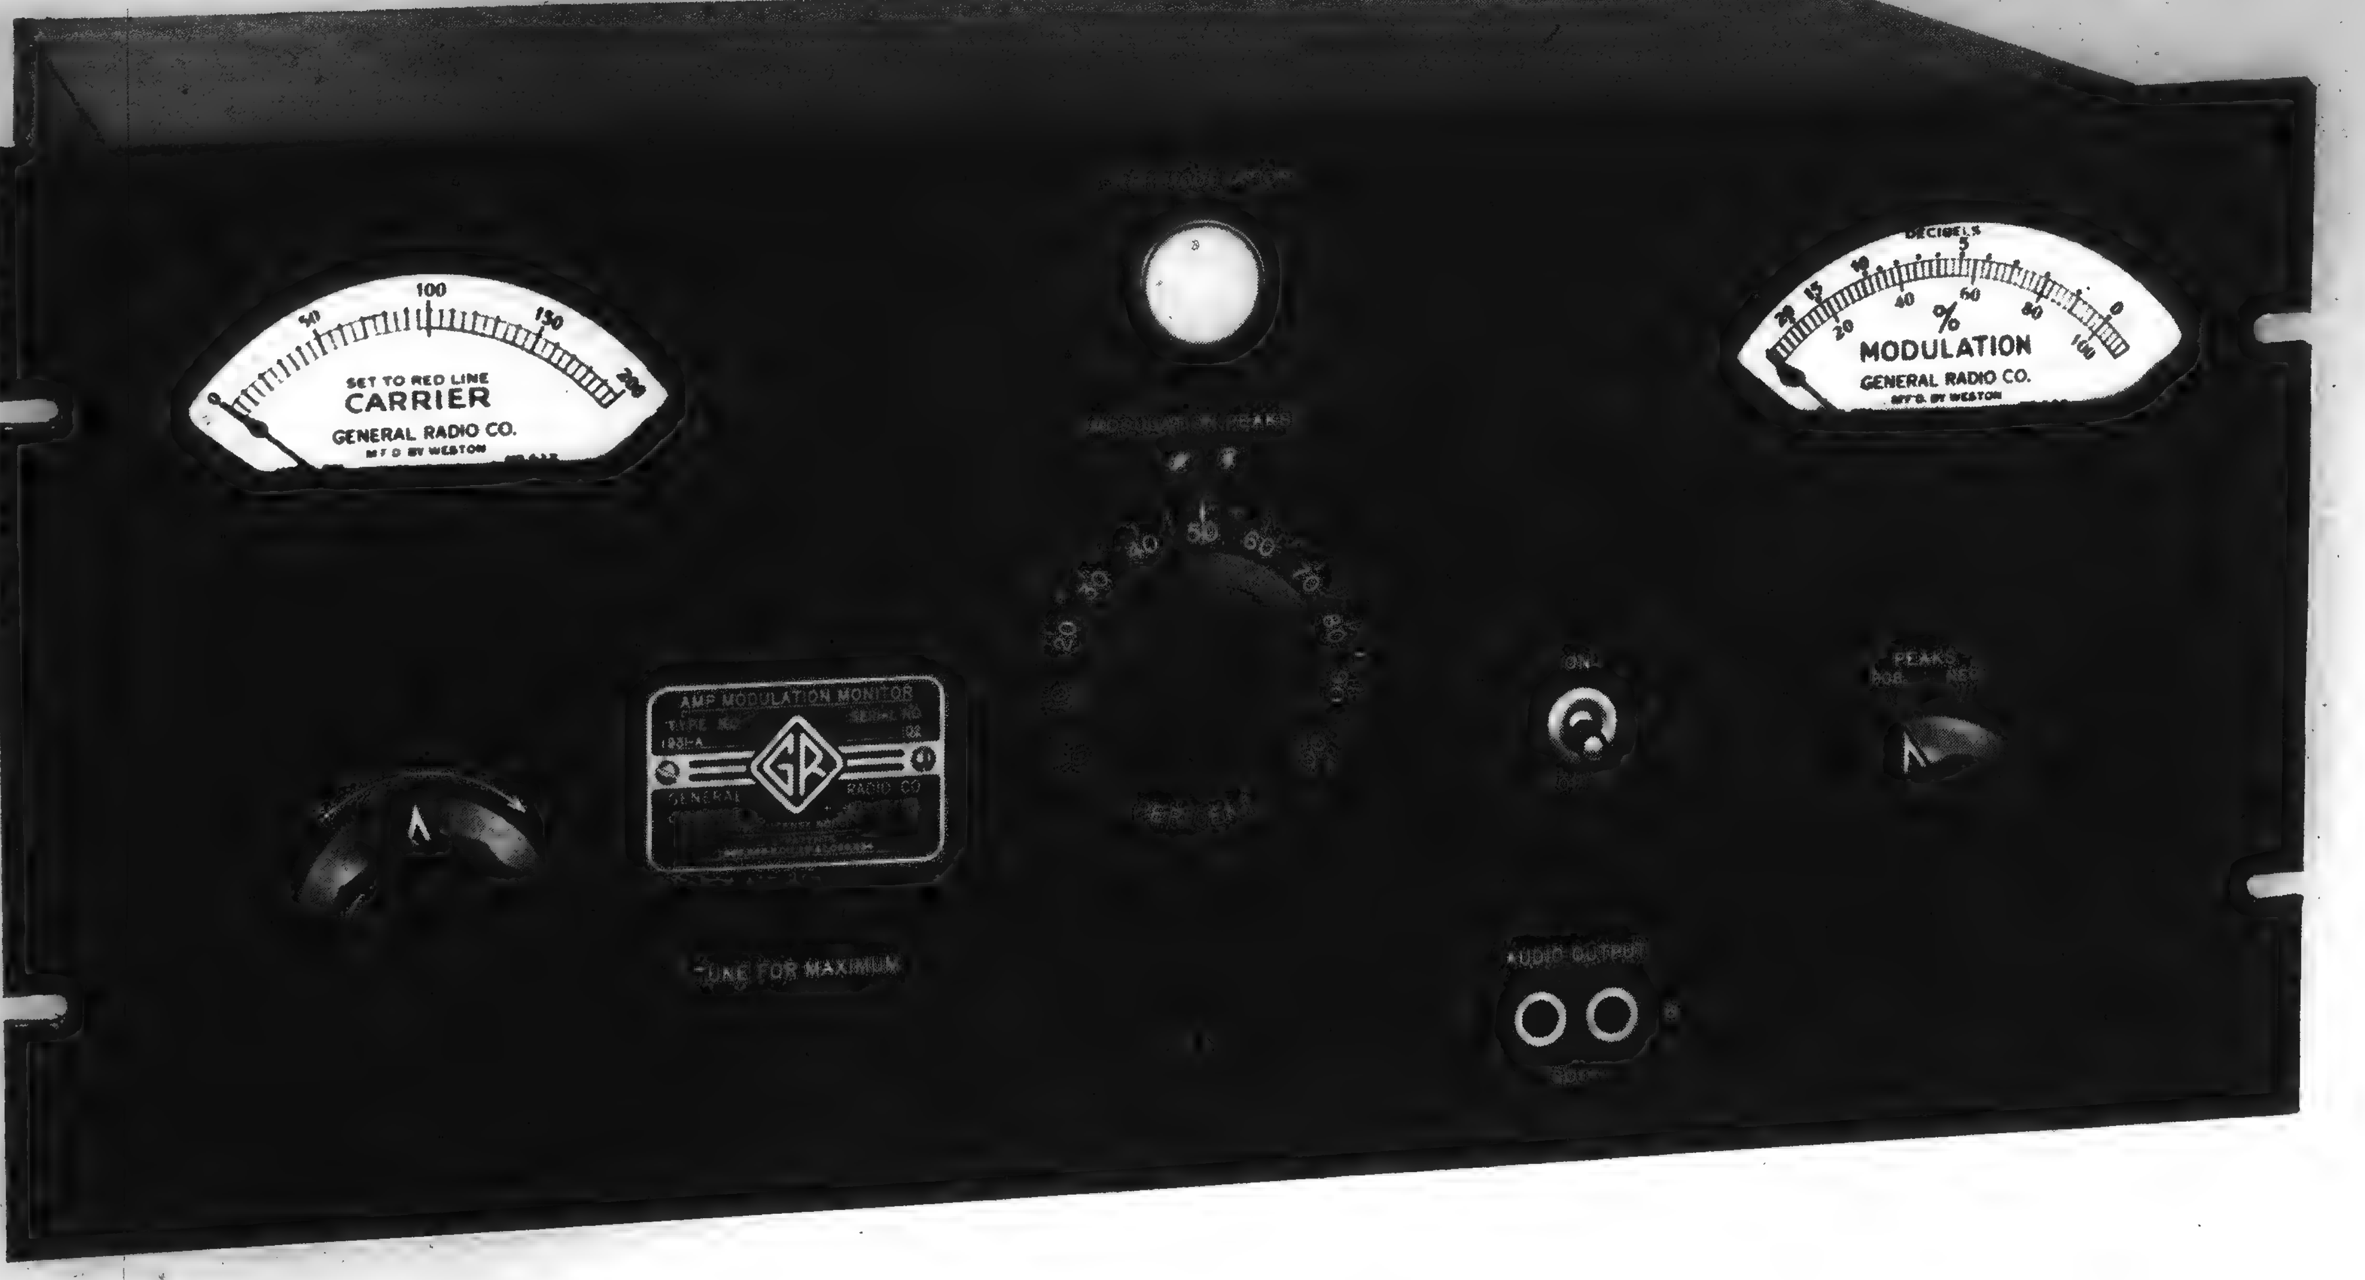
St. Paul, MN 55119



FOR MONITORING A-M TRANSMITTERS

TYPE 1931-A MODULATION MONITOR This modulation monitor indicates continuously the percentage amplitude modulation of broadcast and other radio telephone transmitters. It meets the requirements for modulation monitors specified in Rule 139, amended, of the Federal Communications Commission.

SPECIFIC MEASUREMENTS The following specific measurements can be made with the Type 1931-A Modulation Monitor: ★ Percentage modulation on either positive or negative peaks. ★ Program-level monitoring. ★ Measurement of carrier amplitude shift when modulation is applied. ★ Indication, by means of a flashing lamp, of any modulation peaks exceeding a p value. ★ Transmitter audio-frequency response.

TRIPLE CIRCUIT DESIGN FEATURES The Type 1931-A Monitor consists of three circuits: (1) a linear diode rectifie an instantaneous output voltage proportional to the carri (2) a voltmeter, which gives a continuous indication of th ulation on either positive or negative peaks; (3) a trigger ci the over-modulation lamp. In addition, two auxiliary audi cuits are provided to give a faithful reproduction of the car with less than 0.1% distortion. One of these, at 600 ohms, is audible monitoring; the other, a high-impedance circuit, ca distortion and noise-level measurements.

The linear rectifier is designed for operation at a low power greatly simplifies coupling to the transmitter. The meter rectifier circuit shows any shift in carrier amplitude whic place during modulation.

Terminals are provided for the connection of remote indica centage modulation.

This monitor supersedes the well-known Type 731-B and c latest circuits and developments that have become availa advances in the art.

GENERAL RADIO COMPANY • 275

Branch Engineering Offices: 90 West St., New York 6 • 920 So. Michi

---

Electrical Merchandising
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JUN - 1945

NEW LITERATURE AND SALES HELPS

Ansley Radio Corp.

To assist dealers in increasing interest and demand for symphonic records, the Ansley Radio Corp., Long Island City, N. Y., has inaugurated another in its continuous series of dealer promotional helps. It has secured the services of John N. Burk, program annotator of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will provide informative, interesting program notes for a series of booklets which will be distributed to Ansley dealers for give-away to customers. Each booklet contains descriptive material on one of the world's great symphonies and its composer, including biographical sketch, background on composition and musical analysis by Mr. Burk.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER
JUN

Bach-Mozart Festival Summer Broadcast

The B[illegible]Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzy, will be broadcast on three Saturday evenings by WJZ - American. The programs will be heard from 8:30 to 9:30 p. m. on July 28, Aug. 4 and Aug. 11.

MILLERT
NEWS
6/7/45
abs. Springfield
NEWS REPUBLICAN

Bach-Mozart Festival At Tanglewood

Serge Koussevitzky Directs Boston Symphony; Soloists To Be Announced

A Bach-Mozart Festival, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, is to be given in the Berkshires this summer. Tanglewood ,the scenic estate of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will again be reopened for the purpose. The Orchestra will consist of the principals and other players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Six soloists will be announced at a later date.

There will be six concerts, each with a different program, on the Saturday evenings of July 28, August 4 and August 11 at 8:30, and the Sunday afternoons of July 29, August 5 and August 12 at 3:30.

Season tickets for the six concerts or for four concerts of the Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood may be obtained by application to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts, at $27 and $18 for series of six concerts, and $18 and $12 for series of four concerts. Tax is included in all prices.

ONITOR This modulation monitor indicates plitude modulation of broadcast and other radio the requirements for modulation monitors spece Federal Communications Commission.

e following specific measurements can be made on Monitor: ★ Percentage modulation on either Program-level monitoring. ★ Measurement of dulation is applied. ★ Indication, by means of a flashing lamp, of any modulation peaks exceeding a predetermined value. ★ Transmitter audio-frequency response.

TRIPLE CIRCUIT DESIGN FEATURES The Type 1931-A Modulation Monitor consists of three circuits: (1) a linear diode rectifier which gives an instantaneous output voltage proportional to the carrier envelope; (2) a voltmeter, which gives a continuous indication of the peak modulation on either positive or negative peaks; (3) a trigger circuit to flash the over-modulation lamp. In addition, two auxiliary audio output circuits are provided to give a faithful reproduction of the carrier envelope with less than 0.1% distortion. One of these, at 600 ohms, is intended for audible monitoring; the other, a high-impedance circuit, can be used for distortion and noise-level measurements.

The linear rectifier is designed for operation at a low power level, which greatly simplifies coupling to the transmitter. The meter in the linear rectifier circuit shows any shift in carrier amplitude which may take place during modulation.

Terminals are provided for the connection of remote indicators for percentage modulation.

This monitor supersedes the well-known Type 731-B and embodies the latest circuits and developments that have become available through advances in the art.

CONTINUOUS INDICATION of modulation percentage on either positive or negative peaks.

HIGH-SPEED MOVEMENT for percentage-modulation meter; easily read scale, illuminated; large pointer.

READS BOTH percentage modulation and decibels.

CARRIER SHIFT, when modulation is applied, is shown on this meter.

OVER-MODULATION LAMP flashes instantly whenever modulation peaks exceed a predetermined value set by the dial.

GENERAL RADIO COMPANY • 275 Massachusetts Ave., Cambridge 39, Mass.

Branch Engineering Offices: 90 West St., New York 6 • 920 So. Michigan Ave., Chicago 5 • 1000 No. Seward St., Los Angeles 38

Electrical Merchandising
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JUN - 1945

NEW LITERATURE AND SALES HELPS

Ansley Radio Corp.

To assist dealers in increasing interest and demand for symphonic records, the Ansley Radio Corp., Long Island City, N. Y., has inaugurated another in its continuous series of dealer promotional helps. It has secured the services of John N. Burk, program annotator of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will provide informative, interesting program notes for a series of booklets which will be distributed to Ansley dealers for give-away to customers. Each booklet contains descriptive material on one of the world's great symphonies and its composer, including biographical sketch, background on composition and musical analysis by Mr. Burk.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER
JUN 2[illegible]

Bach-Mozart Festival Summer Broadcast

The Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will be broadcast on three Saturday evenings by WJZ - American. The programs will be heard from 8:30 to 9:30 p. m. on July 28, Aug. 4 and Aug. 11.

MILLERTON,
NEWS
6/7/45
abs. Springfield News Republican

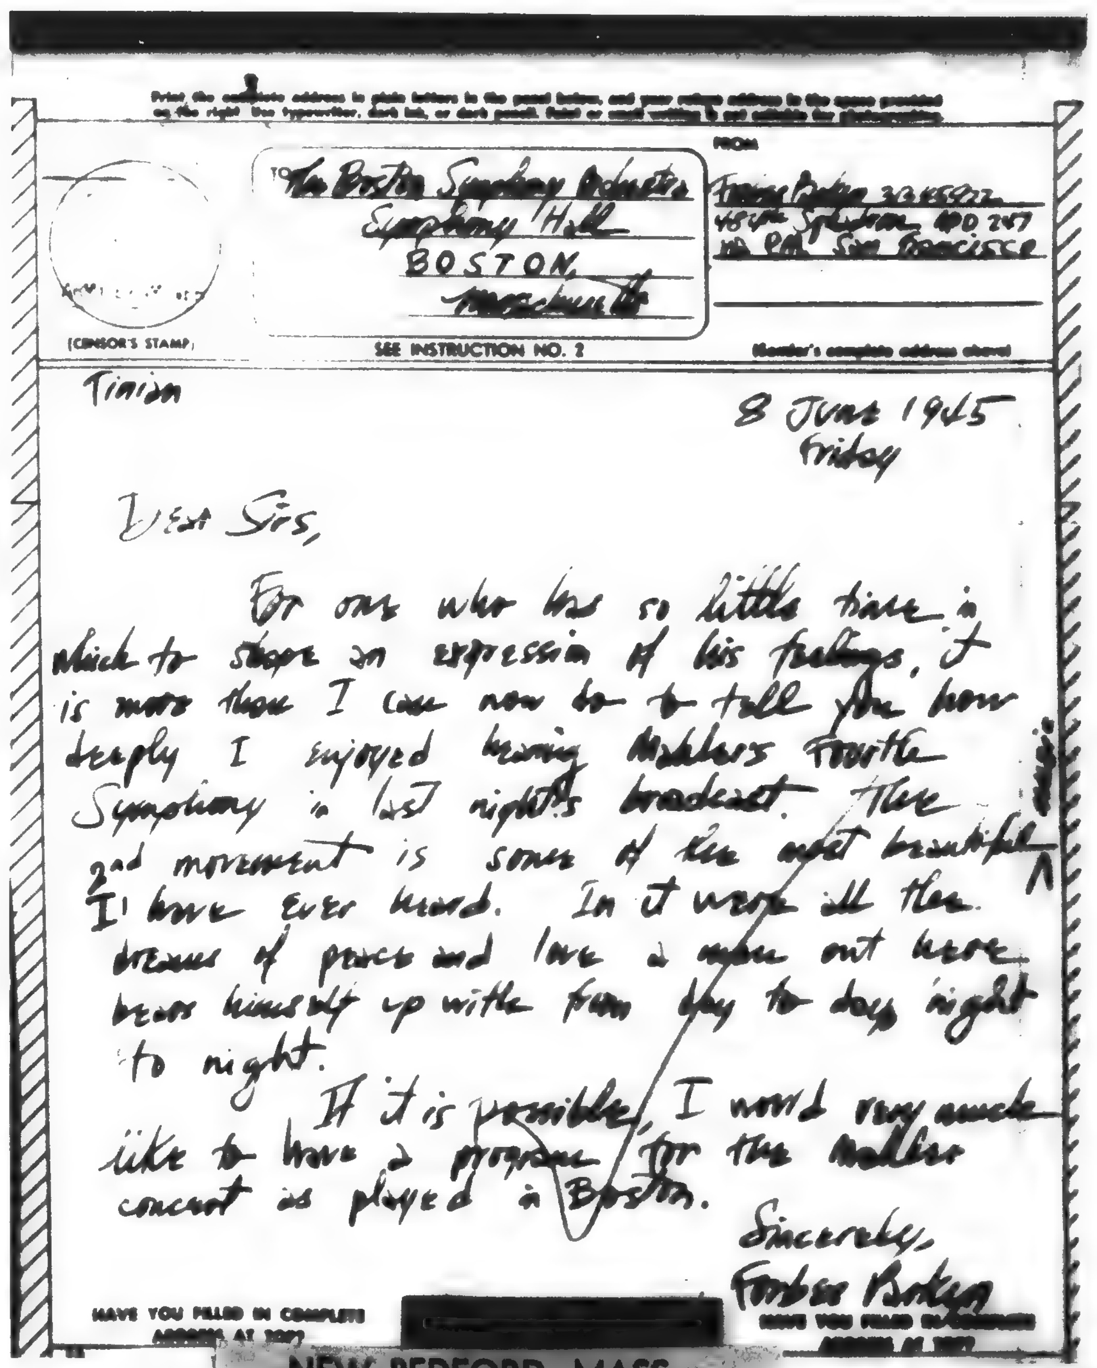
Bach-Mozart Festival At Tanglewood

Serge Koussevitzky Directs Boston Symphony; Soloists To Be Announced

A Bach-Mozart Festival, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, is to be given in the Berkshires this summer. Tanglewood, the scenic estate of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will again be reopened for the purpose. The Orchestra will consist of the principals and other players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Six soloists will be announced at a later date.

There will be six concerts, each with a different program, on the Saturday evenings of July 28, August 4 and August 11 at 8:30, and the Sunday afternoons of July 29, August 5 and August 12 at 3:30.

Season tickets for the six concerts or for four concerts of the Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood may be obtained by application to Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts, at $27 and $18 for series of six concerts, and $18 and $12 for series of four concerts. Tax is included in all prices.



Print the complete address in plain letters in the panel below, and your return address in the space provided on the right. Use typewriter, dark ink, or dark pencil. Faint or small writing is not suitable for photographing.

To The Boston Symphony Orchestra
Symphony Hall
BOSTON, Massachusetts

FROM Forbes Baker [illegible]
484th Sqdn. APO 247
c/o PM San Francisco

(CENSOR'S STAMP)

SEE INSTRUCTION NO. 2

(Sender's complete address above)

Tinian

8 June 1945
Friday

Dear Sirs,

For one who has so little time in which to shape an expression of his feelings, it is more than I can now do to tell you how deeply I enjoyed hearing Mahler's Fourth Symphony in last night's broadcast. The 2nd movement is some of the most beautiful I have ever heard. In it were all the dreams of peace and love a man out here bears himself up with from day to day night to night.

If it is possible, I would very much like to have a program for the Mahler concert as played in Boston.

Sincerely,
Forbes Baker

HAVE YOU FILLED IN COMPLETE ADDRESS AT TOP?

HAVE YOU FILLED IN COMPLETE ADDRESS AT TOP?

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
JUN 24 1945

Broadcast from Tanglewood

The Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, under direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be broadcast three Saturday nights by WNBH-American, 8:30 to 9:30. The first chair men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard under Dr. Koussevitzky's baton. The first of the three successive programs will be heard July 28.

Bernard Weiser, pianist, will be guest soloist when Arthur Fielder conducts the 9th Boston Pops Orchestra concert from 8:30 to 9, WNBH-American, next Saturday night. He will play the "Concertino for Piano and Orchestra" by Francaix.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT-LEADER
JUN 24 1945

THE BACH-MOZART

. . . Festival at Tanglewood, Mas under the direction of Dr. Ser Koussevitsky will be broadcast
three Saturday evenings, July
August 4 and August 11 over t
American Broadcasting syste
The Boston Symphony is sponso
ing the festival and the orchest will be composed of the first chai men of the Boston Sympho
The Pops concerts of the Bosto orchestra are now being broadca on Saturday nights and will co
clude on July 14. Beginning Saturday, July 21, the "Esplanad concerts of the Boston orchest will be broadcast. The Pops an Esplanade orchestras are made u of men from the Boston Symphony

This Clipping From
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

JUN 1 - 1945

Director Plans Bach-Mozart Festival

New York, June 30 (UP)

PLANS for a full-scale Bach-Mozart festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., have been completed by Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An orchestra of chamber proportions will be assembled from the Boston orchestra, all of the principals taking part. The concerts will be given in the theater-concert hall at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home in the Berkshires, which seats 1,150 and is considered ideal for music in intimate performance.

There will be six concerts, each with a different program, on three Saturday evenings at 8:30 and three Sunday afternoons at 3:30 (July 28-29, Aug. 4-5 and Aug 11-12).

Bach will be represented by the Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5; the suites in B minor No. 2, in D major No. 3 and in D major No. 4; the concertos with piano solo in D minor and F minor and the concertos with two pianos in C minor and C major.

Mozart Program

THE MOZART works will be two concertos for piano and orchestra; the Konzertante Sinfonie for violin and viola; the "Haffner" Serenade; the Divertimento in B-flat for strings, with two horns; serenade in B-flat for wind instruments; the adagio and fugue for strings; overture to "Das Schauspieldirektor;" Symphony No. 26 in E-flat; the "Paris" symphony in D major (K. 297); the "Prague" symphony in D major, and the three final symphonies in E-flat, G minor and C major ("Jupiter").

The pianists will include Alexander Borovsky, Alexander Brailowsky, Robert Casadesus, Lukas Foss and Abram Chasins, partnered with Constance Keene. Violin soloists will be William Kroll and Richarad Burgin; viola, A. Veisse and Jean Lefranc; flute, George Laurent, and oboe, Fernand Gillet.

THE FIFTH SEASON of the Norfolk School of Music of Yale University, directed by Dean Bruce Simons of the Yale Music School, will open on Monday, July 2, at the Stoeckel estate, Norfolk, Conn., and continue through Aug. 10.

The school, founded in 1941, is administered by the Ellen Battell Stoeckel Foundation. In the past four seasons it has attracted students from England, Brazil, China, Canada and 27 states. Registration is limited to 50 students, to ensure personal relations between teacher and pupil.

MITCHELL, S. D.
REPUBLIC

JUN 11 1945

Edge Receives Honorary Degree At Boston U.

At commencement exercises of Boston university recently the above were awarded honorary degrees. With the degrees they received, they are: left to right, standing: Joseph Henry Edge, president of Dakota Wesleyan University, Mitchell, S. D., doctor of science in education; William Roger Greeley, architect, president of the New England Town Planning association, doctor of fine arts; Arthur T. Vanderbilt, dean of New York university School of Law. doctor of civil law; Judge Bert Ellsworth Holland of Boston municipal court, doctor of laws; Horace Albert Carter, trustee of the university and treasurer of the William Carter Co., doctor of commercial science. Seated: Sergel Koussevilsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra the past 20 years, doctor of music; Alice Stone Blackwell, writer, humanitarian and worker in the interests of women, doctor of humanities; President Daniel L. Marsh; Charles Seymour, president of Yale, doctor of laws; and Hugh Potter Baker, president of Massachussetts State college, doctor of science in education.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

JUN 12 1945

Film To Tell Resort Assets Of Berkshire

Conference Sets Aside $1000 To Be Matched by County

The Berkshire Hills Conference executive committee, last night, voted to spend $1000 for a Berkshire County resort promotional motion picture. The County Commissioners have budgeted a similar amount and the appropriation awaits the approval of the state director of accounts.

The promotional film will consist of scenic and recreational sequences, duplicating part of those incorporated in the documentary film being assembled for the Housatonic River Improvement Association, for educational use in the movement to eliminate pollution from the river. Separate music and commentary will be used.

Copies of the 30-minute resort promotional film will be available for wide commercial advertising and promotional use. Because of the possibility of duplicate uses of the sequences in the widely different films, the cost for each will be materially reduced. A total of $2000 has been devoted to the documentary filming project by the Housatonic River Improvement Association. Adrian C. Williams, film producer of New York, will spend July completing the photography for both films.

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was a guest at the dinner meeting of the committee in the Curtis Hotel, Lenox. The orchestra is a member of the Conference. Mr. Judd told of plans for the July-August Bach-Mozart festival, in which part of the members of the orchestra will participate under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. He said the organization is looking forward to the resumption of the full Berkshire Symphonic Festival programs in the music shed at Tanglewood, on the Lenox-Stockbridge road. Those concerned have appreciated increasingly the ideal location afforded for the festival, he said.

Eighteen attended the meeting. Charles F. Reid of Adams, president, presided.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
& ~~[illegible]~~ Springfield Eve. Union
JUN 23 1945

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

JUN 23 1945

Eminent Artists Will Appear At Tanglewood Music Festival

Serge Koussevitzky will present a comprehensive list of the music of Bach and Mozart at the Festival devoted to those two composers to be given at Tanglewood, Lenox. The conductor will assemble an orchestra of chamber proportions from his Boston Symphony Orchestra, all of the principals taking part. The concerts will be given in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood, the Orchestra's summer home in the Berkshires, and this hall, seating 1150, is ideal for music in intimate performance. There will be six concerts, each with a different program, on three Saturday evenings at 8.30 and three Sunday afternoons at 3.30 (July 28-29, Aug. 4-5, Aug. 11-12).

From the instrumental music of Bach Dr. Koussevitzky will perform the Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5; the Suites in B minor No. 2, in D major No. 3, and in D major, No. 4; Concertos with Piano Solo in D minor and F minor, the Concertos with Two Pianos in C minor and C major. From the music of Mozart there will be two Concertos for Piano and Orchestra, the Konzertante Sinfonie for Violin and Viola, the "Haffner" Serenade, the Divertimento in B-flat for Strings with Two Horns and the Serenade in B-flat for Wind Instruments, the Adagio and Fugue for Strings, the Overture to "Der Schauspieldirektor," the Symphonies No. 26 in E-flat (K. 184), the "Paris" Symphony in D major (K. 297), the "Prague" Symphony in D major, and the three final Symphonies in E-flat, G minor and C major ("Jupiter"). The pianists to appear in the Festival will include Alexander Borovsky, Alexander Brailovsky, Robert Casadesus, Lukas Foss, and Abram Chasins partnered with Constance Keene. Violin soloists will be William Kroll and Richard Burgin; viola, A. Veisse and Jean Lefranc; flute, Georges Laurent; oboe, Fernand Gillet.

It is still possible to subscribe for four or six tickets by application to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall, Boston.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

JUN 23 1945

finances, Mrs. James W. Russell

Theatre Ass

By THEODOLINDA C. BORIS

Bach-Mozart Festival Soloists Announced

THE soloists to appear in the Bach-Mozart Festival to be given at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., were announced today by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the concerts. They will be Alexander Borovsky, Alexander Brailowsky, Robert Casadesus, Lukas Foss, Abram Chasins, Constance Keene, pianists; William Kroll, Richard Burgin, violinsts; A. Veisse and Jean Lefranc, viola; George Laurent, flute, and Fernand Gillet, oboe.

Dr. Koussevitzky will assemble an orchestra of chamber proportions from his Boston Symphony. There will be six concerts, each with a different program on three Saturday evenings at 8:30 and three Sunday afternoons at 3:30 (July 28-29, Aug. 4-5, Aug. 11-12).

From the music of Bach, Dr. Koussevitzky will perform the Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5; the Suites Nos. 2, 3 and 4; the Concertos with Piano solo in D minor and F minor; the Concertos with two pianos in C minor and C major. From the music of Mozart, there will be two Concertos for Piano and Orchestra, the Konzertante Sinfonie for Violin and Viola, the "Haffner" Serenade, the Divertimento in B flat for strings with two horns, and the Serenade in B flat for wind instruments, the Adagio and Fugue for Strings, the Overture to "Der Schauspieldirektor," the Symphonies K. Nos. 184 and 297, the "Prague" Symphony in D major, and the three final symphonies in E flat, G minor and C major ("Jupiter").

It is still possible to subscribe for four or six tickets (two or three week-ends) by application to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall, Boston.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

JUN 10 1945

OR RECIPIENTS

Presi otter Baker, Massachusetts State coll ded the honorary degree Doctor of S ation at Boston university's 72d ann nent, recently. The honorary degree own with Dr Marsh, president of B. U eft right) seated: Sergei Koussevitsky dir Boston Symphony orchestra; Alice Stone Blac writer and humanitarian; Dr Marsh; Char Seymo president of Yale university; Dr Baker he b row was composed of well-known professors and business men.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

JUN 23 1945

Berkshires to Have Summer Concerts

The Festival of Music by Bach and Mozart, to be presented by Serge Koussevitzky on three consecutive week ends in Tanglewood, Mass., starting July 28, will be devoted to concertos and orchestral works to be played by a limited instrumental body. There will be piano concertos by both composers, with Alexander Borovsky, Alexander Brailovsky, Robert Casadesus and Lukas Foss as soloists. Abram Chasins and Constance Keene will be heard in Bach concertos for two pianos. Five Mozart symphonies will be heard, as well as serenades and other works of chamber orchestra proportions. Concerts will be held Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, totaling six in all.

OWA
ADER

4 1945

MOZART
glewood, Mass., n of Dr. Serge be broadcast on nings, July 28,
ust 11 over the asting system.
ony is sponsor-d the orchestra the first chair-on Symphony. of the Boston
being broadcast and will con-Beginning on the "Esplanade"
oston orchestra
The Pops and as are made up ton Symphony.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

JUN 24 1945

LENOX TO SEEK $3700 FOR COMMUNITY FUND

Drive to Be Held This Week — Christmas Gifts to Soldiers Is Biggest Item

From Our Special Correspondent

Lenox, June 23—At a meeting the 12th it was decided to hold the Lenox Community fund drive from the 25th to 29th, at which time a house-to-house canvass will be made. The goal is $3700. This year the organizations listed below have joined the fund:—

Boy Scouts, 17 per cent; Visiting Nurse association, 26 per cent; New England Home for Little Wanderers, 12 per cent; Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children, 13 per cent; Christmas gifts and letters to the local men and women in the armed services, 31 per cent; expenses, 1 per cent.

The total to be raised and the percentages indicated are based on an average of the amounts raised in town by the above organizations over the past four years. The Christmas gifts organization is an exception, as it did not exist until the war. There are approximately 418 men and women from Lenox in the armed services.

Dr Serge Koussevitzky has chosen the soloists and music for the Bach-Mozart festival to be held the last weekend in July and the first two in August. Among the soloists are several Berkshire residents and former residents, including Robert Casadesus, pianist, of Great Barrington, who played the Mozart concerto at the concluding concert of the 1944 festival; William Kroll, violinist, who as a member of the Elshuco trio, the South Mountain quartet and the Coolidge quartet, spent several seasons at South Mountain; and Richard Burgin, violinist, Boston Symphony orchestra concertmaster and member of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

From the instrumental music of Bach Dr Koussevitzky will direct the principals and other members of the Boston orchestra in the Brandenburg Concertos 2, 3, 4 and 5, Suite in B minor No 2 and in D Major No 3 and 4; Concertos with piano solo in D minor and F minor; Concertos with two pianos in C minor and C major.

From the music of Mozart there will be two Concertos for Piano and Orchestra, the Konzertante Sinfonie for violin and viola, the "Haner" Serenade, the Divertimento in B flat for Strings with Two Horns, the Serenade in B flat for Wind Instruments, the Adagio and Fugue for Strings, the Overture to "Der Schauspieldirektor," Symphonies No 26 and in E flat, the "Paris" Symphony in D major, the "Prague" Symphony in D major, and the three final Symphonies in E flat G minor and C minor ("Jupiter").

It is still possible to subscribe for four or six tickets for two or three weekends by application to Symphony hall, Boston, or to buy tickets locally at an early date. The concerts will be given in thetheater concert hall seating 1150.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

JUN 24 1945

Berkshire Music Fete In Auto Range

PITTSFIELD, Mass. — The Berkshire Symphonic Festival, annual classical music fete, will be held in Tanglewood during the first three weeks in August, it was announced yesterday by the Berkshire Hills Conference. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor and sponsor of contemporary music, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at this famed musical event.

It is expected that motorists will be able to drive to the Berkshire Festival now that gasoline allotments have been liberalized, the Conference revealed.

The area is rich in literary and historical lore. Hawthorne, Longfellow and Melville lived in this New England locality, and evidences of American history dot the countryside from Sheffield to Williamstown.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

JUN 24 1945

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

JUN 24 1945

Isabelle Evans'

Thoughts A

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will present a compreh[illegible] music of Bach and Mozart at the festival devoted to those two composers. He will assemble an orchestra of chamber proportions from his Boston Symphony with all the principals taking part.

S. Koussevitzky

The concerts will be given in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., the orchestra's summer home in the Berkshires, and this hall, seating 1,150, is ideal for music in intimate performance. There will be six concerts, each having a different program, on three Saturday evenings at 8.30 o'clock and three Sunday afternoons at 3.30 o'clock (July 28th-29th, August 4th-5th, August 11th-12th).

From the instrumental music of Bach, Dr. Koussevitzky will perform Concertos No. 2, 3, 4 and 5; the Suites in B Minor No. 2, in D major No. 3, and in D major, No. 4; Concertos with piano solo in D minor and F minor, the Concertos with two pianos in C minor and C major.

From the music of Mozart there will be two concertos for piano and orchestra, the Konzertante Sinfonie for violin and viola, the Haffner Serenade, the Divertimento for strings with two horns, and the Serenade in B flat for wind instruments, the Adagio and Fugue for strings, the Overture to Der Schauspieldirektor, the Symphonies Kochel 184, 297 and the Prague, and the three final symphonies.

The soloists chosen by Dr. Koussevitzky include the pianists Alexander Borovsky, Alexander Brailov- y, Robert Casadesus and Lukas Foss, and Abram Chasins partnered with Constance Keene. Violin soloists will be William Kroll and Richard Burgin; Viola A. Veisse and Jean LeFranc; flute, Georges Laurent; oboe, Fernand Gillet.

NORFOLK, VA.
VIRGINIAN PILOT

JUN 24 1945

The "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2 of the mystical French composer Maurice Ravel is controversial music which you may passionately admire or cordially detest, depending upon the degree of musical sophistication in your aesthetic makeup. This reviewer takes an in-between position, finding moments of sheer brillianse in the piece—and other moments of sheer noise when the suspicion is strong that Mr. Ravel is pulling the listeners' collective leg.

Koussevitzky

Anyway, here is a superlatively fastidious performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky, well recorded and done up on the 12-inch Victor red seal records in the year's most strikingly attractive dual envelope at $2.25 plus tax.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

JUN 24 1945

Music

SERGT. KOUSSEVITZKY will present a comprehensive list of the music of Bach and Mozart at the Festival devoted to those two composers to be given at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. The conductor will assemble an orchestra of chamber proportions from his Boston Symphony Or chestra, all of the principals taking part. The concerts will be given in the Theatre- Concert Hall at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home in the Berkshires. This hall, seating 1150, is ideal for music in intimate performance. There will be six concerts, each with a different program, on three Saturday evenings at 8:30 p. m., and three Sunday afternoons at 3:30 p. m., July 28-29, August 4-5 and August 11-12.

From the intrumental music of Bach Dr. Kousevitzky will perform the Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5; the Suites in B minor No. 2, in D major No. 3, and in D major, No. 4; Concertos with Piano Solo in D minor and F minor, the Concertos with Two Pianos in C minor and C major. From the music of Mozart there will be two Concertos for Piano and Orchestra, the Konzertante Sinfonie for Violin and Viola, the "Haffner" Serenade, the Divertimento in B flat for Strings with two Horns and the Serenade in B flat for Strings with Two Horns and the Serenade in B flat for Wind Instruments, the Adagio and Fugue for Strings, the Overture to "Der Shauspieldirektor," the Symphonies No. 26 in E-flat (K. 148), the "Paris" Symphony in D major (K. 297), the "Prague" Symphony in D major, and the three final Symphonies in E-flat, G minor and C major ("Jupiter").

* * *

William Penny Hacker, Albany pianist and conductor, will direct the Ozark Summer Symphony Workship in connection with the University of Arkansas where he is head of the music department, in its first annual festival, July 8-13. Serving his apprenticeship with Jose Iturbi MM. Hacker has conducted the Mexico Symphony orchestra; the N. Y. A. orchestra of Decatur, Ill.; the Lake George Sum mer symphony orchestra and the Albany Philharmonic orshestra. Special attention will be given to the works of American composers, among them a composition for orchestra and chorus by Frank Bailey, director of the Albany High school glee club.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

JUN 24 1945

Victor 12-Inch

To repeat, the Victor classics are excellent. The best recording thus far of the theme from the 20th Century Fox film "Laura" is among them. Recorded by the Janssen Symphony of Los Angeles, conducted by Werner Janssen, it is a full arrangement of the haunting tune, built on variations of tempo and key. Another movie score, the Tansman "Scherzo" from the Universal picture "Flesh and Fantasy," on the other side, is given much animation and feeling. Both numbers are aided by the symphonic arrangements, which give them distinctive mood quality.

Daphnis and Chloe, Suite No. 1, the story of Daphnis, a shepherd who wins, loses and eventually wins his love again, put to music by Maurice Ravel for ballet, is under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra. The myth, narrated in a complete musical mood, captured sincerely by Koussevitzky, is considered Ravel's masterpiece. Filled with beauty and animation, it is recorded in a Victor Showpiece album which provides material dealing with the composer and the ballet.

Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave Overture," sometimes called the "Hebrides Overture," is recorded by the Boston "Pops" orchestra, under Arthur [illegible] Inspired while walking through the famous Staffa caves in Scotland, the composer has captured the romance of the sea, soothing and melancholy at one time, and surging against the rocks another. The performance by the "Pops" is highly sonorous and imaginative.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

JUN 25 1945

Music Festivals Plans Available

Tanglewood To Hold Bach-Mozart Events

By Helen Havener

NEW YORK, N. Y., June 25—Further details of the Bach and Mozart festivals scheduled for Tanglewood in the Berkshires in late July and early August became available this week. With Salzburg temporarily a thing of the past, these festivals of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky are about the nearest American approach to it, and they are sure to gather as large an audience of the music-minded as present ODT regulations make possible.

While there will be a reasonable amount of selections that will draft on the full personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, much of the music presented will involve individual units of the orchestra or chamber groups. For example, a chamber orchestra selected from the Boston Symphony will play four "Bradenburg" concertos of Bach; three suites; two piano concertos (D minor and F minor); and two concertos for two pianos (C minor and M major) of the same composer. Also among the Mozart music will be two piano concertos, the Sinfonie Concertante for violin and viola; the Haffner Serenade; the B-flat Serenade for wind instruments and the Adagio and Fugue for Strings, as well as an overture and six symphonies which will bring the full orchestra into play.

Soloists engaged for the Bach-Mozart events are Alexander Borovsky, Alexander Brailowsky, Robert Casadesus, and Lukas Foss, pianists; William Kross and Richard Burgin, violinists; A. Veisse and Jean Lefranc, violinists; Georges Laurent, flutist,: and Bernand Gillet, oboist. The two piano numbers will be given by Abram Chasins and Constance Keene.

The dates are July 28-29, Aug. 4-5 and Aug. 11-12.

The casts of the two operas to be given during the New York stadium season were announced this week. Appearing with Gladys Swarthout, who has the title role in Carmen, July 9 and 10, will be Charles Kullman, tenor, and Martial Singer, baritone, as Don Jose and Escamillo; Mimi Benzell, soprano, as Micaela and Lorenzo Alvary, basso, and George Cehanowsky, baritone, in the remaining important roles.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

JUN 26 1945

Koussevitzky will conduct the principals and other members of the Boston Symphony orchestra for a Bach-Mozart festival at the theater concert hall at Tanglewood for six concerts this summer. Soloists will be pianists, Alexander Borovsky, Alexander Brailovsky, Robert Casadesus, Lukas Foss and Abram Chasins partnered with Constance Keene; the violinists, William Kroll and Richard Burgin; violists, A. Viesse and Jean LeFranc; flutist, Georges Laurent and oboist, Fernand Gillet.

Concerts are scheduled for the afternoons of July 29, Aug. 5 and 12; and the evenings of July 28 Aug. 4 and 11. Of the instrumental music of Bach, Dr. Koussevitzky will perform the Brandenburg concertos, Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5; the Suites in B minor No. 3 and in D major, No. 4; the concertos with piano solo in D minor and F minor; and the concertos with two pianos in C minor and C major.

From the music of Mozart, there will be two concertos for piano and orchestra, the Sinfonie Konzertante for violin and viola, the "Haffner" serenade, the Divertimento in B flat for strings with two horns and the Serenade in B flat for wind instruments; the Adagio and Fugue for strings; the Overture to "Der Schauspieldirektor"; the Symphonies No. 26 in E flat (K. 184), the "Paris" symphony in D major (K. 297), the "Prague" symphony in D major; and the three final symphonies in E flat, G minor and C major ("Jupiter").

CRANSTON, R.I
HERALD
6/28/45

The Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., under the direction of Dr Serge Koussevitzky, will be broadca[illegible] Saturday evenings by the American Broadcasting Company. The programs will be heard from 8:30 to 9:30 p.m. EWT, July 28, August 4, and August 11.

PASTE OVER

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JUN 25 1945

Music

Bach-Mozart Festival

Six Tanglewood Concerts to Be Held Weekends in Small Hall

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

IT WAS a foregone conclusion that Tanglewood, having managed at least a token festival last season, would carry on this summer. This unique project is very close to Serge Koussevitzky's heart. He never wanted to curtail either the symphony concerts or the scholastic venture but was forced to bow to necessity.

The Mozart concerts given last summer in the small theater were eminently successful. The something more than a thousand seats were sold out and there was a large overflow for all events. These people were unsheltered and rain discommoded them on at least one occasion.

That there will be as large an attendance, or larger, this year is a certainty. The scope of this year's festival will be widened to include the works of Bach, from whose instrumental music Dr. Koussevitzky will perform the Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5; the Suites in B minor No. 2, in D major No. 3, and in D major No. 4; Concertos with piano solo in D minor and F minor, the Concertos with two pianos in C minor and C major.

The Mozart works on the program will include two Concertos for piano and orchestra, the Konzertante Sinfonie for violin and viola, the "Haffner" Serenade, the Divertimento in B-flat for strings and two horns, the Serenade in B flat for wind instruments, the Adagio and Fugue for strings, the Overture to "Der Schauspieldirektor," the Symphonies No. 26 in E flat, the "Paris" Symphony in D major, the "Prague" Symphony in D major and the three final Symphonies in E flat, G minor and C major ("Jupiter").

The concerts will have as soloists four pianists and a duo-piano team; two violinists; two violists; flautist and oboist. The pianists will include Alexander Borovsky, Alexander Brailovsky, Robert Casadesus, Lukas Foss, and the team Abram Chasins and Constance Keene. Violin soloists will be William Kroll and Richard Burgin; violists, A. Veisse and Jean Lefranc; flute, Georges Laurent; oboe, Fernand Gillet.

The concerts will be given in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood in the Berkshires. Each of the six concerts will have a different program and will be given on three Saturday evenings at 8:30 and three Sunday afternoons at 3:30 on the dates of July 28-29, Aug. 4-5, and Aug. 11-12.

THE POPULAR approach to music continues to have its appeal. Sigmund Spaeth's "Music for Fun" has now been issued in a cheap edition (Circle Books, 69 cents). Dr. Spaeth, as is his special gift, carries simplification to enormous lengths. One is made to feel that anyone who has gone to any pains to find out what music is about has been wasting his time.

* * *

THE WONDER is not that a musical issue has become entangled with the war emotions, but that there has been no such complication until just now. This first storm has broken over Kirsten Flagstad's position in the scheme of things and already both the pros and cons have fired about all their amunition. This column doesn't intend to reload any empty shells.

When one recalls the cases of Johanna Gadski, Fritz Kreisler, Karl Muck and others during the last war it is little short of remarkable how level-headed musical people have been during this one. German opera has been accepted without a qualm; nobody in Hartford batted an eye at Madame Butterfly given here this season. Our fighting men not only fraternized with a German war song, Lili Marlene, but actually adopted it. Music has truly been an international currency.

In the case of Flagstad it has been made to appear that the Metropolitan has refused to re-engage her when actually all Edward Johnson did was to duck the issue by saying there was time to talk about it when the immigration authorities decided whether she could enter the country or not. For the rest there doesn't seem to be much involved except the priority of a woman's loyalty to her husband or to her country, a question which not many have to answer.

When she left here Flagstad's voice, because of much use, was off somewhat from its peak. The only curiosity I can work up is about the present condition of the greatest voice of our times. When emotions finally subside it will probably be just something to remember.

MILLERTON, N.Y.
NEWS
6/28/45

Koussevitzky Announces Programs

Soloists And Music For Bach-Mozart Festival At Tanglewood

MILLBROOK, N.Y
ROUND TABLE
6/29/45

Koussevitzky Announces Programs

For the Bach-Mozart Festival that the principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play on the afternoons of July 29, August 5 and August 12 and the evenings of July 28, August 4 and August 11, Serge Koussevitzky has chosen the soloists and music.

The pianists will include Alexander Borovsky, Alexander Brailovsky, Robert Casadesus, Lukas Foss and Abram Chasins partnered with Constance Keene. Violin soloists will be William Kroll and Richard Burgin; viola, A. Veisse and Jean Lefranc; flute, Georges Laurent; oboe, Fernand Gillet.

From the instrumental music of Bach, Dr. Koussevitzky will perform the Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5; Suites in B minor No. 3 and in D major, No. 4; Concertos with Piano Solo in D minor and F minor; the Concertos with Two Pianos in C minor and C major.

From the works of Mozart there will be two Concertos for Piano and Orchestra, the Konzertante Sinfonie for Violin and Viola, the "Haffner" Serenade, the Divertimento in B flat for Strings with Two Horns and the Serenade in B flat for Wind Instruments, the Adagio and Fugue for Strings, the Overture to "Der Schauspieldirektor," the Symphonies No. 26 in E flat (K. 184), the "Paris" Symphony in D major (K. 297), the "Prague" Symphony in D major, and the three final Symphonies in E flat, G minor and C major ("Jupiter").

The concerts will be given in the Theatre-concert hall at Tanglewood, the Orchestra's summer home between Lenox and Stockbridge. It is still possible to subscribe for four or six tickets (two or three weekends) by application to Symphony Hall, Boston.

Since the Festival was announced four weeks ago requests for tickets have been received from points as distant as Montreal, Santa Barbara, Calif., and Washington, D. C. Early reservations are considerably ahead of those of last season.

GREENSBURG, PA.
TRIBUNE

JUN 29 194

BACH FESTIVAL TO BE HELD

This Clipping From GALVESTON, TEXAS
TRIBUNE

JUN 29 1945

WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE
JUN 30 1945

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y
HERALD
6/29/45

OF SHARPS A

BY

Plans for a full-scale Bach-Mozart festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., have been completed by Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An orchestra of chamber proportions will be assembled from the Boston orchestra, all of the principals taking part. The concerts will be given in the theater-concert hall at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home in the Berkshires, which seats 1,150 and is considered ideal for music in intimate performance.

There will be six concerts, each with a different program, on three Saturday evenings at 8:30 and three Sunday afternoons at 3:30 (July 28-29, Aug. 4-5 and Aug. 11-12).

Bach will be represented by the Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 5; the suites in B minor No. 2, in D major No. 3 and in D major No. 4; the concertos with piano solo in D minor and F minor, and the concertos with two pianos in C minor and C major.

The Mozart works will be two concertos for piano and orchestra; the Konzertante Sinfonie for violin and viola; the "Haffner" Serenade; the Divertimento in B-flat for strings, with two horns; Serenade in B-flat for wind instruments; the adagio and fugue for strings; overture to "Das Schauspieldirektor"; symphony No. 26 in E-flat; the "Paris" Symphony in D major (K. 297); the "Prague" Symphony in D major, and the three final symphonies in E-flat, G minor and C major ("Jupiter").

The pianists will include Alexander Borovsky, Alexander Brailowsky, Robert Casadesus, Lukas Foss and Abram Chasins, partnered with Constance Keene. Violin soloists will be William Kroll and Richard Burgin; viola, A. Veisse and Jean Lefranc; flute, Georges Laurent, and oboe, Fernan Gillet.

The fifth season of the Norfolk School of Music of Yale University, directed by Dean Bruce Simons of the Yale Music School, will open on Monday, July 2, at the Stoeckel estate, Norfolk, Conn., and continue through Aug. 10.

Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

Cir. (42,694)

This Clipping From
THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

p.m. over KGO and the American Broadcasting Company.

Instead of featuring serious classics, the programs are light in content; seats are removed from Symphony Hall in Boston, where the programs originate, and tables and chairs are substituted, and refreshments are served.

Compilations made a while back reveal that in an average Summer season 1,200 cases of beer and ale, 5,000 bottles of wine, 3,500 gallons of the celebrated "Pops Punch" and 1,750 gallons of ice cream are consumed. Tabulations on the number of sandwiches consumed are awaiting new types of postwar adding machines.

The presentation of "Pops" by American will be followed by the broadcasting of the Esplanade and Tanglewood concerts, two phases of the summer activities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

JUN 19 1945

BACH-MOZART TICKET SALE

Festival Will Be Held at Tanglewood

The advance sale of subscription seats for the Bach-Mozart Festival to be held at Tanglewood, the last week end in July and the first two week ends in August, will close Saturday. For a limited period thereafter series tickets for four or six concerts will be on sale in Pittsfield, Lenox, Stockbridge and Great Barrington.

Persons planning to attend the complete series of six concerts directed by Serge Koussevitzky, assisted by the principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, or to be present on two of the week ends, are advised to reserve their seats by mail to Symphony Hall, Boston, this week. Holders of advance subscription tickets will be given first selection of location in the intimate auditorium where the Mozart Festival was held last summer.

Since the festival was announced three weeks ago requests for tickets have been received from points as distant as Montreal, Santa Barbara, Cal., and Washington, D. C. Early reservations are considerably ahead of those of last season, with about 75 per cent by residents and summer residents of Berkshire County and the vicinity.

100

PASTE OVER

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JUN 25 1945

Music

Bach-Mozart Festival

Six Tanglewood Concerts to Be Held Weekends in Small Hall

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

IT WAS a foregone conclusion that Tanglewood, having managed at least a token festival last season, would carry on this summer. This unique project is very close to Serge Koussevitzky's heart. He never wanted to curtail either the symphony concerts or the scholastic venture but was forced to bow to necessity.

The Mozart concerts given last summer in the small theater were eminently successful. The something more than a thousand seats were sold out and there was a large overflow for all events. These people were unsheltered and rain discommoded them on at least one occasion.

That there will be as large an attendance, or larger, this year is a certainty. The scope of this year's festival will be widened to include the works of Bach, from whose instrumental music Dr. Koussevitzky will perform the Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5; the Suites in B minor No. 2, in D major No. 3, and in D major No. 4; Concertos with piano solo in D minor and F minor, the Concertos with two pianos in C minor and C major.

The Mozart works on the program will include two Concertos for piano and orchestra, the Konzertante Sinfonie for violin and viola, the "Haffner" Serenade, the Divertimento in B-flat for strings and two horns, the Serenade in B flat for wind instruments, the Adagio and Fugue for strings, the Overture to "Der Schauspieldirektor," the Symphonies No. 26 in E flat, the "Paris" Symphony in D major, the "Prague" Symphony in D major and the three final Symphonies in E flat, G minor and C major ("Jupiter").

The concerts will have as soloists four pianists and a duo-piano team; two violinists; two violists; flautist and oboist. The pianists will include Alexander Borovsky, Alexander Brailovsky, Robert Casadesus, Lukas Foss, and the team Abram Chasins and Constance Keene. Violin soloists will be William Kroll and Richard Burgin; violists, A. Veisse and Jean Lefranc; flute, Georges Laurent; oboe, Fernand Gillet.

The concerts will be given in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood in the Berkshires. Each of the six concerts will have a different program and will be given on three Saturday evenings at 8:30 and three Sunday afternoons at 3:30 on the dates of July 28-29, Aug. 4-5, and Aug. 11-12.

THE POPULAR approach to music continues to have its appeal. Sigmund Spaeth's "Music for Fun" has now been issued in a cheap edition (Circle Books, 69 cents). Dr. Spaeth, as is his special gift, carries simplification to enormous lengths. One is made to feel that anyone who has gone to any pains to find out what music is about has been wasting his time.

* * *

THE WONDER is not that a musical issue has become entangled with the war emotions, but that there has been no such complication until just now. This first storm has broken over Kirsten Flagstad's position in the scheme of things and already both the pros and cons have fired about all their amunition. This column doesn't intend to reload any empty shells.

When one recalls the cases of Johanna Gadski, Fritz Kreisler, Karl Muck and others during the last war it is little short of remarkable how level-headed musical people have been during this one. German opera has been accepted without a qualm; nobody in Hartford batted an eye at Madame Butterfly given here this season. Our fighting men not only fraternized with a German war song, Lili Marlene, but actually adopted it. Music has truly been an international currency.

In the case of Flagstad it has been made to appear that the Metropolitan has refused to re-engage her when actually all Edward Johnson did was to duck the issue by saying there was time to talk about it when the immigration authorities decided whether she could enter the country or not. For the rest there doesn't seem to be much involved except the priority of a woman's loyalty to her husband or to her country, a question which not many have to answer.

When she left here Flagstad's voice, because of much use, was off somewhat from its peak. The only curiosity I can work up is about the present condition of the greatest voice of our times. When emotions finally subside it will probably be just something to remember.

MILLERTON, N.Y.
NEWS
6/28/45

Koussevitzky Announces Programs

Soloists And Music For Bach-Mozart Festival At Tanglewood

MILLBROOK, N.Y
ROUND TABLE
6/29/45

Koussevitzky Announces Programs

For the Bach-Mozart Festival that the principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play on the afternoons of July 29, August 5 and August 12 and the evenings of July 28, August 4 and August 11, Serge Koussevitzky has chosen the soloists and music.

The pianists will include Alexander Borovsky, Alexander Brailovsky, Robert Casadesus, Lukas Foss and Abram Chasins partnered with Constance Keene. Violin soloists will be William Kroll and Richard Burgin; viola, A. Veisse and Jean Lefranc; flute, Georges Laurent; oboe, Fernand Gillet.

From the instrumental music of Bach, Dr. Koussevitzky will perform the Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5; Suites in B minor No. 3 and in D major, No. 4; Concertos with Piano Solo in D minor and F minor; the Concertos with Two Pianos in C minor and C major.

From the works of Mozart there will be two Concertos for Piano and Orchestra, the Konzertante Sinfonie for Violin and Viola, the "Haffner" Serenade, the Divertimento in B flat for Strings with Two Horns and the Serenade in B flat for Wind Instruments, the Adagio and Fugue for Strings, the Overture to "Der Schauspieldirektor," the Symphonies No. 26 in E flat (K. 184), the "Paris" Symphony in D major (K. 297), the "Prague" Symphony in D major, and the three final Symphonies in E flat, G minor and C major ("Jupiter").

The concerts will be given in the Theatre-concert hall at Tanglewood, the Orchestra's summer home between Lenox and Stockbridge. It is still possible to subscribe for four or six tickets (two or three weekends) by application to Symphony Hall, Boston.

Since the Festival was announced four weeks ago requests for tickets have been received from points as distant as Montreal, Santa Barbara, Calif., and Washington, D. C. Early reservations are considerably ahead of those of last season.

GREENSBURG, PA.
TRIBUNE

JUN 29 1945

BACH FESTIVAL TO BE HELD

This Clipping From GALVESTON, TEXAS
TRIBUNE

JUN 29 1945

WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE

JUN 30 1945

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y
HERALD
6/29/45

OF SHARPS A

BY

Plans for a full-scale Bach-Mozart festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., have been completed by Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An orchestra of chamber proportions will be assembled from the Boston orchestra, all of the principals taking part. The concerts will be given in the theater-concert hall at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home in the Berkshires, which seats 1,150 and is considered ideal for music in intimate performance.

There will be six concerts, each with a different program, on three Saturday evenings at 8:30 and three Sunday afternoons at 3:30 (July 28-29, Aug. 4-5 and Aug. 11-12).

Bach will be represented by the Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 5; the suites in B minor No. 2, in D major No. 3 and in D major No. 4; the concertos with piano solo in D minor and F minor, and the concertos with two pianos in C minor and C major.

The Mozart works will be two concertos for piano and orchestra; the Konzertante Sinfonie for violin and viola; the "Haffner" Serenade; the Divertimento in B-flat for strings, with two horns; Serenade in B-flat for wind instruments; the adagio and fugue for strings; overture to "Das Schauspieldirektor"; symphony No. 26 in E-flat; the "Paris" Symphony in D major (K. 297); the "Prague" Symphony in D major, and the three final symphonies in E-flat, G minor and C major ("Jupiter").

The pianists will include Alexander Borovsky, Alexander Brailowsky, Robert Casadesus, Lukas Foss and Abram Chasins, partnered with Constance Keene. Violin soloists will be William Kroll and Richard Burgin; viola, A. Veisse and Jean Lefranc; flute, Georges Laurent, and oboe, Fernan Gillet.

The fifth season of the Norfolk School of Music of Yale University, directed by Dean Bruce Simons of the Yale Music School, will open on Monday, July 2, at the Stoeckel estate, Norfolk, Conn., and continue through Aug. 10.

Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

Cir. (42,694)

This Clipping From
THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

JUN 29 1945

* * *

Not enough waiters."

"The price of the beer is too h[illegible]

"Not sufficient tables to pro[illegible] for customers."

No, these are not complaints [illegible] by an inquiring reporter in restau[illegible] today. They are direct quotations—although they may sound familiar—from the Boston Transcript of July 12, 1885, following the first Boston Symphony "Pops" Concert.

Since that eventful evening when Wilhelm Gericke raised his baton, the "Pops," as they have been known since 1900, have continued yearly. Now they are being presented each Saturday [illegible] 5:30 to 6:30 p.m. over KGO and the American Broadcasting Company.

Instead of featuring serious classics, the programs are light in content; seats are removed from Symphony Hall in Boston, where the programs originate, and tables and chairs are substituted, and refreshments are served.

Compilations made a while back reveal that in an average Summer season 1,200 cases of beer and ale, 5,000 bottles of wine, 3,500 gallons of the celebrated "Pops Punch" and 1,750 gallons of ice cream are consumed. Tabulations on the number of sandwiches consumed are awaiting new types of postwar adding machines.

The presentation of "Pops" by American will be followed by the broadcasting of the Esplanade and Tanglewood concerts, two phases of the summer activities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

JUN 19 1945

BACH-MOZART TICKET SALE

Festival Will Be Held at Tanglewood

The advance sale of subscription seats for the Bach-Mozart Festival to be held at Tanglewood, the last week end in July and the first two week ends in August, will close Saturday. For a limited period thereafter series tickets for four or six concerts will be on sale in Pittsfield, Lenox, Stockbridge and Great Barrington.

Persons planning to attend the complete series of six concerts directed by Serge Koussevitzky, assisted by the principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, or to be present on two of the week ends, are advised to reserve their seats by mail to Symphony Hall, Boston, this week. Holders of advance subscription tickets will be given first selection of location in the intimate auditorium where the Mozart Festival was held last summer.

Since the festival was announced three weeks ago requests for tickets have been received from points as distant as Montreal, Santa Barbara, Cal., and Washington, D. C. Early reservations are considerably ahead of those of last season, with about 75 per cent by residents and summer residents of Berkshire County and the vicinity.

POPS

ARTHUR FIEDLER, Conductor

AMERICAN NEWSPAPER GUILD NIGHT

June 29, 1945

Under auspices of

NEWSPAPER GUILD OF BOSTON

NATION
NEW YORK, N.Y.

JUN 30 1945

Victor also has issued, in one of its useless new 25-cent "showpiece albums," the recently made recording of Koussevitzky's performance with the Boston Symphony of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé" Suit No. 2 (Set SP-1; $2.25). The music is marvelously orchestrated trash; the performance has long been one of the wonders of our time, unequaled by any other. I speak of the performance as I have heard it in New York—of the particular sonorities, of their refinement, glow, shimmer, and radiance in the particular, and superior, acoustic conditions of Carnegie Hall. I probably would not hear them in Symphony Hall; and probably they could not be reproduced completely by any recording; certainly they are not by either the old or the new one. Here again it turns out that the new one has obvious and important points of superiority over the old; but that the old one is not without important points of superiority over the new. Again there is evidence of the vastly extended frequency-range in the wonderful distinctness and liveness of the murmuring strings and woodwinds at the beginning, the brilliance on top as the violins take over the melody from the cellos. But again there is evidence of insufficient bass in the lack of depth and body in the wonderful chord that is the climax of that melodic line and one of the great moments of the performance. There is too much bass in the old recording; but it gives that chord its effect. Moreover, the reverberation in Symphony Hall that produced such noisy confusion in the loud portions of "Harold in Italy" also produces it at the climaxes of "Daphnis et Chloé"—for example, at the end of the first side. The old recording is free of this; and the absence of excessive reverberation may be one reason for its greater smoothness and refinement of sound in quieter passages; but another reason may be the fact that the older performance itself is more relaxed. I hope, therefore, that the old recording will be retained in the catalogue.

Oddly enough, a recording (11-8745; $1) of a performance of Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" or "Fingal's Cave" Overture by Fiedler with the Boston "Pops" Orchestra has excellent balance of treble and bass in its beautiful sound, and no trace of excessive reverberation. The work is charming; the performance good.

Victor's other June releases have not yet arrived.

POPS

ARTHUR FIEDLER, Conductor

AMERICAN NEWSPAPER GUILD NIGHT

June 29, 1945

Under auspices of

NEWSPAPER GUILD OF BOSTON

NATION
NEW YORK, N.Y.
JUN 30 1945

Victor also has issued, in one of its useless new 25-cent "showpiece albums," the recently made recording of Koussevitzky's performance with the Boston Symphony of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé" Suit No. 2 (Set SP-1; $2.25). The music is marvelously orchestrated trash; the performance has long been one of the wonders of our time, unequaled by any other. I speak of the performance as I have heard it in New York—of the particular sonorities, of their refinement, glow, shimmer, and radiance in the particular, and superior, acoustic conditions of Carnegie Hall. I probably would not hear them in Symphony Hall; and probably they could not be reproduced completely by any recording; certainly they are not by either the old or the new one. Here again it turns out that the new one has obvious and important points of superiority over the old; but that the old one is not without important points of superiority over the new. Again there is evidence of the vastly extended frequency-range in the wonderful distinctness and liveness of the murmuring strings and woodwinds at the beginning, the brilliance on top as the violins take over the melody from the cellos. But again there is evidence of insufficient bass in the lack of depth and body in the wonderful chord that is the climax of that melodic line and one of the great moments of the performance. There is too much bass in the old recording; but it gives that chord its effect. Moreover, the reverberation in Symphony Hall that produced such noisy confusion in the loud portions of "Harold in Italy" also produces it at the climaxes of "Daphnis et Chloé"—for example, at the end of the first side. The old recording is free of this; and the absence of excessive reverberation may be one reason for its greater smoothness and refinement of sound in quieter passages; but another reason may be the fact that the older performance itself is more relaxed. I hope, therefore, that the old recording will be retained in the catalogue.

Oddly enough, a recording (11-8745; $1) of a performance of Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" or 'Fingal's Cave" Overture by Fiedler with the Boston "Pops" Orchestra has excellent balance of treble and bass in its beautiful sound, and no trace of excessive reverberation. The work is charming; the performance good.

Victor's other June releases have not yet arrived.

A Letter from Arthur Fiedler

June 25, 1945

Mr. Frank M. O'Donnell
Treasurer, Newspaper Guild of Boston
294 Washington Street
Boston, Massachusetts

Dear Mr. O'Donnell:

When your request came to Symphony Hall for basic facts about the Esplanade Concerts, I felt impelled to write this letter, instead of sending an impersonal, standardized summary.

I never forget that one of the most important facts about the Esplanade Concerts is the extraordinary interest and cooperation of the newspapers and newspapermen of Boston. The reporters and photographers have shown, through the years, a spirit of personal interest in the project over and above filling their assignments. At various times in the past sixteen years, I might have been obliged to terminate the concerts except for the activity of the editorial writers of the Boston newspapers in urging — and producing — stronger public support. Newspaper backing of such scope, constantly forwarding the artistic education of the public, must be unique, or nearly so, in the whole country.

General details, if you have need of them, will be found on the enclosed slip.

Very sincerely yours,

ARTHUR FIEDLER

CONCERNING THE ESPLANADE CONCERTS

The Esplanade Concerts continue to be the only annual outdoor concerts played free of admission charge six nights a week by members of a major symphony orchestra.

Financial support is derived from these sources: (1) checks mailed to the Esplanade Concerts Fund in care of the Merchants National Bank; (2) free-will contributions of coins at the concert grounds; (3) a share of the dime chair rentals.

Behind all this is the stimulation of public interest by the newspapers of Boston.

On Friday evening, July twentieth, at eight-thirty, the seventeenth season of the concerts will open. Through August fifteenth they will continue each night with the exception of Thursdays. There will be concerts for children on the four Wednesday mornings of this period starting at ten fifteen.

PROGRAMME

Hungarian March "Rakoczy"	Berlioz
Overture to "Il Guarany"	Gomez
Vissi d'Arte from "La Tosca" Soprano: Jean Evans	Puccini
"Vienna Blood" Waltzes	Strauss

THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER

Overture to "The Secret of Suzanne"	Wolf-Ferrari
Second Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Rhapsody in Blue Soloist: Leo Litwin	Gershwin

[In Commemoration of the Beginning of George Gershwin Jubilee Week]

"Oklahoma!" Selection	Rodgers-Bodge
Old Timers' Night at the Pops Ta-Ra-Ra Boom De-Ay — The Bowery — Sidewalks of New York — Sweet Rosie O'Grady — Daisy — The Band Played On — After the Ball — A Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight	Arranged by Lake
Salute to Our Fighting Forces Halls of Montezuma — Semper Paratus — Army Air Corps — Anchors Aweigh — When the Caissons Go Rolling Along — God Bless America	Arranged by Bodge

GUILD POPS COMMITTEE

FRANK M. O'DONNELL, Chairman
JAMES GLENNON, Vice-Chairman

EDNA ALLEN
ALICE MEGLEY
ANN GREEN
ALTA MALONEY
ELMER DeLEW
ELIZABETH SCHOPPE
MARGARET O'NEIL
ARTHUR HILL
TRIVIA FRISSORA
HAROLD KOLB
DOROTHEA CULKIN
ISRAEL SIPERSTEIN
J. MALCOLM BARTER

The proceeds from the sale of floor seats to-night will be donated to the

ESPLANADE CONCERTS FUND

NATION
NEW YORK, N.Y.
JUN 30 1945

Victor also has issued, in one of its useless new 25-cent "showpiece albums," the recently made recording of Koussevitzky's performance with the Boston Symphony of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé" Suit No. 2 (Set SP-1; $2.25). The music is marvelously orchestrated trash; the performance has long been one of the wonders of our time, unequaled by any other. I speak of the performance as I have heard it in New York—of the particular sonorities, of their refinement, glow, shimmer, and radiance in the particular, and superior, acoustic conditions of Carnegie Hall. I probably would not hear them in Symphony Hall; and probably they could not be reproduced completely by any recording; certainly they are not by either the old or the new one. Here again it turns out that the new one has obvious and important points of superiority over the old; but that the old one is not without important points of superiority over the new. Again there is evidence of the vastly extended frequency-range in the wonderful distinctness and liveness of the murmuring strings and woodwinds at the beginning, the brilliance on top as the violins take over the melody from the cellos. But again there is evidence of insufficient bass in the lack of depth and body in the wonderful chord that is the climax of that melodic line and one of the great moments of the performance. There is too much bass in the old recording; but it gives that chord its effect. Moreover, the reverberation in Symphony Hall that produced such noisy confusion in the loud portions of "Harold in Italy" also produces it at the climaxes of "Daphnis et Chloé"—for example, at the end of the first side. The old recording is free of this; and the absence of excessive reverberation may be one reason for its greater smoothness and refinement of sound in quieter passages; but another reason may be the fact that the older performance itself is more relaxed. I hope, therefore, that the old recording will be retained in the catalogue.

Oddly enough, a recording (11-8745; $1) of a performance of Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" or "Fingal's Cave" Overture by Fiedler with the Boston "Pops" Orchestra has excellent balance of treble and bass in its beautiful sound, and no trace of excessive reverberation. The work is charming; the performance good.

Victor's other June releases have not yet arrived.

HUNTINGTON, W. VA.
HERALD ADVERTISER

JUL 945

The Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., will be broadcast over WSAZ at 8:30 July 28, August 4 and August 11. Koussevitzky will [illegible]

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN

JUL 1 - 1945

Music Programs and Recitals

Victor Alessandro
"Pops" under his baton . . . then back for reorganization.

Alessandro to Conduct Boston Symphony in July 4 Concert

By MARGUERITE MACKLIN

WHILE THE OKLAHOMA STATE SYMPHONY society is being reorganized, and plans for the continuance of symphonic music for the state are being made, the nation pays tribute to the musical trail-blazing of Victor Alessandro, conductor of the Oklahoma Symphony orchestra for the last eight years.

Selected as one of three guest conductors for the summer season of the famed Boston symphony, Alessandro left Friday for Boston, where he will rehearse and conduct the orchestra in its traditional Independence day "pops" concert July 4.

The profound impression made upon musical America by Oklahoma City's young conductor is perhaps nowhere better exemplified than in his selection to conduct upon this occasion. Boston's musical standards are among the highest in the world and her audiences have been steeped, for decades, in the traditions of purest artistry.

Maestro Alessandro has chosen a program of universal favorites for his appearance, headlined by four numbers from Spencer Norton's "Dance Suite," Prologue, Sarabande, Bouree and Festival, followed by the Saint-Saens Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah," and five numbers from Still's "Black Belt."

Following the Boston concert, Alessandro will return within a few days to assist in furthering plans for reorganization of the state group. This is in line with his declaration, upon being informed of his choice for the Boston engagement, that the New England capital was paying him no personal tribute, but was acknowledging the musical maturity of Oklahoma.

While such an explanation may be eminently satisfactory to Alessandro himself, most Oklahomans look upon the honor being paid him as a personal triumph, to which they are glad to render enthusiastic applause—and, with a backward glance over the past eight years, a heartfelt shout of "encore."

HERALD TRIBUNE
Cir. (D 330,138) (S 538,005)

JUL 1 - 1945

Koussevitzky Foundation

The Koussevitzky Music Foundation has commissioned Lukas Foss and Alexander Haieff to compose short pieces for the cello. Both of these compositions are to be of such length that they can be recorded on one side of a twelve-inch record or two sides of a ten-inch disk. The foundation will announce its regular 1945 commissions for compositions for symphony orchestra in the near future.

HERALD TRIBUNE
Cir. (D 330,138) (S 538,005)

JUL 1 - 1945

Koussevitzky Lists Works and Soloists for Tanglewood Series

Serge Koussevitzky has announced the program and soloists for the festival devoted to the works of Bach and Mozart being held at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on three Saturday evenings at 8:30 and three Sunday afternoons at 3:30, July 28-29, August 4-5 and August 11-12. A different program will be presented at each concert. The orchestra will consist of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky will perform Bach's Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5; the Suites in B minor No. 2, in D major No. 3, and in D major No. 4; Concertos with Piano Solo in D minor and F minor, the Concertos with Two Pianos in C minor and C major. The Mozart works listed for performance include two Concertos for Piano and Orchestra, the Konzertante Sinfonie for Violin and Viola, the "Haffner" Serenade, the Divertimento in B-flat for Strings with Two Horns and the Serenade in B-flat for Wind Instruments, the Adagio and Fugue for Strings, the Overture to "Der Schauspieldirektor," for the Symphonies No. 26 in E-flat (K. 184), the "Paris" Symphony in D major (K. 297), the "Prague" Symphony in D major, and the three final Symphonies in E-flat, G minor and C major ("Jupiter"). The pianists to appear in the Festival will include Alexander Borovsky, Alexander Brailovsky, Robert Casadesus, Lukas Foss, and Abram Chasins partnered with Constance Keene. Violin soloists will be William Kroll and Richard Burgin; viola, A. Veisse and Jean Lefranc; flute, Georges Laurent; oboe, Fernand Gillet.

Subscriptions for four or six tickets (two or three week ends) may be obtained from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall, Boston.

NORFOLK, VA.
VIRGINIAN PILOT

JUL 1 - 1945

The Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., with Serge Koussevitzky directing, will be broadcast on three Saturday nights over WGH-ABC, from 8:30 to 9:30 o'clock July 28, August 4, and August 11. The present Boston Pops Orchestra series will be concluded July 14, and on July 21 the opening program of the Boston Esplanade Concerts will be broadcast at the same hour.

Both the Pops and Esplanade concerts are presented by an orchestra made up primarily of the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, heard each Saturday night at this time over WGH-ABC during the winter season. At Tanglewood, the first chairmen of the Boston Symphony will be heard under Dr. Koussevitzky's baton.

This Tidewater Virginian sustained a rude shock upon perusal of a beautifully decorated vacation map which came to the radio editor's desk from the Jack Kirkwood Show's publicity department.

The map shows among other things Newport News to be on the southside of the James River, which may be only mildly surprising, but—horror of horrors—the restored Colonial capital, showplace of Tidewater, the home of ancient William and Mary College, bears the name "Williamstown!"

Mr. Rockefeller must feel something like Mrs. William Wrigley, Jr., when a Chicago hotel desk clerk scribbled her name, "Mrs. William Wrigley, Jr."

"My Lord," she said, "And we just spent four million dollars for advertising!"

GREENSBORO, N. C.
NEWS

JUL 1 - 1945

THIS WEE

DAPHNIS AND CHOLOE, Suite No. II, by Ravel. Performed by Boston symphony, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor. Victor Showpiece, SP-1 (two 12-inch records).

The score of "Daphnis and Chloe" was composed by Ravel especially for a Parisian ballet company. From it two orchestral suites have been formed, the second much surpassing the first in popularity.

The music, lavishly programmatic, depicts pastoral scenes of a charming legend of old Greece, is polished and sophisticated. Koussevitsky excels, as usual, in this recorded reading of Ravel, of whom he is a leading interpreter.

Victor markets the discs in a colorful folder, which carries notes about the music, its composer and its performers.—D.M.P.

LOHENGRIN: PRELUDE (WAG-

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

JUL 1 - 1945

Tanglewood Festival

PROGRAMS for the annual Tanglewood Festival, to be broadcast over Station WRNL and American on July 28, August 4 and August 11, at 8:30 P. M., have been announced by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will return to his Boston Symphony musicians for the special musical event.

Dr. Koussevitzky has selected a chamber orchestra, chosen principally from first desk men of the Boston ensemble, and will present works of Bach and Mozart.

From the instrumental music of Bach, Dr. Koussevitzky has selected the Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 5; the suites, No. 2 in B Minor, and No. 4, in D Major. The piano concertos in D Minor and F Minor and the two-piano concertos in C Minor and C Major also are listed.

Mozart will be represented by two piano concertos, the "Konzertante Sinfonie" for violin and viola, the "Haffner" serenade, the B Flat "Divertimento" for strings and two horns, the "Serenade" in B Flat for wind instruments, the Adagio and Fugue for strings; Symphonies No. 26 in E Flat; the "Prague" in D Major, "Paris" in D Major, the E Flat, G Minor and C Major ("Jupiter") and the overture to "Der Schauspielrektor."

ELMIRA, N. Y.
STAR-GAZETTE

JUL 5 - 1945

LAMAR, COLO.
NEWS

JUL 2 - 1945

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

JUL 1 - 1945

This Clipping From
FAIRMOUNT, W. VA.
WEST VIRGINIAN

JUL 1 - 1945

This Clipping From
PARKERSBURG, W. VA.
NEWS

JUL 1 - 1945

DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS

JUL 1 - 1945

Full Bach-Mozart Festival Slated At Tanglewood

NEW YORK, June 30.—Plan for a full-scale Bach-Mozart festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass have been completed by Serg Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

An orchestra of chamber proportions will be assembled from the Boston orchestra, all of the principals taking part. The concerts will be given in the theater-concert hall at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home in the Berkshires, which seats 1150 and is considered ideal for music in intimate performance.

There will be six concerts, each with a different program, on three Saturday evenings and three Sunday afternoons (July 28-29, Aug. 4-5 and Aug. 11-12).

Bach will be represented by the Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5; the suites in B minor No. 2, in D major No. 3 and in D major No. 4; the concertos with piano solo in D minor and F minor, and the concertos with two pianos in C minor and C major.

The Mozart works will be two concertos for piano and orchestra; the Konzertante Sinfonie for violin and viola; the "Haffner" Serenade; the Divertimento in B-flat for strings, with two horns; Serenade in B-flat for wind instruments; the adagio and fugue for strings; overture to "Das Schauspeldirektor"; symphony No. 26 in E-flat; the "Paris" Symphony in D major (K. 297); the "Prague" Symphony in D major, and the three final symphonies in E-flat, G. minor and C major ("Jupiter").

The pianists will include Alexander Borovsky, Alexander Braiowsky, Robert Casadesus, Lukas Foss and Abram Chasins, partnered with Constance Keene. Violin soloists will be William Kroll and Richard Burgin; viola, A. Veisse and Jean Lefranc; flute, Georges Laurent, and oboe, Fernand Gillet.

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

JUL 1 - 1945

Albanians planning to attend the Bach-Mozart festival by the Boston Symphony orchestra on the three weekends, beginning July 28-29 and continuing through August 11-12 at "Tanglewood," in the Berkshires should make immediate reservations for seats by writing to the Boston Symphony orchestra, Syphony Hall, Boston, Mass. The demand for reservations has been very heavy to date and the limited seating capacity of the theatre-concert hall (1150) is expected to be entirely sold out within the next two weeks. There will be a number of benches placed just outside the various entrances to the hall at a reduced price.

[104]

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

JUL 1 - 1945

NETWORK WILL CARRY TANGLEWOOD PROGRAM

American Broadcasting Company Will Handle Full-Hour Programs

The American Broadcasting company has planned a year-round schedule by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The network has devoted weekly time to winter series by the symphonic orchestra and has continued presentation of this ensemble through the summer months with the broadcasting of the Boston "Pops" concerts under Arthur Fiedler.

They announce they will carry the Tanglewood festival when Dr Serge Koussevitzky returns to conduct the musicians in the special musical event. The maestro has selected a chamber orchestra with players chosen principally from first desk men of the Boston ensemble. The works of Bach and Mozart will be played in the full-hour presentation to be heard the 28th and August 4 and 11.

Soloists include Pianists Alexander Borovsky, Alexander Brailowsky, Robert Casadesus and Lukas Foss, with Abram Chasins joining Constance Keene in duo piano works. William Kroll and Richard Burgin will be violin soloists with A. Veisse and Jean LeFranc as violists, George Laurent, flutist, and Fernand Gillet, oboist.

The network has also made announcement that it will carry the opening esplanade concert the 21st.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

JUL 1 - 1945

Bach, Mozart Featured at Tanglewood

Festival concerts devoted to the music of Bach and Mozart will be given by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, who will assemble an orchestra of chamber proportions from the member of that organization, all of th principals taking part.

These concerts will be given in Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., in th Theater-Concert Hall, the orchestra's summer home in the Berkshires, which has a seating capacit of 1,150. It is ideal for music i intimate surroundings. There wi be six concerts, each with a differen program, on three Saturday evenings at 8:30 o'clock and three Sunday afternoons at 3:30 o'clock, Jul 28-29, August 4-5 and August 11-1

From the instrumental music c Bach, Dr. Koussevitzky will per form the Brandenburg Concertc Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5, the suites in minor No. 2, in D major No. 3 an in D major No. 4, concertos fc piano solo and orchestra in D minc and F minor and concertos for tw pianos and orchestra in C minc and C major.

Mozart will be represented by si symphonies: "Symphony No. 26 i E flat, K. 184"; "Symphony in major, K 297." known as the "Paris "The Prague Symphony" and th three final symphonies, "Symphon in E flat," "Symphony in G minor and the "Jupiter Symphony." Th overture to Mozart's "Der Schauspieldirector" will have a hearin together with the "Haffner Serenade," the "Divertimento in B flat for strings and two horns and th "Serenade in B flat" for wind instruments, the "Adagio and Fugue for strings, the "Konzertante Sinfonie for violin and viola" and tw piano concertos with the accompaniment of the orchestra.

The pianists to appear in th festival are: Alexander Borovsky Alexander Brailovsky, Robert Casadesus, Lukas Foss, Abram Chasins partnered with Constance Keane Violin soloists will be William Krol and Richard Burgin, viola, A. Veiss and Jean Lefranc; flute, George Laurent; oboe, Fernand Gillet.

THE SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY UNION AND REPUBLICAN,
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.: JULY 1, 1945

BOSTON POPS PRESENTS PREMIERE OF CONCERTO

Khachatourian Work for Violin Played With Elie Spivak as Soloist

By VICTOR PRAHL

The Boston Pops at Symphony hall were eventful this week in presenting Tuesday night the first performance in this country of a new violin concerto by Aran Khachatourian, with the previous concert marking the first appearance in Boston of the dynamic young Negro conductor, Dean Dixon.

Arthur Rubinstein and William Kapell, both having played with outstanding success, the vital Khachatourian piano concerto, naturally, great interest centered in the first audition of a similar work for the violin by the same composer. The soloist was Elie Spivak, concertmaster of the Toronto Symphony orchestra. The concerto, at a first hearing, proved to be an ingratiating work, gay and vigorous of rhythm, abundantly melodic, and richly orchestrated. One missed the crashing, dissonant tone clusters of the piano concerto, but the violin being more delicately lyrical in character than the piano, the composer was of course more restricted. But even so, this work, for the most part, is much more conservative in idiom. The short, repetitious, rather monotonous, rhythmical phrases of the folk tones of the opening movement are suggestive of the sound and noises of a street bazar in the composer's native Tiflis. The exotic atmosphere of the rather over-long "Andante sostenuto" is reminiscent of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Sheherazade," the bright lilting rhythm of the folk dance which introduces the final "Allegro vivace" being the most direct in its appeal. Mr Spivak's performance of the work was entirely admirable. We do not recall ever having seen a soloist use his notes for an appearance of such importance, but this in no way cramped the player's style. He seemed at home in the work, playing it with authority, richness and depth of tone, and negotiating the difficult technical passages of the last movement with consummate ease. An orchestra player himself, there was a welcome absence of mannerism. The audience which filled the hall to the last seat apparently liked the concerto and the manner in which it was performed, for they recalled the soloist repeatedly. Mr Fiedler and his men gave the score a sympathetic and colorful reading, the more brilliant portions soaring forth with the assurance of a stock repertoire piece. The brilliant tutti at the close of the slow movement, given double forte, was a thrilling bit of orchestration, magnificently played.

Monday's concert was outstanding for the remarkable conducting of Dean Dixon. Mr Dixon's conducting had nothing in common with the casual time-beating often indulged in at such concerts. On the contrary, one felt that his being was charged with the music he had already well digested. His gestures, if somewhat extravagant and suggestive of his more famous colleague, Sir Thomas Beecham, were nevertheless successfully instrumental in producing the desired results. He showed his metal in an incisively clean-cut, rhythmic performance of the monumental "Finale" of Brahms's "Fourth Symphony" which was projected with an understanding comprehension of its rich content. An individual interpretation, sensitively phrased, and well balanced rhythmically, was Enesco's first "Roumanian Rhapsody" and even more authentic, fiery, native feeling was unleashed in the Scherzo from William Grant Still's "Afra-American" symphony. There is a radiant vitality, at times an electric quality, in Mr Dixon's conducting, a spark which recreates, clarifies and illumines the music, a gift of the rare few. He was fortunate in having such a responsive band of players at his command. They too joined the audience in spontaneous, prolonged applause at the conclusion of the concert.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

JUL 2 1945

TANGLEWOOD TICKETS ARE STILL AVAILABLE

Bach-Mozart Festival Will Begin Last Weekend of Month

The advance sale of subscription seats for the Bach-Mozart festival to be held at Tanglewood, between Lenox and Stockbridge, the last weekend in July and the first two weekends in August, closed Saturday. For a limited period, series tickets for four or six concerts will be on sale in Pittsfield, Lenox, Stockbridge and Great Barrington.

Persons planning to attend the complete series of six concerts directed by Dr Serge Koussevitzky, assisted by the principals and other members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, or to be present on two of the weekends, are advised to reserve their seats at once. Holders of advance subscription tickets will be given first selection of location in the intimate auditorium where the Mozart festival was held last summer.

Since the festival was announced three weeks ago, requests for tickets have been received from points as distant as Montreal, Santa Barbara, Cal., and Washington, D. C. Early reservations are considerably ahead of those of last season, with about 75 per cent by residents and summer residents of Berkshire county and the vicinity.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

JUL 2 - 1945

Bach-Mozart Festival To Be At Tanglewood

Serge Koussevitzky has announced complete programs for the six concerts of the Bach-Mozart festival that he will direct at Tanglewood between Lenox and Stockbridge. Of chamber proportions the orchestra will be composed of the principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with guest soloists.

Tickets for individual concerts for the last week-end in July and the first two in August will be on sale July 9. Subscription tickets for four or six concerts may be obtained by mail to Symphony Hall, Boston.

The programs follow:

FIRST PROGRAM
(Saturday Evening, July 28, at 8:30)
Suite in D Major, No. 4, Bach
Piano Concerto in A major (No. 23, K. 488), Mozart
Alexander Brailowsky, Soloist
Symphony in E-flat major, (No. 26, K. 184), Mozart
Symphny in C major, ("Jupiter" No. 41, K. 551), Mozart

SECOND PROGRAM
(Sunday Afternoon, July 29, at 3:30)
Symphony in D major ("Paris" No. 31, K. 297), Mozart
Concerto in C minor for Two Pianos, No. 1
Abram Chasins, Constance Keene, Soloists
Concerto in C major for Two Pianos, No. 2, Bach
Abram Chasins, Constance Keene, Soloists
Overture to "Der Schauspieldirektor" (K. 486), Mozart
Serenade in D major, "Haffner," (K 250), Mozart

THIRD PROGRAM
(Saturday Evening, August 4, at 8:30)
Divertimento in B-flat major for Strings with Two Horns (K. 287), Mozart
Piano Concerto in D Minor, Bach
Alexander Borovsky, Soloist
Piano Concert in F minor, Bach
Alexander Borovsky, Soloist
Symphony in M major ("Prague" No. 38, K. 504), Mozart

FOURTH PROGRAM
(Sunday Afternoon, August 5, at 3:30)
Suite No. 2 in B Minor, for Flute and Strings, Bach
Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D major, for Orchestra with Piano, Violin and Flute
Adagio and Fugue for String Orchestra (K. 546), Mozart
Symphony in G minor (No. 40, K 550), Mozart

FIFTH PROGRAM
(Saturday Evening, August 11, at 8:30)
Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major, for Violin, Bach
Two Flutes and String Orchestra
Konzertante Sinfonie for Violin and Viola, (K. 364), Mozart
Violin Solo, William Krol
Viola Solo, Jascha Veiss
Adagio and Allegro from Violin Partita, Bach
Serenade in B-flat for Wind Instruments, (K. 361), Mozart

SIXTH PROGRAM
(Sunday Afternoon, August 12, at 3:30)
Suite No. 3 in D major, Bach
Piano Concerto in C minor (K 491), Mozart
Robert Casadesus, Soloist
Brandenburg Concerto No 3 in G major, for String Orchestra (with the Sinfonia from the Cantata "Christ lag in Todesbaden"), Bach
Symphony in E-flat major (No 39, K 543), Mozart

SPARTANSBURG, S. C.
HERALD

JUL 1 1945

News and Comment

About Music

The Transylvania Music School-Camp, near Brevard, N. C., in collaboration with the Brevard Chamber of Commerce, is giving a series of free Thursday night concerts this summer with guest soloists. The concerts, beginning at 8:15, are held in the Transylvania amphitheater.

The series opened June 21, with Thomas Pyle, Baltimore baritone, as guest artist. Lamar Stringfield, of Ashville, flutist and composer, was the guest artist June 28.

Edward Gerschefski, member of the faculty of the Converse College School of Music, will give a piano concert next Thursday night.

The guest artist concerts will run through July, as will faculty recitals on Tuesday evenings and student programs on Sunday evenings, James Christian Pfohl, camp director, announced.

* * *

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, director of the Boston Symphony, has completed plans for a Bach-Mozart festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., the orchestra's summer home in the Berkshires.

A chamber orchestra made up of the principals from the Boston Symphony will play six concerts on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons as follows: July 28-29, Aug. 4-5 and Aug. 11-12.

Bach will be represented by the 2nd, 3rd, 4th and 5th Brandenburg concertos, suites in B minor, No. 2, in D major, No. 3, in D major, No. 4, the concertos with piano solo in D minor and F minor, and the concertos with two pianos in C minor and C major.

The Mozart works will be two concertos for piano and orchestra; the Konzertante Sinfonie for violin and viola; the "Haffner" Serenade; the Divertimento in B-flat for strings, with two horns; Serenade in B-flat for wind instruments; the adagio and fugue for strings; overture to "Das Schauspieldirektor"; symphony No. 26 in E-flat; the "Paris" Symphony in D major (K. 297); the "Prague" Symphony in D major; and the three final symphonies in E-flat, G. minor and C major ("Jupiter").

The pianists will include Alexander Borovsky, Alexander Brailowsky,(Robert Casadesus, Lukas Foss and Abram Chasins, partnered with Constance Keene. Violin soloists will be William Kroll and Richard Burgin; viola, A. Veisse and Jean Lefranc; flute, Georges Laurent, and oboe, Fernand Gillet.

PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS HERALD

JUL 3 - 1945

AUGUSTA, ME.
KENNEBEC JOURNAL

JUL 3 - 1945

BANGOR, ME.
NEWS

JUL 3 - 1945

Didn't Bring His Music

BOSTON, July 2 (AP)—Victor Alessandro, conductor of the Oklahoma City symphony orchestra, came to Boston to guest-conduct the "Pops" concert on the Fourth of July—and forgot to bring enough music.

It isn't that the Boston symphony orchestra doesn't have well-stocked shelves in its musical pantry, but when a guest conductor wishes to play something special (in this case, it was Norton's Dance Suite), he always brings his own music.

In the rush to get off, Alessandro forgot all but the parts for strings which would leave quite a few of the 85 players "unemployed".

They'll play Grieg's Peer Gynt Suite instead.

HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR

JUL 3 - 1945

BACH AND MOZART MUSIC AT LENOX

A comprehensive program of the music of Bach and Mozart will be presented by Serge Koussevitzky at the concerts at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass., July 28-29, August 4-5 and August 11-12. The concerts will be given in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood, which has a seating capacity of 1,150.

From the instrumental music of Bach, a Chamber Orchestra, selected by Dr. Koussevitsky from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play four Brandenburg Concertos; three suites; Concertos with piano solos in D minor and F minor, and the Concertos with two pianos in C minor and C major. Mozart will be represented during the festival by a number of compositions, including his two Concertos for piano and orchestra, the Konsertante Sinfonie, the "Haffner" Serenade, the "Paris" and "Prague" Symphonies and the Adagio and Fugue for strings.

RED HOOK, N.Y
ADVERTISER
7/5/45

BACH AND MOZART MUSIC AT LENOX

A comprehensive program of the music of Bach and Mozart will be presented by Serge Koussevitsky at the concerts at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass., July 28-29, August 4-5 and August 11-12. The concerts will be given in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood, which has a seating capacity of 1,150.

From the instrumental music of Bach, a Chamber Orchestra, selected by Dr. Koussevitsky from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play four Brandenburg Concertos; three suites; Concertos with piano solos in D minor and F minor, and the Concertos with two pianos in C minor and C major. Mozart will be represented during the festival by a number of compositions, including his two Concertos for piano and orchestra, the Konsertante Sinfonie, the "Haffner" Serenade, the "Paris" and "Prague" Symphonies and the Adagio and Fugue for strings.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

JUL 3 - 1945

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

JUL 6 - 1945

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

JUL 8 - 1945

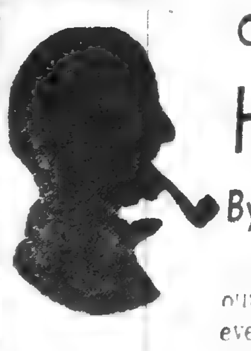
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 8 - 1945

[105]

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES

JUL 4 - 1945



OUR TOWN—

Hot Anthem

By Anton Scherrer

Another alarming thing to come out of this war is the notion that everybody has a right to sing (or [illegible]) the "Star-Spangled Banner" as he damn pleases. This being the Fourth of July is as good a time as any to let down my hair.

This libertine practice, which has the substance of an abrogated Fifth Freedom, is as evident in Indianapolis as it is elsewhere. In support of which I cite Fabien Sevitsky, Clarence Elbert, Elmer Steffen and George Newton, all of whom have opinions of their own regarding the proper tempo of the "Star-Spangled Banner." And what is even worse—not one will listen to reason.

The radio reveals an equally disheartening situation. For example, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, treats the "Star-Spangled Banner" as if it were a dirge. Arthur Rodzinski of the Philharmonic whips up the tempo a teeny weeny bit with the result that it sounds more like a requiem. George Szell of the Metropolitan Opera beats Mr. Rodzinski by five seconds, and Arthur Fiedler of the Pops is six seconds ahead of Mr. Szell. Under Mr. Fiedler's baton, the "Star-Spangled Banner" achieves the speed of an authentic drinking song (andante con moto).

Anyway, It's No Dirge

OF ALL the temporizers, Mr. Fiedler is probably on the right track. At any rate, he has historical precedent to support him. Even if there were no historical evidence, the mere fact that the "Star-Spangled Banner" covers five notes over an octave is sufficient proof that the music is of bibulous origin. For some reason, all first-rate drinking songs have amazing ranges. I don't know why, unless it be that gentlemen in their cups will attempt anything including even the impossible.

As for the historical evidence, everything points to the fact that Francis Scott Key's words were set to a song the title of which was "To Anacreon in Heaven." The words were written by Ralph Tomlinson, a lovable eighteenth century toper. The music was by John Stafford Smith, an uncertain tenor, but able organist who also profited by the perquisites of a cryptic office known as "Composer to His Majesty's Chapel." The song was familiar to all convivial souls in the British Isles around 1800. It was composed at least 15 years earlier, a detail lugged into today's piece to show the length of time it takes for a tune to catch on in England.

"To Anacreon in Heaven" was composed for the Anacreontic Society of London, a jolly organization not unlike that of the Indianapolis Mannerchor today. The British boys met fortnightly to "make music" at the Crown and Anchor Tavern in the Strand. And, of course, right after the concerts the exhausted singers had to wet their whistles. The sign to start tippling came from the chairman who rose and triumphantly sang the constitutional song—sure, "To Anacreon in Heaven." Anyone who believes that it sounded like a dirge is living in a fool's paradise.

Made the Music Fit the Words

IT IS reasonable to assume that the song was circulated in America by way of the Columbian Anacreontic society founded in imitation of the London society in 1795 at New York. Be that as it may, there was a copy of the song in Baltimore in 1814. Tradition has it that in that year a picturesque actor by the name of Ferdinand Durang was rummaging in his trunk to find music to suit the rhythm of Mr. Key's words. He stumbled across "To Anacreon in Heaven." By the time he had sung three stanzas, in trying the music to the words, the little tavern was full of customers who "spontaneously" (so reads an old account) joined in the chorus. It is not without significance that the episode took place in a tavern and that the song was picked up spontaneously.

The hitching of severely serious words to riotous rollicking music was, of course, an unfortunate marriage. At least half-a-dozen attempts have been made to add extra verses in an effort to effect a reconciliation. Even Oliver Wendell Holmes tried his hand. Any number of parodies were written too, some of which were jolly enough to reflect the lilt of the tune. The rest were downright insulting. Curiously enough, however, the most insulting performance wasn't a parody at all. It was a grim effort on the part of a professional prohibitionist who used the classic drinking song to peddle propaganda. It appeared in 1843 in the "Temperance Annual and Cold Water Magazine" (no fooling). It starts like this:

Oh, who has not seen, by the dawn's early light,
Some poor bloated drunkard to his home weakly reeling;
With blear eyes and red nose, most revolting to sight . . .

So far as I know, this is the only version of the "Star-Spangled Banner" that doesn't call for a spirited rendition.

THE ORIGINAL
HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR

JUL 9 - 1945

MILLERTON, N.Y
NEWS
7/5/45

First Two Concerts Announced

Alexander Brailowsky, Abram Chasins, Constance Keene To Be Soloists

Serge Koussevitzky has announced complete programs for the first two concerts of the Bach-Mozart festival that he will direct at Tanglewood, between Lenox and Stockbridge, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The orchestra will be of chamber proportions, composed of the principals and other members of the Boston Orchestra, with guest soloists.

Tickets for individual concerts for the last weekend in July and the first two in August will be on sale July 9 at Symphony Hall, Boston; England Brothers, Pittsfield; the Curtis Hotel, Lenox; the Blue Bird Sport Shop, Stockbridge; and the Chamber of Commerce information booth, Great Barrington. Subscription tickets for four or six concerts may be obtained by mail to Symphony Hall.

The first two programs are as follows:

First programme, Saturday evening, July 28, at 8:30—Bach, Suite in D major, No. 4; Mozart, Piano Concerto in A major No. 29, K. 488. Soloist, Alexander Brailowsky. Mozart, Symphony in E-flat major No. 26, K. 184; Mozart, Symphony in C major, "Jupiter" No. 41, K. 551.

Second programme, Sunday afternoon, July 29, at 3:30—Mozart, Symphony in D major "Paris" No. 31, K. 297; Bach, Concerto in C minor for two pianos, No. 1. Soloists, Abram Chasins, Constance Keene. Bach, Concerto in C major for two pianos, No. 2. Soloists, Abram Chasins, Constance Keene. Mozart, Overture to "Der Schauspieldirektor" K. 486; Mozart, Serenade in D major, "Haffner" K. 250.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

JUL 8 - 1945

Bach-Mozart Festival

Serge Koussevitzky will present a comprehensive list of the music of Bach and Mozart at the Festival devoted to those two composers to be given at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. The conductor will assemble an orchestra of chamber proportions from his Boston Symphony Orchestra, all of the principals taking part. The concerts will be given in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood, the Orchestra's summer home in the Berkshires, and this hall, seating 1150, is ideal for music in intimate performance.

WHEELING, W. VA.
NEWS REGISTER

JUL 8 - 1945

New Recordings

Reviewed by Robert Permar

Berloiz Revived

There is an element of poetic justice in the fact that the first major recording since the lifting of the Petrillo ban should be the presentation of Hector Berlioz' "Harold in Italy." It is the only complete engraving of this beautiful work (five 12-inch doubles—Album No. 989). It is done by perhaps the world's perfect orchestra, the Boston under Dr. Koussevitzky and with the world's first violist, William Primrose, as soloist. The Boston, then under Dr. Karl Muck, made the first full symphonic recording back in 1917, Dvorak's "New World." And, most important, it is adequate revival of the high priest of 19th century French romanticism.

There are technical reasons for the neglect of Berlioz' fine music. First, with the possible exception of Richard Strauss, no man ever demanded so much from the orchestra. He thought massively. Second, his work was conceived in rarified, intellectual terms, difficult for both players and listeners. Few "get" him on the first bounce. Fritz Reiner told us once that he would rather rehearse all nine of the Beethoven symphonies than prepare a performance of the "Symphony Fantastique." But he is well worth any study required. He is unique and, once understood, is remembered.

This highly original work, based upon episodes of Byron's wandering hero, might be described as a symphony with viola obliggato. It is not a concerto in the conventional sense. Commissioned by Paganini, supreme virtuoso of the viola as he was of the violin, he was so delighted with the score that he sent Berlioz twenty thousand francs, enough to support the composer whilst he wrote his "Romeo and Juliette" symphony. But Paganini never played it. He was a very sick man at the time, and died a year later. Primrose, of course, is the one man to tackle it in our day. And he does, superbly.

"Harold in Italy" is not a complete musical exposition of this long and involved classic, though catching its sense. There are four movements — described by Berlioz as Harold in the Mountains, Scenes of Melancholy, Happiness and Joy; March of the Pilgrims Singing their Evening Hymn; Serenade of a Mountaineer to his Mistress, and Orgy of the Brigands. The first has that broad, escapist feeling which one identifies with the imagery of Byron, Shelley and Keats. The second is comparable with the like scene in "Tannhauser." The third is sweetly sentimental, but never cloying The finale is a tour-de-force of the first magnitude, with the richest instrumentation and turbulent drive.

The acoustics are admirable. Within 48 hours after Signor Petrillo decided to let the American people again hear good music, Victor engineers (the best in the business) were preparing Boston's Symphony Hall (an ideal hearing-place) for this recording. A heavy curtain was dropped from the ceiling at the twentieth seat row, in order to prevent overtones. The doors were locked and nobody, not even the exalted critical fraternity, was admitted. After two days and nights of intense work they completed the job, in all of its blazing beauty and full sonorities

In fact, it is such a wonderful job that we are almost inclined to forgive Dr. Koussevitzky for this persona-non-grata slight. After all, none of us would have munched peanuts or started a game of mumbly-peg during such important business.

ERIE, PA.
DISPATCH-HERALD

JUL 8 - 1945

Record Review

A VERY enjoyable album of Red Seal Victor records is that of "Harold in Italy" by Berlioz, in which William Primrose is solo violist and Serge Koussevitsky directs the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There are five records in all, and the work is a series of scenes in which the viola is individualized.

Something like Byron's "Childe Harolde," this work of Berlioz contains a chief theme which reappears throughout the different scenes at various intervals. And Primrose shows his remarkable virtuosity as a violist.

The first scene is entitled: "Harold in the Mountains, Scenes of Happiness and Joy"; the second is: "March of the Pilgrims, Singing Their Evening Hymn"; the third is: "Serenade of a Mountaineer to His Mistress," and the final one is: "Orgy of Brigands; Recollection of Preceding Scenes."

* * *

MOST music lovers are talking about Gershwin these days, because the film biography of the great American composer, "Rhapsody in Blue," has been released by Warner Brothers and will probably be shown in Erie very soon.

In many ways, the musical and emotional climax of the movie is the premiere in Aeolian Hall, New York, of the most celebrated of Gershwin's serious compositions, "The Rhapsody," which brought blues to the concert hall, and the recorded performance of this work which Gershwin prized in his personal collection was that of Jesus Maria Sanroma as pianist with the Boston Pops Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler's direction.

This has now been newly issued as a Victor "Showpiece" and includes two pages of biographical material on Gershwin, a brief history of the orchestra and Fiedler by John Burke, pictures of Sanroma and Fiedler and an attractive jacket in metropolitan blues. This is the third such series to be issued by Victor—the other two being Iturbi's performance of piano music from "A Song to Remember," and "Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" —and it includes two 12-inch records.

SAN JOSE, CAL
MERCURY-HERALD

JUL 8 1945

Bach-Mozart Fete Plans Completed In Massachusetts

NEW YORK. (UP)—Plans for a full-scale Bach-Mozart festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., have been completed by Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An orchestra of chamber proportions will be assembled from the Boston orchestra, all of the principals taking part. The concerts will be given in the theater-concert hall at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home in the Berkshires, which seats 1150 and is considered ideal for music in intimate performance.

There will be six concerts, each with a different program, on three Saturday evenings at 8:30 and three Sunday afternoons at 3:30 (July 28-29, Aug. 4-5, and Aug. 11-12).

The pianists will include Alexander Borovsky, Alexander Brailowsky, Robert Casadesus, Lukas Foss and Abram Chasins, partnered with Constance Keene. Violin soloists will be William Kroll and Richard Burgin; viola, A. Veisse and Jean Lefranc; flute Georges Laurent, and oboe, Fernand Gillet.

HERALD TRIBUNE
Cir. (D 330,138) (S 538,005)

JUL 8 - 1945

Soloists Listed For Berkshire Concert Series

Programs Scheduled for Bach-Mozart Festival by Boston Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky has announced the soloists who will participate in the series of concerts devoted to music by Bach and Mozart being presented this month and next at Tanglewood, Stockbridge, Mass., by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are Alexander Brailowsky, Alexander Borovsky, Robert Casadesus, Abram Chasins and Constance Keene, pianists; William Kroll, violinist, and Jascha Veissi, violist. The programs follow:

Saturday, July 28, 8:30 p. m.

Soloist, Alexander Brailowsky, pianist
Suite in D major, No. 4 .... Bach
Piano Concerto in A major, No. 29 (K. 488) .... Mozart
Symphony in E flat major, No. 26 (K. 184); Symphony in C major, "Jupiter," No. 41 (K. 551) .... Mozart

Sunday, July 29, 3:30 p. m.

Soloists, Abram Chasins, Constance Keene, pianists
Symphony in D major, "Paris," No. 31 (K. 297) .... Mozart
Concerto in C minor for Two Pianos, No. 1; Concerto in C major for Two Pianos, No. 2 .... Bach
Overture to "Der Schauspieldirektor"; Serenade in D major, "Haffner" (K. 250) . Mozart

Saturday, Aug. 4, 8:30 p. m.

Soloist, Alexander Borovsky, pianist
Divertimento in B flat major, for Strings with two Horns (K. 287) .... Mozart
Piano Concerto in D minor; Piano Concerto in F minor .... Bach
Symphony in D major, "Prague," No. 38 (K. 504) .... Mozart

Sunday, Aug. 5, 3:30 p. m.

Suite No. 2 in B minor, for Flute and Strings; Brandenburg Concerto No. 5, in D major, for Orchestra with Piano, Violin and Flute .... Bach
Adagio and Fugue for String Orchestra (K. 546); Symphony in G minor, No. 40 (K. 550) .... Mozart

Saturday, Aug. 11, 8:30 p. m.

Soloists, William Kroll, violinist
Jascha Veissi, violist
Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major, for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra .... Bach
Konzertante Sinfonie for Violin and Viola (K. 346) .... Mozart
Two Preludes (arr. for Strings by Pick-Mangiagalli) .... Bach
Serenade in B flat for Wind Instruments (K. 361) .... Mozart

Sunday, Aug. 12, 3:30 p. m.

Soloist, Robert Casadesus, pianist
Suite No. 3 in D major .... Bach
Piano Concerto in C minor (K. 491) .... Mozart
Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, for String Orchestra (with Sinfonia from Cantata "Christ lag in Todesbanden") ..... Bach
Symphony in E flat major, No. 39 (K. 543) .... Mozart

---

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

JUL 9 - 1945

Tickets for Bach-Mozart Festival Concerts on Sale

Tickets went on sale today for single concerts for the Bach-Mozart Festival that Serge Koussevitzky will direct at Tanglewood the last week end of July and the first two in August. Forty principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and guest soloists will play six different programs on Saturday evenings at 8.30 and Sunday afternoons at 3.30.

Because of the large advance sale of subscriptions the number of individual concert seats remaining is limited. They may be bought at England Brothers; the Curtis Hotel, Lenox; the Blue Bird Sport Shop, Stockbridge; and the Chamber of Commerce information booth, Great Barrington.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

JUL 12 1945

Tanglewood Offers Rarely Heard Works Of Mozart, Bach

Rarely heard music of Bach and Mozart, as well as the more popular compositions will be played at the Bach [illegible] Festival that Serge Koussevitzky will conduct at Tanglewod, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Rested and bronzed from the sun on his recent vacation at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., the conductor in an interview was enthusiastic about the programs that he has planned for the six concerts that 40 principals and other members of the Boston orchestra will play, with guest soloists, on three successive week-ends, beginning Saturday evening, July 28 and ending Sunday afternoon, Aug. 12.

"Because we want to present only the greatest music we have chosen Mozart again, and Bach," Dr. Koussevitzky said. Not only is it beautiful, but it is ideal for the size of the orchestra and the intimate auditorium. Because they were not wrtten for huge halls and large orchestras many of the geratest and most beautiful compositions of Bach and Mozart are rarely played, or not at all.

"For example, while we will conclude the Festival with the popular Symphony in E-flat major (No. 39) by Mozart, in the first program we will play the seldom-heard Symphony in E-flat major (No. 26). It is short, about nine minutes, in three movements without interruption. I am sure it has never been played before in America.

"I played Bach in my first years in Boston more than any previous conductor," Dr. Koussevitzky said, "but the works for orchestra alone, without choir or soloists, are limited, the orchestra is too big and there is more and more new, good music to be played It needs a sophisticated audience to appreciate Mozart, and the performance must be extraordinary. It is only recently that people have been educated by records and radio to enjoy his music.' Turning to the librarian's record of Mozart's "Paris" Symphony in D Major, the opening number of the second Tanglewood program, he showed that it was conducted at Symphony Hall in 1893 by Nikisch and in 1899 by Gericke, and not 20 times in the past 46 years.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
ENQUIRER

JUL 8 - 1945

Tanglewood

Offers Mozart And Bach Festival In Six Concert Series.

NEW YORK, JULY 7.

PLANS for a full-scale Bach-Mozart festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., have been completed by Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An orchestra of chamber proportions will be assembled from the Boston orchestra, all of the principals taking part in the theater-concert hall at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home in the Berkshires, which seats 1,150 and is considered ideal for music in intimate performance.

There will be six concerts, each with a different program, on three Saturdays evenings at 8:30 and three Sunday afternoons at 3:30 (July 28-29, August 4-5 and August 11-12).

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

JUL 8 - 1945

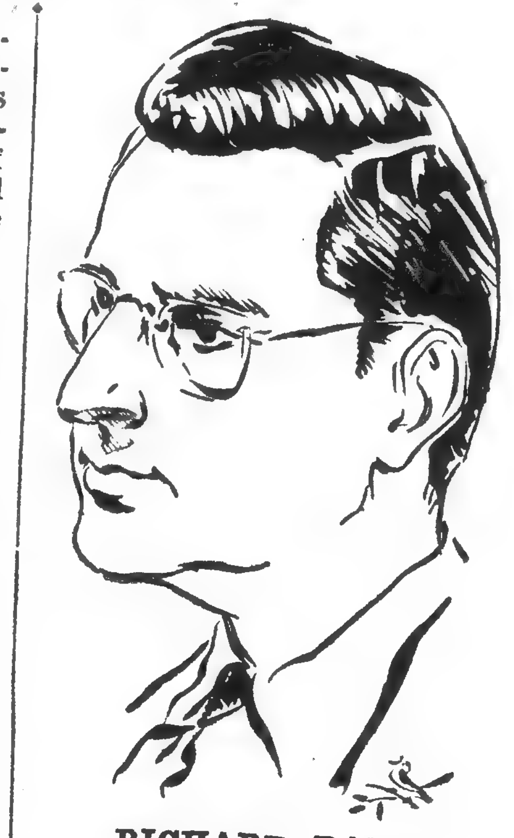
A Bach-Mozart festival will be presented by Director Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston symphony orchestra at Tanglewood, Stockbridge, Mass., on three week ends, July 28, 29, Aug. 4, 5, 11 and 12. Alexander Brailowsky will be the soloist in the Mozart piano concerto in A on the opening night.

WASHINGTON, D.C.
TIMES HERALD

JUL 10 1945

Did You Happen to See---

RICHARD BALES?



RICHARD BALES

He attended his first symphony concert here in Washington at the age of 12. It was the famous Philadelphia orchestra under the direction of Gabrilowitsch and he decided right then and there that he was going to be an orchestra conductor.

Richard Bales, musical director of the National Gallery of Art, never changed his mind from that day forward. So he recalls vividly, "the years between then and the age of 17 when I went off to study for my chosen profession were awfully long."

The music-loving young Alexandrian studied at the Eastman school of music of the University of Rochester from 1932 to 1936, then, armed with his degree, set out into the music world.

For two years he directed orchestras in various Southern States, then received a Fellowship in Conducting at the celebrated Juilliard School of Music. He studied there from '38 to '41.

While still studying he was selected in 1940 by Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, as one of the five outstanding young American conductors. The great conductor took the young Virginian to study privately with him at the Berkshire Music Festival.

"My first big chance to conduct in big time, however, was given me 10 years ago by Dr. Hans Kindler," Bales relates. "He let me conduct the National Symphony Orchestra at a Watergate concert back in 1935."

After serving with the British between 1941-43 because he'd been rejected by the American army, "Dick" Bales took his present position at the National Gallery of Art.

Now he conducts the National Gallery's concerts and symphonettes and composes music for and about the gallery. "National gallery suites," they are called, and they are inspired by paintings in the various collections.

The tall, serious-looking musician will be guest conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra Watergate concerts both tomorrow and Friday nights. In the audience will be Mrs. Bales, a musician herself, whom he met at the Eastman School of Music.

EILEEN ETTEN.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

JUL 12 1945

Bach and Mozart Chosen Due To Intimate Character

Music Seldom Heard in Larger Halls Will Please Tanglewood Concert Audience, Says Dr. Koussevitzky

Rarely heard music of Bach and Mozart will be played at the Bach-Mozart Festival that Serge Koussevitzky will conduct at Tanglewood. Rested and bronzed from the sun after his recent vacation at Saratoga Springs, the conductor in an interview was enthusiastic about the programs he has planned for the six concerts that 40 principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play, with guest soloists, on three week ends, starting Saturday evening, July 28, and ending Sunday afternoon, Aug. 12.

"Because we want to present only the greatest music we have chosen Mozart again, and Bach," Dr. Koussevitzky said. "Not only is it beautiful, but it is ideal for the size of the orchestra and the intimate auditorium. Because they were not written for huge halls and large orchestras many of the greatest compositions of Bach and Mozart are rarely played, or not at all.

"For example, while we will close the festival with the popular symphony in E-flat major (No. 39) by Mozart, in the first program we will play the seldom-heard Symphony in E-flat major (No. 26). It is short, about nine minutes, in three movements without interruption. I am sure it has never been played before in America."

Has Played Bach Frequently

The Brandenburg Concerto in G-major, No. 4, by Bach, in the fifth program has not been played by Dr. Koussevitzky in his 20 years as conductor of the Boston Orchestra. "I played Bach in my first years in Boston more than any previous conductor," he said, "but the works for orchestra alone, without choir or soloists, are limited, the orchestra is too large, and there is more and more good music to be played.

"It needs a sophisticated audience to appreciate Mozart and the performance must be extraordinary," Dr. Koussevitzky continued. "It is only recently that people have been educated by records and radio to enjoy Mozart." Turning to the librarian's record of the "Paris" Symphony in D-major, that will open the second program at Tanglewood, he showed that it was conducted at Symphony Hall in 1893 by Nikisch and in 1899 by Gericke, and not 20 times in the past 46 years.

"I am happy to be back in the Berkshires," the conductor said facing the breath-taking view of the hills, across Stockbridge Bowl from the terrace of Seranak, his summer home in Lenox. "I enjoy the extraordinary beauty and the quiet more every year. This view changes every hour, and I like it always. But I do not like the changes of the weather," he added with a smile.

"I am happy to continue the festivals at Tanglewood, to keep contact with the Berkshire audiences in a smaller way. Next year I hope the war will be over and we can have the music school and the concerts in the big shed."

Commenting on the success of the new open, "Peter Grimes" at the re-opening of Sadler Wells opera house in London, Dr. Koussevitzky said: "The first performance of that opera in America will be at Tanglewood, but we will play excerpts from it during the coming Symphony season in Boston." He told of commissioning Benjamin Britten, British composer, in 1942 to write it, and of asking Samuel Barber, an American composer, to write another.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

JUL 10 1945

Serge Koussevitzky has announced the programs for the six Bach-Mozart festival concerts which will be held at Tanglewood the last week end of this month and the first two week ends in August. The orchestra, which will be of chamber proportons, will be composed of the principals and other members of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The first program will be given Saturday, July 28 at 8.30 p.m. and Alexander Brailowsky, pianist, will be the soloist. The program will include the Bach "Suite in D major, No. 4," the Mozart "Piano Concerto in A major," the Mozart "Symphony in E flat major and the Mozart "Symphony in C major."

The second program will be given Sunday, July 29 at 3 30 p.m. and the soloists will be the pianists, Abram Chasins and Constance Keene. The program will include the Mozart "Symphony in D major" the Bach "Concerto in C minor for Two Pianos," the Bach Concerto in D major for Two Pianos, the Mozart "Overture to 'Der Schauspieldrektor,'" and the Mozart "Serenade in D major."

The third program will be given Saturday evening, Aug. 4 at 8:30 p.m. with Alexander Borovsky as piano soloist. The program will include the Mozart "Divertimento in B flat major for strings with two horns," the Bach "Piano Concerto in D minor," the Bach "Piano Concerto in F minor" and the Mozart "Symphony in D major."

The fourth program will be given Sunday, Aug. 5 at 3:30 p.m. The program will include the Bach "Suite No. 2 in B minor, for flute and strings," the Bach "Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D major, for orchestra with piano, violin and flute," the Mozart "Adagio and Fugue for string orchestra and the Mozart "Symphony in G minor."

The fifth program will be given Saturday, Aug. 11 at 8:30 p.m. and William Kroll, violinist, and Jascha Veissi, violist, will be the soloists." The program will include the Bach "Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major for violin, two flutes and stirng orchestra," the Mozart "Konzertante Sinfonie for violin and viola" the Bach "Adagio and Allegro from the Violin Partita," and the Mozart "Serenade in B flat for wind instruments."

The sixth and final program will be given Sunday, Aug. 12 at 3.30 p.m. with Robert Casadesus, pianist, as soloist. The program will include the Bach "Suite No. 3 in D major," the Mozart "Piano Concerto in C minor," the Bach "Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, for string orchestra," and the Mozart Symphony in E flat major."

RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER

JU

BOSTON 'POPS' ORCHESTRA

I heard a beautiful concert Saturday night by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra. Can you give me information about this orchestra and its concerts?—Mary T. R., Richmond.

The Boston "Pops" Orchestra has been in existence almost as long as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was founded in 1881. Its season begins in May and lasts throughout the Summer months. The concerts are delightfully informal, with the musicians usually in their shirt sleeves, and the rows of seats are replaced by refreshment tables where the audience may be served during the concert The "pop" of the bottles of soft drinks being uncapped brings the symphony its unusual name, as well as the fact that the more popular classics make up the program. Its conductors have included Franz Kneisel Agide Jacchia, Alferdo Casella. and, at the present, Arhtur Fiedler.

This Clipping From SAGINAW, MICH.
NEWS

JUL 15 1945.

Programs are out for the Bach-Mozart festival to be directed by Serge Koussevitzky with the assistance of the Boston Symphony orchestra principals and other members and a large group of soloists at Tanglewood, set in the beautiful Berkshires of Massachusettes. Six different programs are planned for July 28 and 29, Aug. 4 and 5 and Aug. 11 and 12.

HERALD TRIBUNE
Cir. (D 330,138) (S 538,005)

JUL 8 - 1945

Soloists Listed For Berkshire Concert Series

Programs Scheduled for Bach-Mozart Festival by Boston Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky has announced the soloists who will participate in the series of concerts devoted to music by Bach and Mozart being presented this month and next at Tanglewood, Stockbridge, Mass., by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are Alexander Brailowsky, Alexander Borovsky, Robert Casadesus, Abram Chasins and Constance Keene, pianists; William Kroll, violinist, and Jascha Veissi, violist. The programs follow:

Saturday, July 28, 8:30 p. m.

Soloist, Alexander Brailowsky, pianist
Suite in D major, No. 4..................Bach
Piano Concerto in A major, No. 29 (K. 488) Mozart
Symphony in E flat major, No. 26 (K. 184); Symphony in C major, "Jupiter," No. 41 (K. 551)..................Mozart

Sunday, July 29, 3:30 p. m.

Soloists, Abram Chasins, Constance Keene, pianists
Symphony in D major, "Paris," No. 31 (K. 297)..................Mozart
Concerto in C minor for Two Pianos, No. 1; Concerto in C major for Two Pianos, No. 2 Bach
Overture to "Der Schauspieldirektor"; Serenade in D major, "Haffner" (K. 250).Mozart

Saturday, Aug. 4, 8:30 p. m.

Soloist, Alexander Borovsky, pianist
Divertimento in B flat major, for Strings with two Horns (K. 287)..............Mozart
Piano Concerto in D minor; Piano Concerto in F minor..................Bach
Symphony in D major, "Prague," No. 38 (K. 504)..................Mozart

Sunday, Aug. 5, 3:30 p. m.

Suite No. 2 in B minor, for Flute and Strings; Brandenburg Concerto No. 5, in D major, for Orchestra with Piano, Violin and Flute..................Bach
Adagio and Fugue for String Orchestra (K. 546); Symphony in G minor, No. 40 (K. 550)..................Mozart

Saturday, Aug. 11, 8:30 p. m.

Soloists, William Kroll, violinist
Jascha Veissi, violist
Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major, for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra..................Bach
Konzertante Sinfonie for Violin and Viola (K. 346)..................Mozart
Two Preludes (arr. for Strings by Pick-Mangiagalli)..................Bach
Serenade in B flat for Wind Instruments (K. 361)..................Mozart

Sunday, Aug. 12, 3:30 p. m.

Soloist, Robert Casadesus, pianist
Suite No. 3 in D major..................Bach
Piano Concerto in C minor (K. 491)....Mozart
Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, for String Orchestra (with Sinfonia from Cantata "Christ lag in Todesbanden")....Bach
Symphony in E flat major, No. 39 (K. 543) Mozart

CINCINNATI, OHIO
ENQUIRER

JUL 8 - 1945

Tanglewood

Offers Mozart And Bach Festival In Six Concert Series.

NEW YORK, JULY 7.

PLANS for a full-scale Bach-Mozart festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., have been completed by Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An orchestra of chamber proportions will be assembled from the Boston orchestra, all of the principals taking part in the theater-concert hall at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home in the Berkshires, which seats 1,150 and is considered ideal for music in intimate performance.

There will be six concerts, each with a different program, on three Saturdays evenings at 8:30 and three Sunday afternoons at 3:30 (July 28-29, August 4-5 and August 11-12).

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

JUL 8 - 1945

A Bach-Mozart festival will be presented by Director Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston symphony orchestra at Tanglewood, Stockbridge, Mass., on three week ends, July 28, 29, Aug. 4, 5, 11 and 12. Alexander Brailowsky will be the soloist in the Mozart piano concerto in A on the opening night.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

JUL 9 - 1945

Tickets for Bach-Mozart Festival Concerts on Sale

Tickets went on sale today for single concerts for the Bach-Mozart Festival that Serge Koussevitzky will direct at Tanglewood the last week end of July and the first two in August. Forty principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and guest soloists will play six different programs on Saturday evenings at 8.30 and Sunday afternoons at 3.30.

Because of the large advance sale of subscriptions the number of individual concert seats remaining is limited. They may be bought at England Brothers; the Curtis Hotel, Lenox; the Blue Bird Sport Shop, Stockbridge; and the Chamber of Commerce information booth, Great Barrington.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

JUL 12 1945

Tanglewood Offers Rarely Heard Works Of Mozart, Bach

Rarely heard music of Bach and Mozart, as well as the more popular compositions will be played at the Bach [illegible] Festival that Serge Koussevitzky will conduct at Tanglewod, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Rested and bronzed from the sun on his recent vacation at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., the conductor in an interview was enthusiastic about the programs that he has planned for the six concerts that 40 principals and other members of the Boston orchestra will play, with guest soloists, on three successive week-ends, beginning Saturday evening, July 28 and ending Sunday afternoon, Aug. 12.

"Because we want to present only the greatest music we have chosen Mozart again, and Bach," Dr. Koussevitzky said. Not only is it beautiful, but it is ideal for the size of the orchestra and the intimate auditorium. Because they were not wrtten for huge halls and large orchestras many of the geratest and most beautiful compositions of Bach and Mozart are rarely played, or not at all.

"For example, while we will conclude the Festival with the popular Symphony in E-flat major (No. 39) by Mozart, in the first program we will play the seldom-heard Symphony in E-flat major (No. 26). It is short, about nine minutes, in three movements without interruption. I am sure it has never been played before in America.

"I played Bach in my first years in Boston more than any previous conductor," Dr. Koussevitzky said, "but the works for orchestra alone, without choir or soloists, are limited, the orchestra is too big and there is more and more new, good music to be played. It needs a sophisticated audience to appreciate Mozart, and the performance must be extraordinary. It is only recently that people have been educated by records and radio to enjoy his music." Turning to the librarian's record of Mozart's "Paris" Symphony in D Major, the opening number of the second Tanglewood program, he showed that it was conducted at Symphony Hall in 1893 by Nikisch and in 1899 by Gericke, and not 20 times in the past 46 years.

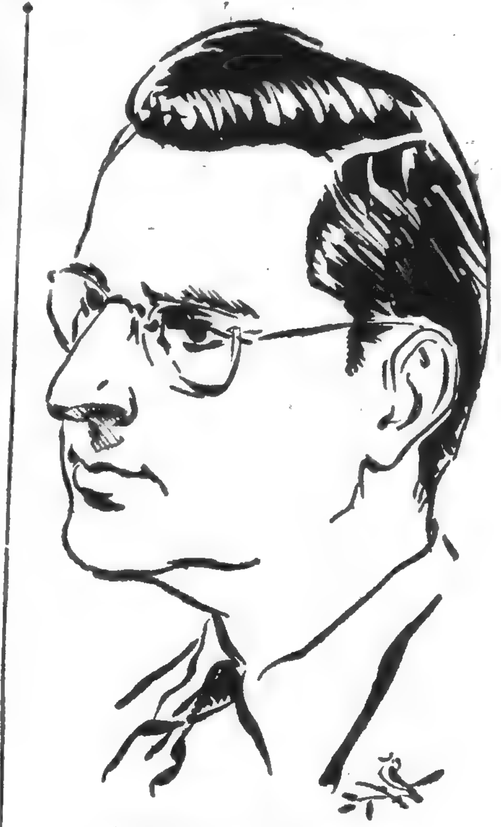
Commenting on the success of the new open, "Peter Grimes" at the re-opening of Sadler Wells opera house in London, Dr. Koussevitzky said: "The first performance of that opera in America will be at Tanglewood, but we will play excerpts from it during the coming Symphony season in Boston." He told of commissioning Benjamin Britten, British composer, in 1942 to write it, and of asking Samuel Barber, an American composer, to write another.

WASHINGTON, D.C.
TIMES HERALD

JUL 10 1945

Did You Happen to See---

RICHARD BALES?



RICHARD BALES

He attended his first symphony concert here in Washington at the age of 12. It was the famous Philadelphia orchestra under the direction of Gabrilowitsch and he decided right then and there that he was going to be an orchestra conductor.

Richard Bales, musical director of the National Gallery of Art, never changed his mind from that day forward. So he recalls vividly, "the years between then and the age of 17 when I went off to study for my chosen profession were awfully long."

The music-loving young Alexandrian studied at the Eastman school of music of the University of Rochester from 1932 to 1936, then, armed with his degree, set out into the music world.

For two years he directed orchestras in various Southern States, then received a Fellowship in Conducting at the celebrated Juilliard School of Music. He studied there from '38 to '41.

While still studying he was selected in 1940 by Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, as one of the five outstanding young American conductors. The great conductor took the young Virginian to study privately with him at the Berkshire Music Festival.

"My first big chance to conduct in big time, however, was given me 10 years ago by Dr. Hans Kindler," Bales relates. "He let me conduct the National Symphony Orchestra at a Watergate concert back in 1935."

After serving with the British between 1941-43 because he'd been rejected by the American army, "Dick" Bales took his present position at the National Gallery of Art.

Now he conducts the National Gallery's concerts and symphonettes and composes music for and about the gallery. "National gallery suites," they are called, and they are inspired by paintings in the various collections.

The tall, serious-looking musician will be guest conductor of the National Symphony Orchestra Watergate concerts both tomorrow and Friday nights. In the audience will be Mrs. Bales, a musician herself, whom he met at the Eastman School of Music. EILEEN ETTEN.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

JUL 12 1945

Bach and Mozart Chosen Due To Intimate Character

Music Seldom Heard in Larger Halls Will Please Tanglewood Concert Audience, Says Dr. Koussevitzky

Rarely heard music of Bach and Mozart will be played at the Bach-Mozart Festival that Serge Koussevitzky will conduct at Tanglewood. Rested and bronzed from the sun after his recent vacation at Saratoga Springs, the conductor in an interview was enthusiastic about the programs he has planned for the six concerts that 40 principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play, with guest soloists, on three week ends, starting Saturday evening, July 28, and ending Sunday afternoon, Aug. 12.

"Because we want to present only the greatest music we have chosen Mozart again, and Bach," Dr. Koussevitzky said. "Not only is it beautiful, but it is ideal for the size of the orchestra and the intimate auditorium. Because they were not written for huge halls and large orchestras many of the greatest compositions of Bach and Mozart are rarely played, or not at all.

"For example, while we will close the festival with the popular symphony in E-flat major (No. 39) by Mozart, in the first program we will play the seldom-heard Symphony in E-flat major (No. 26). It is short, about nine minutes, in three movements without interruption. I am sure it has never been played before in America."

Has Played Bach Frequently

The Brandenburg Concerto in G-major, No. 4, by Bach, in the fifth program has not been played by Dr. Koussevitzky in his 20 years as conductor of the Boston Orchestra. "I played Bach in my first years in Boston more than any previous conductor," he said, "but the works for orchestra alone, without choir or soloists, are limited, the orchestra is too large, and there is more and more good music to be played.

"It needs a sophisticated audience to appreciate Mozart and the performance must be extraordinary," Dr. Koussevitzky continued. "It is only recently that people have been educated by records and radio to enjoy Mozart." Turning to the librarian's record of the "Paris" Symphony in D-major, that will open the second program at Tanglewood, he showed that it was conducted at Symphony Hall in 1893 by Nikisch and in 1899 by Gericke, and not 20 times in the past 46 years.

"I am happy to be back in the Berkshires," the conductor said facing the breath-taking view of the hills, across Stockbridge Bowl from the terrace of Seranak, his summer home in Lenox. I enjoy the extraordinary beauty and the quiet more every year. This view changes every hour, and I like it always. But I do not like the changes of the weather," he added with a smile.

"I am happy to continue the festivals at Tanglewood, to keep contact with the Berkshire audiences in a smaller way. Next year I hope the war will be over and we can have the music school and the concerts in the big shed."

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

JUL 10 1945

Serge Koussevitzky has announced the programs for the six Bach-Mozart festival concerts which will be held at Tanglewood the last week end of this month and the first two week ends in August. The orchestra, which will be of chamber proportons, will be composed of the principals and other members of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The first program will be given Saturday, July 28 at 8:30 p.m. and Alexander Brailowsky, pianist, will be the soloist. The program will include the Bach "Suite in D major, No. 4," the Mozart "Piano Concerto in A major," the Mozart "Symphony in E flat major," and the Mozart "Symphony in C major."

The second program will be given Sunday, July 29 at 3:30 p.m. and the soloists will be the pianists, Abram Chasins and Constance Keene. The program will include the Mozart "Symphony in D major" the Bach "Concerto in C minor for Two Pianos," the Bach Concerto in D major for Two Pianos," the Mozart "Overture to 'Der Schauspieldrektor,'" and the Mozart "Serenade in D major."

The third program will be given Saturday evening, Aug. 4 at 8:30 p.m. with Alexander Borovsky as piano soloist. The program will include the Mozart "Divertimento in B flat major for strings with two horns," the Bach "Piano Concerto in D minor," the Bach "Piano Concerto in F minor" and the Mozart "Symphony in D major."

The fourth program will be given Sunday, Aug. 5 at 3:30 p.m. The program will include the Bach "Suite No. 2 in B minor, for flute and strings," the Bach "Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D major, for orchestra with piano, violin and flute," the Mozart "Adagio and Fugue for string orchestra and the Mozart "Symphony in G minor."

The fifth program will be given Saturday, Aug. 11 at 8:30 p.m. and William Kroll, violinist, and Jascha Veissi, violist, will be the soloists. The program will include the Bach "Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major for violin, two flutes and stirng orchestra," the Mozart "Konzertante Sinfonie for violin and viola" the Bach "Adagio and Allegro from the Violin Partita," and the Mozart "Serenade in B flat for wind instruments."

The sixth and final program will be given Sunday, Aug. 12 at 3:30 p.m. with Robert Casadesus, pianist, as soloist. The program will include the Bach "Suite No. 3 in D major," the Mozart "Piano Concerto in C minor," the Bach "Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, for string orchestra," and the Mozart Symphony in E flat major."

RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER

JUL 12

BOSTON 'POPS' ORCHESTRA

I heard a beautiful concert Saturday night by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra. Can you give me information about this orchestra and its concerts?—Mary T. R., Richmond.

The Boston "Pops" Orchestra has been in existence almost as long as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was founded in 1881. Its season begins in May and lasts throughout the Summer months. The concerts are delightfully informal, with the musicians usually in their shirt sleeves, and the rows of seats are replaced by refreshment tables where the audience may be served during the concert The "pop" of the bottles of soft drinks being uncapped brings the symphony its unusual name, as well as the fact that the more popular classics make up the program. Its conductors have included Franz Kneisel, Agide Jacchia, Alferdo Casella, and, at the present, Arhtur Fiedler.

This Clipping From SAGINAW, MICH.
NEWS

JUL 15 1945.

Programs are out for the Bach-Mozart festival to be directed by Serge Koussevitzky with the assistance of the Boston Symphony orchestra principals and other members and a large group of soloists at Tanglewood, set in the beautiful Berkshires of Massachusettes. Six different programs are planned for July 28 and 29, Aug. 4 and 5 and Aug. 11 and 12.

TADY, N. Y.
ZETTE

0 1945

ssevitzky has an-grams for the six festival concerts eld at Tanglewood nd of this month week ends in Austra, which will be oportons, will be e principals and of the Boston Sym-

ram will be given 28 at 8:30 p.m. and owsky, pianist, will
The program will ach "Suite in D
the Mozart "Piano major," the Mozart
E flat major," and
"Symphony in C program will be

July 29 at 3:30 p.m. s will be the pian-asins and Constance rogram will include mphony in D major"
certo in C minor for the Bach Concerto
r Two Pianos," the ure to 'Der Schaus-and the Mozart major."
ogram will be given ing, Aug. 4 at 8:30 xander Borovsky as
The program will ozart "Divertimento or for strings with e Bach "Piano Conor," the Bach "Piano minor" and the Mo-ny in D major."
rogram will be given 5 at 3:30 p.m. The include the Bach
B minor, for flute
the Bach "Branden-
No. 5 in D major, with piano, violin and ozart "Adagio and ring orchestra and
"Symphony in G

ogram will be given
. 11 at 8:30 p.m. and violinist, and Jascha will be the soloists.
will include the Bach Concerto No. 4 in violin, two flutes and ra," the Mozart "Kononie for violin and ch "Adagio and Al-Violin Partita," and erenade in B flat for ents."
nd final program will day, Aug. 12 at 3:30
bert Casadesus, pian-
. The program will ch "Suite No. 3 in D Mozart "Piano Con-minor," the Bach
Concerto No. 3 in G
ring orchestra," and Symphony in E flat

OND, VA.
LEADER

12 194

ORCHESTRA beautiful concert by the Boston ra. Can you give about this orcheserts?—Mary T. R.,

"Pops" Orchestra xistence almost as ston Symphony Or-was founded in on begins in May ghout the Summer
oncerts are delight-with the musicians shirt sleeves, and ts are replaced by bles where the be served during The "pop" of the drinks being un-the symphony its s well as the fact popular classics ogram. Its conduced Franz Kneisel, Alferdo Casella,
nt, Arhtur Fiedler.

Clipping From NAW, MICH.
NEWS
15 1945.

e out for the Bach-l to be directed by itzky, with the ase Boston Symphony ncipals and other a large group of so-lewood, set in the hires of Massachuferent programs are
July 28 and 29,
Aug. 11 and 12.

GREAT BARRINGTON,
MASS
COURIER
7/12/45

Among the recent guests at the Berkshire Inn were the following: Mr. and Mrs. John T. Higgins, Bridgeport, Conn.; Dr. and Mrs. L. Turitto, Brooklyn, N. Y.; Mr. and Mrs. P. R. Gara, Little Ferry, N. Y.; and Frank Clark of St. Albans, N. Y.

Tickets for the Bach-Mozart Festival to be held July 28-29, August 4, 5, 11 and 12 at Tanglewood, are now on sale at the Chamber of Commerce information booth on Main street. The Festival will be under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

Sunday evening services will be held at 7:00 o'clock at Trinity church in Van Deusenville beginning July 15 and continuing throughout the summer months. Rev. Richard Mortimer-Maddox, rector of St. James' Episcopal church, will deliver the sermons.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JUL 13 1945

Festival To Give First Performances Of Mozart Symphony, Britten Opera

A symphony and an opera will receive their first American performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, according to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's conductor.

The symphony, Mozart's E flat major, No. 26, will be heard on the first program, Saturday evening, July 28. "It is short," says Dr. Koussevitzky, "about nine minutes, in three movements without interruption. I am sure it has never been played before in America."

Commenting on the success of the new opera, "Peter Grimes," at the re-opening of Sadler Wells Opera House in London, Dr. Koussevitzky said, "The first performance of that opera in America will be at Tanglewood, but we will play excerpts from it during the coming symphony season in Boston." He told of commissioning Benjamin Britten, British composer, in 1942 to write it, and of asking Samuel Barber, an American composer, to write another. "It will be our first experience with new opera," he said. "What we have done has shown that we can realize nothing with the old operas. We try to find a new way in operatic acting, but we can only take chicken steps with the old ones."

Rested and bronzed from the sun on his recent vacation at Saratoga Springs, the conductor was enthusiastic about the programs that he has planned for the six concerts that 40 principals and other members of the Boston orchestra will play, with guest soloists, on three successive week-ends, beginning Saturday evening, July 28, and ending Sunday afternoon, Aug. 12.

"Because we want to present only the greatest music we have chosen Mozart again, and Bach," Dr. Koussevitzky said. "Not only is it beautiful, but it is ideal for the size of the orchestra and the intimate auditorium. Because they were not written for huge halls and large orchestras many of the greatest and most beautiful compositions of Bach and Mozart are rarely played, or not at all.

This Clipping From ATLANTA, GA.
JOURNAL

JU

. . . A second war-time Berkshire music festival will be given this summer at Tanglewood, Mass., under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, with an orchestra made up of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The music of Mozart and Bach will feature the programs which will continue over three week-ends, July 29-29; August 4-5 and August 11-12. . . . As far as casts are concerned, but minus the elaborate stage facilities, the Metroplitan Opera in miniature has moved out to the Lewisohn Stadium in upper Manhattan for a few days this summer. Presentations of "Carmen" were given on July 9-10 and "La Boheme" on August 2-3. . . . Frank Heffer, music buyer in the NBC music library division, is the composer of "Homage," in the form of chorale, an organ work just published by Edward Schuberth.

WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE

JUL 13 1945

Motor Corps Takes Boston Symphony ~~To Army Hospital~~

Five station wagons at the [illegible]

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

JUL 13 1945

ground music.

FINE PROGRAMS AT TANGLEWOOD

"I'm Glad to Be Back in the Berkshires," Says Serge Koussevitsky

Rarely heard music of Bach and Mozart, as well as the more popular compositions will be played at the Bach-Mozart Festival that Serge Koussevitzky will conduct at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Rested and bronzed from the sun on his recent vacation at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., the conductor in an interview was enthusiastic about the programs that he has planned for the six concerts that 40 principals and other members of the Boston orchestra will play, with guest soloists, on three successive week ends, beginning Saturday evenings, July 28 and ending Sunday afternoon, Aug. 12.

"Because we want to present only the greatest music we have chosen Mozart again, and Bach," Dr. Koussevitzky said. Not only is it beautiful, but it is ideal for the size of the orchestra and the intimate auditorium. Because they were not written for huge halls and large orchestras many of the greatest and most beautiful compositions of Bach and Mozart are rarely played, or not at all.

"I am happy to be back in the Berkshires," he continued facing the breath-taking view of the hills, across Stockbridge Bowl, from the terrace of "Seranak," his summer home in Lenox. "I enjoy the extraordinary beauty and the quiet more every year. This view changes every hour, and I like it, but I do not enjoy the changes of the weather.

"I am happy to continue the festivals at Tanglewood, to keep contact with the Berkshire audiences in a smaller way. Next year I hope the war will be over and we can have the concerts in the shed and the music school."

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

JUL 14 1945

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

JUL 15 1945

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

JUL 13 1945

Koussevitzky Back Rested and Bronzed

Enthusiastic About Tanglewood Concerts Due to Begin July 28 and End Aug. 12.

Rarely heard music of Bach and Mozart, as well as the more popular compositions will be played at the Bach-Mozart Festival that Serge Koussevitzky will conduct at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony orchestra's ~~summer home between Lenox and Stockbridge~~.

Rested and bronzed from the sun on his recent vacation at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., the conductor in an interview was enthusiastic about the programs that he has planned for the six concerts that 40 principals and other members of the Boston orchestra will play, the guest soloists, on three successive week-ends, beginning Saturday evening, July 28, and ending Sunday afternoon, Aug. 12.

"Because we want to present only the greatest music we have chosen Mozart again, and Bach," Dr. Koussevitzky said. "Not only is it beautiful, but it is ideal for the size of the orchestra and the intimate auditorium. Because they were not written for huge halls and large orchestras many of the greatest and most beautiful compositions of Bach and Mozart are rarely played, or not at all.

"I am happy to continue the festivals at Tanglewood, to keep contact with the Berkshire audiences in a smaller way. Next year I hope the war will be over and we can have the music school and the concerts in the big shed," he said.

Bastille Day Concert Closes Pops Season

THE CURRENT "POPS" CONCERT SEASON closes Saturday evening, with a Bastille Day concert, under the joint sponsorship of France Forever and American Relief for France, Inc.

From the first announcement of the event by the Executive Committees of the sponsoring organizations, the occasion has promised to be one of the most important of the summer social season. Tables are at a premium and headquarters of the American Relief for France, 121 Newbury st., where remaining tickets may still be obtained, is an extremely busy spot, with Mrs. Barbara Chadbourne directing the sale.

Among those arriving at Symphony Hall next Saturday evening when both Arthur Fiedler and Louis Speyer conduct and Camille A. Girouard appears as guest artist with the Pops Symphony Orchestra in commemoration of Bastille Day will be Orson Adams, Jr., Mrs. John Carver Beale, Charles Sumner Bird, Miss Mildred E. Bixby, Mrs. Ferdinand Brigham, Prof Rene De Messieres, Marcel C. Durot, Allan Forbes, Mrs. Homer Gage, Arthur W. Heinzelman, Mrs. Robert W. Lovett, Mrs. Andre Morize, Prof. Andre Morize, Mrs. Isaac Patch, Mrs. Edward K. Rand, Miss Joanna Sargent, Prof. Jean Seznec, Mrs. William D. Sohier, Mrs. John V. Spalding, Mrs. Louis Speyer, Mrs. John A. Tuckerman, Edward A. Weeks, Jr., Mrs. Edward L. Young, Mrs. H. B. Richardson, Mme. Nadia Boulanger, Mrs. Emile Boas, Samuel Labastie.

★ ★ ★

MR. AND MRS. ROBERT W. MITTON of Newton, at Wianno Club, Cape Cod, over the week-end, were among those entertaining at dinner preceding the first of the regular Saturday evening dances. Mrs. Earl Major of Newton Center and her young daughter, Jane, were celebrating Mrs. Major's birthday, the party having been arranged by her husband, Capt. Earl M. Major, serving with the U. S. Navy in Guam. Also entertaining a party of 12 at dinner were Mr. and Mrs. Joseph J. Bodell of Providence, with their daughters, Marguerite and Jeanne, both active in Red Cross work at Camp Edwards, and their son, Ens. Joseph Bodell, Jr., USNR, a survivor of the carriers, the Wasp and the Bunker Hill, now on leave.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

JUL 15 1945

FROM THE SHELL

. . . on the Charles River Basin in Boston, the American Broadcasting company will preesnt the Esplanade concerts this summer. The first one will be on Saturday night, July 21, when thousands of Bostonians and tourist visitors are expected to be present at the annual opening of New England's outdoor season of lighter musical fare. Arthur Fiedler will again be the director of the series which will be played by an ensemble comprised of Boston Symphony orchestral personnel. The series will be interrupted to permit broadcasts of the Mozart-Bach festival at Tanglewood the latter part of July and the early part of August.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

JUL 17 1945

Serge Koussevitzky vacationed recently at Saratoga Springs and is now at his summer home "Serenak," in Lenox. Dr. Koussevitzky is preparing the programs for the Bach-Mozart festival at Tanglewood which opens on Saturday evening, July 28. The concerts will be given by 40 principals and other members of the Boston Symphony and there will be guest artists.

At the first concert the Mozart Symphony in E-flat major (No. 26) will be given. Of it Dr. Koussevitzky says "I am sure it has never been played before in America."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

JUL 15 1945

CRITICAL and AMUSEMENTS

Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood

With the regular Berkshire Music Festivals suspended until after the war, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony will present a Bach-Mozart Festival in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., during three week ends this Summer. Six concerts, each with a different program, will be given on three consecutive Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, beginning July 28 and ending Aug. 12.

Dr. Koussevitzky will preside over an orchestra made up of the principals and other members of the Boston Symphony. Soloists include pianists Alexander Borovsky, Alexander Brailowsky, Robert Casadesus, Lukas Foss, Abram Chasins and Constance Keene; violinists William Kroll and Richard Burgin; flutist Georges Laurent; oboist Fernand Gillet, and violists Jascha Veissi and Lean Lefranc.

Reserved season tickets may be obtained for either six or four concerts upon application to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass. Six-concert subscriptions are priced at $27 and $18; four-concert (any two pair), at $18 and $12; all including tax.

The complete programs are as follows:

Saturday, July 28, at 8:30
Suite in D major, No. 4 . . . Bach
Piano Concerto in A major (K. 488) . . . . . . Mozart
Soloist: Brailowsky
Symphony in E-flat (K. 184) . Mozart
Jupiter Symphony (K. 551) . Mozart

Sunday, July 29, at 3:30
Paris Symphony (K. 297) . . Mozart
C-minor and C-major Concertos for Two Pianos . . . . . Bach
Soloists: Chasins and Keene
Der Schauspieldirektor Overture . . . Mozart
Haffner Serenade (K. 250) . Mozart

Saturday, Aug. 4, at 8:30
Divertimento in B-flat for Strings and Two Horns . . . . Mozart
D-minor and F-minor Piano Concertos . . . . . . Bach
Soloist: Borovsky
Prague Symphony (K. 504) . Mozart

Sunday, Aug. 5, at 3:30
Suite No. 2 for Flute and Strings . . . Bach
Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 . Bach
Adagio and Fugue for Strings . Mozart
Symphony in G minor (K. 550) . . . Mozart

Saturday, Aug. 11, at 8:30
Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 . Bach
Konzertante Sinfonie for Violin and Viola . . . . Bach
Soloists: Kroll and Veissi
Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 . Bach
Serenade for Wind Instruments . . . Mozart

Sunday, Aug. 12, at 3:30
Suite No. 3 in D major . . . Bach
C-minor Piano Concerto (K. 491) . . . Mozart
Soloist: Casadesus
Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 . Bach
Symphony in E flat (K. 543) . Mozart

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

JUL 17 1945

Charles Spaulding, assistant manager of the business staff of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, completed 30 years of service last Thursday with the organization and was honored by his associates at a farewell party.

GREAT BARRINGTON,
MASS
COURIER
7/12/45

Among the recent guests at the Berkshire Inn were the following: Mr. and Mrs. John T. Higgins, Bridgeport, Conn.; Dr. and Mrs. L. Turitto, Brooklyn, N. Y.; Mr. and Mrs. P. R. Gara, Little Ferry, N. Y.; and Frank Clark of St. Albans, N. Y.

Tickets for the Bach-Mozart Festival to be held July 28-29, August 4, 5, 11 and 12 at Tanglewood, are now on sale at the Chamber of Commerce information booth on Main street. The Festival will be under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

Sunday evening services will be held at 7:00 o'clock at Trinity church in Van Deusenville beginning July 15 and continuing throughout the summer months. Rev. Richard Mortimer-Maddox, rector of St. James' Episcopal church, will deliver the sermons.

WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE

JUL 13 1945

Motor Corps Takes Boston Symphony ~~To Army Hospital~~

Five station wagons of the Newton Red Cross Motor Corps [illegible]

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

JUL 13 1945

Koussevitzky Back Rested and Bronzed

Enthusiastic About Tanglewood Concerts Due to Begin July 28 and End Aug. 12.

Rarely heard music of Bach and Mozart, as well as the more popular compositions will be played at the Bach-Mozart Festival that Serge Koussevitzky will conduct at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony orchestra's ~~summer home between Lenox and Stockbridge~~.

Rested and bronzed from the sun on his recent vacation at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., the conductor in an interview was enthusiastic about the programs that he has planned for the six concerts that 40 principals and other members of the Boston orchestra will play, the guest soloists, on three successive week-ends, beginning Saturday evening, July 28, and ending Sunday afternoon, Aug. 12.

"Because we want to present only the greatest music we have chosen Mozart again, and Bach," Dr. Koussevitzky said. "Not only is it beautiful, but it is ideal for the size of the orchestra and the intimate auditorium. Because they were not written for huge halls and large orchestras many of the greatest and most beautiful compositions of Bach and Mozart are rarely played, or not at all.

"I am happy to continue the festivals at Tanglewood, to keep contact with the Berkshire audiences in a smaller way. Next year I hope the war will be over and we can have the music school and the concerts in the big shed," he said.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

JUL 15 1945

CRITICAL and AMUSEMENTS

Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood

With the regular Berkshire Music Festivals suspended until after the war, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony will present a Bach-Mozart Festival in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., during three week ends this Summer. Six concerts, each with a different program, will be given on three consecutive Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, beginning July 28 and ending Aug. 12.

Dr. Koussevitzky will preside over an orchestra made up of the principals and other members of the Boston Symphony. Soloists include pianists Alexander Borovsky, Alexander Brailowsky, Robert Casadesus, Lukas Foss, Abram Chasins and Constance Keene; violinists William Kroll and Richard Burgin; flutist Georges Laurent; oboist Fernand Gillet, and violists Jascha Veissi and Lean Letranc.

Reserved season tickets may be obtained for either six or four concerts upon application to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass. Six-concert subscriptions are priced at $27 and $18; four-concert (any two pair), at $18 and $12; all including tax.

The complete programs are as follows:

Saturday, July 28, at 8:30

Suite in D major, No. 4 . . .	Bach
Piano Concerto in A major (K. 488)	Mozart
Soloist: Brailowsky
Symphony in E-flat (K. 184) .	Mozart
Jupiter Symphony (K. 551) .	Mozart

Sunday, July 29, at 3:30

Paris Symphony (K. 297) . .	Mozart
C-minor and C-major Concertos for Two Pianos	Bach
Soloists: Chasins and Keene
Der Schauspieldirektor Overture	Mozart
Haffner Serenade (K. 250) .	Mozart

Saturday, Aug. 4, at 8:30

Divertimento in B-flat for Strings and Two Horns	Mozart
D-minor and F-minor Piano Concertos	Bach
Soloist: Borovsky
Prague Symphony (K. 504) .	Mozart

Sunday, Aug. 5, at 3:30

Suite No. 2 for Flute and Strings	Bach
Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 .	Bach
Adagio and Fugue for Strings .	Mozart
Symphony in G minor (K. 550)	Mozart

Saturday, Aug. 11, at 8:30

Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 .	Bach
Konzertante Sinfonie for Violin and Viola	Bach
Soloists: Kroll and Veissi
Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 .	Bach
Serenade for Wind Instruments	Mozart

Sunday, Aug. 12, at 3:30

Suite No. 3 in D major . . .	Bach
C-minor Piano Concerto (K. 491)	Mozart
Soloist: Casadesus
Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 .	Bach
Symphony in E flat (K. 543) .	Mozart

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JUL 13 1945

Festival To Give First Performances Of Mozart Symphony, Britten Opera

A symphony and an opera will receive their first American performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, according to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's conductor.

The symphony, Mozart's E flat major, No. 26, will be heard on the first program, Saturday evening, July 28. "It is short," says Dr. Koussevitzky, "about nine minutes, in three movements without interruption. I am sure it has never been played before in America."

Commenting on the success of the new opera, "Peter Grimes," at the re-opening of Sadler Wells Opera House in London, Dr. Koussevitzky said, "The first performance of that opera in America will be at Tanglewood, but we will play excerpts from it during the coming symphony season in Boston." He told of commissioning Benjamin Britten, British composer, in 1942 to write it, and of asking Samuel Barber, an American composer, to write another. "It will be our first experience with new opera," he said. "What we have done has shown that we can realize nothing with the old operas. We try to find a new way in operatic acting, but we can only take chicken steps with the old ones."

Rested and bronzed from the sun on his recent vacation at Saratoga Springs, the conductor was enthusiastic about the programs that he has planned for the six concerts that 40 principals and other members of the Boston orchestra will play, with guest soloists, on three successive week-ends, beginning Saturday evening, July 28, and ending Sunday afternoon, Aug. 12.

"Because we want to present only the greatest music we have chosen Mozart again, and Bach," Dr. Koussevitzky said. "Not only is it beautiful, but it is ideal for the size of the orchestra and the intimate auditorium. Because they were not written for huge halls and large orchestras many of the greatest and most beautiful compositions of Bach and Mozart are rarely played, or not at all.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

JUL 13 1945

ground music.

FINE PROGRAMS AT TANGLEWOOD

"I'm Glad to Be Back in the Berkshires," Says Serge Koussevitzky

Rarely heard music of Bach and Mozart, as well as the more popular compositions will be played at the Bach-Mozart Festival that Serge Koussevitzky will conduct at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Rested and bronzed from the sun on his recent vacation at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., the conductor in an interview was enthusiastic about the programs that he has planned for the six concerts that 40 principals and other members of the Boston orchestra will play, with guest soloists, on three successive week ends, beginning Saturday evenings, July 28 and ending Sunday afternoon, Aug. 12.

"Because we want to present only the greatest music we have chosen Mozart again, and Bach," Dr. Koussevitzky said. Not only is it beautiful, but it is ideal for the size of the orchestra and the intimate auditorium. Because they were not written for huge halls and large orchestras many of the greatest and most beautiful compositions of Bach and Mozart are rarely played, or not at all.

"I am happy to be back in the Berkshires," he continued facing the breath-taking view of the hills, across Stockbridge Bowl, from the terrace of "Seranak," his summer home in Lenox. "I enjoy the extraordinary beauty and the quiet more every year. This view changes every hour, and I like it, but I do not enjoy the changes of the weather.

"I am happy to continue the festivals at Tanglewood, to keep contact with the Berkshire audiences in a smaller way. Next year I hope the war will be over and we can have the concerts in the shed and the music school."

Bastille Day Concert Closes Pops Season

THE CURRENT "POPS" CONCERT SEASON closes Saturday evening, with a Bastille Day concert, under the joint sponsorship of France Forever and American Relief for France, Inc.

From the first announcement of the event by the Executive Committees of the sponsoring organizations, the occasion has promised to be one of the most important of the summer social season. Tables are at a premium and headquarters of the American Relief for France, 121 Newbury st., where remaining tickets may still be obtained, is an extremely busy spot, with Mrs. Barbara Chadbourne directing the sale.

Among those arriving at Symphony Hall next Saturday evening when both Arthur Fiedler and Louis Speyer conduct and Camille A. Girouard appears as guest artist with the Pops Symphony Orchestra in commemoration of Bastille Day will be Orson Adams, Jr., Mrs. John Carver Beale, Charles Sumner Bird, Miss Mildred E. Bixby, Mrs. Ferdinand Brigham, Prof Rene De Messieres, Marcel C. Durot, Allan Forbes, Mrs. Homer Gage, Arthur W. Heinzelman, Mrs. Robert W. Lovett, Mrs. Andre Morize, Prof. Andre Morize, Mrs. Isaac Patch, Mrs. Edward K. Rand, Miss Joanna Sargent, Prof. Jean Seznec, Mrs. William D. Sohier, Mrs. John V. Spalding, Mrs. Louis Speyer, Mrs. John A. Tuckerman, Edward A. Weeks, Jr., Mrs. Edward L. Young, Mrs. H. B. Richardson, Mme. Nadia Boulanger, Mrs. Emile Boas, Samuel Labastie.

★ ★ ★

MR. AND MRS. ROBERT W. MITTON of Newton, at Wianno Club, Cape Cod, over the week-end, were among those entertaining at dinner preceding the first of the regular Saturday evening dances. Mrs. Earl Major of Newton Center and her young daughter, Jane, were celebrating Mrs. Major's birthday, the party having been arranged by her husband, Capt. Earl M. Major, serving with the U. S. Navy in Guam. Also entertaining a party of 12 at dinner were Mr. and Mrs. Joseph J. Bodell of Providence, with their daughters, Marguerite and Jeanne, both active in Red Cross work at Camp Edwards, and their son, Ens. Joseph Bodell, Jr., USNR, a survivor of the carriers, the Wasp and the Bunker Hill, now on leave.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

JUL 17 1945

Charles Spaulding, assistant manager of the business staff of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, completed 30 years of service last Thursday with the organization and was honored by his associates at a farewell party.

This Clipping From ATLANTA, GA.
JOURNAL

JUL

. . . A second war-time Berkshire music festival will be given this summer at Tanglewood, Mass., under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, with an orchestra made up of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The music of Mozart and Bach will feature the programs which will continue over three week-ends, July 29-29; August 4-5 and August 11-12. . . . As far as casts are concerned, but minus the elaborate stage facilities, the Metroplitan Opera in miniature has moved out to the Lewisohn Stadium in upper Manhattan for a few days this summer. Presentations of "Carmen" were given on July 9-10 and "La Boheme" on August 2-3. . . . Frank Heffer, music buyer in the NBC music library division, is the composer of "Homage," in the form of chorale, an organ work just published by Edward Schuberth.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

JUL 14 1945

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

JUL 15 1945

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

JUL 15 1945

FROM THE SHELL

. . . on the Charles River Basin in Boston, the American Broadcasting company will preesnt the Esplanade concerts this summer. The first one will be on Saturday night, July 21, when thousands of Bostonians and tourist visitors are expected to be present at the annual opening of New England's outdoor season of lighter musical fare. Arthur Fiedler will again be the director of the series which will be played by an ensemble comprised of Boston Symphony orchestral personnel. The series will be interrupted to permit broadcasts of the Mozart-Bach festival at Tanglewood the latter part of July and the early part of August.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

JUL 17 1945

Serga Koussevitzky vacationed recently at Saratoga Springs and is now at his summer home "Serenak," in Lenox. Dr. Koussevitzky is preparing the programs for the Bach-Mozart festival at Tanglewood which opens on Saturday evening, July 28. The concerts will be given by 40 principals and other members of the Boston Symphony and there will be guest artists.

At the first concert the Mozart Symphony in E-flat major (No. 26) will be given. Of it Dr. Koussevitzky says "I am sure it has never been played before in America."

Esplanade Concerts Begin Next Friday

Jul 15
194

Now established as a unique institution which has brought added fame to Boston, the Esplanade Concerts will be launched on their 17th season next Friday night at 8:30 in the Hatch Memorial Shell (Embankment road, foot of Mt. Vernon street) by Arthur Fiedler, who started them experimentally in 1939, and has conducted them ever since.

These continue to be the only annual outdoor concerts played free of admission charge six nights a week by members of a major symphony orchestra. About one quarter of a million men, women and children attend yearly. There is no city or state subsidy. Financial support comes from the Esplanade Concerts Fund, made up yearly by those of the public who like to contribute. Some send in checks to the official depository, the Merchants National Bank, at Copley square. Others drop coins at the program-distribution booths on the concert grounds. (The annotated program leaflets are free.) Listeners may stand or sit on the lawn covering 40,000 square feet of space along the Charles river, in front of the shell. Reserved seats are unpurchasable. Anyone wishing the convenience of a chair may rent one for a dime and place it in any available location he wishes.

The Esplanade series are reputed to be the most democratic orchestra concerts in the nation.

The forthcoming season of Esplanade concerts will continue nightly, with the exception of Thursdays, through Aug. 15. There will be concerts for children—and any others interested—on Wednesday mornings at 10:15, July 25, Aug. 1, 8 and 15.

Programs for the first six concerts follow:

Friday—Opening Night

Hallelujah Chorus from "The Messiah" Handel
Largo from the "New World" Symphony .... Dvorak
Danza Piemontese No. 1 .... Sinigaglia
Toccata .... Frescobaldi-Kindler
"Emperor" Waltzes .... Strauss
Hora Staccato .... Dinicu-Heifetz
Variations on "Pop Goes the Weasel" Gailliet
"The Stars and Stripes Forever," March Sousa

Saturday

Wedding March from "The Golden Cockerel" .... Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "Leonore" No. 3 ... Beethoven
Ave Maria .... Bach-Gounod
Waltz of the Flowers from the "Nutcracker" (Ballet Suite) .... Tchaikovsky Cornish Rhapsody .... Hubert Bath
Piano Soloist: Leo Litwin
(First radio performance in the United States)
Salute to Our Fighting Forces Arranged by Bodge
Overture to "Fatinitza" .... von Suppe Liebestraum .... Liszt-Herbert
"Flags Flying," March .... Repper

Sunday

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg from "Tannahauser" .... Wagner
Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan und Isolde" .... Wagner
Ride of the Valkyries .... Wagner
Overture to "Die Fledermause" ... Strauss
Angelus from "Scenes Pittoresques" Massenet
"Molly on the Shore" .... Grainger
American Salutes ("When Johnny Comes Marching Home") .... Gould

Monday, July 23

Overture to "Egmont" .... Beethoven
Symphony No. 8, in F major ... Beethoven
Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" .... Rossini
Largo from "Xerxes" .... Handel
(Solo Violin: Gaston Elcus)
"Village Swallows," Waltz .. Josef Strauss
"Strike Up the Band" .... Gershwin

Tuesday, July 24

"Academic Festival" Overture Brahms
Two Movements from Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98 Brahms
III. Allegro giocoso
IV. Allegro energico e passionato
Hungarian Dance No. 1 Brahms
Peer Gynt Suite Grieg
Hoe Down from "Rodeo" Copland
Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
Cheyenne Indian War Dance ..... Skilton

Children's Concert

Wednesday Morning, July 25 at 10:15

Procession from "The Queen of Sheba" Gounod
Overture "Light Cavalry" von Suppe
Finale of the Fourth Symphony Tchaikovsky
The Guard Mount from "Carmen" Bizet
Syncopated Clock Anderson
Polka from "The Golden Age" Shostakovitch
Salute to Our Fighting Forces Arranged by Bodge

NEWS-REPUBLICAN. THURSDAY, JULY 19, 1945.

Koussevitzky Presents Rarely Heard Works

The Carefully Chosen Program At Tanglewood "Ideal For Size Of Orchestra, Intimate Auditorium"

Rarely heard music of Bach and Mozart, as well as the more popular compositions will be played at the Bach-Mozart Festival that Serge Koussevitzky will conduct at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Rested and bronzed from the sun on his recent vacation at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., the conductor in an interview was enthusiastic about the programs that he has planned for the six concerts that 40 principals and other members of the Boston orchestra will play, with guest soloists, on three successive weekends, beginning, Saturday evening, July 28, and ending Sunday afternoon, August 12.

"Because we want to present only the greatest music we have chosen Mozart again, and Bach," Dr. Koussevitzky said. Not only is it beautiful, but it is ideal for the size of the orchestra and the intimate auditorium. Because they were not written for huge halls and large orchestras many of the greatest and most beautiful compositions of Bach and Mozart are rarely played, or not at all.

"For example, while we will conclude the Festival with the popular Symphony in E-flat major (No. 39) by Mozart, in the first program we will play the seldom-heard Symphony in E-flat major (No. 26). It is short, about nine minutes, in three movements without interruption. I am sure it has never been played before in America.

"I played Bach in my first years in Boston more than any previous conductor," Dr. Koussevitzky said, "but the works for orchestra alone, without choir or soloists, are limited, the orchestra is to big, and there is more and more new, good music to be played. It needs a sophisticated audience to appreciate Mozart, and the preformance must be extraordinary. It is only recently that people have been educated by records and radio to enjoy his music." Turning to the librarian's record of Mozart's "Paris" Symphony in D Major, the opening number of the second Tanglewood program he showed that it was conducted at Symphony Hall in 1893 by Nikisch and in 1899 by Gericke, and not 20 times in the past 46 years.

"I am happy to be back in the Berkshires," the conductor said, facing the breath-taking view of the hills, across Stockbridge Bowl, from the terrace of "Seranak," his summer home in Lenox. I enjoy the extraordinary beauty and the quiet more every year. This view changes every hour, and I enjoy it, but I do not like the changes of the weather.

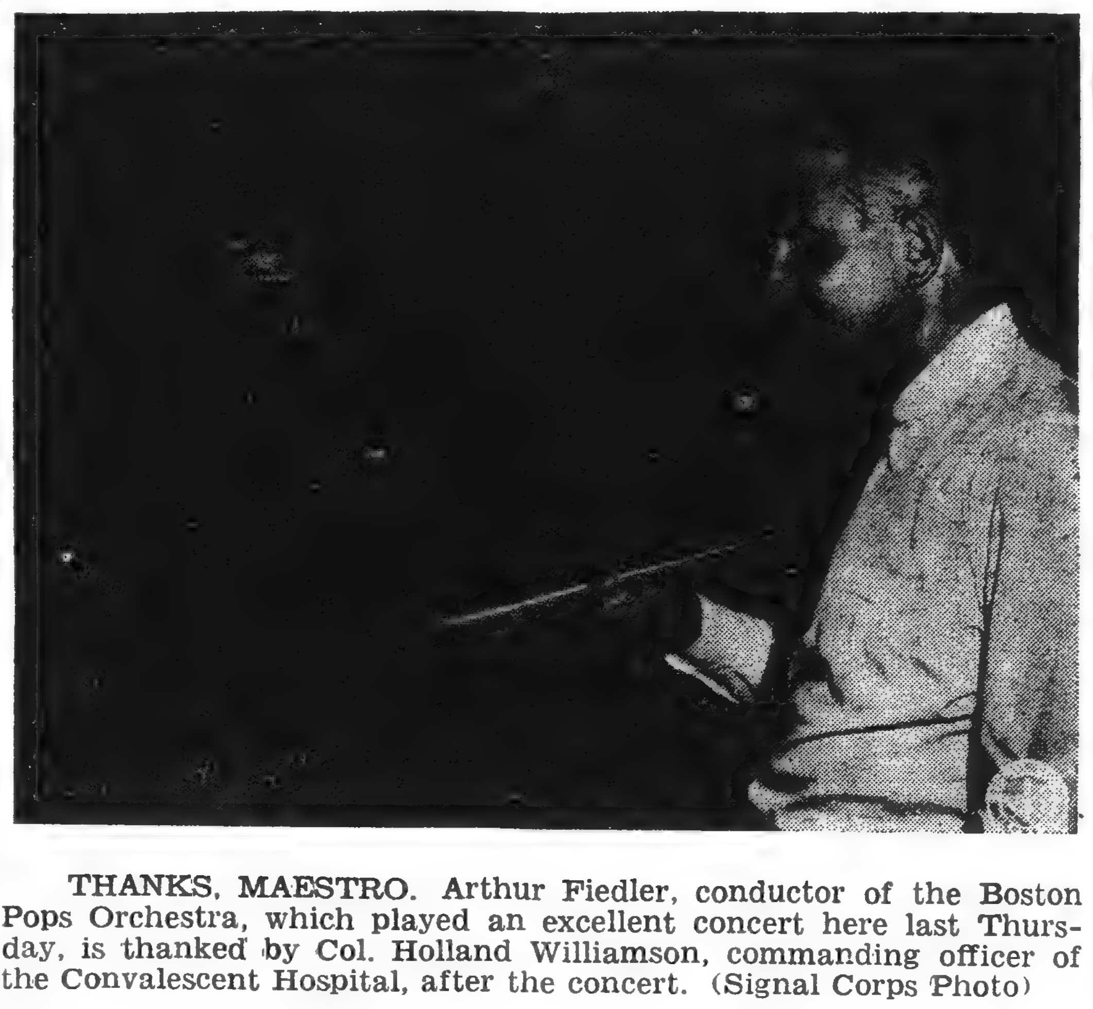
"I am happy to continue the festivals at Tanglewood, to keep contact with the Berkshire audiences in a smaller way. Next year I hope the war will be over and we can have the concerts in the shed and the music school.

Commenting on the success of "Peter Grimes," the opera that he commissioned the British composer, Benjamin Britten, to write in 1942 that was performed at the re-opening of the Sadler Wells opera house in London last month Dr. Koussevitzky said, "The first performance of that opera in America will be at Tanglewood, but we will play excerpts from it during the coming Symphony season in Boston." "It will be our first experience with new opera," he said. "What we have done has shown that we can realize nothing with the old operas. We try to find a new way in operatic acting, but we can only take chicken steps with the old operas. We must have new ones."

Jul 18

CAMP EDWARDS BULL

rson Outlines Salva



THANKS, MAESTRO. Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, which played an excellent concert here last Thursday, is thanked by Col. Holland Williamson, commanding officer of the Convalescent Hospital, after the concert. (Signal Corps Photo)

Boston Symphony Plays To Capacity Audience Here

Cheered on by an enthusiastic, capacity audience, the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducted by Arthur Fiedler, outdid itself in a concert in the Arena Thursday afternoon. As the program unfolded, the audience, composed mainly of patients at the Convalescent Hospital, applauded, cheered and even, in many cases, whistled in the good old GI manner.

Col. Holland Williamson, commanding officer of the Convalescent Hospital, personally thanked Mr. Fiedler for the fine program, and expressed the hope that the orchestra would be able to appear here frequently in the future.

Program Opens

The program opened with a march, "El Capitan," followed by the overture to "Die Fledermaus."

Then the orchestra departed from the classical and switched to the lighter side, with Ravel's "Bolero," a number which is particularly suited to the symphony. "The Skaters," a waltz by Waldteufel, proved highly popular, and the orchestra drew much help from the whistlers in the audience. The applause after this number called for a short encore.

Solo By Litwin

Leo Litwin, pianist, was the soloist for the next number, Gershwin's immortal "Rhapsody in Blue," and a medley from the Broadway hit, "Oklahoma!" followed.

The program was concluded with a beautifully arranged Salue to Our Fighting Forces, which included excerpts from the Marine's Hymn, the Coast Guard song "Semper Paratus," the Army Air Corps chant, Anchors Aweigh, the Field Artillery's "When the Caissons Go Rolling Along" and "God Bless America."

The audience loved it, and for many of those hearing the program, it was their first experience with Pops concers. To say that Pops gained many recruits through this concert would be no exaggeration.

CHELSEA, MASS.
EVENING RECORD

JUL 20 1945

Esplanade Concert

The hundreds of Chelsea music lovers who have been attending the Esplanade concerts in Boston will be among the audience tonight when the 17th season opens at the Hatch Memorial shell.

The concerts, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the superb direction of Arthur Fiedler, will be given each evening, except Thursday, and will, it is predicted, attract thousands.

Folks travel miles and miles to hear the famed Boston Symphony and all we have to do is to run into Boston ,a dime carfare, to attend these famous concerts. We are, indeed, fortunate to be so near to such good music.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JUL 19 1945

New Tanglewood Concert Series Programs Given

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the following programs for the Bach-Mozart Festival which he and members of the orchestra will give at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on three successive week ends beginning July 28:

Saturday evening, July 28, at 8:30—Suite in D Major, no. 4, Bach; Piano Concerto in A Major, no. 29 (K488), Mozart, soloist Alexander Brailowsky; symphonies in E Flat Major, no. 26, and C Major, "Jupiter," Mozart.

Sunday afternoon, July 29, at 3:30—"Paris" Symphony in D Major, Mozart; Concerto in C Minor for Two Pianos. no. 1, Bach, soloists, Abram Chasins, Constance Keene; Concerto in C Major for Two Pianos, no. 2, Bach, soloists Mr. Chasins and Miss Keene; Adagio from G Minor Quintet, Mozart, and "Haffner " Serenade in D Major, Mozart.

Saturday evening, August 4, at 8:30—Divertimento in B-Flat Major, for Strings and Two Horns (K287), Mozart; Piano Concerto in D Minor, soloist Alexander Borovsky, Mozart; Piano Concerto in F Minor, Bach, soloist, Mr. Borovsky; Symphony in D Major, "Prague," Mozart.

Sunday afternoon, August 5, at 3:30—Suite No. 2 in B Minor, for Flute and Strings, Bach; Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D Major, for Orchestra and Piano, Violin and Flute, Bach; Adagio and Fugue for String Orchestra (K546), Mozart, Symphony in G Minor, Mozart.

Saturday evening, August 11, at 8:30—Brandenburgh Concerto No. 4 in G Major, for Violin, Flutes and String Orchestra, Bach; Konzertante Sinfonie for Violin and Viola (K364), Mozart, soloists, William Krohl violin and Jascha Veissi; Two Preludes, Bach-Mangiagalli; Serenade in B Flat for Wind Instruments (K361), Mozart.

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT

JUL 19 1945

FESTIVAL OPENING AT LENOX, MASS.

Bach-Mozart Featured at Tanglewood, Beginning July 28

A Bach-Mozart Festival will be held at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. three successive week-ends beginning July 28. Serge Koussevitzky will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The schedule follows:

Saturday evening, July 28, at 8:30—Suite in D Major, No. 4, Bach; Piano Concerto in A Major, No. 29 (K488), Mozart, soloist Alexander Brailowsky; symphonies in E Flat Major No. 26, and C Major, "Jupiter," Mozart.

Sunday afternoon, July 29, at 3:30—"Paris" Symphony in D Major, Mozart; Concerto in G Minor for Two Pianos, No. 1, Bach, soloists, Abram Chasins, Constance Keene; Concerto in C Major for Two Pianos, No. 2, Bach, soloists Mr. Chasins and Miss Kene; Adagio from G Minor Quintet, Mozart, and "Haffner" Serenade in D Major, Mozart.

Saturday evening, August 4, at 8:30—Divertimento in B-Flat Major, for Strings and Two Horns (K287), Mozart; Piano Concerto in D Minor, soloist Alexander Borovsky, Mozart; Piano Concerto in F Minor, Bach, soloist, Mr. Borovsky; Symphony in D Major, "Prague," Mozart.

Sunday afternoon, August 5, at 3:30—Suite No. 2 in B Minor, for Flute and Strings, Bach; Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D Major, for Orchestra and Piano, Violin and Flute, Bach; Adagio and Fugue for String Orchestra (K546), Mozart, Symphony in G Minor, Mozart.

Saturday evening, August 11, at 8:30—Brandenburgh Concerto No. 4 in G Major, for Violin, Flutes and String Orchestra, Bach; Konzertante Sinfonie for Violin and Viola (K364), Mozart, soloists, William Krohl violin and Jascha Veissi; Two Preludes, Bach-Mangiagalli; Serenade in B Flat for Wind Instrument (K361), Mozart.

Sunday afternoon, August 12, at 3:30—Suite No. 3 in D Major, Bach, Piano Concerto in C Minor (K491), Mozart, soloist, Robert Casadesus; Brandenburgh Concerto No. 3 in G Major, for String Orchestra (with the Sinfonie from the Cantata, 'Christus lag im Totenbanden"; Symphony in E Flat Major, No. 39, Mozart.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JUL 21 1945

Symphony Lists Program Changes At Tanglewood

Three changes have been made in the programs to be given at the Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

The second program, Sunday, July 29 at 3:30 p. m., will have the addition of Mozart's Adagio and Fugue for Strings, and in place of Mozart's "Haffner" Serenade in D major, his Symphony in C major, No. 34, has been substituted.

On the fourth program, Sunday, Aug. 5, Mozart's Adagio from the String Quintet in G minor will take the place of the Adagio and Fugue.

The Festival will comprise six concerts, each with a different program, on three Saturday evenings at 8:30 and three Sunday afternoons at 3:30 (July 28-29, Aug. 4-5, Aug. 11-12) and will have as soloists Alexander Borovsky, Alexander Brailovsky, Robert Casadesus, Lukas Foss, Abram Chasins and Constance Keene, pianists; William Kroll and Richard. Burgin, violinists; A. Veissi, violist; and Jean Lefranc, flautist; and Georges Laurent, flautist; and Fernand Gillet, oboist.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

JUL 2[illegible]

Tanglewood Plans Festival Concerts

The Bach-Mozart Festival to be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., will open next Saturday evening with a program devoted largely to the works of Mozart. Alexander Brailowsky, pianist, will be soloist in the Mozart Concerto in A major, K. 488. Bach's D major Suite will open the program. The second half will be devoted to the "Jupiter" and the E-flat symphonies of Mozart.

Abram Chasins and Constance Keene, pianists, will be soloists Sunday afternoon, July 29, in the Bach concertos for two pianos in C major and C minor. Alexander Borovsky, pianist, will be soloist Saturday, August 4, in two concertos of Bach. In the second of the third pair of week-end concerts, Robert Casadesus will be soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in C minor, K. 491.

The concerts will be held indoors. The small orchestra will consist of selected members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This Clipping From
JACKSON, TENN.
SUN

JUL 22 1945

Bach Anniversary Marked On Concert

The 95th anniversary of the death of Johann Sebastian Bach will be commemorated on Saturday, July 28, when WTJS and the American Broadcasting Company present the first concert program of the 1945 Tanglewood Festival, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, at 7:30 p. m.

Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, will direct an ensemble composed of first desk men from the orchestra, and others, in Bach's "Suite in D. Major, No. 4," the opening number of the Festival. The program will be the first of three concerts to be broadcast by American from the little auditorium in the Music Center at Tanglewood.

Following the Bach work on the opening concert. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony and the same composer's E-Flat Major Symphony and A-Major Piano Concerto, No. 29 (K.488). Alexander Brailowsky, Polish pianist, will be the soloist in the latter.

American also will broadcast the Festival program of August 4 and 11

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS
JUL 23 1945

Music Festival Scheduled

The annual Bach-Mozart Music Festival, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will begin at Tanglewood, Mass., at 8:30 p. m. Saturday and continue at 3:30 p. m. the following day and on successive Saturdays and Sundays through Aug. 12.

Soloists for the season will be Alexander Borovsky, Alexander Brailowsky and Robert Casadesus, Lukas Foss and, together, Abram Chasin and Constance Keene, piano; William Kroll and Richard Burgin, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe, and Jascha Venissi and Jean LeFranc, viola.

The opening program will consist of Bach's Suite in D Major, No. 4; Mozart's Piano Concerto in A Minor, No. 29, with Mr. Brailowsky as soloist, and two Mozart symphonies, the "Jupiter" in C Major and the No. 26 in Elflat Major.

Location of the concerts is in the Berkshire Mountains, between Lenox and Stockbridge. Some season tickets still are available at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

Reprint in Memphis Commercial Appeal

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JUL 21 1945

Sound Currency

"There is no acceptable currency between nations that distrust one another except genius and goodness," says Charles Morgan, novelist and weekly essayist in the "London Times" literary supplement. His dictum receives support in the Bach-Mozart Festival, to be held at Lenox, Mass., July 28 to Aug. 12, when a native Russian who is also a great American will conduct six programs of music composed by the eighteenth-century genius of our conquered enemies. Serge Koussevitzky has chosen soloists of American and European birth or derivation, whose people have been at war twice in our generation and are now in the Old World, many of them viewing one another with distrust, to put it mildly. And yet these discords, so much older than a generation, will be dissolved, not the slightest doubt, in the Bach-Mozart programs.

It is not possible to argue from these projected concerts that peace on earth and universal good will are about to arrive and to visit us indefinitely. It is a fact, though, that music and painting and poetry have long dwelt on harmonious terms in some high place of the mind and heart, where nationalism is admitted only after it has checked its gun and the ambitions and fears that arm it to the teeth. These programs suggest also that many fancy plans for reeducating the Germans might be reduced to the simple one of sending them all to school to their eighteenth-century artistic genius, whose nationalism was of the kind that can enter the kingdom of heaven of great music and great poetry, where even internationalism is transcended in human and angelic concord, and acceptable tokens of good will are exchanged.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

JUL 22 1945

Advance reservations for the Bach-Beethoven festival by the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, indicate a complete sellout long before the two opening events, next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon. It is urged that any contemplating attending this first group, or succeeding week-end concerts, make immediate application by writing or telegraphing to Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

JUL 22 1945

AFTER a brief holiday, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, returns to his Boston Symphony musicians to open the music festival at Tanglewood, Mass., on Saturday night. The American Broadcasting company which airs all the Boston Symphony concerts will present three of the festival concerts on successive Saturdays from 7:30 to 8:30 beginning on July 28. The program of the festival this year will be devoted to Bach and Mozart and the orchestra will be composed of first desk men and other members of the Boston orchestra.

FOR THE SATURDAY

. . . program of the Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, Dr. Koussevitsky will present Alexander Brailowsky, pianist, as soloist in the Mozart Piano concerto in A Major No. 29. Other numbers on the program will be the Bach Suite in D Major No. 4 and two Mozart symphonies, in E Flat Major and C Major, "Jupiter." The second program of the series on Sunday afternoon will not be broadcast. But the soloists will be Abram Chasins and Constance Keene, pianists, who will play the Bach Concerto in C Minor for Two Pianos, No. 1 and the Bach Concerto in C Major for Two Pianos No. 2. Other numbers will be the Mozart "Paris" symphony in D Major, the overture to "Der Schauspieldirektor" and Serenade in D Major "Haffner." There will be six programs in the series.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

JUL 22 1945

WHILE THE EDITORS

. . . and critics tied the New York Philharmonic Symphony with the Boston Symphony for first place among symphony orchestras, the readers gave the New York organization first place. We believe this is because the Boston orchestra broadcasts on Saturday night and that not as many people listen to the radio on Saturday night as on Sunday afternoon (they probably won't listen as much on Sundays after the gas rationing is entirely lifted). The readers gave the Metropolitan first place in its class and Gateways to Music rated over Symphony for Youth in programs of educational character.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

JUL 22 1945

List Programs For Bach-Mozart At Tanglewood

The programs for the Bach-Mozart Festival to be given at Tanglewood in Lenox, Massachusetts, directed by Serge Koussevitzky with the assistance of the principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and soloists, are announced as follows:

First program, Saturday July 28, at 8:30 P. M. Bach, Suite in D major, No. 4. Mozart, Piano Concerto in A major (No. 29, K. 488). Soloist: Alexander Brailowsky. Mozart, Symphony in E-flat major (No. 26, K. 184). Mozart, Symphony in C major, "Jupiter" (No. 41, K. 551).

Second program, Sunday, July 29, at 3:30 P. M. Mozart Adagio and Fugue, for Strings. Mozart, Symphony in D major "Paris" (No. 31, K. 297). Bach, Concerto in C minor for Two Pianos, No. 1, Soloists: Abram Chasins, Constance Keene. Bach, Concerto in C major for Two Pianos, No. 2. Soloists: Abram Chasins, Constance Keene. Symphony in C major, No. 34.

Third program, Saturday, August 4, at 8:30 P. M. Mozart, Divertimento in B-flat major, for Strings with Two Horns (K. 287). Bach. Piano Concerto in D minor. Soloist: Alexander Borovsky. Bach, Piano Concerto in F minor. Soloist: Alexander Borovsky. Mozart, Symphony in D major ("Prague") (No. 38, K. 504).

Fourth program, Sunday, August 5, at 3:30 P. M. Bach, Suite No. 2 in B minor, for Flute and Strings. Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D major, for Orchestra with Piano, Violin and Flute. Mozart, Adagio from the String Quintet in G minor (K. 516). Mozart, Symphony in G minor (No. 40, K. 550).

Fifth program, Saturday, August 11, at 8:30 P. M. Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major, for Violin, Two Flutes and String Orchestra. Mozart. Konzertante Sinfonie for Violin and Viola (K. 364). Violin Solo: William Kroll. Viola Solo: Jascha Veissi. Bach, Two Preludes (Arranged for Strings by Pick-Mangiagalli). Mozart, Serenade in B-flat for Wind Instruments (K. 361).

Sixth program, Sunday, August 12, at 3:30 P. M. Bach, Suite No. 3 in D major. Mozart, Piano Concerto in C minor (K. 491). Soloist: Robert Casadesus. Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, for String Orchestra (with the Sinfonia from the Cantata "Christ lag in Todesbanden"). Mozart, Symphony in E-flat major (No. 39, K. 543).

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

JUL 22 1945

THE 95TH ANNIVERSARY of the death of Johann Sebastian Bach will be commemorated on Saturday, July 28, when the first concert program of the 1945 Tanglewood Festival will be presented under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. at 8:30 p. m. Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, will direct an ensemble composed of first desk men from the orchestra, and others, in Bach's "Suite In D Major, No. 4", the opening number of the festival. The program will be the first of three concerts to be broadcast over WSLS from the Little Auditorium at the Music Center in Tanglewood, Mass.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JUL 22 1945

Benjamin Britten's opera "Peter Grimes" has been repeated twelve times during the current season of the Sadler's Wells Theatre in London, and other productions will be heard next season in Basle, Paris, Stockholm and Antwerp. Four symphonic excerpts from the opera will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky next season in Boston and New York.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JUL 22 1945

Bach-Mozart Concerts to Start Saturday Night

First of the three concerts in this year's Bach-Mozart festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., home of the Berkshire Festival, to be broadcast will be heard over WFCI Saturday at 8:30 p. m.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, will lead a group of principals and other players from the Boston orchestra, and Alexander Brailowsky, pianist, will be guest artist. The latter will play Mozart's A major concerto. Bach's Suite in D Major, No. 4, will make up the rest of the program.

This year's concerts will originate from the Theatre-Concert hall at Tanglewood and not from the huge music shed as was the practice in peacetime. WFCI will carry two other concerts on succeeding Saturdays. Six in all will make up the program of the festival.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

JUL 22 1945

Musical Digest:

Koussevitzky At Tanglewood For Festival

By Eric Claudin.

NEW YORK, July 21.—Conducting an ensemble composed of first-desk men from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky will commemorate the 195th anniversary of the death of Johann Sebastian Bach in his first concert program of the Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., Saturday. The orchestra will play Bach's Suite No. 4 in D Major as the opening number of the festival.

As soloist with the orchestra Alexander Brailowsky will play Mozart's Piano Concerto in A Major, No. 29. Mozart's Symphony No. 39 in E Flat Major and the composer's Symphony No. 41 in C Major ("Jupiter") also will be heard on the concert which will be held in the little auditorium in the Music Center at Tanglewood.

The Bach-Mozart Festival will continue for three weeks.

(This program will be heard over KGKO at 7:30 p.m. Saturday.)

This Clipping From HUDSON, N. Y.
REGISTER

JUL 23 1945

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY AT TANGLEWOOD

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra will play to capacity audiences at Tanglewood again this season.

With the recent announcements of the concerts to be held this summer, the first of which will be given on July 28 and 29, tickets for this notable event were in such great demand that only a few single seats are available at present. Many enthusiasts, unable to obtain seats, will stand to hear the concerts.

In addition to the two concerts this month, four others will be given—on August 4 and 5 and August 11 and 12, and will include a number of outstanding soloists. The programmes for the six, all of which will be different, will consist of the compositions of Bach and Mozart.

The Saturday evening concerts will start at 8:30 and the Sunday afternoon concerts at 3:30.

[110]

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JUL 23 1945

New England Buses Offer Schedule For Music Festival

Hartford residents who find it impossible, because of the gas shortage or the difficulty of making reservations, to attend the weekend concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, will be able to hear at least the three Sunday afternoon concerts, July 28, Aug. 4 and 11, to which transportation will be available through the New England Transportation Co.

Buses leaving the terminal, 256 Asylum St., at 8:50 Sunday morning reach Lenox at 11:13, with local buses in Lenox on a regular schedule for the 3 p. m. concert at Tanglewood. After the concert there will be a New England bus leaving at 7:15 from Lennox, reaching Hartford at 9:40.

This Clipping From OMAHA, NEBR.
MORNING WORLD-HERALD

JUL 24 1945

Orchestra Is Gift

Boston (U.P.)—Serge Koussevitzky, famed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, got his first orchestra as a wedding present from his wife's father, one of Russia's wealthiest merchants.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

Cir. (D 47,330) (S 76,135)

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JUL 24 1945

Bus Runs Arranged For Symphony Concerts

Bus service between Hartford and Lenox, Mass., will enable many Hartford residents who are short on gas to attend at least the three Sunday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood on July 28, August 4 and 11, the New England Transportation Company announced Monday.

Buses will leave the terminal, 256 Asylum Street, at 8:50 Sunday morning and arrive in Lenox at 11:13. There they will connect with local buses to Tanglewood. After the concert there will be a New England bus leaving Lenox at 7:15, reaching Hartford at 9:40 p. m.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER

JUL 26 1945

Bach and Mozart Se For Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, Mass.—After brief holiday, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky returns to his Boston Syhphony musicians on Saturday, to open the Tanglewood Festival in the Little Auditorium here.

WJZ-American, which aired the regular season of the Boston ensemble, and its Summer "Pops," will bring to muhic lovers three concerts of the festival on successive Saturday evenings, from 8:30 to 9:30 p.m., EWT.

The programs this year will be devoted to Bach and Mozart. The orchestra will be composed of first desk men and other members of the Boston Syhphony Orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzsky will open the festival with D Major Suite, No. 4 of Bach, and Mozart's "Concerto in A Major" (K.488) for piano and orchestra. Alexander Brailowsky, pianist will be the soloist in the latter.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

Cir. (D 395,201) (Sat. 294,296)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JUL 23 1945

Soloists at Tanglewood.

The six programs for the Bach-Mozart festival to be given at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., will have the following soloists: July 28, Alexander Brailowsky, pianist; July 29, Abram Chasins and Constance Keene, pianists; August 4, Alexander Borovsky, pianist; August 5, pianist, violinist and flutist with the orchestra, playing the Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D major; August 11, William Kroll, violinist and Jascha Veissi, violist and August 12, Robert Casadesus, pianist. The orchestra comprises members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

* * *

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JUL 22 1945

Tanglewood Festival on Air

Bostonians to Commemorate 195th Anniversary of Bach's Death

Commemorating the 195th anniversary of Johann Sebastian Bach's death, the first broadcast of the 1945 Tanglewood Festival, featuring a group of musicians from the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's direction, will present Bach's Suite in D Major, No. 4, to open the program at 8:30 p. m. next Saturday over WJZ. Following the Bach work, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the "Jupiter" Symphony, E Flat Major Symphony and A Major Piano Concerto No. 29, all by Mozart. Alexander Brailowsky, Polish pianist, will be the soloist in the concerto.

A program from the sixth annual American Negro Music Festival at Walsh Stadium, St. Louis University, will be broadcast at 9:30 p. m. tomorrow over WJZ. A choir of 1,000 voices will participate, and featured guests will include Anne Brown, soprano, of "Porgy and Bess" fame; Lionel Hampton, Paul Muni, the Deep River Boys and Graham Jackson, the late President Roosevelt's favorite musician.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JUL 26 1945

Bus Service to Tanglewood Concerts

Transportation to the three Sunday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Mass., will be available through the Arrow Bus Line, with Arrow buses leaving the New England Bus terminal at 256 Asylum St. Sunday mornings at 8:50.

Reaching Lenox at 11:13, these connect with local buses on a regular schedule for the 3:30 p. m. concert at Tanglewood. After the concert Arrow buses leave Lenox at 7:15 and 10:50 p. m. and reach Hartford at 9:40 p. m. Sunday and 1:15 a. m. Monday.

Although reservations are not necessary, Rene Dupuis, manager of the Arrow Line, says it is advisable to call 5-7306 or 5-8579 as an extra bus may be put on to meet the demand.

The Tanglewood concerts are being held on three Saturday evenings at 8:30 and three Sunday afternoons at 3:30 (July 28-29, Aug. 4-5, and Aug. 11-12).

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

JUL 24 1945

Words and Music

The Bostonians at Tanglewood Will Play Bach and Mozart

By Harriett Johnson

If you like symphonic music you'll most likely take it standing as well as sitting in the concert hall; you'll also take it, especially during the summer, in the park, at the stadium, on the beach, well almost any place where you can hear a tune to make you tingle combined with a pleasant breeze and some country scenery.

Since the war some of the most tempting events of this nature have been put on the shelf for the duration. Others, however, are sturdily putting up a front, even if it's not quite as elaborate or glamorous a one as before Pearl Harbor.

Among the latter is the Berkshire Symphonic Festival played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Mass. For eight summers (through 1941), thousands of people from all over the country flocked to Lenox, Pittsfield, Stockbridge and other surrounding towns to be near Euterpe's sweet sounds and drink them in. The initial part of their visit, however, probably would not be with the Muse. More likely, many of them would be ringing doorbells trying to find a bed.

I'm discovering that even if you're planning on attending its smaller offspring, the Bach-Mozart Festival, scheduled to begin this coming weekend, it's not so easy to find a place to sleep. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have built up a loyal and devoted following who apparently had put in their reservations months in advance.

Brailowsky Soloist

Don't be discouraged, however, but follow your inspiration if you're so inclined, and this is what you'll get. The concerts, all devoted to the music of Bach and Mozart, are to be held over three successive weekends beginning with this Saturday and Sunday. They are to take place in the theatre-concert hall at Tanglewood which seats 1,150 and therefore is ideal for performances of 18th Century music. It's also comforting to realize in these days of rain and more rain, that even if it pours, you'll be better protected than you would have been in the mammoth "shed" in the old days of the bigger scale festival. As might be expected, Dr. Koussevitsky is to conduct all performances.

For each series there will be two concerts: Saturday at 8:30, Sunday at 3:30. Ticket information may be secured by writing to the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston; the information bureau, Chamber of Commerce, Great Barrington; Curtis Hotel, Lenox; England Brothers, Pittsfield; the Blue Bird Shop, Stockbridge, or the ticket office at Tanglewood.

Soloists for the first series include Alexander Brailowsky, pianist, who will play the piano Concerto in A Major (No. 29, K. 488) by Mozart, on Saturday. Abram Chasins and Constance Keene, on Sunday, are to perform two Bach Concertos for two pianos; No. 1 in C minor, and No. 2 in C Major. Music to be performed for the rest of the first series as follows:

Saturday, Bach Suite in D Major, No. 4; Mozart, Symphony in E flat Major (No. 26, K. 184); Mozart Symphony in C Major, the "Jupiter," No. 41, K. 551.

Sunday, Mozart Symphony in D Major, the "Paris" (No. 31, K. 297); Mozart Overture to "Der Schauspieldirektor," and Serenade in D Major, the "Haffner" (K. 250).

Each Week End Different

Different works are to be performed each week end. Highlights of the Aug. 4-5 series are: Alexander Borovsky, pianist, a soloist in two Bach Concertos, one in D minor, another in F minor; the Mozart Symphony (No. 40, K. 550), and the Bach "Brandenberg Concerto No. 5, in D Major for Orchestra with piano, violin and flute."

During the Aug. 11-12 series William Kroll, violinist, and Jascha Veissi, violinist, are to play the Mozart "Konzertante Sinfonie for viola, K. 364." on Saturday. On Sunday, at the final concert, Robert Casadesus is to perform the Mozart Piano Concerto in C Minor (K. 491). Bach Brandenburg Concertos are to be performed at both of these last week-nd concerts.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

JUL 25 1945

Bus Service to Tanglewood For Six Concerts Approved

Operation of busses from Pittsfield to Tanglewood for the six Saturday night and Sunday afternoon Bach-Mozart festival concerts, beginning this Saturday, has been approved by the Office of Defense Transportation, Thomas E. MacDonald, manager of the Berkshire Street Railway, announced today.

Busses will leave Park Square Saturday nights at 7.30 and Sunday afternoons at 2.30, returning immediately after the concerts. The round-trip fare will be 40 cents —from Lenox, 20 cents.

Conference Gets Credit

Mr. MacDonald said much credit for securing the bus service for the concerts was due the Berkshire Hills Conference whose public relations director, Haydn Mason, conferred with Office of Defense Transportation officials in New York yesterday.

The ODT had twice refused the street railway's application for operating special busses on the mile and one-quarter Tanglewood run off regular routes. It had also refused the Boston Symphony Orchestra's similar request. Mr. Mason phoned Thomas J. Kelly, Conference vice-president in New York and he visited ODT officials, who gave no assurance. Mr. Mason then went to New York armed with facts and visited the ODT office with Mr Kelly.

The railway's case was built on the fact that, in 1942, it voluntarily suspended special-bus operation to Tanglewood because of the acute gasoline shortage. In 1943 an ODT regulation banned special busses on routes not operated in 1942. Because of its "voluntary patriotic suspension" in the year previous, therefore, the Berkshire Street Railway was prohibited running busses to Tanglewood, as explained by Mr. Mason. Bus lines which had not suspended seasonal operations in 1942 were unhampered.

The ODT officials with whom negotiations were conducted were Alvin S. McEvoy, regional director of the highway transportationn department and Walter T. Edgerton, transportation specialist.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

JUL 25 1945

Gardens at Tanglewood Beautified for Festival

Shortage of Help Fails To Curtail Accomplishments Of Ward Gaston, Superintendent

T[illegible] y for [illegible] who [illegible] Fes- [illegible] ky and [illegible] Orchestra [illegible] The [illegible] hedges [illegible]

[illegible] shor- [illegible] first in the [illegible] summer home of [illegible] lovelier than e[illegible] med. "They [illegible] would under- [illegible] have things [illegible] Ward J. Gaston, Tanglewood superintendent [illegible] yesterday, "but [illegible] been in [illegible] to be in shape [illegible]"

Th[illegible] attended con- [illegible] will notice [illegible] pines on either side of the so-called "Hawthorne Pines" leading from the main entrance to the theatre-concert hall where the orchestra will play. Mr. Gaston set out this spring 500 trees, to be ready to take the place of the famous pines, of whose connection with Hawthorne, if any, he has never heard.

The last flower bed remaining from the days when the estate was private has been sodded over, making the garden a completely green one. The area north of the auditorium has also been seeded, extending the lawn where the overflow audience may sit.

To Place Canopy

Between [illegible] and Saturday n[illegible] a canopy [illegible] feet by 60, [illegible] season, will be stretched in front of the hall for the overflow audience, and another will cover the path from the driveway and box office. Benches will be placed under the canopy and opposite the side doors for early comers with general admission.

The work is now done by two men and the superintendent, where formerly four or five men were employed. They have trimmed three-eighths of a mile of hemlock hedge 9 feet high, 12 feet wide and 50 years old, a smaller hedge only 38 years old and 78 hemlock trees.

For the first time since the use of the large shed was suspended the tower in the parking field at the left of the drive-way will be lighted. That space will be used for parking as the field on the right is too wet this year.

Many Tourists

Scores of tourists visit Tanglewood every day, stroll about the gardens and lawns and admire the view looking over Stockbridge Bowl. As a party of eight left yesterday one member was heard to remark to the others, "The place is so beautiful that it is a privilege even to see it."

One feature of the estate, not officially connected with it, is Mr. Gaston's private vegetable garden, which he covers with sand to save the effort of weeding. When the plants are up and of fair size, he sprinkles sand over the soil, as he says he hasn't time to weed in the Festival season. In the fall he plows the sand under. He is especially proud of 300 tomato plants of nine varieties, some of which are now bearing.

Tickets for the concerts to be held for the next three Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons are on sale at England Brothers; the Curtis Hotel, Lenox; the Blue Bird Sport Shop, Stockbridge; the Chamber of Commerce booth, Great Barrington. Admission to the grounds will be sold the day of the concerts at the box office on the grounds.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 68,326) (S 67,016)
This Clipping From
DAYTON, O.
NEWS

JUL 25 1945

Free Music?

Sergei Koussevitzky with his music plan for conquered Germany complicates anew our already painfully complex life; yet he may have something there.

The orchestra conductor has the idea that Richard Wagner had more to do, perhaps, than Mein Kampf with stirring up the devil's brew which Hitler's Germany was. Was not Hitler forever taking time out to fill up at the well of Wagner that megalomania which lay behind his power? Had not all Germany been soaked for two generations in the Siegfried stuff and the Valkyrie rides which blew the bubbles for the German gods and set the German ego soaring into dreams of German might? Some men, when they want the grand feeling of ruling all the world, hunt up their favorite moonshine, drink it hot. The Germans bought a ticket to the concert and on the wings of Richard Wagner annexed the earth, moon and stars.

Now while the conquered Germans are being reeducated into respectable world citizens, our great musician says, we must bar them from their Wagner and from all other music of the sort that sets men wild. We had to make our Indians cease their war chants. That led too much to war. Let now the Germans be barred from the intoxication of the war music on which they have been fed.

All right! Let the Germans be fed hereafter on the Moonlight Sonata and Papa Haydn's harmless jingles and Mendelssohn's wedding march—yes, make it Mendelssohn to rub it in—and Schubert's quieting melodies (not his March Militaire). Lull the Germans as you please. They have no liberty, no rights. But how, then, with ourselves?

Shall we subject ourselves to the Siegfried stuff out of which the wars are made? How about those Sousa marches which tingle us to our toes, make us want to fight our weight in wildcats, march right up to the cannon's mouth?

Free speech! Free press! Free religion! Listen to the fire-eater orator, read the subversive editor, tolerate the alien faith; but no free music, no subversive jazz?

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

JUL 27 1945

Concertmaster for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open its festival at Tanglewood this week end, is Richard Burgin, upper left. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, is shown in the garden of his estate, center, and at the right is Alexander Brailovsky, soloist for tomorrow evening's concert. Mr. Brailovsky will play Mozart's Piano Concerto in A Major. The program tomorrow is the first of six to be given on three consecutive week ends.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

JUL 25 1945

Writes Article On Tanglewood For Magazine

A history of the Berkshire Music Festival by Joseph Franz, Festival trustee and architect of the Tanglewood Music Shed, appears in the May-June issue of "The Southwestern Musician" published in Denton, Texas.

The idea, Mr. Franz' article reads, was conceived in the summer of 1934 by Dr. Henry Hadley, a famous conductor and composer. "He was perhaps inspired by the outstanding cultural development of [illegible] such associations for many years."

When a contact was suggested to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky the Festival greatly interested him. The [illegible] reminded him of Russia when he toured with his orchestra by boat along the Volga River and gave performances in [illegible] at nominal prices [illegible].

At the [illegible] Festival in 1941, [illegible] reached an all-time [illegible], Mr. Franz writes. [illegible] 1942 and 1943 the Festival was [illegible] because of war restrictions but last year Dr. Koussevitzky presented a Festival in the [illegible] house with a curtailed [illegible]

MILLERTON, N.Y.
NEWS
7/26/45

Concert Tickets May Be Purchased At Tanglewood

A Canopy Will Be Erected To Protect Overflow Audience From Weather; Benches For Early-Comers

Admission tickets will be sold at Tanglewood for the six concerts of the Bach-Mozart Festival that Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the next three weekends. Music lovers may hear 40 principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with guest soloists, from the grounds at Tanglewood outside the opera-concert hall.

A canopy will be erected north of the hall to protect the overflow audience from the weather, and another will cover the gravel walk from the box office to the auditorium. Benches will be placed under the canopy and opposite the side-doors for early comers.

The orchestra will arrive in Lenox, Stockbridge and surrounding towns on Thursday in order to rehearse before the opening concert.

Keen interest is shown in the Festival by permanent and summer members of the Berkshires and by hundreds of persons from out of town. The principal hotels in the vicinity are already filled for the three weekends, and many private homes will take guests.

Tickets for the preferred section and the stage are on sale at Symphony Hall, Boston; England Brothers, Pittsfield; the Curtis Hotel, Lenox; the Blue Bird Sport Shop, Stockbridge; the Chamber of Commerce Information Booth, Great Barrington. Admission to the grounds will be sold at the box-office the days of the concerts.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 38,755)
This Clipping From
MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE

JUL 27 1945

Koussevitzky Conducting First Tanglewood Broadcast Tomorrow

The opening broadcast of the Tanglewood Festival is to be heard tomorrow over CBF and the American Broadcasting Company network from the Little Auditorium in Tanglewood, Mass. It will be heard at 8.30 p.m., with the other two broadcasts from the festival screduled for the same period on successive week-ends.

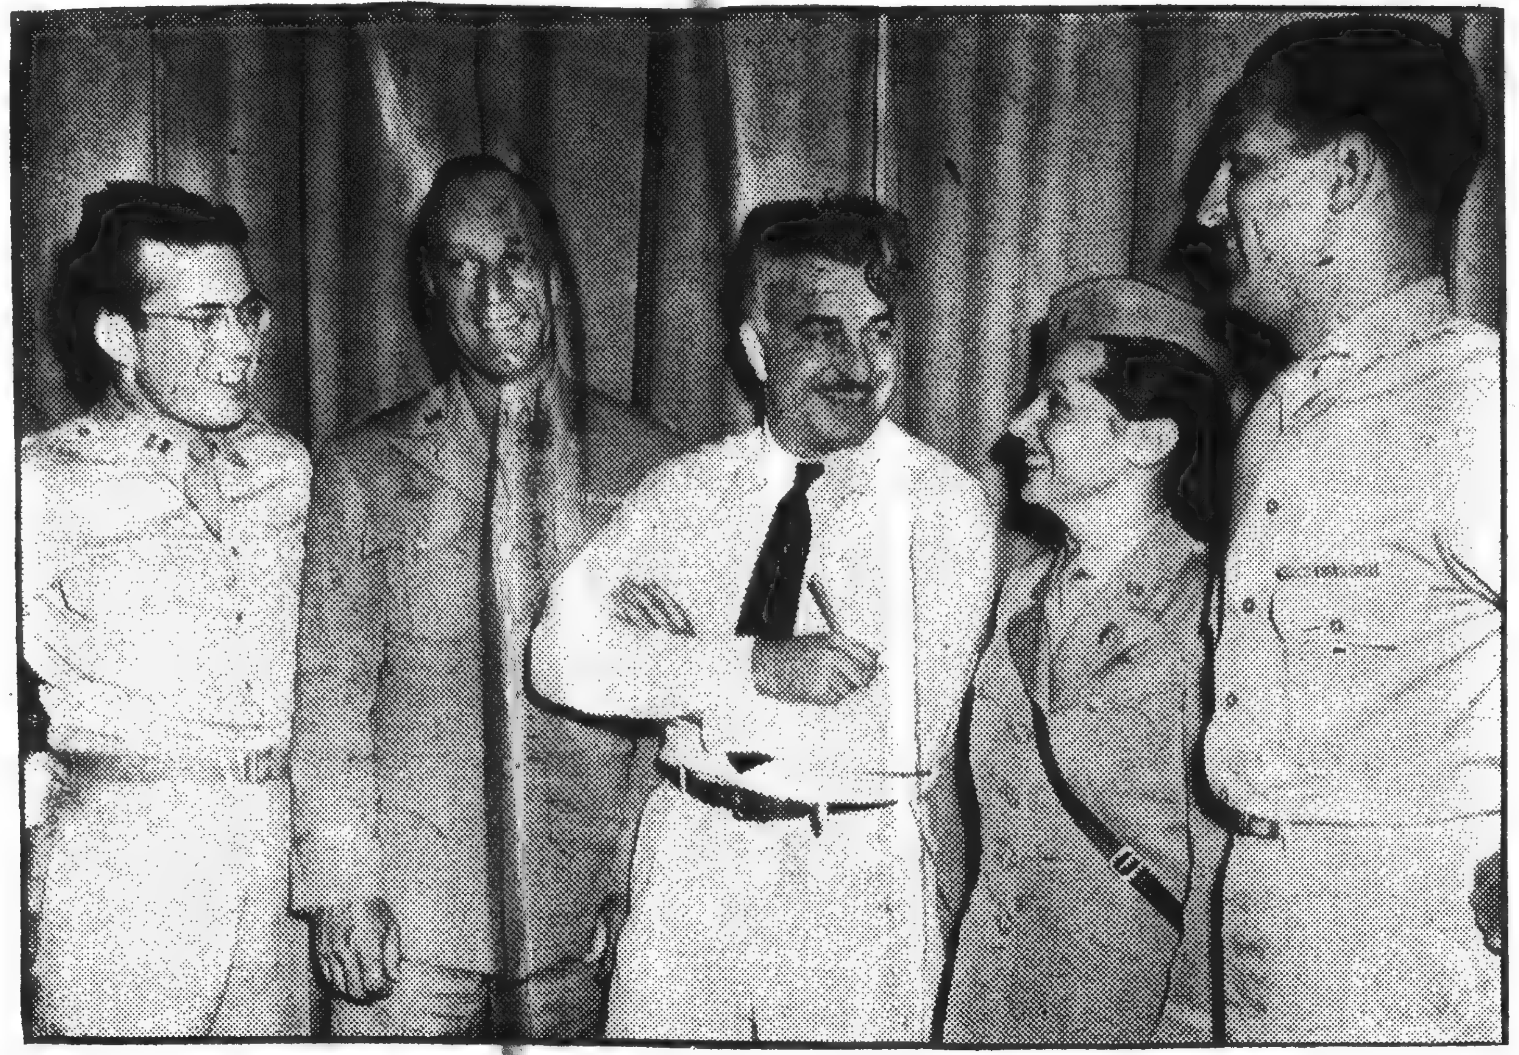
Dr. Serge Koussevitzky rejoins the musicians of the Boston Symphony for the festival, the orchestra at Tanglewood being made up of first desk men and other members of the regular Boston aggregation.

The Tanglewood programs this year are devoted to Bach and Mozart, Dr. Koussevitzky opens it with the D Major Suite, No. 4 of Bach and Mozart's Concerto in A Major for piano and orchestra. Alexander Brailowsky, noted pianist, will be the soloist in the Mozart work

Oliver Daniel, producer of the Boston Symphony broadcasts, and Gene Hamilton, announcer for them, will again be coupled to bring listeners the Tanglewood Festival programs.

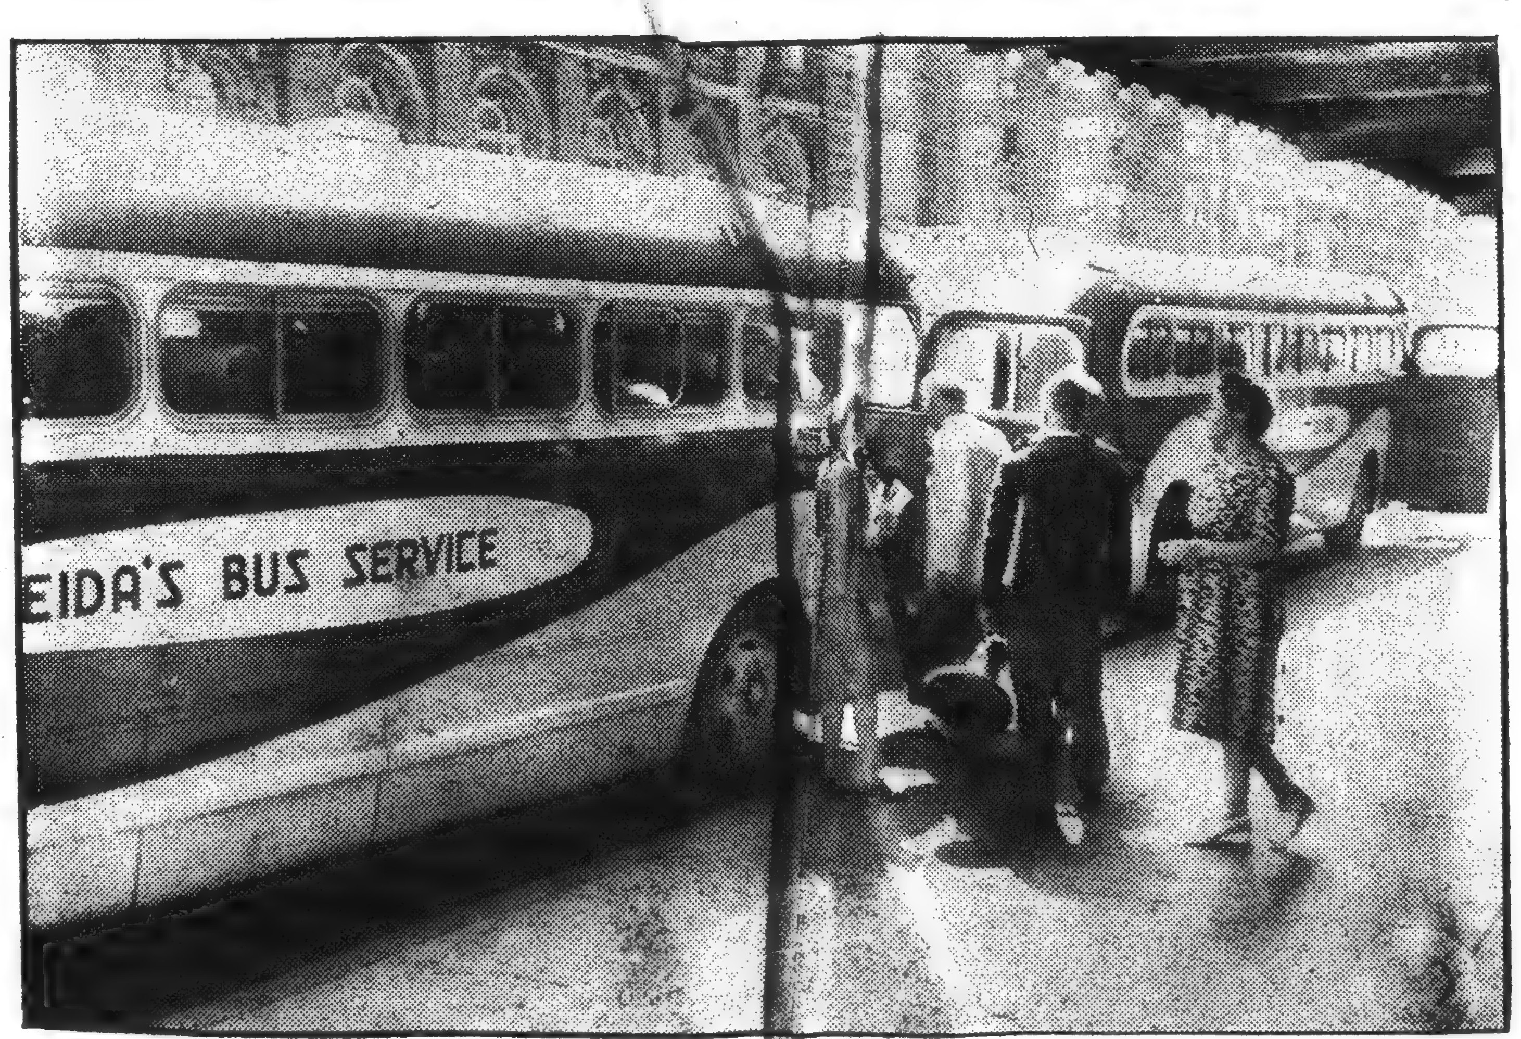
INFORMATION OBSCURED

From Army paper – "Minute Man" – July 2[illegible] 194[illegible]



Shown backstage with Arthur Fiedler, left to right, Captain Garland Shell, Entertainment Officer, First Service Command; Colonel Holland Williamson, Commanding Officer, Convalescent Hospital; Mr. Fiedler, [illegible] Rima Gurvitz, and Captain Donel J. Lynch, both of the Special Services Section, Convalscent Hospital.

Arthur Fielder, world famous conductor of the Boston Pops Orchestra, conducts opening number of the one hour and fifteen minute concert for four thousand convalescent patients jammed in the camp arena.



Commercial buses were chartered by Special Services, Convalescent Hospital, to transport members of orchestra to Camp Edwards. Miss Ruth Evans, Entertainment Coordinator for Red Cross, helps check passengers.

ARTHUR [illegible]DLER [illegible] BOSTON [illegible]PS CON[illegible] TO CAM[illegible] EDWA[illegible]

It was great d[illegible]c at Camp Edw[illegible] week when thur F[illegible] his entire Bost[illegible] Orchestra st[illegible] a Fid[illegible] patients of the [illegible] and Conval[illegible] Ho[illegible]

First the orchestra [illegible]vided into 12 groups which went fo[illegible] ward in the Hospital ent[illegible] to attend the [illegible]cert in the C[illegible]rea.

....At 3.00 Arthur [illegible] lifted his bat[illegible] gin another [illegible]ation [illegible] famous Bost[illegible] Concerts, which [illegible] are [illegible]d from Bost[illegible]tural Symph[illegible] This [illegible] however, th[illegible]mance was in [illegible]s Spo[illegible]ena, Camp [illegible] where 4,000 [illegible]ded [illegible]red to hear [illegible]sody in Blue," [illegible] "O[illegible]ma" and ot[illegible] favorites played [illegible]mp[illegible] style of th[illegible] Pops.

Mr. Fiedle[illegible]ous [illegible]encores wh[illegible] virtually demanded [illegible]dero[illegible]plause inte[illegible] with whistles and [illegible] Supp[illegible]or the me[illegible] the orchestra wa[illegible]in ca[illegible] and a poli[illegible] led them back to [illegible]mpho[illegible] Hall for th[illegible]lar evening perfo[illegible]

A graphic s[illegible] the a[illegible]joining pi[illegible]

[113]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

1945,

HUR LER BRINGS OSTON S CONCERT TO CAM EDWARDS

It was a great d usic at Camp Edwards last eek when Arthur F d his entire Boston Pops rchestra staged a Fi for patients of the General Convalescent Ho

First the orche divided into 12 concert ups which went f d to ward in the General pital entertaining ble to attend the big con in the Camp Are

···At 3.00 P.M. A dler lifted his baton to beanother of the in ally famous Boston Pops certs, which nor heard from Boston's cull Symphony Hall ime, however, the perfornce was in the spa ts Arena, Camp Edwards, ere 4,000 battle gathered to hear "Rhapy in Blue," tunes klahoma" and other G. I. rites played in th arable style of the Boston s.

Mr. Fiedler wa with encores which were ally demanded l ous applause interspersed whistles and c pper for the members of orchestra was pr camp and a police escort them back to Bo phony Hall for their regu-evening perform

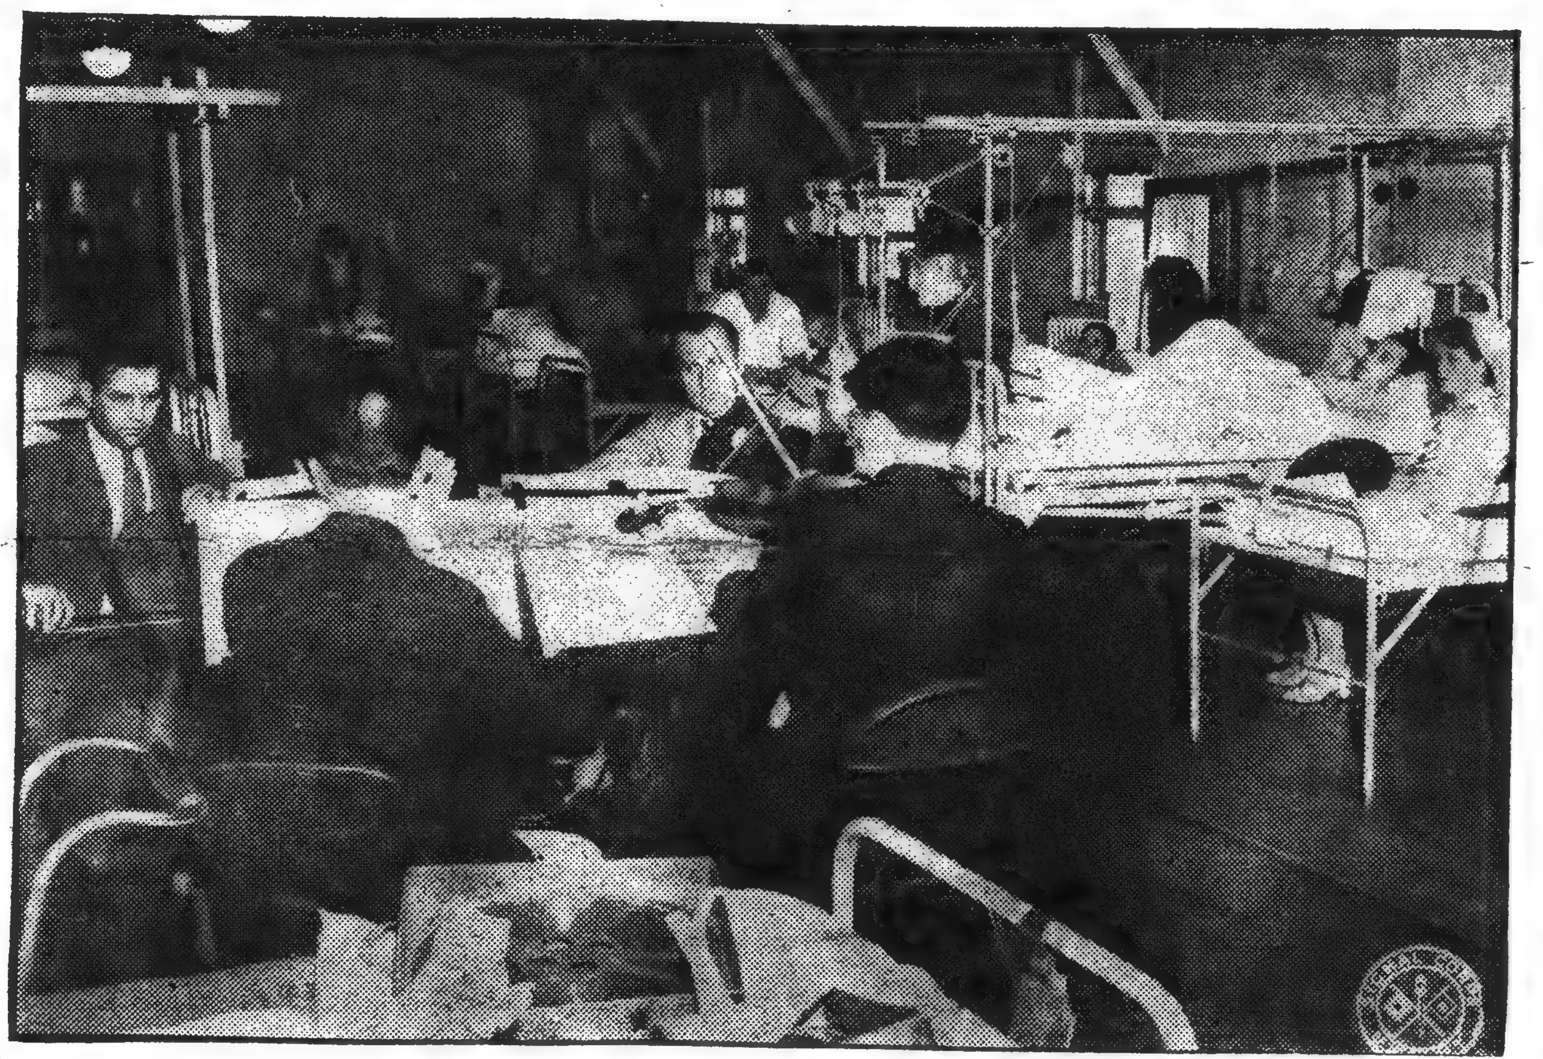
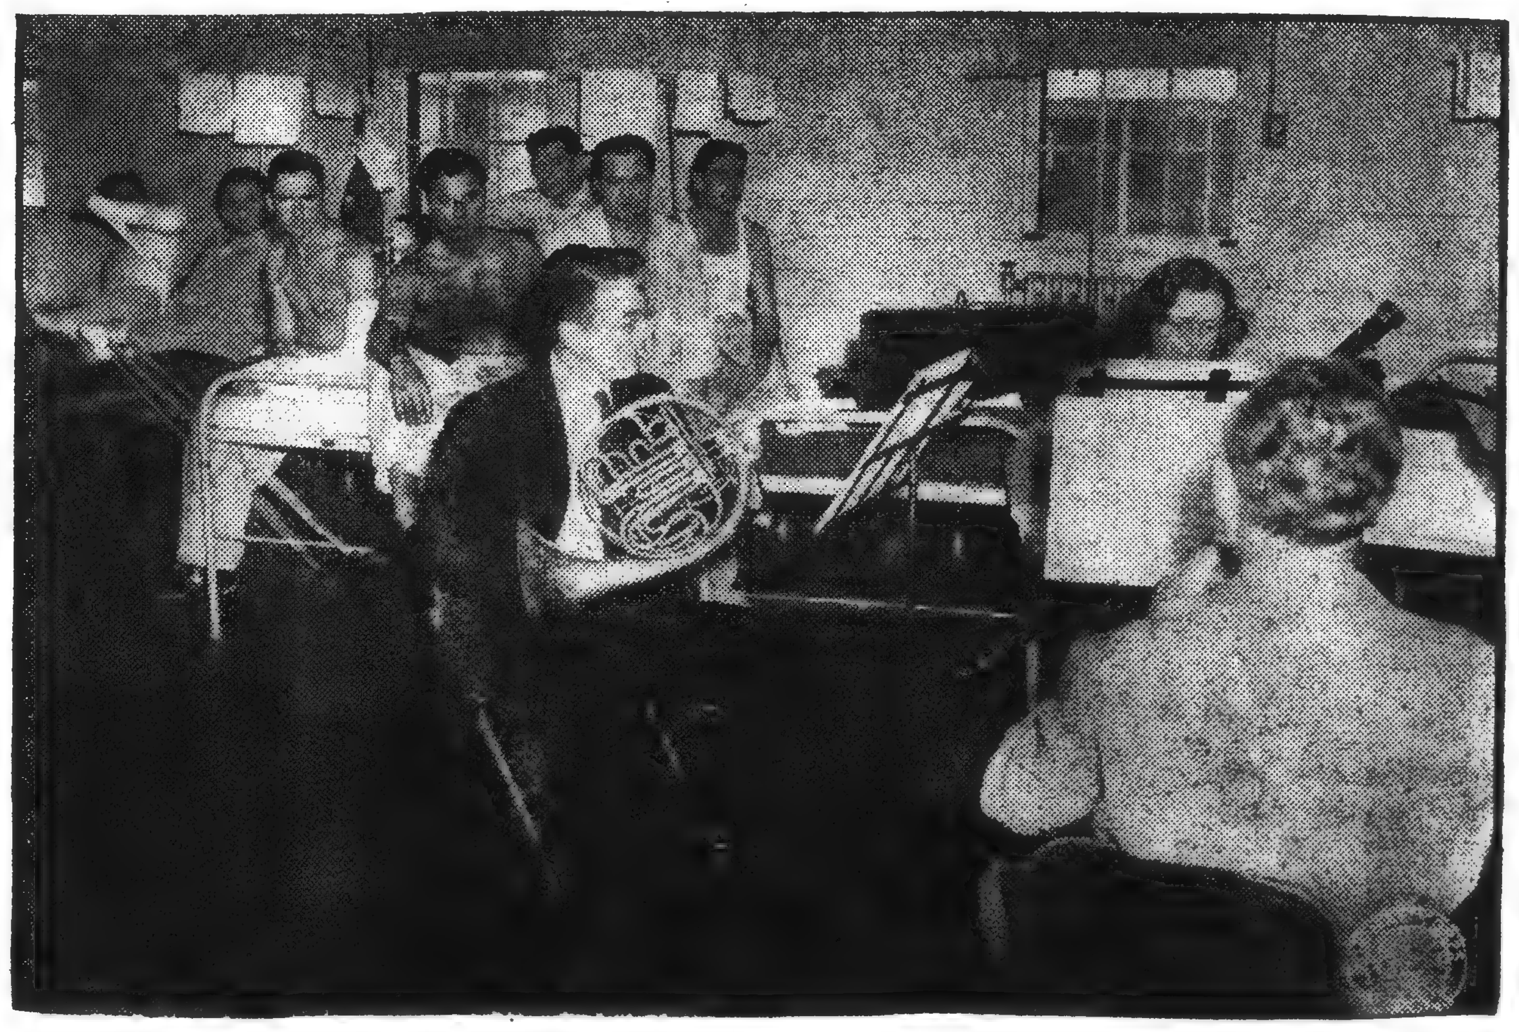
A graphic stor the adjoining pictures.

When one of the commercial buses broke down en route, the First Service Command shuttle bus was hailed and boarded by members of the orchestra and Mr. Rosario Mazzeo, Personnel Manager, who so efficiently planned the details of the trip.



Small groups of musicians went into the wards at the General Hospital to play for patients unable to attend the big concert in arena.



The French Horn expert goes into the wards at the General Hospital to display his technique.

[114]

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

JUL 27 1945

Massachusetts Music Festival Draws Visitors

BY JUDITH CASS

CHICAGOANS who are in and near Pittsfield, Mass., for the summer are looking forward to three week-ends of music beginning tomorrow night when a Bach and Mozart six concert festival will be held at Tanglewood. The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and assisted by Alexander Brailowsky, pianist, will provide the musical fare. Dr. Koussevitzky celebrated his 71st birthday anniversary yesterday at a tea in his summer home, Seranak, given by his niece, Miss Olga Naumoff.

Among those who have taken festival tickets are Mrs. Frederic S. Coolidge, Mrs. W. Rockwood Gibbs, Mrs. James Ransom Walker, Mrs David Shields Cook, Mr. and Mrs. Harry C. Holloway, the John L. Seniors, and Albert Spalding, violinist, and Mrs. Spalding, who have many friends in Chicago. The John Alden Carpenters, who are summering in their Beverly Cove, Mass., home, will attend this week-end's concerts. Another festival guest is Mme. Giovanni Cardelli of New York, a former Chicagoan, who is visiting the William Felton Barretts in North Egremont, Mass.

Mrs. Coolidge is the former Elizabeth Sprague of Chicago and known as "the fairy godmother to chamber music." Her annual music festivals in the Temple of Music on South Mountain have been discontinued for the duration, however.

The site of the approaching festival, Tanglewood, was a gift in 1937 to the Boston Symphony of Mrs. Andrew Hopewell Hepburn of Concord, Mass., and her aunt, the late Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan. War has not dimmed the scenic charm of Tanglewood.

This Clipping From LOUISVILLE, KY.
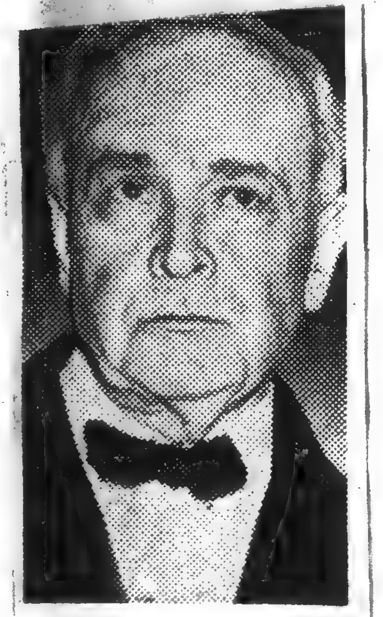
TIMES

JUL 28 1945



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducts Bach's D-Major Suite, Mozart's A-Major Concerto at the Tanglewood Festival, 7:30 p.m. WINN.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
TIMES

JUL 29 1945

Ravel: "Daphnis and Chloe" second suite. Conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for Victor. This two-disk issue is one of the recent recordings and one of Koussevitzky's showpieces. The orchestra plays it with that limpid clarity and elegance that skill and long familiarity bring.

This Clipping From WOODLAND, CALIF.
DEMOCRAT

JUL 27 1945

This Clipping From COLUSA, CAL.
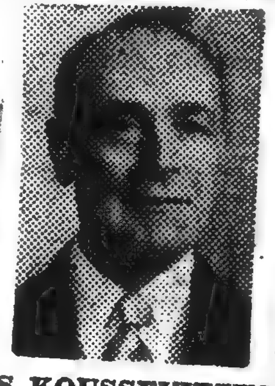
SUN-HERALD

JUL 27 1945

THE BACH-MOZART FESTIVAL at Tanglewood, Massachusetts, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be broadcast on three successive Saturdays over KFBK at 5:30 o'clock starting tomorrow. Alexander Brailowsky, pianist, will be the soloist in a performance of Mozart's A Major Concerto.



S. KOUSSEVITZKY

This Clipping From
THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

* * *

After a brief holiday, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky returns to his Boston Symphony musicians tomorrow to open the "Tanglewood Festival" in the little auditorium in Tanglewood, Massachusetts. The concert, and the two following, will be broadcast over KGO at 5:30 p.m.

Earlier, Antal Dorati will lead the American Symphony Orchestra in the first North American performance of Holzmann's "Cantigas de Edad de Oro" in the Saturday Symphony, heard at 1 p.m. over KGO.

* * *

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JUL 28 1945

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JUL 28 1945

Tanglewood Concerts Have Bus Service

For the first time since the Berkshire Symphonic Festival of 1941 there will be bus service to Tanglewood from Pittsfield and Lenox. The ODT has sanctioned the running of buses to the Bach-Mozart Festival in time for concerts conducted by Serge Koussevitzky on the next three weekends. The buses will leave the Park in the center of Pittsfield at 7:30 Saturday evenings and 2:30 Sunday afternoons, stopping in Lenox to pick up passengers for the Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

As all reserved seats have been sold for the coming week end, only admission tickets will be available at the box office on the days of the concerts.

PEORIA, ILL.
STAR

JUL 28 1945

TANGLEWOOD CONCERT, first of a series of three such concerts featuring light summer music, will be heard at 7:30 p. m. today, WLS. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be conductor.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

JUL 29 1945

THE SATURDAY NIGHT . . . program of the annual Bach-Mozart festival at Tanglewood, Mass., will be broadcast over ABC at 7:30. Dr. Koussevitsky will conduct the program with Alexander Borovsky, piano soloist. The members are Mozart's "Divertimento in B Flat Major; two Bach Piano concerti, D Minor and F Minor and Mozart's Symphony in D Major.

This Clipping From
JACKSON, TENN.
SUN

JUL 28 1945

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky will be on the podium for the opening concert of the annual Tanglewood Festival broadcast next Saturday at 7:30 over WTJS.

PORTLAND, OREGON
OREGONIAN

JUL 28 1945

Tanglewood Festival

After a brief holiday, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky returns to his Boston Symphony musicians today at 5:30 on KEX to open the Tanglewood Festival in the little auditorium in Tanglewood, Mass. The programs this year will be devoted to Bach and Mozart. The orchestra will be composed of first desk men and other members of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky will open the Festival with the "D Major Suite, No. 4" of Bach, and Mozart's "Concerto in A Major (K. 488) for Piano and Orchestra." Alexander Brailowsky, pianist, will be the soloist in the latter.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JUL 28 1945

Tanglewood Lists Concert Programs

The Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., which opens tonight, continues with a second program tomorrow afternoon and four programs on the two Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons to follow (Aug. 4-5, Aug. 11-12). Serge Koussevitzky, conducting a chamber orchestra of Boston Symphony players, will present the following program this evening at 8:30:

Bach, Suite in D major, No. 4; Mozart, Piano Concerto in A major (No. 29, K 488) soloist Alexander Brailowsky; Mozart, Symphony in E flat major, (No. 26, K 184); and Symphony in C major, "Jupiter."

The following program will be presented tomorrow afternoon at 3:30:

Mozart, Symphony in D major, "Paris;" Bach, Concerto in C minor for Two Pianos, Nos. 1 and 2, soloists, Abraham Chasins and Constance Keene; Mozart, Adagio and Fugue for Strings and Adagio from the G minor Quintet; and Symphony in C major, No. 34.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

JUL 29 1945

ACE CONDUCTOR Serge Koussevitzky will appear here next season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a single concert under Pittsburgh Orchestra Association auspices.

This Clipping From
JACKSON, TENN.
SUN

JUL 28 1945

Schedule Bach And Mozart Works For Tanglewood Festival

Programs for the annual Tanglewood Festival, to be broadcast over WTJS-American on July 28, August 4, and August 11, from 7:30 to 8:30 p. m., have been announced by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will return to his Boston Symphony musicians for the special musical event.

From the instrumental music of Bach, Dr. Koussevitzky has selected the Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 5, the Suites, No. 2 in B Minor, No. 3, in D Major, and No. 4, in D Major. The piano concertos in D. Minor and F Minor and the two-piano concertos in C Minor and C Major also are listed.

Mozart is represented by two piano concertos, the "Konzertante Sinfonie" for violin and viola, the "Haffner" Serenade, the B Flat "Divertimento" for strings and two horns, the "Serenade" in B Flat, the Adagio and Fugue for strings, Symphonies No. 26 in E Flat, the "Prague" in D Major, "Paris" in D Major, the E Flat, G Minor and C Major ("Jupiter"), and the Overture to "Der Schauspieldirektor."

American, which broadcast the winter season by the Boston Symphony, has continued the summer activities of the ensemble.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

JUL 28 1945

Legislature might decide.

Tanglewood Concerts Will Open Today

The first concert of the season at Tanglewood will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this evening at 8.30 under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The program follows:

BACH .... Suite in D major, No. 4
MOZART ... Piano Concerto in A major (No. 29, K. 488)
Soloist: Alexander Brailovsky

MOZART .... Symphony in E-flat major (No. 26, K. 184)
MOZART..Symphony in C major "Jupiter" (No. 41, K. 551)

The second concert will be given Sunday afternoon at 3.30. The program will be as follows:

MOZART...Symphony in D major "Paris" (No. 31, K. 297)
BACH ..... Concerto in C minor for Two Pianos, No. 1
Soloist: Abram Chasins, Constance Keene

BACH .... Concerto in C major for Two Pianos, No. 2
Soloists: Abram Chasins, Constance Keene
MOZART....Overture to "Der Schauspieldirektor" (K. 486)
MOZART..Serenade in D major "Haffner" (K. 250)

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

JUL ... 45

Playing Bach's Concerto for for piano in D Minor, Alexander Borovsky will be soloist Saturday for the second concert of the Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, Mass. Serge Koussevitsky will open the program with Mozart's Divertimento No. 15 B Flat Major for strings and two horns.

(This program will be heard over KRLD at 7:30 p.m. Saturday.)

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JUL 29 1945

TANGLEWOOD OPENS 2D WARTIME FETE

Koussevitzky Is Conductor as Berkshire Music Festival Again Attracts Throng

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., July 28—The second wartime Berkshire Music Festival began at Tanglewood this evening, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting the principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first of six programs, consisting exclusively of the music of Bach and Mozart.

These events, inaugurated last year by Dr. Koussevitzky to provide this community with good music in spite of wartime conditions, are again planned on a smaller scale than the pre-war festivals. They are being held in the relatively small theatre concert hall which seats 1,152, though 250 additional patrons can be accommodated on the stage. Other listeners, purchasing general admissions, hear the concert from a large tent just outside the hall.

Despite the physical limitations of the present festival, it is obvious that tremendous musical interest has been aroused in these concerts. Concerts are being held Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons of each of three consecutive week-ends, and the management reports that all tickets already have been sold.

The orchestra includes some forty players, and Dr. Koussevitzky has engaged distinguished soloists for the concerts. Alexander Brailowsky was soloist for this evening, playing Mozart's A major piano concerto (K. 488). The orchestral works on the program were Bach's suite in D major, No. 4, and Mozart's symphonies in E flat major (K. 184) and C major (K. 551), the "Jupiter."

Other artists to be heard include Abram Chasins and Constance Keene, duo-pianists; Alexander Borovsky and Robert Casadesus, pianists; William Kroll, violinist, and Jascha Veissi, violist. Major orchestral works scheduled for performance on future programs include the "Paris," "Prague," G minor (K. 550) and E flat (K. 543) symphonies of Mozart and the Bach Brandenburg Concerti Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5. Mr. Casadesus' vehicle will be the Mozart C minor piano concerto (K. 491), which he will play at the final concert of the series on Aug. 12, while Mr. Borovsky will play the piano concerti in D minor and E minor of Bach next Saturday.

This Clipping From
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS

JUL 28 1945

WORCESTER, M
GRAM

JUL 29 1945

Berkshir
Opens;

By RAYMOND

LENOX, July 2
vitzky tonight raised
Symphony Orchestra and called to attentio music. Alexander B was soloist.

There was what h
the traditional Berks tival downpour. And there was an overflo ence which was rew some eloquently play by Bach and Mozart.
concert was not given i but in the opera ho seats about 1200. All space on the stage was and several hundred music from a large ca ered area at the entra

Roof Was Sounding

Even when the roo an annoying sounding the rain the audience with profound attenti too, has become trad Tanglewood. There is about these veradnt, grounds that seems t
it was on this same e
Hawthorne wrote his Seven Gables," and th forgetting the unbelie that Koussevitzky from his orchestra of dents here in 1941.

Alexander Brailowsk
the spotlight with the which is saying a g
Koussevitzky, imma c groomed, genial, and tent upon his task, is w by the Berkshire audi

Never Same Pia

We are among the ones who have heard B play many times. He the same pianist. His admittedly Chopin and every last bar of that piano works from mem most any score tech otherwise, of the 19th centuries is his next f night he played Moza
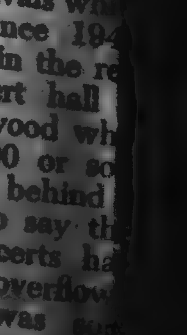
"Concerto in A Major"
ect.

Koussevitzk
Performa

By ROBERT A. HAG
PM's Music Critic



Kousse

LENOX, Mass., July first of three pairs of wee certs devoted exclusively works of Bach and Mo presented Saturday eve
Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood by Serge Koussevitzky and the principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Alexander Brailowsky was Saturday's soloist, playing the solo part of the Mozart A-major Piano C
(K.488), and on Sunday,
Chasins and Constance Kee heard in the Bach C-major minor concertos for two pia

Like the two weekends
Mozart programs offered la mer, the present series is d as a wartime substitute famous and larger-scaled B Summer music festivals whi been suspended since 194 concerts are given in the re small theater-concert hall grounds at Tanglewood wh seat 1150, with 200 or so chairs on the stage behind chestra. Needless to say th plete series of concerts ha sold out, and the overflow commodated—and was protected from Saturday downpour—by a large tent just outside the hall.

It is gratifying to find t remarkably high performance ards of former festivals her maintained, and in many r surpassed, by Saturday's an day's concerts. This, of cours be attributed to the caliber ceptional skill of the 40-o strumentalists who make u orchestra, to the ists and, most of to the c torial genius of Koussev

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
JUL 27 1945

Massachusetts Music Festival Draws Visitors

BY JUDITH CASS

CHICAGOANS who are in and near Pittsfield, Mass., for the summer are looking forward to three week-ends of music beginning tomorrow night when a Bach and Mozart six concert festival will be held at Tanglewood. The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and assisted by Alexander Brailowsky, pianist, will provide the musical fare. Dr. Koussevitzky celebrated his 71st birthday anniversary yesterday at a tea in his summer home, Seranak, given by his niece, Miss Olga Naumoff.

Among those who have taken festival tickets are Mrs. Frederic S. Coolidge, Mrs. W. Rockwood Gibbs, Mrs. James Ransom Walker, Mrs. David Shields Cook, Mr. and Mrs. Harry C. Holloway, the John L. Seniors, and Albert Spalding, violinist, and Mrs. Spalding, who have many friends in Chicago. The John Alden Carpenters, who are summering in their Beverly Cove, Mass., home, will attend this week-end's concerts. Another festival guest is Mme. Giovanni Cardelli of New York, a former Chicagoan, who is visiting the William Felton Barretts in North Egremont, Mass.

Mrs. Coolidge is the former Elizabeth Sprague of Chicago and known as "the fairy godmother to chamber music." Her annual music festivals in the Temple of Music on South Mountain have been discontinued for the duration, however.

The site of the approaching festival, Tanglewood, was a gift in 1937 to the Boston Symphony of Mrs. Andrew Hopewell Hepburn of Concord, Mass., and her aunt, the late Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan. War has not dimmed the scenic charm of Tanglewood.

This Clipping From LOUISVILLE, KY.
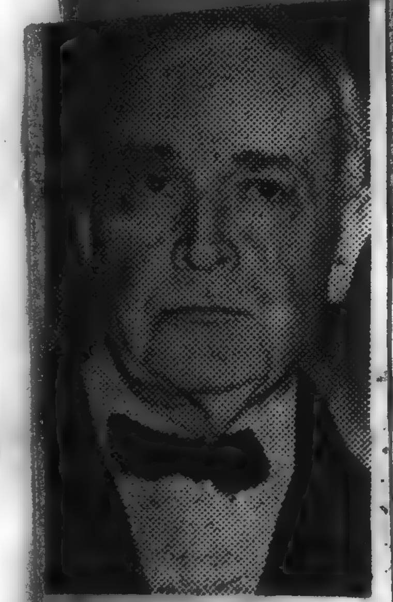
TIMES
JUL 28 1945



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducts Bach's D-Major Suite, Mozart's A-Major Concerto at the Tanglewood Festival, 7:30 p.m. WINN.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
TIMES
JUL 29 1945

Ravel: "Daphnis and Chloe" second suite. Conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for Victor. This two-disk issue is one of the recent recordings and one of Koussevitzky's showpieces. The orchestra plays it with that limpid clarity and elegance that skill and long familiarity bring.

WOODLAND, CAL.
DEMOCRAT
JUL 27 1945

This Clipping From COLUSA, CAL.
SUN-HERALD
JUL 27 1945

THE BACH MOZART FESTIVAL at Tanglewood, Massachusetts, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be broadcast on three successive Saturdays over KFBK at 5:30 o'clock starting tomorrow. Alexander Brailowsky, pianist, will be the soloist in a performance of Mozart's A Major Concerto.

S. KOUSSEVITZKY

This Clipping From
THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
JUL 27 1945

* * *

After a brief holiday, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky returns to his Boston Symphony musicians tomorrow to open the "Tanglewood Festival" in the little auditorium in Tanglewood, Massachusetts. The concert, and the two following, will be broadcast over KGO at 5:30 p.m.

Earlier, Antal Dorati will lead the American Symphony Orchestra in the first North American performance of Holzmann's "Cantigas de Edad de Oro" in the Saturday Symphony, heard at 1 p.m. over KGO.

* * *

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JUL 28 1945

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JUL 28 1945

Tanglewood Concerts Have Bus Service

For the first time since the Berkshire Symphonic Festival of 1941 there will be bus service to Tanglewood from Pittsfield and Lenox. The ODT has sanctioned the running of buses to the Bach-Mozart Festival in time for concerts conducted by Serge Koussevitzky on the next three weekends. The buses will leave the Park in the center of Pittsfield at 7:30 Saturday evenings and 2:30 Sunday afternoons, stopping in Lenox to pick up passengers for the Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

As all reserved seats have been sold for the coming week end, only admission tickets will be available at the box office on the days of the concerts.

PEORIA, ILL.
STAR
JUL 28 1945

TANGLEWOOD CONCERT, first of a series of three such concerts featuring light summer music, will be heard at 7:30 p. m. today, WLS. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be conductor.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT-LEADER
JUL 29 1945

THE SATURDAY NIGHT . . . program of the annual Bach-Mozart festival at Tanglewood, Mass., will be broadcast over ABC at 7:30. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the program with Alexander Borovsky, piano soloist. The members are Mozart's "Divertimento in B Flat Major; two Bach Piano concerti, D Minor and E Minor and Mozart's Symphony in D Major.

JACKSON, TENN.
SUN
[illegible] 1945

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky will be on the podium for the opening concert of the annual Tanglewood Festival broadcast next Saturday at 7:30 over WTJS.

PORTLAND, OREGON
OREGONIAN
JUL 28 1945

Tanglewood Festival

After a brief holiday, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky returns to his Boston Symphony musicians today at 5:30 on KEX to open the Tanglewood Festival in the little auditorium in Tanglewood, Mass. The programs this year will be devoted to Bach and Mozart. The orchestra will be composed of first desk men and other members of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky will open the Festival with the "D Major Suite, No. 4" of Bach, and Mozart's "Concerto in A Major (K. 488) for Piano and Orchestra." Alexander Brailowsky, pianist, will be the soloist in the latter.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JUL 28 1945

Tanglewood Lists Concert Programs

The Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., which opens tonight, continues with a second program tomorrow afternoon and four programs on the two Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons to follow (Aug. 4-5, Aug. 11-12). Serge Koussevitzky, conducting a chamber orchestra of Boston Symphony players, will present the following program this evening at 8:30:

Bach, Suite in D major, No. 4; Mozart, Piano Concerto in A major (No. 29, K 488) soloist Alexander Brailowsky; Mozart, Symphony in E flat major, (No. 26, K 184); and Symphony in C major, "Jupiter."

The following program will be presented tomorrow afternoon at 3:30:

Mozart, Symphony in D major, "Paris;" Bach, Concerto in C minor for Two Pianos, Nos. 1 and 2, soloists, Abraham Chasins and Constance Keene; Mozart, Adagio and Fugue for Strings and Adagio from the G minor Quintet; and Symphony in C major, No. 34.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
JUL 29 1945

ACE CONDUCTOR Serge Koussevitzky will appear here next season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a single concert under Pittsburgh Orchestra Association auspices.

This Clipping From
JACKSON, TENN.
SUN
JUL 28 1945

Schedule Bach And Mozart Works For Tanglewood Festival

Programs for the annual Tanglewood Festival, to be broadcast over WTJS-American on July 28, August 4, and August 11, from 7:30 to 8:30 p. m., have been announced by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will return to his Boston Symphony musicians for the special musical event.

From the instrumental music of Bach, Dr. Koussevitzky has selected the Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 5, the Suites, No. 2 in B Minor, No. 3, in D Major, and No. 4, in D Major. The piano concertos in D Minor and F Minor and the two-piano concertos in C Minor and C Major also are listed.

Mozart is represented by two piano concertos, the "Konzertante Sinfonie" for violin and viola, the "Haffner" Serenade, the B Flat "Divertimento" for strings and two horns, the "Serenade" in B Flat, the Adagio and Fugue for strings, Symphonies No. 26 in E Flat, the "Prague" in D Major, "Paris" in D Major, the E Flat, G Minor and C Major ("Jupiter"), and the Overture to "Der Schauspieldirekter."

American, which broadcast the winter season by the Boston Symphony, has continued the summer activities of the ensemble.

This Clipping From
INDIANAPOLIS, IN NEWS
JUL 2

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
JUL 28 1945

Legislature might decide.

Tanglewood Concerts Will Open Today

The firstc oncert of the season at Tanglewood will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this evening at 8.30 under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The program follows:

BACH .... Suite in D major. No. 4
MOZART ... Piano Concerto in A major (No. 29, K. 488)
Soloist: Alexander Brailovsky

MOZART .... Symphony in E-flat major (No. 26, K. 184)
MOZART..Symphony in C major "Jupiter" (No. 41, K. 551)

The second concert will be given Sunday afternoon at 3.30. The program will be as follows:

MOZART...Symphony in D major "Paris" (No. 31, K. 297)
BACH ..... Concerto in C minor for Two Pianos. No. 1
Soloist: Abram Chasins, Constance Keene

BACH .... Concerto in C major for Two Pianos, No. 2
Soloists: Abram Chasins, Constance Keene
MOZART....Overture to "Der Schauspieldirektor" (K. 486)
MOZART..Serenadei n D major "Haffner" (K. 250)

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
JUL 29 1945

Playing Bach's Concerto for for piano in D Minor, Alexander Borovsky will be soloist Saturday for the second concert of the Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, Mass. Serge Koussevitzky will open the program with Mozart's Divertimento No. 15 B Flat Major for strings and two horns.

(This program will be heard over KRLD at 7:30 p.m. Saturday.)

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JUL 29 1945

TANGLEWOOD OPENS 2D WARTIME FETE

Koussevitzky Is Conductor as Berkshire Music Festival Again Attracts Throng

Special to The New York Times.

LENOX, Mass., July 28—The second wartime Berkshire Music Festival began at Tanglewood this evening, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting the principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first of six programs, consisting exclusively of the music of Bach and Mozart.

These events, inaugurated last year by Dr. Koussevitzky to provide this community with good music in spite of wartime conditions, are again planned on a smaller scale than the pre-war festivals. They are being held in the relatively small theatre concert hall which seats 1,152, though 250 additional patrons can be accommodated on the stage. Other listeners, purchasing general admissions, hear the concert from a large tent just outside the hall.

Despite the physical limitations of the present festival, it is obvious that tremendous musical interest has been aroused in these concerts. Concerts are being held Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons of each of three consecutive week-ends, and the management reports that all tickets already have been sold.

The orchestra includes some forty players, and Dr. Koussevitzky has engaged distinguished soloists for the concerts. Alexander Brailowsky was soloist for this evening, playing Mozart's A major piano concerto (K. 488). The orchestral works on the program were Bach's suite in D major, No. 4, and Mozart's symphonies in E flat major (K. 184) and C major (K. 551), the "Jupiter."

Other artists to be heard include Abram Chasins and Constance Keene, duo-pianists; Alexander Borovsky and Robert Casadesus, pianists; William Kroll, violinist, and Jascha Veissi, violist. Major orchestral works scheduled for performance on future programs include the "Paris," "Prague," G minor (K. 550) and E flat (K. 543) symphonies of Mozart and the Bach Brandenburg Concerti Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5. Mr. Casadesus' vehicle will be the Mozart C minor piano concerto (K. 491), which he will play at the final concert of the series on Aug. 12, while Mr. Borovsky will play the piano concerti in D minor and E minor of Bach next Saturday.

[115]

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

[illegible] 29 1945

Berkshire Festival Opens; Brailowsky Plays

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, July 28.—For the tenth season, Serge Koussevitzky tonight raised his baton over 40 members of his Boston Symphony Orchestra at picturesque but drenched Tanglewood and called to attention another of the world's great festivals of music. Alexander Brailowsky, distinguished Russian pianist, was [illegible]

[illegible] that has become [illegible] Berkshire Festival. And as usual [illegible] overflowing audience [illegible] was rewarded by [illegible] played scores [illegible] Mozart. Tonight's [illegible] given in the shed [illegible] opera house which [illegible] 1200. All available [illegible] stage was occupied [illegible] hundred heard the [illegible] large canvas-covered [illegible] the entrance.

Roof Was Sounding Board

[illegible] the roof became [illegible] sounding board to [illegible] the audience listened [illegible] attention. This [illegible] traditional at Tanglewood. There is something [illegible] verdant, expansive [illegible] that seems to inspire. [illegible] same estate that [illegible] wrote his "House of Seven Gables," and there is no [illegible] the unbelievable art [illegible] Koussevitzky extracted [illegible] orchestra of young students [illegible] in 1941.

Alexander Brailowsky shared [illegible] with the conductor [illegible] saying a good deal. Koussevitzky, immaculately [illegible] genial and deeply in[illegible] his task, is worshipped [illegible] Berkshire audience.

Never Same Pianist

We [illegible] among the fortunate [illegible] to have heard Brailowsky [illegible] times. He is never [illegible] same pianist. His forte is [illegible] Chopin and he plays every last bar of that composer's [illegible] works from memory. Almost any score technical or otherwise, of the 19th or 20th [illegible] is his next forte. Tonight he played Mozart — the "Concerto in A Major" to be exact.

To review his Mozart as a technical performance is to describe almost flawless execution, dynamic changes that were mathematical perfection and a meticulous handling of details—In short it left little to be desired that a fine concert grand and digital skill can achieve.

As an interpretor of the light, lacy, 18th century classicist, he was somewhat less to our liking. The playing of the Bach "Minuets" from the "Suite in D Major" under Koussevitzky's domination was illustrative of our point. Even in the comparatively robust portions of the Bach score and in the Mozart symphonies in E-flat and the "Jupiter Symphony" which followed, there was a total divorce from exaggeration, tonal or rhythmic.

Sometimes Too Athletic

Brailowsky's Mozart was brilliant but was played with a too frequent athletic style. It didn't possess the craftsmanship that typified Luboshutz and Nemenoff's playing of Mozart's "Concerto in E-Flat, for Two Pianos," played here last Summer.

The program opened with the Bach "Suite in D Major." The Boston orchestra has always been at home in scores of this era, but tonight, the woodwind and 'cello sections were not at their best. The adagio movement was sadly off pitch. In all fairness, we must however attribute much of this tonal difficulty to a damp evening which in a partly open arena is no help to the welfare of instruments.

The Festival will be resumed tomorrow afternoon, when Abram Chasins ad Constance Keene will appear as piano soloists. The two next weekends will be devoted to similar concerts.

M. July 30, 45

Koussevitzky Leads Brilliant Performance of Bach, Mozart

By ROBERT A. HAGUE
PM's Music Critic

LENOX, Mass., July 30.—The first of three pairs of weekend concerts devoted exclusively to the works of Bach and Mozart was presented Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood by Serge Koussevitzky and the principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Alexander Brailowsky was Saturday's soloist, playing the solo part of the Mozart A-major Piano Concerto (K.488), and on Sunday, Abram Chasins and Constance Keene were heard in the Bach C-major and C-minor concertos for two pianos.

Koussevitzky

Like the two weekends of all-Mozart programs offered last Summer, the present series is designed as a wartime substitute for the famous and larger-scaled Berkshire Summer music festivals which have been suspended since 1941. The concerts are given in the relatively small theater-concert hall on the grounds at Tanglewood which can seat 1150, with 200 or so added chairs on the stage behind the orchestra. Needless to say the complete series of concerts has been sold out, and the overflow is accommodated—and was somewhat protected from Saturday night's downpour—by a large tent set up just outside the hall.

It is gratifying to find that the remarkably high performance standards of former festivals here were maintained, and in many respects surpassed, by Saturday's and Sunday's concerts. This, of course, may be attributed to the caliber and exceptional skill of the 40-odd instrumentalists who make up the orchestra, to the artistry of the soloists and, most of all, to the conductorial genius of Dr. Koussevitzky.

Then, too, the design and acoustical felicities of the hall itself added to the hearers' enjoyment of the music. The simple, unfinished-wood interior is responsible for a unique resonance and clarity in the sounds emitted by the various instruments. This was immediately apparent in the opening number of Saturday's program, Bach's Suite in D major, No. 4. Here there was an effect of perfect balance between the different choirs of the orchestra: the strings, the woodwinds, the brasses all sounded equally important. This also was true of the other works performed. The size of the orchestra was just right for the size of the hall, making for particularly happy results in the Bach and Mozart music programmed.

Especially praiseworthy was the performance of the Mozart A-major Concerto by Mr. Brailowsky and the orchestra. The pianist played with a technical flawlessness, a gracefulness of tone, an elasticity of touch and a sensitivity of feeling that left nothing to be desired on the part of this listener. And Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra collaborated with the soloist superbly. It was Mozart playing of the highest order—as were the orchestra's performance of the early E-flat major symphony (K.184) and that later masterpiece, the C major (Jupiter).

The enthusiastic audience recalled Mr. Brailowsky and the conductor many times at the conclusion of the concerto, and, after the Jupiter, Dr. Koussevitzky and the men received a prolonged ovation.

* * *

Sunday afternoon's concert provided further rewards for Tanglewood concert-goers, who heard superlative presentations of the two Bach two-piano concertos. Under Dr. Koussevitzky's baton, the opening allegro for the C major emerged with eloquence and ordered splendor and the great final fugue was set forth with magnificent feeling for its architectural logic: and the closing allegro of the C minor came as a burst of joy after the measured and reflective beauty of the preceding adagio.

MONDAY, JULY 30,

Mr. Chasins and Miss Keene played the double solo parts of both works with commendable musicianship. Their evenly matched and solid tone was particularly noticeable in the adagio of the C major—where the two pianos have the music all to themselves—and even more telling throughout the C minor. Nor was Mozart neglected on Sunday. The precision and unanimity of the Boston string section and the unsugary sweetness of their tone were made especially manifest in the delicate traceries of the adagio from the G minor quintet for strings and in the Haffner Serenade (D major, K.250). Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concertmaster, played the solo violin part of the latter with a brilliant technical ease that brought him a special ovation from the audience.

At the end of the afternoon, Dr. Koussevitzky, who had seemed to be in a particularly happy frame of mind and to be enjoying himself during both programs, conducted the Paris Symphony (D major K.297) con amore. The first movement was bright, transparent, bubbling over with wit and vitality; the finale admirably spirited, bringing the concert to a whirlwind close.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

JUL 29 1945

Music

The Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., which opened last night, continues with a second program this afternoon and four programs on the two Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons to follow. Serge Koussevitzy, conducting a chamber orchestra of Boston Symphony players, will present the following program this afternoon at 3:30:

Mozart, Symphony in D major, "Paris" (No. 31, K. 297). Bach, Concerto in C major for Two Pianos, No. 2. Soloists: Abram Chasins, Constance Keene. Bach, Concerto in C minor for Two Pianos, No. 1. Soloists: Abram Chasins, Constance Keene. Mozart, Adagio from the G minor Quintet. Mozart, Serenade in D major, "Haffner" (K. 250).

Third Program, Saturday evening, August 4, at 8:30:

Mozart, Divertimento in B-flat major, for Strings with Two Horns (K. 287). Bach, Piano Concerto in D minor. Soloist: Alexander Borovsky. Bach, Piano Concerto in F minor. Soloist: Alexander Borovsky. Mozart, Symphony in D major ("Prague") (No. 38, K. 504).

Fourth Program, Sunday afternoon, August 5, at 3:30:

Bach, Suite No. 2 in B minor, for Flute and Strings. Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D major, for Orchestra with Piano, Violin and Flute. Mozart, Adagio and Fugue for String Orchestra (K. 546) Mozart, Symphony in G minor (No 40, K, 550).

Six special music scholarships of $500 each are being offered by the Julius Hartt School of Music in Hartford to talented students, according to an announcement by Moshe Paranov, school director. The scholarships have been donated by Alfred C. Fuller, president of the Manufacturers Association of Connecticut, who made a similar gift last year.

Auditions will be held in Hartford from September 5 to 15. Ability to demonstrate talent in the chosen field is the most essential requirement for the applicant, according to the announcement. The maximum age limit for all applicants is 25 years.

The scholarships are being offered for specialized training in three fields. Two are available in opera, two in piano, and two in violin. The opera winners will receive instruction with Friedrich Schorr and stage training with Dr. Elemer Nagy; the pianists, instruction with Moshe Paranov and coaching with Harold Bauer; and the violinists instruction with Rubin Segal and coaching with Richard Burgin.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 29 1945

Large Turnout Of Celebrities

Tanglewood, Lenox, July 28—Many persons distinguished in music and others who were well known in society in this country and abroad before the war were present for the opening tonight of the Bach-Mozart festival. The theater with seating capacity of 1450 was filled and there was an overflow audience in the tent just outside the entrance.

Mrs Frederick S. Coolidge, sometimes called the fairy godmother of chamber music, who is spending the summer at the Wendell-Sheraton hotel, Pittsfield, had a seat near the front. She has attended every Tanglewood festival.

Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the Berkshire Symphonic festival, inc., since its organization, had as guests tonight Mrs Alexander Brailowsky, wife of the pianist, and Malcolm Vaughn who with the Brailowskys is her house guest at Stockbridge.

With Mrs Donald F. McPherson were John Alden Carpenter, the Chicago composer, and Mrs Carpenter, for whom Mrs McPherson is entertaining at luncheon tomorrow at Court hill, Pittsfield.

The Boston Symphony directors were Jerome D. Greene, president, who is at Curtis hotel; Thomas N. Metcalf, who with Mrs Metcalf and Miss Metcalf is at the Lenox club; also Mark A. De Wolfe Howe. With Miss Olga Naumoff, niece of Dr Koussevitzky, were his nephew, ~~Fabian~~ Sevitzky, and Mrs Sevitzky, who are at the conductor's summer home, Seranak.

An eminent European pianist was Princess Sapieha and the prince, who are occupying Miss Louisa G. Ludlow's cottage at Lenox. Princess Eugenia Ruspoli of Castellio di Nemi, Rome, who is at Curtis hotel, was there with Prince and Princess Alexis Droutzkoy.

Mrs Ralph Pulitzer entertained at dinner at her Lenox home and later took her guests to the concert.

Among others noticed in the audience were Mr and Mrs Albert Spalding of Great Barrington, Mr and Mrs Bruce Crane of Dalton, Robert Talcott Francis and Mr and Mrs James Dwight Francis, who are at the Lenox club; Mrs W. Rockwood Gibbs of Lake Forest, Ill., and Rock Ridge farms, Richmond; Mrs Benjamin Arnold (Louise Van Rensselaer) who is at Red Lion inn, Stockbridge.

Mr and Mrs Wendell Cross of Waterbury, Ct., who are staying at Berkshire inn, Great Barrington, had 18 guests at Tanglewood. Miss Helen Brice of New York City, a summer sojourner at Berkshire inn, was with Mr and Mrs William Felton Barrett. Miss Mabel Choate was accompanied by her niece, Mrs Geoffrey Platt from Salisbury, Ct., were Mrs Arnold Whitridge and Mrs Donald J. Warner.

Boston Symphony in Brilliant Form at Tanglewood Concert

By CYRUS DURGIN

STOCKBRIDGE, July 29—If "Tanglewood" in the Berkshires has been swimming in glorious music these past 24 hours, it also has been swimming in the extraordinary high fogs produced hereabouts. But while the clouds did not lift much for the second concert in the Bach-Mozart festival, this afternoon, the rain let up so that you could walk around without an umbrella.

Serge Koussevitsky and his small orchestra of Boston Symphony men achieved wonders of rich, clear senority today in an atmosphere in which it was extremely difficult to keep string instruments and tympani in tune. The program assembled Mozart's "Haffner" Serenade (K. 250), the "Paris" Symphony (K. 297), and the adagio from the G Minor Quintet (K. 516), and two scores of Bach; the concerto in C Major and the one in C Minor, each for two pianos. The soloists were Abram Chasins and Constance Keene, the latter a former student of the Berkshire Music Centre.

Mr. Koussevitsky began with the "Haffner" serenade and gave it a reading superlative in style, warm and lively of expression. The orchestra played beautifully throughout, and Richard Burgin's account of the violin solo and Cadenzas in the Rococoicondeau was certainly one of the finest performances of anything I have ever heard.

"Basses are Full"

Miss Keen's piano playing was excellent from every point of view. In the C major concerto Mr. Chasins exemplified the point he made at a lecture here a few seasons ago. That "in Bach as in baseball, the basses are full" and turned off a robust voicing of his part, Bach is practically beyond cavil these days, but the C major concerto exemplifies my private theory that Bach sometimes can be dull. The sight of a distant and pretty blonde face through the open door of the concert hall proved more absorbing than the eternally plodding figurations of the second movement, when the pianos carry on alone.

As at the opening concert last night, the auditorium was full and the benches under canvas well populated. Intensely enthusiastic applause has been the keynote of the first week-end of this Bach-Mozart festival, which will be resumed Saturday

---

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 29 1945

Bach, Mozart Combine Well

By VICTOR PRAHL

Tanglewood, Lenox, July 28 — The Bach-Mozart festival directed by Serge Koussevitsky with the assistance of the principals and other members of the Boston Symphony orchestra opened tonight in the opera-concert shed at Tanglewood. A downpour of rain which began at 5 and continued steadily through the concert did not prevent the loyal following, which is accustomed to such weather at Tanglewood, from filling every seat in the hall, on the stage in back of the orchestra and the benches in the tent in the garden at the rear of the hall.

In adding Bach to Mozart, Dr Koussevitsky acted wisely, for the sturdiness of Bach provides a happy contrast and balance to the delicacy and refinement of Mozart, and for the most part the instrument combination required for the one serves as a perfect ensemble for the other. Tonight's program consisted of four major numbers, the Suite in D major, No 4 by Bach, Mozart's Piano Concerto in A major (K. 488) played by Alexander Brailovsky, and two Mozart symphonies, the E flat, No 26, and the C major (Jupiter) No 41.

Brailovsky's Mozart Sparkles

Mr Brailovsky, making his debut appearance in this setting, although famed primarily as an interpreter of Chopin, proved himself equally at home with Mozart, bringing a sparkling clarity, an elegance of phrasing, beauty of tone, a subtle rhythmical sense, and a general refinement to the work which gave it life from its opening phrases to the end of its gay rondo.

"Particularly beautiful was the announcement of the opening theme and the purity of the passage work in the first movement, so simple structurally, so forthright in thematic statement, and with such a perfect balance between the solo instrument and orchestra. There was depth and expressiveness of tone in the lovely "Andante," which is the heart of the composition, and an appropriate bouncy lightness in the neatly phrased final "Presto." Mr Brailovsky received an ovation and was recalled repeatedly.

The perfection with which the orchestra played the Overture, Bourree, Gavotte, Menuetto and Rejouissance of the previous Bach Suite, transported one in dance measures to the rococo period in which the composer lived. The Symphony in E flat by Mozart No 184, like some of the master's other works of the same years, is of the "Italian" type, this one impressing with its grandiose concerto-like first movement and the subtle voice leading of the "Andante." Dr Koussevitsky's magnificent interpretation of the "Jupiter" is well known to his followers, having been played as the final number of last year's successful festival.

Tonight's performance seemed to have an especial fire. Naturally there was a tremendous response from the enthusiastic audience.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

JUL 29 1945

Music

ALL roads lead to the Bach-Mozart festival by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, in the concert and opera auditorium at "Tanglewood" this afternoon, beginning at 3:30 o'clock, inaugurating the first of three Sunday afternoon concerts, extending through August 12. The series also includes three Saturday night concerts, the first of which was held last night, continuing through August 11.

There are no reserved seats inside the auditorium available, but music lovers may purchase admission tickets to the grounds which will allow the holders to seats outside the auditorium where the music may be heard and seen t oadvantage through th eopen doors. It is advisable to come equipped with umbrellas, parasols and raincoats in the event of stormy weather or the bright sun. The program for this afternoon is as follows:

Symphony in D major (Paris)	Mozart
Concerto for two pianos in C minor	Bach
Abram Chassins and Constance Keene
Over ture to "Der Schauspieldirektor"	Mozart
Seranade in D major (Haffner)	Mozart

* * *

[116]

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

JUL 30 1945

CELEBRATED MUSICIANS gather backstage with Dr. Serge Koussevitsky following the Sunday afternoon Bach-Mozart concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. Left to right are Alexander Brailowski, Saturday night's piano soloist; Abram Chasins and Miss Constance Keene, yesterday's pianists; Dr. Koussevitsky; Robert Casadesus, piano soloist at the final concert Aug. 12; and the celebrated violinist; Zino Francescatti, summering at Sout Egremont.

Festival Opening Overflows Hall

Crowds Jam Tanglewood Auditorium for First Two Concerts In Bach-Mozart Series

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

Serge Koussevitzky was recalled time after time yesterday afternoon at the close of the second concert of the Bach-Mozart festival at Tanglewood. The "Paris" symphony of Mozart was a tumultuous vehicle for the nearly 40 men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing under the direction of their famous leader, and it evoked a thunderous demonstration, although it might be difficult to measure or compare the responses that every offering in the two concerts of this first week end had roused.

A spirit of cordial spontaneity has become a part and a tradition of Tanglewood in the 11 short seasons of summer symphonic music in the Berkshires. Present conditions make it wise to use the smaller theatre-concert hall on the spacious grounds rather than the huge Shed, but the audiences at both of these first two concerts filled every available seat in the hall, on the stage, under the sheltering canvas set up in the rear of the hall, and stood at every spot where either a view of the stage might be gained or to which a beam of sound would reach.

Yesterday's Program

Yesterday afternoon the weather had been more favorable than on the preceding evening. While it was not clear and bright, at least there was not the heavy and steady rainfall which had greeted the opening night audience. The program consisted of two Bach concertos for two pianos within a surrounding layer of Mozart: the "Haffner" Serenade, a movement from the G minor string quintet and the "Paris" symphony. Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, was the idol of the day. His performance of the solos in the Serenade earned him one of the most cordial, one might say affectionate, ovations in Tanglewood history. His solos and cadenzas were done with technical prowess, artistic poise and consummate grace. The record should reveal that he stole the show.

If anyone thinks of Mozart as a dainty individual, he shouldn't produce the "Paris" symphony as an example, for Koussevitzky understands it, and rightly so, as a rough and ready page frankly intended to please the taste of the Parisian public of the day. Broad and incisive bow strokes and unrestrained good humor are its distinguishing traits. The youthful Mozart had been advised concerning the French preferences and he admittedly connived to please them. He naively informed his father, after the performance was a success, that he went to the Palais Royal and "had a large ice and went home."

The slow movement from the string quintet gained in sonority as played by the string section of the small orchestra, but suffered in such items as attack and tone balance when compared with the effect produced when played by the ensemble for which it was written. Its grandeur, however, was emphasized by the expressive intensity with which it was executed

Bach and Mozart

The choice of Bach and Mozart for this festival links two names which cannot possibly be omitted from any list of musical immortals which anyone might wish to enumerate on the fingers of one hand. Their successive lives spanned the century which ended at about the time our nation was declaring its independence. By thus placing them in their relative era, and remembering that instrumental development was progressing at the very same time, the distinctive musical character of each one becomes more understandable and clarifies the background of the two-piano concertos in which Abram Chaisins and Constance Keene were the soloists.

Composers of Bach's day were more or less restricted to writing either for the church or for private wealthy and titled patrons. Even so little later as in Mozart's day, there had developed a public which was willing to pay admission to hear opera, symphonies and virtuoso soloists. But the virtuoso was not yet a phenomenon of Bach's day. The duo-piano team adjusted themselves to their task with exemplary self-abnegation. They made no attempt to exaggerate the simplicity of the utterances of the score, but paid special attention to the tone quality they wished to produce. The dialogue passed from one piano to the other with calm placidity and technical exactitude. In the fugue in the C major concerto the clarity of voices was remarkably maintained although the aid and support furnished by the accompanying orchestra was of tremendous importance and should not be minimized.

Saturday Concert

On the preceding evening the opening concert had been completely Mozart except for the D major suite (No. 4) of Bach with which the program started. There was not complete understanding nor entirely successful execution in this initial choice, and it was only in the succeeding Mozart symphonies that the standard which is the rule at Tanglewood was really reached. Alexander Brailowsky was the soloist in the Mozart A major piano concerto. He found it moderately difficult to apply his abundant talents to this particular number although his artistic instincts influenced him to play with the highest sincerity; his command of the keyboard permitted him to fulfill all the demands of the score with facility and all the promptings of his skill and taste with faithfulness.

There were two Mozart symphonies, one from his very early youth, and one of the last great three. The first was the E flat (No. 26) and the second was the great C major, more popularly known as the "Jupiter." This is well-known and solid ground for both the orchestra men and their conductor, and it was here that an eclat was finally attained which up to that time had been conspicuously lacking. This was playing with the broadest of conception, the most lavish use of color and complete and intrepid musicianship. The little E flat symphony is in three movements but is played without a pause. It is richly orchestrated and reveals a subtlety and sensitivity remarkable in one so young, for he was only 17 when he dashed it off. It seems that some unseen power, in possession the secret of his tragically-short lotment of life, was guiding him put down quickly and without lay his every musical thought d idea.

We neither expected nor desired to find another opportunity this year again to dust off the feeble pun about Jupiter Pluvius which a weak but appropriate moment last year we were inveigled into using, but, sure enough, rain, as it did in last year's Mozart festival, again accompanied the performance of this famous symphony this year. But the weather had no influence on the performance. This particular symphony, along with a few others from the same shelf of classics, stands out in the repertory of the eminent conductor of the Boston orchestra. The perfection of detail, the overall conception with its wealth of contrast, of color, and of change of pace, the spic-and-span enunciation of phrases, all contribute to a masterful example of Mozart interpretation.

Of the four remaining concerts the next two will be played on this coming Saturday evening and the following Sunday afternoon.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JUL 30 1945

TANGLEWOOD MUSIC IS RICH AND VARIED

Koussevitzky Scores Artistic Triumph in First Week-End of Bach-Mozart Festival

By MARK A. SCHUBART
Special to THE NEW-YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., July 29—The first week-end of the three-week Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood has come to an end, and it is obvious that once more Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has scored an artistic triumph. Presiding over an orchestra made up of some forty members of the incomparable Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducted concerts last evening and this afternoon in the theatre-concert hall which might well serve as models for what summer concerts should offer music enthusiasts.

Inaugurated last year with two week-ends of all-Mozart programs, these modestly proportioned festivals, originally designed to keep the Tanglewood musical tradition alive in wartime, have won for themselves a unique place in our musical life. It is to be hoped that they will become an annual event, regardless of future circumstances, for they constitute a project which has great validity over and above their wartime expediency.

At least part of the distinction these concerts possess derives from the hall itself, a pleasantly unpretentious affair, which seems to make that aural chasm between audience and performing artists seem much smaller than in our more formal auditoriums. Brahms or Tchaikovsky symphonies would doubtless benefit but little from this intimacy, but in the theatre-concert hall the works—even the large ones—of Bach and Mozart are heard in new and refreshing perspective, the acoustics is almost startlingly reliable and the individual qualities of the instrumental groups stand out clearly.

Variety of Strings Noted

In large auditoriums these qualities are often lost or absorbed into a general mass of rich sound. Here one is constantly reminded of the dry subtlety of the woodwinds, the brilliant power of the brasses, the endless variety of the strings.

None of these factors could, however, be appreciated if the level of artistry at these concerts was not extremely high. Indeed, the very intimacy of the atmosphere and the transparency of the sonorities in ensemble place on the shoulders of the musicians and conductor a responsibility for accurate performance. No faking or covering up is possible; every sound is heard, and every instrument, by reason of the smaller size of the orchestra, takes on new importance. The "routine" orchestral technique would no longer be routine here; it would be plainly incompetent.

The musical fare this week-end has been rich and varied. The opening concert yesterday evening had the services of Alexander Brailowsky, the distinguished pianist, as soloist in a remarkable performance of Mozart's A major concerto (K. 488). Adapting himself admirably to the temper of the occasion and of the music at hand, Mr. Brailowsky's performance represented virtuosity at its best.

The opening section was delivered with vigor and simplicity; the soulful and somewhat Italiante Adagio was sung with plaintive charm, and the work was brought to a close with a rousing performance of the finale. There was extraordinary synchronization between orchestra and soloist, as well as a real communion of musical thought and feeling.

In the purely orchestral part of the program, Dr. Koussevitzky once more demonstrated his wizardry in infusing a performance with vitality and making it a living rather than a charming perusal of a dead art. Because of the style of the period in which Mozart lived and wrote, all too many conductors fail to find in the composer's music the powerful expression of a vigorous musical gift which goes far beyond such comparatively trivial values as sophistication and elegance. That Dr. Koussevitzky can capture and re-create this vitality without being unfaithful to the stylistic necessities of the music is eloquent testimony to the essential success of his efforts.

Two Mozart Works Played

Two Mozart symphonies were heard on last evening's concert—the early symphony in E-flat (K. 184) and the familiar and much-exploited "Jupiter." The former brief work received a charming performance, but it was the latter—a work heard constantly in our concert halls—that impressed this listener. For here was a performance of a work from the so-called standard repertoire which was fresh and exciting and new. The work was recreated in the true sense of the word, and because it appeared to be untainted with the traditions of other interpreters it acquired new significance and new impetus.

The Bach suite in D major, No. 4, which completed the program, received an equally exciting, though less technically adroit reading. The overture was read with unusual eloquence and the majestic opening material built up effective tension which found release in the gigue-like middle section.

For today's concert Abram Chasins and Constance Keene, the young American pianists, joined forces in Bach's two-piano concerti Nos. 1 and 2 in C minor and C major, respectively. The artists' performances were straightforward, workmanlike and warmly expressive. The C minor concerto, probably the more rewarding vehicle of the two works, received the more persuasive reading, though the final fugue of the C major was brilliantly executed.

Other works heard on this final concert of the first week-end were Mozart's D major "Paris" symphony (K.297), the Adagio ma non Troppo from the C minor string quintet (K.516), and the "Haffner" serenade in D major (K.250). The last named received an especially ingratiating reading, and Richard Burgin, the orchestra's concert master, won rounds of applause for his sparkling performance of the virtuosic violin solos.

Koussevitzky Plays To Over Flow Audience

First Two Concerts Opened With Works Of Bach And Mozart

The first two concerts of the Bach-Mozart festival held Saturday evening and Sunday at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., were heard by an overflow audience. Many people stood in the rain to hear the great works of Bach and Mozart conducted by Serge Koussevitzky and enjoyed the soloists, Alexander Brailowsky, Abram Chasins and Constance Keene.

The third and fourth programs to be heard Saturday evening, August 4, at 8:30 and Sunday afternoon, August 5, at 3:30 are as follows:

Third programme: Mozart, Divertimento in B-flat major, for Strings with Two Horns (K. 287); Bach, Piano Concerto in D minor. Soloist, Alexander Borovsky. Bach, Piano Concerto in F minor. Soloist, Alexander Borovsky. Mozart, Symphony in D major ("Prague") (No. 38, K. 504).

Fourth programme: Bach, Suite No. 2 in B minor, for Flute and Strings; Bach, Brandenburg

[illegible]

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES-PICAYUNE-STATES

JUL 8 - 1945

A masterpiece issued as a showpiece by Victor is Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" in a beautiful rendition by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. A welcome Victor recording is Chopin's "Polonaise in A-Flat, Op. 53 No. 6," played by Jose Iturbi. This is a companion piece to this popular pianist's "Music to Remember."

—S. A. T., JR.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
JUL 30 1945

Member of Boston Symphony Dies

BOSTON—Abdon F. Laus, 57, [illegible] bassoonist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and teacher of bassoon and saxophone, died here yesterday. He had appeared for several seasons at the Tanglewood concerts in Lenox.

A native of Algiers, Mr. Laus was [illegible] in Paris and in 1910 won first prize from the Conservatory of Paris. He appeared as soloist at the Theatre des Champs [illegible] and at the Paris Opera House. In 1918 he came to the United States with the French Military Band joining the Boston Symphony Orchestra that same year. He subsequently founded the Boston Saxophone Orchestra.

In 1925 Mr. Laus received an award from the French government for his services to French music and culture. The survivors, besides his wife, are a son, Jacques, [illegible]. Another son, Lieut. Andre N. Laus, was killed in action in [illegible] August. The funeral will [illegible] morning, with [illegible]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JUL 30 1945

ABDON F. LAUS

Bassoonist of Boston Symphony Honored by French Government

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

NEWTON, Mass., July 29—Abdon F. Laus, bassoonist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died today in his home here at the age of 57.

Born in Algiers, Mr. Laus was educated in Paris and in 1910 received his first prize from the Conservatory of Paris. He appeared as soloist at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées and at the Paris Opéra. He came to the United States in 1918 with the French Military Band and remained here to join the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In 1925 the French Government awarded Palmes Academiques to him in recognition of his service for the advancement of French music and culture.

He leaves a widow, Mrs. Charlotte N. Laus; a son, Jacques, and two grandchildren. Another son, Lieut. Andre N. Laus, was killed in action in France a year ago.

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS
JUL 30 1945

Big Crowds At Festival Despite Rain

Despite rain which attended the opening of the Berkshire summer festival at Tanglewood, large crowds heard the Saturday programs of the selected orchestra of the Boston Symphony, under direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

The rain continued throughout the Saturday session, when Alexander Brailowsky, pianist, was guest artist for Mozart's Piano Concerto in A Major, No. 29. The orchestra opened with Bach's Suite in D Major, No. 4, and closed with two Mozart symphonies, No. 26 in E-flat Major, and the "Jupiter," No. 41, in C Major.

Yesterday's program, with better weather, brought another large turnout. The guest soloists were Abram Chasins and Constance Keene, pianists, who played Bach's Concerti in C Minor and in C Major for two Pianos, No. 1 and No. 2. The orchestra opened with Mozart's Symphony in D Major, the "Paris," No. 31, and closed with Mojart's Der Schauspieldirektor Overture and his "Haffner" Serenade in D Major.

Alexander Borovsky will be guest soloist next Saturday and will play two Bach piano concerti, in D Minor and F Minor.

MUSIC HATH CHARMS—These two piano students of the famous Robert Casadesus brave Saturday night's downpour at the opening Tanglewood concert. They are Miss Margaret Gustaveson and her sister, Mrs. Jacqueline Miller of Kansas City, Mo.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

Words and Music

The Bostonians at Tanglewood Thrill With Bach and Mozart

By Harriett Johnson

Tanglewood, Mass., July 30.—About 40 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, rain-dampened but undaunted, began their Bach-Mozart Festival and thrilled two sold-out houses with their superb ensemble playing and beauty of orchestral sound. The programs included Mozart's "Jupiter" (No. 41) and "Paris" (No. 31), Symphonies and Bach's Suite in D Major, No. 4.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who conducted both concerts (Saturday night's and yesterday afternoon), showed that Tanglewood, as in previous years, has the effect of ambrosia on his spirits. His austerity slides down the wall and a mood of inspired relaxation takes its place. This added to his obvious mastery as a conductor produces some rare results.

The rustic "theatre-Concert" Hall which seats 1,500, was sold out for each concert. People also filled every available extra inch on the stage and hundreds overflowed outside under a large canopy. Admittance to the grounds costs just $1.50, and if it hadn't been for a downpour on Saturday night and wet grass plus a threatening sky yesterday, at least a thousand more per concert would have heard the music from a comfortable niche on the grass.

"Tanglewood Tales"

Situated between Lenox and Stockbridge, the estate itself at Tanglewood is a bait for music lovers. The well-kept, expansive grounds afford beautiful views of the Berkshire Hills and its romantic past appeals to the imagination. Here, for instance, Nathaniel Hawthorne wrote "Tanglewood Tales," and "The House of Seven Gables." Thus its rich associations combined with its inspired music making have for some years made a visit to Tanglewood of unique appeal.

After 1941 the grandiose "Berkshire Symphonic Festival" (held in the shed seating over 6,000) was discontinued, but its substitute, the more intimate music-making in the smaller hall, has its own special charm. This year the music is restricted exclusively to that of Bach and Mozart. Soloists for the initial week end were Alexander Brailowsky, pianist, who played Mozart's Piano Concerto in A Major (k488); Abram Chasins and Constance Keene, duo-pianists, who performed two Bach Concertos for two pianos (C Major No. 2 and C Minor No. 1). All gave clean, musicianly accountings of the music.

Burgin Stars

Brailowsky's playing was secure, but like a stone without a glow, his melodies were clipped instead of being rounded by beauty of phrasing and kindled by a creative imagination. Mr. Chasins and Miss Keene, through a carefully prepared plan of dynamic values, achieved an admirable sense of architecture in the Bach works. Their ensemble was excellent, but a warmer tone with more imaginative coloring of the simultaneously sounding melodies would have made their efforts more interesting. The first movement of the C Major Concerto was taken at a too deliberate tempo and sounded static.

It was the Boston Orchestra and Richard Burgin, its concertmaster, who ran away with the honors for putting a remarkable chunk of charm and imagination, besides a plethora of virtuosity into what they performed. Mr. Burgin was the soloist in the Mozart "Haffner" Serenade in D Major and startled the audience with his brilliance.

Seemingly as cool as a tightrope walker suspended in mid-air, he shot his musical sparks out into the audience and they ignited everybody. Mr. Koussevitsky's orchestra enhanced its extraordinary precision (keen enough to be worthy of the sharpest sabre) by an ease which was gay and lighthearted or tragic and poignant as needed. All of the music was alive; it didn't just exist.

The Festival continues for the next two week ends with a different program and soloist, scheduled for each Saturday and Sunday. Tickets are already just about sold out, but you can still probably get a seat on the stage or, in any case, one on the grass. Thus while hugging a tree, you'll be smothered by some unusually sweet sounds. Any inquiries should be addressed to the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston.

THE BOSTON HERALD, TUESDAY, JULY 31, 1945

Festival Opening Overflows Hall

Crowds Jam Tanglewood Auditorium for First Two Concerts In Bach-Mozart Series

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

Serge Koussevitzky was recalled time after time yesterday afternoon at the close of the second concert of the Bach-Mozart festival at Tanglewood. The "Paris" symphony of Mozart was a tumultuous vehicle for the nearly 40 men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing under the direction of their famous leader, and it evoked a thunderous demonstration, although it might be difficult to measure or compare the responses that every offering in the two concerts of this first week end had aroused.

A spirit of cordial spontaneity has become a part and a tradition of Tanglewood in the 11 short seasons of summer symphonic music in the Berkshires. Present conditions make it wise to use the smaller theatre-concert hall on the spacious grounds rather than the huge Shed, but the audiences at both of these first two concerts filled every available seat in the hall, on the stage, under the sheltering canvas set up in the rear of the hall, and stood at every spot where either a view of the stage might be gained or to which a beam of sound would reach.

Yesterday's Program

Yesterday afternoon the weather had been more favorable than on the preceding evening. While it was not clear and bright, at least there was not the heavy and steady rainfall which had greeted the opening night audience. The program consisted of two Bach concertos for two pianos within a surrounding layer of Mozart: the "Haffner" Serenade, a movement from the G minor string quintet and the "Paris" symphony. Richard Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, was the idol of the day. His performance of the solos in the Serenade earned him one of the most cordial, one might say affectionate, ovations in Tanglewood history. His solos and cadenzas were done with technical prowess, artistic poise and consummate grace. The record should reveal that he stole the show.

If anyone thinks of Mozart as a Festival

Continued on Fifth Page

THIRD ANNIVERSARY OF WAVES was observed before 15,000 at the Esplanade concert last night where Rear Admiral Felix Gygax, USN, commgndant of the First Naval District, administered the oath of allegiance to five women reservists representing the five states of the First Naval District. Left to right, Admiral Gygax; Alice G. Conlon of North Providence, R. I.; Peggy Belle Barnes of Brattleboro, Vt.; Walma A. Hakkila of New Ipswich, N. H.; Barbara Hall of Belfast, Me., and Elaine H. J. Wood of Roxbury.

Globe 3/24/44

Symphony Man's Son Decorated

Abdon Laus, 101 Washington st., Newton, bassoonist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Laus, head of the French Women's Club of Boston, were yesterday notified that their son, Capt Andre N. Laus, 29, had been awarded the Silver Star for gallantry in action near Gela, Sicily, on July 10, 1943.

CAPT. ANDRE N. LAUS

The citation sent home with the medal said Capt Laus, then a first lieutenant, swam ashore from a landing barge through heavy surf and machine gun fire to determine beach conditions. It added that, while guiding his men ashore, he also saved a drowning soldier's life.

"His outstanding courage and exemplary leadership were largely instrumental," the citation continued, "in the successful landing of his company with a minimum of casualties."

Capt Laus is a graduate of M. I. T., class of 1937. Before the war he was a research chemist and a reserve officer. His wife is the former Aline Perrin, who taught French in Brookline High School. They have a 18-months-old baby boy.

He has been in the Sicilian, Salerno, Anzio and Cassino campaigns. He was promoted to captain on Feb. 23 during the battle of the Anzio beachhead.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

JUL 30 1945

Chasins and Keene in Concert at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, July 29.—The second of the Bach-Mozart festival concerts at Tanglewood this afternoon had as soloists Abram Chasins and Constance Keene, pianists. The forty members, including principals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

The program:
Mozart—Serenade in D major (Haffner)
Bach—Concerto in C major, for two pianos
Bach—Concerto in C minor, for two pianos
Mozart—Adagio ma non troppo from the G minor quintet for strings
Mozart—Symphony in D major (Paris)

At first glance one would conclude that this was a concert for the academician, or at least for the connoisseur. Most of the Tanglewood audience may be so designated. But the brightness of Mozart scoring and the solidity of the Bach concerti were two of the main inducements for two hours of refreshing musical experience. Another was the best of the Boston Symphony strings, which have no parallel.

Concert's Main Work

The concert's main work was the "Symphony in D Major," its closing number. Its first movement was read with pompous stability. To the analyst, it recalled the whims of the 18th century Parisians. The required "first hatchet stroke" which begins the first movement was there, as was the dainty, thin beginning of the "finale" and its sudden forte.

The pleasant delicacy of the "andante" was a tonally rich dialogue between strings and woodwinds, both of which were heard to better advantage than at last night's concert. The finale chattered its way amiably to a brilliant finish.

Too Rarely Heard

To the devotee and musicologist alike, Bach concerti for two pianos and orchestra are not to be shunned—they are too rarely heard for that. As a matter of fact, the two played this afternoon are arrangements of two lost concerti which Bach originally wrote for two violins.

Mr. Chasins and Miss Keene carried the burden of the musical content with thorough awareneess of its requirement. Although somewhat marred by some rather distracting mannerisms of Mr. Chasins, it was an exciting Bach performance. These arrangements were undoubtedly written for our contemporary keyboards and not for Bach's clavichord. This afternoon's pianists played with logic and understanding pedal economy and keyboard lucidity. In other words they played Bach and not an adaptation.

The "Haffner Serenade" brought the orchestra's concertmaster very much to the foreground with some magnificently executed solo passages and cadenzas. The reception which was given him rivaled that accorded Brailowsky last night to the former's advantage.

The next two weekends provide four more Bach-Mozart concert.s The soloists are to be Robert Casadesus and Alexander Borovsky, pianists; William Korll, violinist, and Jascha Veissi, violist.

This Clipping From
GLENS FALLS, N. Y.
POST STAR

AUG 3 - 1945

Serge Koussevitzky recently vacationed in Saratoga Springs. He is now at his Summer home, "Serenak," in Lenox, Mass.

Dr. Koussevitzky is conducting the Boch-Mozart festival at Tanglewood and will present the third and fourth programs in the series tomorrow evening and Sunday afternoon.

The festival is being given by 40 principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by soloists. At tomorrow's concert Alexander Borovsky will play two Bach Piano Concertos in D minor and F minor. Orchestral numbers will be Mozart's Divertimento for strings and two horns, also his Symphony in D major.

On Sunday afternoon, at 3.30, the compositions to be played are the Suite, No. 2, for flute and strings, by Bach, the Bach Brandenburg Concerto, No. 5, Mozart's Adagio and Fugue for string orchestra, and his Symphony in G minor.

The series will conclude next week-end with concerts Saturday and Sunday. The famous pianist, Robert Casadesus, will be heard in the Mozart Piano Concerto in C minor. Other soloists will be William Kroll and Jascha Veissi.

This Clipping From
BEAVER-ROCHESTER, PA.
TIMES

AUG 2 - 1945

Bach Anniversary Marked On Concert

The 95th anniversary of the death of Johann Sebastian Bach will be commemorated on Saturday, July 28, when WTJS and the American Broadcasting Company present the first concert program of the 1945 Tanglewood Festival, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, at 7:30 p. m.

Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, will direct an ensemble composed of first desk men from the orchestra, and others, in Bach's "Suite in D. Major, No. 4," the opening number of the Festival. The program will be the first of three concerts to be broadcast by American from the little auditorium in the Music Center at Tanglewood.

Following the Bach work on the opening concert, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony and the same composer's E-Flat Major Symphony and A-Major Piano Concerto, No. 29 (K.488). Alexander Brailowsky, Polish pianist, will be the soloist in the latter.

American also will broadcast the Festival program of August 4 and 11.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JUL 30 1945

Bach-Mozart Festival Begins at Tanglewood

Special to The Hartford Times

Lenox, Mass.—Since that benign, prewar Sunday afternoon when something more than 12,000 people crowded the broad lawns at Tanglewood, the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's permanent summer home in the storied Berkshires has found a way of acceding to Serge Koussevitzky's insistence that music be kept going here. Two summers ago the Institute's last commencement put some impressive talent on parade in the big shed which has since been closed; last year a series of Mozart concerts in the little hall coincided with the revered leader's seventieth birthday.

Saturday and Sunday saw the beginning of a Bach-Mozart festival which strongly indicated a new direction for this already classic summer music event. It will be good business to go back into the big shed when times permit, but not many of those who heard these first two concerts will look forward to a return of the symphonic melange which entranced the coke and popcorn crowd.

New Kind of Festival

You've got to like music to really care about the new Tanglewood with its all-Bach and Mozart prospectus. Instead of an orchestra of a hundred men you have about forty. This is not a mere scaling down for the interim but a regrouping of resources to suit the intrinsic requirements of the music. The Mozart orchestra is certainly not the modern symphonic behemoth which is organized to detonate Berlioz, Tschaikowsky and Wagner before audiences of stadium size.

On Saturday night there were voices in the Jupiter Symphony which I had never heard before. In the finale of the A major piano Concerto were bassoon passages which in all their delicacy and fleetness were also new; the trumpets in Bach's D major Suite No. 4 were something which we are now writing home about.

New Transparency

All this because Dr. Koussevitky has gathered about him for this signal series a hand-picked orchestra which for clarity, transparency and virtuosity leaves far behind the super-charged machine of modern symphony.

The instrumentation varies with the requirements of the various compositions but, generally speaking, there are eight first violins, eight seconds, four violas, four celli, three basses, wind specifications and a tympanist.

The Soloists

There were three soloists for these two concerts, Alexander Brailowsky in the Mozart Concerto and Abram Chasins with his pupil, Constance Keene, who set forth the two Bach clavier concertos in C and C minor. In the soloist category, though, must be included Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, who with fine phrasing and style sense took the leading part in the "Haffner" Serenade Sunday afternoon. For this he received an ovation from the audience and from his colleagues.

Mr. Chasins and Miss Keene gave us a breezy, well-articulated Bach. Brailowsky's interpretation of the 21st Mozart Concerto was notable for its gentle expressiveness and a tone more exquisite than robust Its poetry was given a rare suggestibility.

Early Mozart Symphony

Of special interest was the seldom-heard, youthful E flat Symphony which Koussevitzky juxtaposed with the great "Jupiter" on Saturday night. By comparison somewhat underdeveloped, it bore up under the contrast nevertheless, its fairly emotional, nobly stated andante giving it stature.

The first pair of concerts ended with a sparkling account of Mozart's "Paris" Symphony which was preceded by the lovely adagio from the G minor Quintet.

A heavy rain in the late Saturday afternoon made a quagmire of the grounds and although there was a steady rain during the concert it was not such as to interrupt the music. C. E. L.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

AUG 4 - 1945

Tanglewood Audience Must Be Seated on Time Tonight

Because the opening number for tonight's concert of the Bach-Mozart Festival plays for 30 minutes, the audience is urged to be in their seats at Tanglewood before 8.30, as the program will start promptly. No one will be seated while Dr. Koussevitzky directs the orchestra in Mozart's "Divertimento in B-Flat Major," for strings with two horns.

At a meeting of Cpl. Joseph Keating, traffic director, Sheriff J. Bruce McIntyre, in charge of parking, Willard M. Sistare, director of ushers and ticket-takers, and Miss Martha Hick, chairman of ushers, with George E. Judd, orchestra manager, yesterday noon, plans were made for parking and seating the audience with dispatch.

Cars from the south will be admitted by the first entrance to the parking field on West Street. Cars from Lenox will enter through the main gate, as directed by the traffic officer.

In the audience this week-end will be Mrs. Andrew J. Hepburn of Concord, who with her aunt, the late Miss Mary Tappan, gave Tanglewood, her family estate, to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a permanent summer home. She will be accompanied by her daughter, Miss Daphne Brooks, and her son, Peter Brooks, USNR, recently returned from overseas service.

Busses will leave the park at 7.30 this evening and 2.30 tomorrow for Tanglewood. Tickets of admission to the grounds will be on sale at the box office before the concerts.

Tonight's program will be broadcast from 8.30 to 9.30 by the American Broadcasting Company over its nation-wide network of 160 stations.

[119]

TO BANISH PLANES IN CONCERT AREA

Post Aug 1

Officials Tell Music Director Arthur Fiedler Aircraft Will Avoid the Esplanade on Concert Nights

CONFERENCE ON PLANES DISTURBING CONCERT
Arthur Fiedler, right, conductor of the Esplanade orchestra, confers with flying official and State officials on rerouting planes away from Hatch Memorial Shell. Left to right, Karl Dahlem of the American Airlines; Sidney Wiggin and Nelson Curtis of the Metropolitan District Commission and Mr. Fiedler.

The very unsymphonic drone of airplanes will no longer provide a cacophonous counterpoint to the Esplanade concerts as a result of a unique conference held before last night's concert between Arthur Fiedler, conductor, and air traffic officials and the Secretary of the Metropolitan District Commission.

The growth of local air traffic, and the increase in the movement of military planes, had resulted in an almost constant procession of propellors over the Hatch Memorial Shell and the evening throngs of music lovers, and the worst distraction in 16 years of concerts.

Conferring with air traffic directors were Mr. Fiedler and Nelson Curtis, secretary of the Metropolitan District Commission. As a result of the conference all civilian planes will be rerouted on the Cambridge side of the river during concert hours.

Steps are being taken by Mr. Fiedler to secure the co-operation of the army so that their planes will not find it necessary to fly over the Esplanade at concert time.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

AUG 4 - 1945

Borovsky to Play At Festival Tonight

Alexander Borovsky, pianist, will be the soloist in two piano concerti with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its third program of the Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, Mass. this evening at 8:30. Mr. Borovsky will play Bach's Concerto in D minor and F minor with the Symphony which is under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

The remainder of the program will include Mozart's Divertimento in B flat major, for strings with two horns, and the "Prague" Symphony.

This Clipping From BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
ENQUIRER NEWS

AUG

Kroll and Veissi To Be Symphony Soloists Tonight

William Kroll, violinist, and Jascha Veissi, violist, will be soloists when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducts Mozart's "Konsertante Sinfronie" on the concluding broadcast of the Tanglewood Music Festival on August 11. The program, aired over the American network, will start at 7:30 p. m.

Bach's "Brandenburg Concerto No. 4," with Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, supplying the violin solo, will be included on the same program.

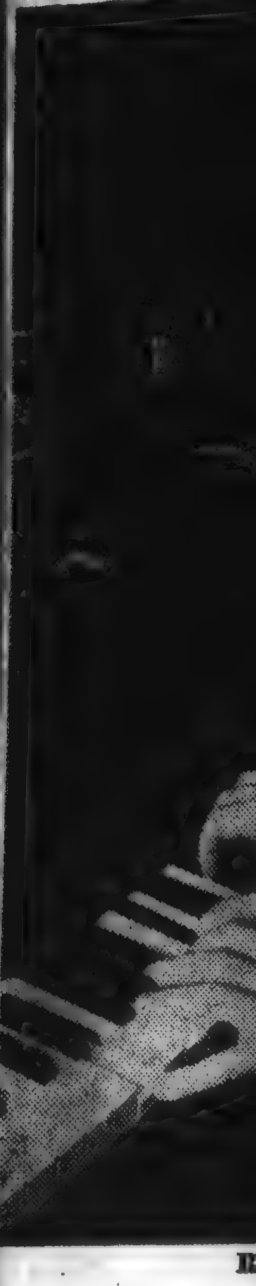
The concert will mark the end of another season of concerts by the Boston Symphony.

EDWARD JOHNSON, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera, announcing that plans are under way for another opera season on the air, estimated that 13,000,000 persons listened to the broadcasts last season. The new season is expected to open late in the fall.

PITTSFIELD, MASS
BERKSHIRE EAGL

AUG 3 - 194

Piano Solois
In Second S



Russian

Borovsky and Foss To Play
Koussevitzky

The second of three of concerts in the Festival at Tanglewood
tomorrow evening at 8.
Serge Koussevitzky will principals and other me
the Boston Symphony Alexander Borovsky wil soloist in Bach Concertos nor and F minor. In concert Lukas Foss, the pianist, will play the so Bach's Brandenburg Con
5 in D major. Georges and Richard Burgin, co ter and violinist, will be day afternoon.

Born in Russia, Mr. came to the United State playing in 1931 a Bach with the Boston Orchestr
by Dr. Koussevitzky, chestra's 50th anniversa living in Paris for seve he became a permanent this country in 1941, ap American citizenship, wh complete in six months.
played with the major and makes extensive co each season.

Lukas Foss, born in spent his childhood in was brought to this cou a young boy. He atte Curtis Institute in Philad studied conducting and c at the Berkshire Music year ago he succeeded J
SanRoma as the orchestr
He has composed a can Prairie," which was per the New York Philhar chestra last season, a pia to and other works. He ed a Guggenheim fellow ago and is composing th at the MacDowell Music
Petersboro, N. H.

The orchestra rehear day afternoon, this mo afternoon, and will ha

WEDNESDAY, AUG
THE BOSTON DAI

Esplanade
Out of Boun
Boston Air

The roar of ai will no longer soft harmonies ler's musicians a agreement reac by the local ai complaints that cert audiences
ler effects than Carl Dahlen,
local air lines,
and Nelson Cu
the Metropoli mission, and for the duratio season the p course out

ANES AREA

ector Arthur Avoid the t Nights

ING CONCERT orchestra, confers with lanes away from Hatch
the American Airlines; litan District Commission unsymphonic drone of ill no longer provide a counterpoint to the concerts as a result of a ference held before last ers between Arthur Fiedor, and air traffic officials cretary of the Metropoli-Commission.

of local air traffic, and the movement of mili-and resulted in an almost ssion of propellors over emorial Shell and the eve-of music lovers, and the tion in 16 years of conwith air traffic directors iedler and Nelson Curtis, the Metropolitan District

As a result of the con-civilian planes will be ree Cambridge side of the concert hours.
being taken by Mr. Fiedler co-operation of the army r planes will not find it fly over the Esplanade at

E CREEK, MICH.
UIRER NEWS

3 - 1945 and Veissi Symphony sts Tonight

Kroll, violinist, violist, will be
Serge Koussevitzky
art's Konzertante the concluding broa glewood Music Fes
11. The program,
American network, wi
30 p. m.
Brandenburg Concerto
Richard Burgin, assis-tor, supplying the violin included on the same rt will mark the end of son of concerts by the phony.

JOHNSON, general
the Metropolitan Opera, that plans are under ther opera season on the ed that 13,000,000 per-to the broadcasts last new season is expected in the fall.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

AUG 3 - 1945

Piano Soloists To Be Heard In Second Series of Concerts

Russian-born Alexander Borovsky

Borovsky and Foss To Play for Koussevitzky

The second of three week ends of concerts in the Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood will open tomorrow evening at 8.30, when Serge Koussevitzky will direct 40 principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Alexander Borovsky will be the soloist in Bach Concertos in D minor and F minor. In Sunday's concert Lukas Foss, the orchestra's pianist, will play the solo part in Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D major. Georges Laurent and Richard Burgin, concert master and violinist, will be heard Sunday afternoon.

Born in Russia, Mr. Borovsky came to the United States in 1927, playing in 1931 a Bach concerto with the Boston Orchestra, directed by Dr. Koussevitzky, at the orchestra's 50th anniversary. After living in Paris for several years he became a permanent resident of this country in 1941, applying for American citizenship, which will be complete in six months. He has played with the major orchestras and makes extensive concert tours each season.

Lukas Foss, born in Germany, spent his childhood in Paris, and was brought to this country when a young boy. He attended the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia and studied conducting and composition at the Berkshire Music Center. A year ago he succeeded Jesus Maris SanRoma as the orchestra's pianist. He has composed a cantata, "The Prairie," which was performed by the New York Philharmonic orchestra last season, a piano concerto and other works. He was awarded a Guggenheim fellowship a year ago and is composing this summer at the MacDowell Music Colony in Peterboro, N. H.

Lukas Foss

The orchestra rehearsed yesterday afternoon, this morning, this afternoon, and will have another rehearsal tomorrow morning. All rehearsals are private.

Since last week end the roof of the theatre-concert hall has been water-profed and parking fields drained. A large overflow audience is expected if the weather is fair. A few stage seats for tomorrow night's concert are on sale at England Brothers' book department. Admission to the grounds, entitling the early-comers to seats under the canopy, will be sold at the box office before the concerts.

Saturday's Program

Divertimento in B-flat major for strings with two horns	Mozart
Piano Concerto in D minor	Bach
Piano concerto in F minor	Bach
Symphony in D major (Prague)	Mozart

Sunday's Program

Suite No. 2 in B minor, for flute and strings	Bach
Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D major, for orchestra with piano, violin and flute	Bach
Adagio and Fugue for string orchestra	Mozart
Symphony in G minor	Mozart

This Clipping From MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS

AUG 4 - 1945

New Music For Germany

Serge Koussevitsky with his music plan for conquered Germany complicates anew our already painfully complex life; yet he may have something there.

The orchestra conductor has the idea that Richard Wagner had more to do, perhaps, than Mein Kampf with stirring up the devil's brew which Hitler's Germany was. Was not Hitler forever taking time out to fill up at the well of Wagner that megalomania which lay behind his power? Had not all Germany been soaked for two generations in the Siegfried stuff and the Valkyrie rides which blew the bubbles for the German gods and set the German ego soaring into dreams of German might? Some men, when they want the grand feeling of ruling all the world, hunt up their favorite moonshine, drink it hot. The Germans bought a ticket to the concert and on the wings of Richard Wagner annexed the earth, moon and stars.

Now while the conquered Germans are being re-educated into respectable world citizens, our great musician says, we must bar them from their Wagner and from all other music of the sort that sets men wild. We had to make our Indians cease their war chants. That led too much to war. Let now the Germans be barred from the intoxication of the war music on which they have been fed.

All right! Let the Germans be fed hereafter on the Moonlight Sonata and Papa Haydn's harmless jingles and Mendelssohn's Wedding March—yes, make it Mendelssohn—the Jew—to rub it in—and Schubert's quieting melodies (not his March Militaire). Lull the Germans as you please. They have no liberty, no rights. But how, then, with ourselves?

Shall we subject ourselves to the Siegfried stuff out of which the wars are made? How about those Sousa marches which tingle us to our toes, make us want to fight our weight in wildcats, march right up to the cannon's mouth?

Free speech! Free press! Free religion! Listen to the fire-eater orator, read the subversive editor, tolerate the alien faith; but no free music, no subversive jazz?

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

AUG 5 - 1945

Music

By Edgar S. Van Olinda

THE second Sunday afternoon Bach-Mozart concert in the series of three by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be held in the opera auditorium this afternoon at 3:30 o'clock. The only tickets available are those of general admission, entitling the holder to sit outside the auditorium, under canvas in the event of rain. The program today is as follows:

Suite, No. 2 in B minor for flute and strings — Bach
Georges Laurent, Soloist
Brandenberg Concerto, No. 5 in D major — Bach
Soloists:
Alexander Borovsky, piano
William Kroll, violin
Georges Laurent, flute
Adagio and Fugue for strings — Mozart
Symphony in G minor — Mozart

The Ernest Williams Music Camp, Saugerties, will present its fourth weekly concert this afternoon in the camp auditorium, featuring the camp band, orchestra and choir. Guest conductors will be Josef Stopak, staff director of the American Broadcasting company and Engelbert Roentgen. Frederic Swift, president of the National Vocal association will direct the choir in five modern compositions. Dr. Albert Brown, Albany vocal teacher is a member of the teaching staff.

Dr. Reinald Werrenrath, Albany vocal teacher and director of the Mendelsohn club, is spending the summer at his camp near Dannemora. He will resume teaching in Albany in September and meet with the male group the first Wednesday in October.

John Seagle, well known concert, radio and recording baritone, has become associated with the General Electric television studios in Schenectady. Many of his "Church in the Wildwood' library recordings are used on Sunday throughout the United States. He is the son of Oscar Seagle, for many years assistant to the late Jean de Reszke, world-famous operatic tenor. Mr. Oscar Seagle conducts the Seagle Colony vocal school at Schroon lake.

Dr. Charles F. Stokes, professor of music, State College for Teachers, was the guest conductor for the concert of the Adirondack orchestra, Saranac Lake, last Friday evening. The orchestra is composed of the faculty and advanced students of the Deerwood Music center, Saranac inn. The soloists were Larry Eanet, pianist, Washington, D. C., and Paul Reisman, violinist, Iowa university.

BEAUMONT, TEXAS ENTERPRISE

AUG 5 - 1945

Tanglewood Festival

William Kroll, violinist, and Jascha Veissi, violist, will be soloists when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducts Mozart's "Konzertante Sinfonie" on the third and final ABC broadcast from the Tanglewood Music festival, Saturday at 7:30 p. m. over KFDM. Members of the Boston Symphony orchestra featured in the concerts also will play Bach's "Brandenburg Concerto No. 4" with Richard Burgin, assistant conductor of the ensemble, as violin soloist. The concert will mark the end of another season of ABC broadcasts by members of the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

AUG 5 - 1945

Indoor and Outdoor Views at the Tanglewood Festival

Daphne Smith

In the Berkshires, the Bach-Mozart programs continue with performances today, Saturday night and next Sunday afternoon. Here are two scenes of this event, the one above showing Dr. Koussevitzky congratulating his two piano soloists, Abram Chasins and Constance Keene, at the end of the first half of last Sunday's performance. At intermission time (below), the audience wanders over the extensive grounds. At left, part of the large tent, used for overflow crowds, can be seen.

[120]

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 1, 1945
THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—

Esplanade Concerts Out of Bounds for Boston Airlines

The roar of airplane motors will no longer drown out the soft harmonies of Arthur Fiedler's musicians as a result of an agreement reached yesterday by the local airlines, following complaints that Esplanade concert audiences get more propeller effects than pianissimo tones.

Carl Dahlen, representing the local air lines, met with Fiedler and Nelson Curtis, secretary of the Metropolitan District Commission, and assured them that for the duration of the concert season the planes would take a course out of line with Esplanade acoustics.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

AUG 5 - 1945

List Soloists for Last Bach-Mozart Festival

Richard Burgin, violinist, and Georges Laurent and George Madsen, flautists, will be soloists in the last of three programs in the current Bach-Mozart festival coming from Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., to be broadcast. The concert will begin Saturday night over WFCI at 8:30.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will lead a group of principals and other players from the Boston orchestra.

The program will consist of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major for violin, two flutes and string orchestra, and Mozart's Konzertante Sinfonie for violin and viola. William Kroll and Jascha Veissi, viola virtuoso, will take solo parts in the second piece.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES

AUG 5 - 1945

SEVITZKY SAYS U. S. IS MUSICAL NATION

Sees Both Sides of Tastes, Classical and Jive

NEW YORK, Aug. 4 (AP)—"We are an enormously musical nation. There is a tremendous interest in America in music," says Fabien Sevitzky. And he's not too concerned whether it is classical music or jazz, good music or bad.

As conductor of the Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra he might be supposed to be only on the side of the classics, but he is humble enough to see both sides. He approves jitterbug and jive because "those who listen to music today will want to listen to good music tomorrow."

Sevitzky has featured more American compositions on his programs than most conductors, but he finds fault with American composers. He says that they have not paid enough attention to general interest in music, and that they tend to use European themes instead of American, of which he claims there is a vast quantity, for instance, among hillbilly fiddlers and cowboy songsters.

Practical Musician

"I'm a practical musician," he admits. "I am even a little bit sane. One of my best friends is Fred Waring. I admire him because he knows how to sell music. As musicians, we all play it and also sell it. I don't agree with those who say music must be masterly whether or not anyone listens. Who wants to play to an empty hall?"

Sevitzky, in New York as guest conductor in the stadium concerts, was born in Russia but speaks English fluently, and emphatically asserts his right to say, "We Americans." Arriving in this country in 1923, he had become a citizen by 1928.

Audiences not only have pleasure listening to his concerts, but also have fun watching, for he is one of the most violent conductors. His hair is black and straight; he has black, heavy eyebrows thick enough to part; excited, his eyes flash and half a dozen wrinkles form straight across his wide forehead, enough to form a staff to write music on. He gestures freely, perhaps a heritage of his youthful training for the stage.

Says Writers Too Complicated

Sevitzky also complains that composers tend to write over the heads and hearts of American music lovers. Once he invited them to submit symphonic works based on Foster themes. Their compositions, he complains, lost all sight and sound of Foster; they were too distorted and their harmonization too modern. He's at work on a Foster composition himself.

To composers his advice is: Write, write, write, write, write!" and not to think that everything put on paper is a masterpiece. At the same time he acknowledges that many men of great talent writing today will be the masters of tomorrow.

What he wants, and believes the country needs, is compositions which "the public will like right off." He has in mind such works as Tschaikowsky's "1812 Overture," Schubert's "Serenade" and

His wife, who sings under the name of Maria Koussevitzky, was a leading soprano in Poland. They have toured Mexico and South America.

Brahms' "Lullaby." Patriotic or popular, or both, comprehensible at a first hearing and something to whistle.

Recent films about Gershwin and Chopin, Sevitzky declares, helped more than harmed those composers. Beethoven's name is known to thousands now, thanks to the victory theme taken from his fifth symphony.

Sevitzky's early musical training, like that of his uncle, Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston orchestra, was in the double bass. Among his teachers at the St. Petersburg Imperial Conservatory were Rimskykorsakov and Glazounov. In World War I he served in the Russian infantry.

Band Brought Him to U. S.

Ever since reading "The Last of the Mohicans" in a Russian translation, he had wanted to come to this country. He managed to leave Russia in 1922, after being turned back twice at the frontier; the trip was all the more complicated because he took his double bass with him. Ther were months of extreme poverty in Poland before his ability was recognized and rewarded.

For six years he was a member of the Philadelphia orchestra; he organized the renowned Philadelphia Chamber String Simfonietta and conducted it 18 years. In 1930 he went to Boston to conduct the People's Symphony and the Metropolitan Theater orchestras, and founded and conducted two of the first young-America musical groups, the young musicians' orchestra and the Sevitzky Vocal ensembles. A turn as guest conductor in Indianapolis in 1936 led to an offer of the permanent position, and he has held it ever since.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

AUG 5 - 1945

For the third and final concert of the Bach-Mozart Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., Saturday, Serge Koussevitsky will conduct Mozart's Sinfonia Concertante for Violin, Viola and Orchestra in E Flat Major, K. 364, with William Kroll and Jascha Veissi as soloists. Richard Burgin, assistant conductor of the ensemble, will be violin soloist in Bach's "Brandenburg" Concerto No. 4 in G Major. Flutists will be Georges Laurent and George Madsen.

(This program will be heard over KGKO at 7:30 p.m. Saturday.)

HOUSTON, TEX.
POST

AUG 7 - 1945

Symphony Conductor

To The Post:

The Boston Symphony honored a native Houstonian, Victor Alessandro, as guest conductor for their Independence day pops concert, July 4, 1945.

Victor, conductor of Oklahoma City Symphony, also conducted the Minneapolis Symphony when this organization played in Oklahoma City the past season.

The writer would like to have the Houston Symphony society accord this same honor to young Victor, another of our own who has made good, by having him as guest conductor for one of its concerts this coming season.

Readers of Time Magazine, April 16, 1945, are familiar with the story of this young musician's life, who started his conducting at about five years of age as conductor of the Baby-Band of the First Methodist church, Houston, and of the recognition and praise of his musicianship given him by the great Heifetz.

The writer was present when the late John Phillip Sousa, after hearing the Baby-Band play, predicted that the child conductor would some day be among the great.

(Mrs.) NORMA LOUISE BARNETT,
527 Hathaway, Houston, Texas.

YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR

AUG 5 - 1945

Serge Koussevitzky conducts the Boston Symphony orchestra, heard on WFMJ during most of the year, and the Boston Pops orchestra, a favorite summer feature.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

AUG 5 1945

THE FIFTH PROGRAM

. . . of the Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra on Saturday evening. Dr. Sergei Koussevitsky will direct the concert which will be broadcast over ABC at 7:30 and will have as soloists William Kroll, violin, and Jascha Veissi, viola player. They will be heard in Mozart's Konzertante Sinfonie for Violin and Viola. Other numbers will be the Brandenburg Concerti Nos. 2 and 4 and Mozart's Serenade in B. Flat for Wind Instruments. On Sunday afternoon the final program will be given. It will not be broadcast. Robert Casadesus, pianist, will be the soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in C Minor. Other numbers will be the Bach Suite in D. Major; Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, and Mozart's Symphony in E Flat Major.

This Clipping From ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

AUG 5 - 194

WILLIAM KROLL, violinist, and Jascha Veissi, violinist, will be the soloists when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducts Mozart's "Konzertante Sinfonie" during the third and final broadcast from the Tanglewood Music Festival on Saturday at 8:30 p. m. over WSLS. Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, featured in the concerts, also will play Bach's "Brandenburg Concerto No. 4" with Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the ensemble, as violin soloist. Other soloists will be Georges Laurent and George Madsen, flutists.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

AUG 5 - 1945

Borovsky Piano Soloist At Berkshire Festival

By RAYMOND MORIN

PITTSFIELD, Aug. 4.—Serge Koussevitzky wielded his baton tonight over some forty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with more than his usual enthusiasm. The event was the second of three Berkshire festival weekends of concerts at Tanglewood. Alexander Borovsky was piano soloist.

The weather man fully atoned for last Saturday night's drenching and the theater concert hall was jammed with 1500 auditors occupying the full seating capacity of both auditorium and stage as well as many hundred who sat under the canvas top at the entrance and hundred more who lounged about on the ground.

More Bach and Mozart

The presence of so many signifies more than la lackadaisical interest in Bach and Mozart—the musical fare of this festival. There is considerable inconvenience in getting here. Many required the combined agencies of train, bus and taxi. The enthusiasm tonight was more than formal or even dutiful. Every movement of the opening Mozart "Divertimento in B Flat Major" (K 287) fairly sparkled. Those thousands of Worcesterites who have witnessed Koussevitky's meticulous instructions to his men know what I mean.

Even in Mozart and Bach he brings exciting drama and brightness. In the allegro movements his insistence on technical perfection was granted. The "Adagio" indicated again (as it did here last Summer) that the production of luscious tone is second nature to the string section.

Borovsky Pleases

Alexander Borovsky, craftsman of the keyboard proved many things about himself in his performance of the Bach "Concerti in D Minor and F Minor." First of all he demonstrated great respect of the unequalled polyphonist. He gave neat, unaffected, direct technical execution. And at this point it might be well to mention that this unpretentious gravel-floored hall has a startling faculty of crystalizing the tone of instruments. The string ensemble is heard with an intimacy that Symphony Hall and our own Auditorium don't permit. For that reason the woodwinds are particularly on the spot as there are no concealments for tonal discrepancies caused either by error or by weather conditions.

A strong inducement for hearing music at Tanglewood is the acoustical advantage of not only this hall but of the vast shed which is in wartime retirement.

Mr. Borovsky (not to be confused with Alexander Brailowsky who played a week ago) made Bach persuasive and not a bunch of dried sticks. There was fluency and consistent charm as well as warmth and human quality. What is more musically deadly than an unimaginative performance of Bach with or without the support of the Boston Symphony? Of the two works played we lean more favorably toward the "Concerto in D Minor" for its lack of restraint and greater conviction.

The "Prague Symphony" by Mozart concluded the program. The fourth of the festival's six concerts will be given tomorrow afternoon.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

AUG 6 - 1945

TANGLEWOOD FETE FEATURES PIANIST

Lucas Foss, 22, of the Boston Symphony, Wins Applause in Bach Concerto

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 5—An audience of 3,000 this afternoon heard the fourth concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. The theatre concert hall was filled to capacity with 200 seated on the stage. At the box office it was said that the evening performance was attended by 2,700.

Today's program feature was Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D major, for orchestra with piano, violin and flute. Lucas Foss, 22-year-old Boston Symphony pianist and composer, received an ovation, in which Richard Burgin, violin, and Georges Laurent, flute, of the orchestra also shared. For three years Mr. Foss was a student at Dr. Koussevitzky's Tanglewood Music Center. He is at present at the MacDowell Colony, Peterboro, N. H.

Present this afternoon were Mrs. Joseph P. Kennedy, wife of the former American Ambassador to the Court of St. James, and her daughter, Mrs. Charles Burke of Boston, who are at Heaton Hall, Stockbridge. Also present were Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Hopewell Hepburn of Concord, Mass. Mrs. Hepburn, the former Rosamond Sturgis Dixey, and her aunt, the late Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan, gave historic Tanglewood to the Boston Symphony in 1937.

Last night's audience was generous in its applause for Alexander Borovsky, piano soloist in two Bach concertos.

PITTSFIEL
BERKSHIR

AUG 6 -

Tanglew
Weather

Koussevi
Men Ple
Concert

By JAY C. ROS

The second pair
Bach-Mozart
ayed in the concer ewood yesterday
turday evening un al weather conditi ires can offer.
zky, directing some Boston Sympho luding all the fir ve two remarkable diences which in eded any records lished for this par

rfect Weather

Anyone who attem report on the mus the semi-rustic or cumstances which must also re
orts, for they play part in the sche
re. This second o s of the festival w favorable as the f greeable. For b air was coolish b clear. Yesterday ns of warm, brigh preceding evening of brilliant star
music-lovers
upon which to lo

N. ADAMS, MA
TRANSCRI

AUG 6 - 194

Bach-Moz oncert Pre

00 Music Lo acted to Ta — Hundreds lankets on ousing Shortag fourth concert i Bach-Mozart festiv

the Boston Sym
a under the directi evitsky, yesterday ated ers to Tanglewood
t August weather enjoyment of an ram.

ees outside the co l as the marquee trance, were cro hundred perso s on the lawn w of the orchestra.
d concert hall
n type of archit est notes of music ible, even outside on Simpson, box o stimated the atten night at 2,700 perso who followed the ng blankets to sit ather too chilly fo al hundred perso or the Sunday co ir lunches under d pines at Tanglew
Saturday found it using accommoda ber of them were o Springfield to week-end audience princesses, Eugeni e, Sapieha, former Vladimir Kouda

heffield with the he audience were
t. de Viry of Ship
nd Savoie, France,
e Robinson Smith,

erkshire Symphon

fth concert will night and the si next Sunday af from all the con oston Symphony

INFORMATION OBSCURED

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

AUG 6 - 1945

Tanglewood Has Perfect Weather for Concerts

Koussevitzky Directs as Boston Symphony Men Please Audience Which Overfills Concert Hall by Hundreds

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The second pair of concerts of [illegible] Bach-Mozart Festival was [illegible] hall at Tan-[illegible] yesterday afternoon and [illegible] evening under the most [illegible] conditions the Berk-[illegible] can offer. Serge Kousse-[illegible] directing some 40 men from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, [illegible]uding all the first desk men, gave two remarkable programs to [illegible] which in numbers ex-eeded any records previously es-ablished for this particular hall.

erfect Weather

Anyone who attempts to render report on the musical activities t the semi-rustic or quasi-bucolic rcumstances which are Tangle-[illegible] must also render weather eports for they play a very defi-[illegible] part in the scheme of things [illegible] This second of three week ds of the festival was as perfect d favorable as the first had been sagreeable. For both concerts e air was coolish but exception-y clear. Yesterday there were ears of warm, bright sun, and on e preceding evening a vast ceil-g of brilliant stars and moon. any music-lovers took blan-ts upon which to lounge outside the hall as had been the custom in other years when the huge shed had been employed for the concerts.

The concert yesterday afternoon closed with the big G minor Mozart symphony. It was given a performance of the same magnificent stature which had characterized the playing of its sister symphony the C minor, last week-end at the first brace of concerts. This is no experimental Mozart, but the convincing result of years, of decades of polishing, adjusting and balancing until today, we get a performance which marks the zenith of present-day orchestral progress Significant, too, is the fact that Mr. Koussevitzky adheres scrupulously to the printed score and the indications. This is authoritative there are no whims or fantasies nothing but true and real Mozart

The Mozart Adagio and Fugue for string orchestra, (K546), which had preceded the symphony, was also played with tremendous intensity. This is one of the most mature pieces of Mozart. The adagio makes big demands on the string and the ensuing fugue calls for the last ounce of artistic effort that can be produced. It was truly an heroic accomplishment.

Laurent Solos

The first half of the program had been exclusively Bach: the Suite No. 2 in B minor for flute with strings, and the 5th Brandenburg concerto. George Laurent was the flute soloist in the Suite. The orchestra was reduced to half its size for the number, and then the remaining half was so restrained in order to maintain a proper relationship with the soloist that the result was one of rather innocuous pleasure, quite devoid of light and shadow. Mr. Laurent blows a beautiful tone and plays with unusual musicianship, but his part is doubled for so much of the time with the first violins that his opportunities for emerging from the group are not as numerous as his ability might cause the audience to wish. An airplane droning overhead had the good sense and courtesy to drone in B minor.

Foss Wins Ovation

In the Brandenburg, the soloists were Lukas Foss, piano; Richard Burgin, violin and, again Mr. Laurent. The piano was placed at the center front of the stage as for a piano concerto, which distorted the importance of that instrument in the general ensemble, for there is really only one spot, in the lengthy cadenza at the close of the first movement, where the piano deserves this placement. Otherwise it is more just one of the larger ensemble. However, in his single opportunity, the youthful Foss infused his solo with such a zest and animation that he won a tremendous and thunderous, spontaneous ovation. His enthusiasm inclined him to unsteadiness but he came through with everything well under complete control, and took his many recalls with humble and naive astonishment.

Saturday Program

Saturday evening's concert was consistently impressive. Between the Mozart B flat divertimento for strings with two horns and the concluding "Prague" symphony, Alexander Borovsky played two Bach concertos, the D minor and the F minor. These are not vehicles on which a soloist may ride to personal glory by means of bravura playing; rather the piano is considered an integral part of the composition. The orchestra has much more importance than to offer support and accompaniment. The temptation to a soloist, therefore, to exaggerate wherever possible, to draw personal attention is great, but Mr. Borovsky was not lured into any such false protrusion. The artistic bond between him and the orchestra was a happy combination, particularly in the D minor, in which he, with Koussevitzky's asstistance, forged a magnificent performance. Mr. Borovsky's unaffected simplicity, but authoritative dominance pervaded every note he played. In the lovely arioso of the F minor, he spun the gentle melody as preciously as the piano can simulate what was intended more appropriately for a violin. The ovation he received was not only genuine but all the more significant because he won it in efforts which offer absolutely no opportunity for show. His gracious manner suited his exceptional abilities.

The Mozart divertimento revealed the little orchestra's string section in some phases of its possibilities that had not before been on display. The variations and several other instances of virtuosity affirmed their qualities forcefully. The orchestra has rarely exceeded its effectiveness in responding to the demands of its peerless leader. Mr. Koussevitzky treated it, as it deserved, as a miniature, and fashioned every detail with minute care and precision. The result was a variety of color nuances and contrasts, within a propertly visualized frame to effect a masterpiece of execution. The two horns and the strings were able and adequate, in the main, to stand the spotlight into which such a work projects them.

The D major (Prague) symphony was played with the same spaciousness which was the spirit of the evening. This is one of the later and more loftily conceived of Mozart's symphonies, and is one in which he is no longer in a decorative mood, but in a deeper and more introspective expressiveness. There is a lovely gentle second theme in the first movement, especially beautiful after the more vigorous first one. It would not have suffered if it had been even more quietly tender and relaxed than Mr. Koussevitzky elected to take it. But, over all, it was a fitting climax to a program which was a solid contribution to the standard of performance that is the rule at these concerts.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

h Bach-Mozart Concert Presented

00 Music Lovers Attracted to Tanglewood — Hundreds Spread Blankets on Lawn — Housing Shortage Noted

e fourth concert in the cur-Bach-Mozart festival, present-y the Boston Symphony or-ra under the direction of Serge sevitsky, yesterday afternoon cted an estimated 3,000 muvers to Tanglewood in Lenox. ct August weather contributed e enjoyment of an exception-ogram.

tees outside the concert hall, ll as the marquee tent near ntrance, were crowded, and l hundred persons spread ts on the lawn within easy t of the orchestra. The pinehed concert hall is of the en type of architecture and west notes of music are clear-dible, even outside it.

don Simpson, box office man-estimated the attendance Sat-night at 2,700 persons. Music who followed the practice of ing blankets to sit on found eather too chilly for comfort.
ral hundred persons arrived for the Sunday concert and ir lunches under the giant d pines at Tanglewood. Early Saturday found it difficult to using accommodations and ber of them were forced to o Springfield to spend the week-end audiences included princesses, Eugenia Ruspeli e Sapieha, formerly of Mos-d Vladimir Koudacheff, who effield with the prince. Althe audience were Baroness t de Viry of Shipton court, nd Savoie, France, and Miss e Robinson Smith, president Berkshire Symphonic festith concert will be given night and the sixth and next Sunday afternoon.

from all the concerts go oston Symphony corpora-

---

and the ngle-urday mbers estra, will Conurgin, con-violin ll . be Mad-

ETE
NIST

Boston
lause

An ternoon this seaphony Or-at itzcon-capacity
At the ttended was o No. with Foss, pianova-rgin, flute,

For udent ewood ent at rboro,

re Mrs.
of the dor to nd her rke of n Hall, t were opewell
. Mrs. samond nt, the Tappan, to the s gener-lexander in two

Perfect Weather Conditions Add to Tanglewood Pleasure

Springfield Repub Aug 6

3000 Persons Hear Program

Tanglewood, Lenox, Aug. 5—An audience of 3000 heard the fourth concert in the current Bach-Mozart Boston Symphony orchestra festival this cool, sunny afternoon. There were 1500 general admissions.

Hall, Tent Filled

The concert hall was filled to capacity, also the marquee tent near the entrance with all available settees and hundreds squatted on blankets spread upon the lawn. Although the pine sheathed concert hall is of the peculiar Saarinen type of architecture, its acoustics are perfect and the lowest notes of music carry far.

Nearly 650 Cars Noted

Gordon Simpson, box office manager, said last night's attendance was 2700. Many found spreading blankets on the lawn quite chilly. Lieut-Col James Bruce McIntyre, in charge of grounds, estimated 650 cars were parked in two areas this afternoon. Col Joseph T. Keating of the Lee state police was in command of a unit and directed traffic on the grounds. There were 15 World war 1 veterans under Deputy Sheriff Fred N. Cummings, Pittsfield.

The century-old hemlock hedge gardens were objectives for many visitors, a large contingent of whom arrived before noon and picnicked beneath the giant elms and pines. Supt Ward J. Gasto was questioned about his honest-to-goodness, weedless garden, on which annually he spreads two inches of coarse sand after his vegetables have had a good start. Result—the vegetables thrive in hardpan soil; the weeds die and remain dead; no garden backache at Tanglewood.

Rooms at Premium

All available hotel rooms were so scarce last night that some motorists drove to Springfield for accommodations. Mrs W. Rockwood Gibbs and Mrs E. Norman Scott were among those who entertained at dinner today at Red Lion inn, Stockbridge, and later took their guests to Tanglewood.

With Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of Berkshire Symphonic festival, and Miss Marion Oliver were Malcolm Vaughan and George Sandor.

Wilhelm Willeke, leader of the South Mountain String quartet, Pittsfield, was with Samuel Gilbert Colt. Three princesses were in the audience—Eugenia Ruspoli of Rome; Sapieha, formerly of Moscow, and Vladimir Koudacheff, who with the prince is at Sheffield, also Baroness Humbert De Viry of Shipton court, Lenox, and Savoie, France.

The fifth concert will be given Saturday night and the sixth and final one next Sunday afternoon. All proceeds go to the Boston Symphony corporation.

Soloists Add To Enjoyment

By VICTOR PRAHL

The most perfect weather imaginable brought forth the largest gathering of the season for the fourth concert of the Bach-Mozart festival at Tanglewood under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. For once the day and music were in tune. With the cooling breezes, and the slender shadows of Tanglewood's tall pines extending over the lawn, the bright sunshine proved to be a reassuring element, in appreciation of which no notes were ever piped in the afternoon by any faun sweeter than those from the flute of Georges Laurent, who played the solo part in the opening "Suite No 2 in B minor" by Bach and the same master's "Brandenburg Concerto No 5" in D major. On the technical side there was clearness of articulation in the difficult skips of intervals, the execution of the fiatura, and one admired as well the breath control in the extended phrases of the "Sarabande," and the bit of virtuosity in the final "Badinerie." The strings substantiated the musical structure and played with their usual beauty of tone.

Gifted Pianist

There was equality of balance and a happy give-and-take of solo passages in the Brandenburg concerto, with Lukas Foss at the piano, Richard Burgin, the violin, and Mr Laurent, the flute. But as the piano plays the greater role, the solo honors went to Mr Foss, who kept the tone of the large open Steinway in scale with the flute and violin, answering the thematic figuration in their own language. In the extended solo passage of the first movement, he built a fiery climax—his tone was musical in the moving "Adagio," and the rapid passages of the "Allegro," cleanly smooth and musically expressive as they were technically difficult. Dr Koussevitsky and the men of the orchestra joined the audience in an ovation for this gifted young musician.

This is the one program of the series in which the works of Bach comprised the first half of the program and those of Mozart the second, and we preferred it thus, the span of intermission providing a break, and easing the change from one to the other, which at times has seemed a bit abrupt. However, in today's concert, Bach flowered naturally into Mozart, for in the "Adagio and Fugue for Strings," a two-piano work which Mozart rescored for this combination, he exhibits his skill and achievement in counterpoint, gleaned from a close and diligent study of his great predecessor. The purity of line with which the strings defined the introduction of each part in this four-voiced fugue was clarifying to the architecture of the composition. Its realization in the terms of Dr Koussevitsky's conception was truly magnificent.

Symphony Ceases Program

This exceptional concert closed with one of Mozart's three greatest symphonies (all three are being performed in this series), the "G minor," and as played by Dr Koussevitsky, it is our favorite of the three. This symphony may lack trumpets and drums, but its elemental musical substance, so rich thematically, its subtlety of modulation, its dynamic qualities and its gentle melancholy, coupled with lightness and grace, make of it one of the greatest of all Mozart symphonies. The first time we entered the shed at Tanglewood some years ago this work was being performed and Dr Koussevitsky's interpretation seems to have become an integral part of the scene.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

AUG 6 - 1945

---

ning Eagle, Pittsfield, Mass. Monday, August 6

Many Out-of-Towners Here For Second Festival Week End

With a larger audience on the benches and the lawns of Tanglewood than in the opera-concert hall seating 1400, nearly 3000 persons heard the fourth concert of the Bach-Mozart Festival yesterday afternoon. Twenty-seven hundred attended the Saturday evening program.

Knowing that all seats had been sold, music lovers came from as far distant points as New York and Boston with blankets and folding chairs to listen from the lawns. Two hours before the concerts people had arrived to secure seats on the benches or stroll about the gardens, some with picnic baskets.

Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees who had not attended the first week end were Edward A. Taft with Mrs. Taft and Henry B. Cabot with Mrs. Cabot. M. A. deWolfe Howe returned from Boston. Philip Allen, chairman of the concert for the benefit of Russian War Relief that Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave in 1942, was present with Mrs. Allen.

Mrs. Kennedy Present

In the audience were Mrs. Joseph P. Kennedy, wife of the former American ambassador to Great Britain, and her daughter, Mrs. Charles Burke of Boston; three princesses, Eugenia Ruspoli of Rome; Sapieha, formerly of Moscow; and Vladimir Koudacheff, who is staying in Sheffield with the prince; and the Baroness Humbert DeViry of Shipton Court, Lenox, and Savoie, France.

Mr. and Mrs. William E. Dodge Stokes entertained at a picnic luncheon for 65 at Mahkeenac Boat Club Saturday noon and Mrs. Newbold Morris gave a luncheon for Princess Ruspoli and Prince and Princess Droutzkoy at her home at Brookhurst, Lenox.

Other out of town guests were Miss Henrietta Loder and Peter Lubbock of London and Capt. Norbert Bogdan of the AMG in Germany, with Mr. and Mrs. George K. Livermore; Mrs. Victor Malcolm, who will sail tonight on the Queen Mary for her home in England; Mrs. Wallace K. Harrison of Washington, with Mr. and Mrs. Thomas N. Mabry; Mrs. Goodhue Livingston Jr., of New York, with her mother, Mrs. Owen Johnson of Stockbridge, and Mr. Johnson; Mrs. Margaret Grant, director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in 1942 and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation School in 1943, with her son, Harold; Charles L. Safford of Bryn Mawr, formerly organist and director of music at Williams College, with Mrs. Safford, their daughter, Ellen, and sister, Miss Mary Tappen, of Philadelphia, who are spending the summer in Williamstown.

The third and last series of concerts will be next Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon.

Mozart and Bach Devotees Hear Choice Program at Tanglewood

By Willard M. Clark

STOCKBRIDGE, Aug. 5—It was good to be at Tanglewood today; good to see the crowd of Mozart and Bach devotees and good to hear again the incomparable ensemble of Boston symphony orchestra players which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has with him.

The nature of these concerts is intimate and the small music hall is the ideal site for this music even though it could not possibly hold the number of persons who are attending this Bach-Mozart Festival. For the convenience of these persons, a tent has been erected so that the outdoor audience may face the center doors of the music hall, and additional chairs have been placed near the side doors; then, of course, there are hundreds of other persons who prefer to sit on the ground when they listen to music. Folks return again and again to these concerts and intermission takes on the air of a happy Old Home Week.

For this afternoon, Dr. Koussevitzky prepared a choice program, a program which was superbly played. It opened with a definitive performance of Bach's "Suite No. 2 in B Minor, for Flute and Strings." The flutist was, of course, the greatest of them all, Georges Laurent. The various short movements were played with exquisite regard for their form and musical content, played so beautifully, in fact, that an ovation followed.

Then came the "Brandenburg Concerto No. 5, in D Major," for orchestra, with piano, violin and flute. The six so-called Brandenburg concertos are among the most rewarding of Bach's works for the average listener as well as for the professional. In this work, the string orchestra partly accompanies the trio and partly competes with it in concertizing manner. The trio was composed of Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, and surely one of the very great violinists; Lukas Foss, orchestra pianist, and, again, Mr. Laurent. It was our first opportunity of hearing Mr. Foss since he took over the post vacated by Sanroma. Here is a most talented pianist, one who is always within the frame, whose technical facility is used only as a means to an end. He played most beautifully and was greatly admired, as were his colleagues, Messrs. Burgin and Laurent. Particularly effective was the adagio reserved for the three solo instruments.

Following intermission, Dr. Koussevitzky introduced Mozart's rarely heard "Adagio and Fugue for String Orchestra." It is a fine example of the mature Mozart, full of emotional contrasts, rich in melody and, as always, elegant.

The concert concluded with a fine performance of Mozart's "G Minor Symphony, No. 40." The Bostonians have been heard to greater advantage in this work, but there was so much that was fine, that it would be carping to dwell upon those passages which were played with less perfection than one has a right to expect from the Boston player. Surely this G minor symphony is one of the greatest ever penned. It leaves one a bit breathless as it courses its expressive way.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

AUG 5 - 1945

Tanglewood Theater Filled For Bach-Mozart Program

Violin Section Does Solo Part

By VICTOR PRAHL

Tanglewood, Lenox, Aug. 4—The third concert of the Bach-Mozart festival given at Tanglewood tonight under the direction of Dr Serge Koussevitsky opened with one of Mozart's masterpieces, well remembered for its superb performance at last year's festival. The first violin section again distinguished themselves by playing in unison the part usually allotted to a solo instrument, when the work is performed by a chamber group. The clarity of the figuration in the theme and variations, the tonal beauty and perfection of phrasing in the moving "Adagio" and "Andante," the unity of ensemble in the final "Molto Allegro," as well as the periodic cadenzas, were superlatively beautiful playing, in the best Mozart manner, and again one realized that one was listening to what is probably the finest string section in existence.

The program was further significant in that it served to introduce the gifted pianist, Alexander Borovsky, in two seldom heard works by Bach, the concertos in D minor and F minor. Having heard Mr Borovsky at numerous concerts in Paris, it was a pleasure to hear him in this setting and once more admire the many admirable qualities of his subtle pianism, particularly the velvety texture of his singing tone in the slow movements of both compositions, the sturdy, authoritative manner in which he announced the opening theme of the "D minor," and the authentic Bach style with which both works were projected throughout. The overflowing audience reacted with great enthusiasm to both of these spirited works, and the artist was recalled many times. It was an auspicious debut.

The concluding number was Mozart's "Symphony in D major," usually known as the "Prague" because it was first performed in that city in 1787. Known also as the "symphony without a minuet," this work is not of the Italian type, so dear to the heart of the master, but a full sized composition in the Viennese style, expressing all that it has to say in the very rich content of three full movements. Listening to the manner in which the lyric portions of the "Andante" soared forth, as well as the clean delineation of its poyphonic character, provided a rare musical experience. After a spirited performance of the lively "Finale," enthusiasm ran high and there were repeated bravos during which Dr Kousevitsky invited the orchestra to arise and share in the reception.

Although pianists seem to be featured in this year's series, tomorrow's program will offer by way of contrast, Bach's 5th Brandenburg Concert in which the violin and flute will be solo instruments, as well as the piano.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

AUG 9 1945

Week-end Concerts

From the festival of the National Composers Congress at Colorado Springs, an all-Beethoven program will be broadcast this Saturday at 4 p.m. over WNAB-ABC featuring Johana Harris, pianist, and the Roth Quartet. The program includes the Piano Sonata, Op. 109, the String Quartet, Op. 135, and "The Tempest", Piano Sonata, Op. 31 No. 2.

William Kroll, violinist and Jascha Veissi, violinist, will be soloists as Serge Koussevitzky conducts Mozart's "Konzertante Sinfonie" from the Tanglewood Festival over WNAB-ABC at 8:30 Saturday night. Also on the program will be Bach's "Brandenburg Concerto No. 4" with Richard Burgin as violin soloist and George Daurent and George Madsen, flutists.

The Detroit Symphony, on WICC-MBS at 8:30 Saturday night, will perform Handel's Concerto for Oboe and Orchestra with Dirk Van Emmerick as oboe soloist. Valter Poole will also conduct the Bach-Ormandy Chorale, Haydn's G Major Symphony No. 13, the overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and Strauss' "Tales from the Vienna Woods."

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

AUG 8 - 1945

This Clipping From
POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
NEW YORKER
(same article abridged) also Dallas Times Herald

AUG 8 - 1945

A Woman's New York

Extra Pianist Tunes In To Help the Bostonians

By ALICE HUGHES

NEW YORK, Aug. 7.—Maybe you heard Alex Brailowsky and 40 men of the Boston Symphony under Ole Massa Koussevitzky do a beautiful job on Mozart's A major concerto on the air the other Saturday evening. But only a dozen of us, in a living room at Rye, N. Y., and not in the Berkshires, really heard the whole concert, because where we were Ania Dorfman chipped in on the piano.

Never, perhaps, was a musical event like the one we heard. After dinner at Miss Tobe's summer home we were sitting around the parlor when it came time for Koussy's concert at Tanglewood. Ania, who had played with our Philharmonic at Lewisohn Stadium only a few nights before, was soon to play the Mozart piece herself in concert, and this was a fine chance for her to get a little workout on it with the great Boston band—a couple of hundred miles away on a rainy hill. Well, you never saw or heard anything like the ensuing two-piano recital in your born days, and what a chance for the piano soloists!

She Did the Impossible

Ania sat at Tobe's piano whose keys are apt to fly off any minute, and hit the executant on the nose, and did everything such as artist can never do at a public concert. When she considered the maestro's tempo too slow, she hollered at the loud speaker, and between her parts she got up and walked around making cracks—leaping back to the keyboard just before her cue to take over from the band. And if she felt like singing a passage, she did.

Stylist Tobe was just back from a month in Paris and London, and that evening we were saying bye-bye to a businessman friend off to Europe by Clipper. His English hostess was to be a duchess, no less, and when he saw my wondrous new white translucent raincoat, he insisted on buying it right off my torso as a present for Her Nibs.

Brenda Still Makes News

Brenda Diana Duff Frazier Kelly still is news in these parts as former glamour queen and great beauty of our saloon society, even though she is a staid married lady now. Today headlines scream that she expects a teentsy baby in a few months and that she and her big spouse, "Shipwreck" Kelly, are going to quit living in such outlandish spots as Havana and Buenos Aires, and settle right down on a farm they've bought near East Norwich, Conn. So Brenda is going to be both a mamma and a real, way-down dirt soil farmer and, if she visits the Stork Club, it will be just to sell Billingsley some scallions.

Many of the stylish East Side homes that aren't torn down are sold to big names in show business. Gypsy Rose Lee has had a beauty, Producer Billy Rose is almost an old settler on fashionable Sutton pl., and now Irish Tenor Morton Downey has bought a five-story 5th ave. house—for an Irish Lullaby, maybe.

Alfy Gives In

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

AUG 6 - 1945

Tanglewood at Scenic Best for Concert

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, Aug. 5.—As Artur Rodzinski, famous conductor of the New York Philharmonic so aptly expressed it to me during the intermission of today's Berkshire Festival concert, "Music at Tanglewood is one of the most inspiring of musical adventures."

Tanglewood was at its scenic best this afternoon and the music superb. Serge Koussevitzky and his forty Boston Symphony players performed the fourth in the series of six Berkshire concerts with artistic brilliance.

It was a particularly cosmopolitan audience. Royalty was well represented, and among the musical luminaries were Albert Spalding and Robert Casadesus. Among the hundreds who sat on the grounds surrounding the capacity-filled auditorium were people from all walks of life. There was a large representation of servicemen and women. One young painter from Washington, D. C., said he spent the night on the porch of a Pittsfield schoolhouse so as to hear today's concert.

For the benefit of those who have not seen previous reviews, this is a festival of three weekends of music by Bach and Mozart. Wartime restrictions have necessitated the temporary closing of the huge Tanglewood shed, but it will probably be placed in use again next Summer.

Average of 2000

There has nevertheless been an average of 2000 people at each of the concerts, which are given in the unpretentious theater concert hall which is prosaic in its construction but acoustically perfect.

As before, the musicians and audience have been imbued with an almost fervent interest in this scholarly musical diet. Today's program was initiated with a scintillating performance of Bach's "Suite No. 2 in B Minor." It is scored for about 20 stringed instruments and flute. Georges Laurent, familiar to Worcester through his symphony and Art Museum appearances, played the flute score. Mr. Laurent read it with wizardry and accomplished the difficult task of bringing plaintive, brilliant and gentle qualities to music that could easily have reverted back to the dead arts. During these two weekends we have not as yet heard any Bach that lacked vitality or sustained interest.

Each of the movements of this afternoon's work had an individual silhouette of sound. The "overture" had sharply drawn and sturdy lines, the "rondeau" was light and graceful, the "sarabande" was gentle and reflective, the "bourre" resumed a strong narrative, the "polonaise" was vigorous and the closing "badinerie" jovial.

Brandenburg Concerto

The "Brandenburg Concerto, No. 5 in D Major" (Bach) had the services of Lukas Foss, pianist; Richard Burgin, violinist, and Georges Laurent, flutist. Mr. Foss handled the ornate virtuosity of the piano part with deft fingers and intelligence. One of the highspots of the work was the beautiful trio dialogue of the Second Movement which also brought Burgin and Laurent very happily into the foregrounds.

The Mozart works heard were the "Adagio and Fugue for String Orchestra" and the familiar "Symphony in G Minor." Much should be written of these that space does not permit. The series will be concluded with next weekend's concerts on Saturday night and Sunday afternoon.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

AUG 6 1945

Pianist Lukas Foss Wins Ovation at Tanglewood

By CARL E. LINDSTROM
Special to The Hartford Times

Lenox, Mass.—A debonair young pianist by the name of Lukas Foss was the hero of Sunday's concert at Tanglewood. As a soloist he was only one of three, for Georges Laurent, flutist, and Richard Burgin, violinist, shared honors with him in the fifth of Bach's Brandenburg Concertos and no one was better aware than he of the coequal status of the members of the concertino in this gladsome and popular classic.

When a violent burst of applause signalled the audience release from pent-up and excited attention Foss bobbed up perfunctorily in acknowledgment and then deferentially turned to his colleagues and Dr. Koussevitzky but his misguided modestly was quickly overruled. The clamoring listeners indicated emphatically that it was he whom they chose to honor.

The composer had played a favorite of course in committing to the clavier so prominent a part in this concerto, but Foss took no advantage. It was not until the prolonged and elaborate cadenza of the first movement that his taste, his musicianship, his complete technical mastery came into play. This was the definitive cadenza—not merely a display interlude but an elaboration of the material previously stated but done with such skill and intensification that the listeners hung upon every note with bated breath. It was a marvel of logic and astutely sustained interest. Playing in a state of complete relaxation and artistic afflatus, he was able to generate excitement to the point where the entire audience breather an audible murmur of admiration when the ensemble came into the final tutti.

The adagio belonged to Messrs. Burgin, Foss and Laurent in equal right for it is practically an unaccompanied trio but it is no derogation of either of the other two that Foss consistently distinguished himself. His trills were exceptional in that they had no mechanical beginning and ending. He simply pulled them effortlessly out of the air when wanted.

Mr. Laurent had his innings in the B minor Suite of Bach for flute and strings. His tone was broad rather than pointed; sweet rather than piercing. His phrasing was exemplary and his breathing expert.

Sunday's performance of the G minor Symphony will never be erased from the minds of those who heard it. All previous associations were washed out in an urgently beautiful and possessing interpretation. An afternoon loveliness, faintly melancholic, pervades this precious composition and we had on this occasion the rarest of Berkshire afternoons, the perfect orchestra and an inspired leader.

This Clipping From
YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR

AUG 1 1945

William Kroll, violinist, and Jascha Veissi, violist, will be the soloists when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducts Mozart's "Konzertante Sinfonie" during the third and final broadcast from the Tanglewood Music Festival at 8:30 p. m. on WFMJ. From the instrumental music of Bach, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 5; the suites, No. 2 in B minor, No. 3, in D major, and No. 4, in D major.

This Clipping From CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

AUG 1 1945

★ ★ William Kroll, violinist, and Jascha Veissi, violinist, get solo spots when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky directs the Boston Summer Orchestra in the Mozart Konzertante Symphonie in a Tanglewood program, WJW at 8:30. You also hear the Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 with Concertmaster Richard Burgin, violinist, and Georges Laurent and George Madsen, flutists, as soloists.

Tanglew
Featur

Alexander Borovsky, C
Applause

Saturday night's concert o
Boston Symphony Orchestra attended by 2,700 people an audience was generous in its plause for Alexander Boro piano soloist in two Bach certos. The program cons of Mozart's Divertimento i flat major and Symphony major, Bach's Piano Concer
F minor and Piano Concer
D minor. Borovsky's playin the Adagio, second moveme the Piano Concerto in D m was the highlight of the ing's performance.

An audience of 3,000 hear fourth concert Sunday afte of the Boston Symphony chestra's Bach-Mozart Fe at Tanglewood, under the tion of Dr. Serge Koussev
The theatre concert hall wa ed to capacity with 200 on the stage.

Sunday's program featur
Bach's Brandenburg Concer
5 in D major, for orchestra piano, violin and flute.
Foss, 22-year-old Boston phony pianist and compose ceived an ovation, in which ard Burgin, violin, and G

JASCHA VEISSI who w Mozart work. The

PITTSFIELD, M
BERKSHIRE EA

AUG 11

Patrons o
For Bach-

Prominent musicians of music arrived in the yesterday and today f series of the Bach-Moz that Serge Koussevitzk tomorrow afternoon
wood.

Mr. and Mrs. William daughter, Barbara, cam from their summer hom stock, N. Y. to stay w
Mrs. Jay C. Rosenfeld a
Mrs. Veissi arrived fron to stay in Lenox. Mr be solo violinist for to cert and Mr. Veissi w solo viola part.

Olin Downes, leading for the New York Time the festival for the firs present at the rehearsa
ing. Mme. Nadia Bou standing woman cond has taught in Califor past two years since re the music department
College will be in the a

Leonard Bernstein,
sistant conductor of th
Philharmonic Orchestr mer student in conduc
Koussevitzky at the B

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

AUG 1 0 1945

Theater School Buys Lenox Estate

EAST HAMPTON, N. Y., Aug 9 (AP)—Leighton Rollins, director of the Rollins Theater School Inc., today announced that the school's board of trustees had bought the former estate of Gaston Drake at Lenox, Mass., which adjoins the Summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Rollins also announced that Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, would serve as an honorary trustee of the school.

For the past ten years Rollins School has used the "Graycroft" estate in East Hampton for its quarters.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 330,138) (S 538,005)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

AUG 12 1945

Easthampton Estate Is Sold to Rollins Theater School

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 11.—Wheeler & Taylor, realtors, of Great Barrington, have sold the thirty-acre Gaston Drake place here to the Rollins Theater School, Inc., Graycroft, Easthampton, L. I., Leighton Rollins, director. The property overlooks Tanglewood and Lake Mahkeenac and is called Astalula, an Indian name which means "overlooking Lake of Sunbeams." The large house and stable will be converted into a theater. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose summer home, Seranak, adjoins Astalula, has been elected an honorary trustee of the school.

[123]

Tanglewood Festival Features Pianists

Alexander Borovsky, Of The Boston Symphony, Wins Applause In Bach Concertos

Saturday night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was attended by 2,700 people and the audience was generous in its applause for Alexander Borovsky, piano soloist in two Bach concertos. The program consisted of Mozart's Divertimento in B-flat major and Symphony in D major, Bach's Piano Concerto in F minor and Piano Concerto in D minor. Borovsky's playing of the Adagio, second movement, of the Piano Concerto in D minor, was the highlight of the evening's performance.

An audience of 3,000 heard the fourth concert Sunday afternoon of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The theatre concert hall was filled to capacity with 200 seated on the stage.

Sunday's program feature was Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D major, for orchestra with piano, violin and flute. Lucas Foss, 22-year-old Boston Symphony pianist and composer, received an ovation, in which Richard Burgin, violin, and Georges Laurent, flute, of the orchestra also shared.

The fifth and sixth programs, which will bring the Bach-Mozart Festival to an end at Tanglewood, are as follows:

Fifth programme: Saturday evening, August 11, at 8:30—Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 in F major, for trumpet, flute, oboe and violin, with string orchestra; Mozart, Konzertante Sinfonie for violin and viola (K. 364); violin solo: William Kroll; viola solo: Jascha Veissi. Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major, for violin, two flutes and string orchestra; Mozart, Serenade in B-flat for wind instruments (K. 361).

Sixth programme: Sunday afternoon, August 12, at 3:30—Bach, Suite No. 3 in D major; Mozart, Piano Concerto in C minor (K. 491); soloist: Robert Casadesus. Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, for string orchestra (with the Sinfonia from the Cantata "Christ lag in Tobesbanden"); and Mozart, Symphony in E-flat major (No. 39, K. 543).

—BUY WAR BONDS—

JASCHA VEISSI who will play the solo part for the viola in the same Mozart work. The program will be in the concert theatre at 8.30.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

Patrons of Music Arrive For Bach-Mozart Finale

Prominent musicians and patrons of music arrived in the Berkshires yesterday and today for the last series of the Bach-Mozart Festival that Serge Koussevitzky will close tomorrow afternoon at Tanglewood.

Mr. and Mrs. William Kroll and daughter, Barbara, came yesterday from their summer home in Woodstock, N. Y. to stay with Mr. and Mrs. Jay C. Rosenfeld and Mr. and Mrs. Veissi arrived from New York to stay in Lenox. Mr. Kroll will be solo violinist for tonignt's concert and Mr. Veissi will play the solo viola part.

Olin Downes, leading music critic for the New York Times, attending the festival for the first time, was present at the rehearsal this morning. Mme. Nadia Boulanger, outstanding woman conductor, who has taught in California for the last two years since resigning from the music department at Wellesley College will be in the audience.

Leonard Bernstein, former assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, and a former student in conducting with Dr. Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Music Center, is in Lenox. Dr. Raymond Kendall, special advisor in music to USO, is here in connection with the Rachmaninoff Foundation.

Others Arrive

Also in the audience will be Mrs. John Nicholas Brown of Providence and Newport, wife of the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustee who is on a mission to Germany to direct the restoration of art treasures; Edward Taft, orchestra trustee, and Mrs. Taft; Mrs. Edward Thaw and Mrs. Chester Humphrey of Boston and Dublin, N. H.; Mrs. Mason Brill of New York and Maine; Mr. and Mrs. Wolfe Wolfensohn of Cambridge, guests of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge at the Hotel Wendell-Sheraton; Mrs Antoine Laporte, recently arrived from France where her husband is head of a hospital and her sister, Mrs. Walter Lovell of Brookline; Thomas Whittemore of Boston, speaker at the Wednesday Morning Club yesterday, who will leave Aug. 28 for London and Istanbul. Mr. Whittemore, a guest of Mrs. Donald F. McPherson of Court Hill, is keeper of coins and seals at the Fogg Museum of Art, Harvard University and director of the Byzantine Institute.

The audience is requested to be in their seats promptly at 8.30 this evening. Admission to the grounds, entitling early-comers to seats on benches, under the canopy, will be sold at the box office before each

---

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

AUG 10 1945

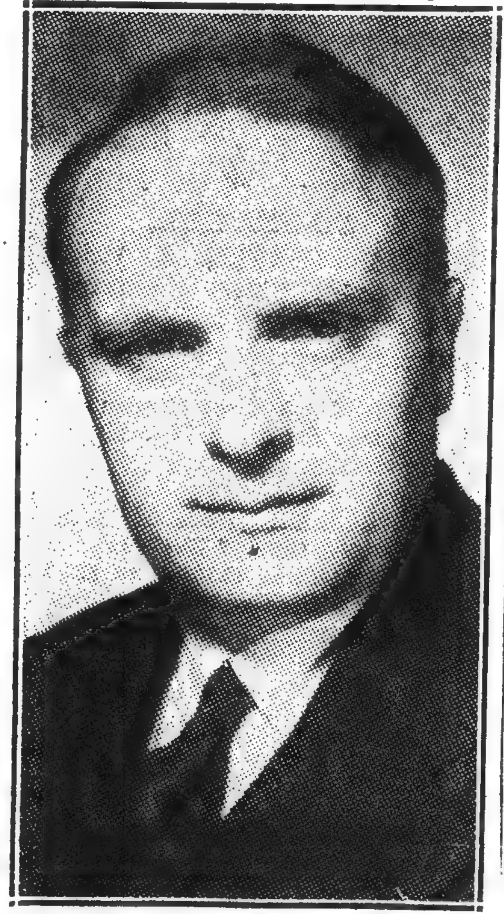
WILLIAM KROLL who will be heard in the violin solo of Mozart's Konzertante Sinfonie at the Tanglewood Festival tomorrow evening.

Tanglewood Sold Out for Week-End Symphony Concerts

Dr. Koussevitzky Makes Slight Change in Program—Kroll, Veissi And Casadesus To Be Heard

The audience for the last weekend of the Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood promises to be the largest for any of the concerts in the theatre-concert hall this season or last. Hundreds of persons attempting to buy tickets have been disappointed because the hall has been sold out for Sunday's program for more than a week and for tomorrow night's concert since Monday.

A slight change has been made in the program as originally announced for tomorrow evening. Dr. Kousevitzky will conduct the 40 principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 as the opening number and substitute two Bach Preludes for it in the second half. Otherwise the program remains the same. The first hour, from 8.30 to 9.30, will be broadcast over the entire hook-up of 160 stations by the American Broadcasting Company.



ROBERT CASADESUS, pianist of New York and Great Barrington, will play Sunday.

William Kroll, violinist, and Jascha Veissi, viola player, who will be soloists tomorrow night, are known to the Berkshires for their association with the Coolidge Quartet, and Mr. Kroll as violinist of the Elshuco Trio and first violin of the South Mountain Quartet. Born in New York, he has played chamber music since the age of 14. At 10 he studied with the late Henri Marteau, then teaching in Berlin. He continued studying under Franz Kneisel at the Institute of Musical Art, from which he graduated with highest honors. In 1942 he received the Coolidge medal for services to chamber music.

Mr. Veissi was born in Russia, where he studied before going to France to continue with Georges Enesco. In 1922 he came to the United States to join the Cleveland Orchestra and later became first viola player with the San Francisco Orchestra and violist of the Kolish Quartet. He owns one of the finest violas in existence, a Gasparo dated 1540.

Robert Casadesus of Great Barrington and New York, outstanding French pianist who was soloist for the closing concert of last season's Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, will play in Mozart's piano concerto in C minor Sunday afternoon.

The Programs

The programs for the week-end follow:

Saturday at 8.30
Brandenburg Concerto No. 4 in G major for violin, two flutes and string orchestra	Bach
Konzertante Sinfonie for violin and viola	Mozart
Two preludes arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli	Bach
Serenade in B-flat for wind instruments	Mozart
Sunday at 3.30
Suite No. 3 in D major	Bach
Piano Concerto in D minor	Mozart
Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, for string orchestra (with the Sinfonia from the Cantata "Christ lag in Todesbanden")	Bach
Symphony in E-flat major	Mozart

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

AUG 12 1945

Music

THE final concert of the very successful Bach-Mozart festival will be held on the "Tanglewood" property of the Boston Symphony orchestra this afternoon at 3:30 o'clock. The entire series of three week-end musical events has been sold out in advance. However, there are tickets of admission available, allowing the purchasers to seats outside the auditorium, where the music may be enjoyed to the fullest extent. The program for this afternoon will include the piano concerto in C-minor by Mozart, played by the eminent soloist, Robert Casadesus, who made such a signal success last year with the orchestra under the baton of Serge Kous[illegible]

* * *

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

AUG 12 1945

Ideal Weather Attracts Largest Concert Crowd

Tanglewood, Lenox, Aug. 11—Ideal weather brought out one of the largest audiences so far for the fifth concert tonight of the Bach-Mozart festival by Boston Symphony orchestra at Tanglewood. The concert hall had been sold out weeks ago and hundreds of general admission tickets were sold.

Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, inc., was accompanied by Mrs Nadi Boulanger of Paris and Boston, Miss Miriam K. Oliver and Malcolm Vaughan. Mrs Boulanger, a composer, has accepted an invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra at two concerts during the November celebration in Symphony hall of the centennial anniversary of the birth of Gabriel Faure, composer. Miss Smith is having a dinner party tomorrow night at her home and the other guests will be Mr and Mrs Robert Casadesur, Mr and Mrs Zeno Franscettio, the former a noted French violinist; Georges Najer, Boston symphony first trumpet, and Mrs Najer; Georges Laurent, first flutist, and Mrs Laurent.

George K. Livermore, New York banker, and Mrs Livermore entertained at dinner at Lakeside, Lenox, and later took their guests to Tanglewood. They included Mr and Mrs Chester Griswold Burden of Park avenue, who are at Lakeside for the weekend; Col Arnold Whitridge, army, Mrs Whitridge and Misses Jane and Rhoda Whitridge; also Lieut-Comdr Styvesant Van Cortlandt Morris, army, and George De LaCour of Paris, who is at the Lenox club.

With Mrs Carlos M. De Heredia were Mrs Nicholas Brown of Newport and her daughter-in-law, Mrs John Nicholas Brown (Anne S. Kinisolving) of Providence. Mrs Brown, Sr., is the sister of Viscountess D'Odmoy of Nice, France; Mrs Peter Goelet Gerry, the former Mrs George W. Vanderbilt, and Mrs George Grenville Merrill of Newport. Mrs De Heredia had a luncheon party today and will have a dinner party tomorrow for her guests.

Mr and Mrs John Shepard, Jr., were luncheon and bridge hosts today at Belvoir terrace, Lenox. Their guests included Mrs Ross Winans Whistler, Mrs Alexandre Hoppin, Miss Anna Remsen Alexandre, Mr and Mrs John Butler Swann, Giraud Foster and Robert Talcott Francis.

Noticed in the audience from Curtis hotel, Lenox; were Princess Eugenia Ruspoli and her niece, Princess Alexis Droutzkoy, Mrs Henry White Cannon, Mrs Hunter Barton, Mrs E. Griswold Hollister, Miss Olive C. Colton, Mrs Jennings Hackett and Coleman Jennings, Olin Downes of the New York Times.

With Mrs Frederick S. Coolidge, who is at Wendell-Sheraton hotel, Pittsfield, were Mr and Mrs Wolfe Wolfensohn of Cambridge.

From Berkshire inn, Great Barrington, were Mrs H. Barclay Dodd, Mr and Mrs Marvin Tinsley, Mr and Mrs Martin L. Strauss, 2d, New York; Mr and Mrs Eli Jacobson, Worcester.

From Red Lion inn, Stockbridge, were Mr and Mrs John Alexander Rogers, Mrs Charles C. Griswold, New York; Mrs William Cole, Washington; Mrs James Ransom Walker and Mrs David Shields Cook, Chicago. Mr and Mrs C. E. Van Norman of Dartmouth street, Springfield, are at Red Lion for two weeks.

With Miss Rosamond Sherwood was her nephew, Lieut-Col Arthur Murray Sherwood, 3d, army.

STOWN, O.
ICATOR

1 1945

violinist, and violist, will be the Dr. Serge Kousse- Mozart's "Konzer- during the third and from the Tangle- estival at 8:30 p. m. on the instrumental Dr. Koussevitzky the Brandenburg Con- 3, 4, and 5; the suites, nor, No. 3, in D major, D major.

LAND, OHIO
NEWS

1 1945

WJW at 9:30. Kroll, violinist, violinist, get Dr. the Boston Sym- the Mozart Kon- onie in Tangle- WJW at 8:30. You ach Brandenburg with Concert- Burgin, violinist, and George soloists.

Wins ood pointed; sweet ng. His phrasing his breathing mance of the G will never be minds of those evious associa- out in an ur- and possessing afternoon love- elancholic, per- ous composition this occasion the e afternoons, the and an inspired

---

MASS.
RAM

1945 ool state

N. Y., Aug. Rollins, director Theater School. ounced that the of trustees had estate of Gas- ox, Mass., which mer home of the y Orchestra. announced that director mphony Orches- as an honorary hool.

en years Rollins the "Graycroft" ampton for its

WORCESTER SUNDAY TELEGRAM, AUGUST 12, 1945

AT BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

Part of the throng attending the Berkshire Music Festival in front of the Theater Concert Hall at Tanglewood.

Audience, in Beethoven Mood, Listens to Bach

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, Aug. 11.—Tanglewood estate was populated tonight by an audience of 2000 which chose to celebrate the jubilant war news by the "down to earth" audition of music by Bach and Mozart. This was the first of the pair of concerts which are concluding the third and last weekend of the current Berkshire Music Festival.

The war news reaction was unmistakable. Dr. Koussevitzky beamed over his 40 Boston Symphony players who were obviously excited over recent developments. The large audience might well have preferred dozens of scores that would have stimulated a more vivid realization of what has finally been militarily accomplished. This was clearly on everyone's mind. The "Victory Symphony" (No. 5) by Beethoven, or the Shostakovitch "Seventh Symphony" (which, it was once affirmed and then denied, commemorated the seige of Leningrad) would have served the purpose well.

Just Bach and Mozart

But this has been a Bach-Mozart festival, given in the 1200-capacity - theater - concert-hall by an abbreviated symphony orchestra on a small stage for a group of devotees of polyphony and classicism.

As Dr. Koussevitzky stepped onto the stage the audience rose as is its custom and earnestly sang a piece of music that has more to say to Americans than any message of the masters. Francis Scott key took very little time to write it but Dr. Koussevitzky leads our "Star Spangled Banner" with a conviction that is nothing short of a lesson in Americanism.

Brandenburg Concerto

But to get on with tonight's program. The "Brandenburg Concerto No. 4, in G Major" by Bach is academic music,. It is as far removed from music for the masses as the "Iliad" by Homer is unsuited as a western movie scenario. Yet three movements represented an almost unparalleled Bachian serenity and since the great polyphonist had a gift for writing infectious melody, it completely succeeded in creating a joyful atmosphere.

The effect was vastly enhanced by the superb artistry of Richard Burgin's violin and flutists Georges Laurent and George Madsen.

No less significant was the orchestral performance of Mozart's "Konzertante Sinfonie for Violin and Viola." This work engaged William Kroll, violinist, and Jascha Veissi, violist, in solo capacities. With the exception of a nervousness which both artists were apparently experiencing, this was playing of best concert-hall standards, particularly in the exceedingly hazardous duet cadenza at the end of the opening "allegro maestoso" movement which was played immaculately. The concluding two movements were scholarly and imaginative. It is a work that allows excellent opportunity for comparison of tone and technical abilities.

Concludes Tomorrow

The program's concluding works were the Pick-Mangiagalli arrangement of two preludes by Bach and the Mozart "Serenade in B-Flat for Wind Instruments."

Tomorrow afternoon concludes a laborious but stoutly met chapter in the Berkshire Festival history. The war moved its activities from the mammoth shed which seats nearly 5000 to more restricted quarters. The orchestra has been decreased but its musical integrity has been kept alive. Tomorrow's soloist will be the French pianist Robert Casadesus, who will be heard in Mozart's "Concerto in C Minor."

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

AUG 13 1945

Bach-Mozart Festival Finished by Koussevitzky

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

Special to The Hartford Times

Lenox, Mass.—The penultimate concert in the Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood Saturday night reached the highest altitude possible for chamber music.

This symphony - less program comprised the fourth Brandenburg Concerto, Mozart's Konzertante Sinfonie for violin and viola, his B flat Serenade for Wind Instruments (K 361) and two Bach preludes. All these were designed for just such an idealized, communicative medium as Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has shaped here—a resonant hall small enough to preserve the necessary sense of intimacy, an equally resonant audience and, most important of all, such a hand-picked group of players as these Boston Symphony men.

Trio of Soloists

The concertino in the Bach Concerto comprising Richard Burgin, violin, and the two flutists, Georges Laurent and George Madsen, played with a rare rapport and the utmost finish. The relationship between this trio and the supporting orchestra was nicely poised. Burgin has an unusual gift of dynamic adjustment and a versatile bow. His melodic line in this instance was beautifully traced without being obtrusive with respect either to the ripieno or the flutes.

The entire conception was fresh and lovely, about as remote from the academic Bach as one could imagine. Here was living music, not something out of the archives.

Jascha Veissi proved the finest sort of an advocate for the softly-spoken viola, whose normal tone has sweetness rather than authority To maintain its role on a basis of parity with so trenchant a violin as William Kroll's—and that is a requirement of the Mozart Sinfonie—calls for a confident and skillful player. Both the solo artists were recalled many times.

Serenade for Wind Choir

Not many program makers would have risked the Mozart Serenade as a final number. An extended composition for wind instruments alone is likely to be monotonous, but Dr. Koussevitzky knew his players and seemed to have secrets of his own for drawing out the inherent pigmentation of this bright and sweet-tempered composition. The variations of the andantino movement and the concluding rondo were particularly gay. A truly Mozartian transparency was maintained throughout the Serenade which was shortened by the omission of one of the minuets and the romance.

A memorable bit of virtuosity was contributed to this concert by the second of the Bach preludes as transcribed by Pick-Mangiagalli. This excerpt from the E major Sonata for unaccompanied violin has been arranged and rearranged but it is unfailingly attractive because of its innate brilliance. As played by this stellar ensemble it was fairly dazzling. One is reminded of such exhibitions as the one-time Bostonian stunt of having the entire first violin section play in unison the solo part of the first movement of the Mendelssohn Concerto as a similar feat by a Toscanini orchestra playing a Paganini caprice.

The festival which has drawn crowds up to 3,000 came to an end Sunday afternoon with the playing of the Bach D major Suite, the third Brandenburg Concerto, Mozart's piano Concerto with Robert Casadesus as soloist, and the E flat Symphony (K 543). The need for keeping a vigil on developments in the war news made it impossible for this observer to remain.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

AUG 13 1945

Applaud Koussevitzky At Close of Festival

By RAYMOND MORIN

LENOX, Aug. 12. — Coming as it has at the climax of World War 2, this Tanglewood Festival has symbolized that we have also been fighting a war for freedom of musical speech. Our scores of Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer and Offenbach have not been burned in our public squares—nor have some of the composers in whom we have entrusted our musical future been interned or worse for reasons of race or creed, and they never will be.

When ~~Serge Kouss~~evitzky put down his baton after this ~~after~~noon's concert, he brought the Tenth Berkshire Festival reluctantly to its close. The ovation which followed was inspired by far more than the Mozart "Symphony in E-Flat," the concluding work.

Link With City Festival

The musical populace of Worcester is particularly qualified to appreciate the Boston Symphony's wartime achievement, for the Worcester Festival is not entirely disassociated with that of Tanglewood. It was in 1934 that Henry Hadley started the "Berkshire Symphonic Festival" on the Dan R. Hanna farm in Stockbridge. Henry Hadley had previously conducted the Worcester festival. Dr. Koussevitzky took over in 1936.

Like the Worcester Festival the Berkshire organization has had to fight a war against the effects of war—the problem of transportation has been but one. Therefore, today's audience applauded a great conductor and orchestra which has survived great odds.

Bach Opens Program

The program opened with the Bach "Suite No. 3, in D Major" in five movements. It is a conservative bit of craftsmanship which Koussevitzky translated into a logical and vibrant score. We cannot over-estimate the value of the conductor's work in the reading of these Bach scores. The rhythmic stability of the opening "Overture"—the moving fervor achieved in the "air" which transcended anything that we have heard here during the three weekends resulted from direction that was so clear that those of us who do play an instrument felt more like participants than auditors.

Casadesus Brilliant

Robert Casadesus played Mozart's "Piano Concerto in C Minor" with a finesse and lucid neatness that have been unprecedented at this festival. He took into full account the frail instrument for which Mozart wrote, and he didn't confuse the score with one by Liszt.

He played with a technical skill that approached perfection and he collaborated with the orchestra with amazing unity. It was only in the very fragile "Larghetto" movement that there was occasionally an overabundance of orchestral background. Mr. Casadesus played all three movements so zealously that we find ourselves unable to identify any one section as predominantly outstanding, unless it be the First Movement Cadenza which was played with breathtaking brilliance.

The two concluding works were Bach's "Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, in G Major for String Orchestra" and Mozart's "Symphony in E-Flat" Both deserve many long paragraphs but it will perhaps suffice to say that they brought to a close a series of six concerts that should go down in history as timely achievements.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

AUG 1945

Dr. Grant Named Dean at Eastman

By the United Press.

ROCHESTER, Aug. 14.—Appointment of Dr. Margaret Grant, New York City, as dean of students and administrative assistant to the director of the Eastman School of Music was announced today by Dr. Alan Valentine, president of the University of Rochester.

Dr. Grant has been associated for a number of years as executive assistant to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Berkshire Music Center, Lenox, Mass. She will assume her new duties Sept. 1.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE

3 1945

3000 Attend Bach-Mozart Series Finale

Dr. Koussevitzky And Casadesus Share Honors

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

At the final concert of the Bach-Mozart festival yesterday afternoon at Tanglewood, the opera-concert hall, seating some 1400, including 250 on the stage, could accommodate less than half of those who attended.

To close the sixth concert, Serge Koussevitzky, leading 40 men from the Boston Symphony orchestra, including all the first desk men, chose the big E-flat symphony of Mozart, and gave it one of those monumental performances upon which an appreciative public has been very willing to concede him his eminent position among interpreters of the classics. In spite of a wizard's speed in the finale, and perhaps an extra degree of meticulousness in the lovely andante it was still a performance that one can well cherish in his memory. The abridged Boston orchestra executed the last detail with the most faithful responsiveness. This was more nearly the size of orchestra, no doubt, by which Mozart expected his symphonies to be played than the modern huge 100-man group which is the organization in regular season, and the symphonies and other related pieces gained a conture and an intimacy to which the fuller and larger orchestra can not be adjusted so well.

The third Brandenburg Concerto of Bach for string orchestra which preceded the symphony was played with a contagious and released enthusiasm. The string sections of the orchestra bit into the juicy portions with incisive and vigorous attacks, and gave a real he-man performance. Instead of the two transitional chords in a minor Phrygian cadence which Bach wrote to bridge the two movements, and which was used when the same concerto was played in the big shed six years ago, Koussevitzky resorted to a practice now accepted by usage of interpolating a fitting movement from the same composer's other works. Yesterday he used "Christ Lay in Death's Dark Prison," a contrast propitious with the encircling movements.

Casadesus Scores Again

The soloist of the afternoon was the pianist, Robert Casadesus, playing the Mozart C minor concerto. The tremendous impression he made last year in the Coronation concerto was this time affirmed and enhanced. It was an experience to hear the dulcet tone he produced from his piano in the beautiful slow movement. By a keen sense of proportion and also sense of tone value, he was influenced to use his superlatively gentle and poetic touch for this simple and economically written melody, and then, when required, he unleashed an over aboundance of technic to play the final movement with excitement but absolute certainty. The ovation he received was long and vociferous.

The Bach suite in D major, No. 3, was used to open the program. It consists of a half dozen short diversified movements, the form of which was the precursor of the modern sonata and symphony. The second movement has become a favorite by reason of its familiarity gained through a transcription for violin solo.

Saturday Concert

The lives of Bach and Mozart, roughly, span a century. No examples could have been chosen to illustrate better the development and direction of musical progress than the two selections which opened Saturday evening's concert: The Bach 4th Brandenburg concerto in G major, and the Mozart Symphonie Concertante. Bach did not know the instrumental virtuoso in the very beginning of the 18th century as did Mozart comparatively so little later, thus the soloists in the Bach, Richard Burgin, violin, and Georges Laurent and George Madsen, concertmaster and flutists of the orchestra, respectively, were given parts which are buried much of the time within the busy polyphony of the orchestra. The flutes made the most of their opportunities in their aiolments, and Mr. Burgin articulated the courante passages and swiftly-moving rhythmic figures with thorough musicianship and technic. Mr. Koussevitzky conceived this Brandenburg, one of the most appealing of the six, with happy tempo choices and a spirit of broad, ample dimensions.

Coming to the Mozart, there is immediately apparent the progress from what was known as the horizontal writing of Bach to a perpendicular manner. Mozart provided long preludes for the orchestra before the soloists enter, but, once upon the scene, the orchestra, due here thanks also to Mr. Koussevitzky, becomes an accompanying support for the soloists. William Kroll, violin, and Jascha Veissi, fulfilled the virtuoso requirements of this gem from the treasure house of Mozart with a performance which should be memorable, even among Tanglewood traditions. The whole conception was on such a scale of grandeur, with every minor fraction so preciously molded, that the co-ordinated result was a uhique performance. Kroll and Veissi played with an elegance of style, so proper to Mozart, an easy and beautiful sensitive tone, a gratifyingly true sense of intonation, and such conspicuously successful mutual understanding, that they achieved a peak in Mozartean interpretation. The eloquence of the dialogue in the middle slow movement was beautifully expressive. The cadenza at the end of the first movement, too, was brilliant in its flawless and facile mastery. They were accorded an extremely cordial appreciation.

After intermission came two more examples to display the remarkable palette upon which Mr. Koussevitzky works; two Bach preludes, arranged for string orchestra by Ricardo Pick-Mangiagalli, and the Mozart Serenade in B flat for wind instruments. The Bach preludes were the only transcriptions to be used on these six festival programs, which had otherwise remained moderately pure in selection, except for the permitted retouching by accepted editors.

The outstanding string section of the Boston orchestra exhibited its virtues here without sharing the stage with its colleagues of the other sections. The tenuously spun web of the adagio was sustained with the consummate artistry which Dr. Koussevitzky knows he can produce with his exceptionally attentive strings. This first section is from the Prelude and Fugue in D minor for organ. The second is the Prelude in the E major Sonata for violin unaccompanied in which the transcriber has left the first violin part in its original form and composed the other parts in the contrapuntal manner of Bach. This was the rollicking task for the men of the orchestra and they conveyed their and, incidentally, Bach's spirit, with great exhilaration and a youthful vitality

Then came the famed wind section of the orchestra to close the program. There were only a baker's dozen of men but they produced a tone of luscious beauty and roundness. The marvelous and here appreciable qualities of the bassoons, and the contra-bassoons and the bass clarinet, added a depth and a foundation to the wealth of melody and fancy that Mozart seemed to have available to lavish at any time upon any work at hand. The deft control necessitated by the sudden dynamic changes called for by the orchestra's peerless leader found the men more than ready and adequate, as did the demands of the score in the taxing theme with variations and the final rondo. Nothing, however, excelled the astonishing effects they achieved in the initial largo where the full beauty of the particular quality which is the nature of wind choirs, and of that of the Boston orchestra specifically.

This festival again demonstrated and justified, if any justification were needed, the policy of the Tanglewood enterprise. The maintenance of the loftiest standard of performance, and an unswerving adherence to a definite category in musical literature have made this and all the preceding festivals outstanding events in American musical history. As chauvinistic as we may be about the beauties of our hills and of our weather (at least two-thirds of the time), it must be acknowledged that the standards of the Boston orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky make this occasion one which is unapproached by any other in the whole country, and one which has attracted the presence and the interest of the elite of American music.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

AUG 1 3 1945

SCORE TRIUMPH AT TANGLEWOOD

Casadesus, Koussevitzky and Players Win Ovation

By Willard M. Clark

STOCKBRIDGE, Aug. 12 — The Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood came to a triumphant close this afternoon with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the ensemble of Boston Symphony orchestra players, and the distinguished pianist, Robert Casadesus, winning a veritable ovation from the huge audience.

The weather was almost ideal, although threatening clouds hung over the bowl. People sat on the stage, filled every seat in the house, and spread outside, just as they used to do in the days when the huge shed was open.

It was a magnificent program, superbly played. The opening number was the delectable "Suite in D Major, No. 3" by Bach. The familiar "Air" was beautifully uttered and there was a gay abandon to the two gavottes and the final gigue. Orchestra and conductor were in top form and responded to the enthusiastic applause many, many times. Dr. Koussevitzky insisted that his men acknowledge the applause.

To hear Robert Casadesus in recital is one thing; to hear him as soloist with an orchestra is quite another. We have found the eminent French pianist's recitals inclined to dryness, but today he revealed new facets of his art. To be sure, the Mozart, "Concerto in C Minor" is one of the loveliest works of its kind ever penned, but it needs the elegance and insight which Mr. Casadesus gave it. There was a sturdy utterance of the opening Allegro, fitting contrast to the highly emotional Largetto, one of the loveliest movements in any concerto for piano and orchestra. The perfect fusion of piano and orchestra is seldom accomplished so fully as it was in this movement, or, for that matter during the entire work. The finale was highly dramatic and resulted in a true ovation for all concerned.

The time element did not permit hearing the final work, the Mozart "Symphony in E-flat Major, No. 39." However the performance of the Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, for string orchestra made up in some measure for the loss. It is in this lovely work that the beauty of the strings was fully revealed. Lacking an adagio movement, the serious, impressive orchestral introduction of the cantata "Christ Lag in Todesbanden" was used.

Perhaps next summer the Tanglewood concerts on a grand scale will once more get under way, but Dr. Koussevitzky has done a great service to music lovers by making possible these more intimate concerts during the troubled times.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

AUG 1 4 1945

Albany Music Notes

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

The Albany Area's approximation of the world famous Salzburg music festival ended on a note of exhaltation, as the Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitzky, brought the three-week's Bach Mozart festival at "Tanglewood" in the Berkshires to a regrettable conclusion Sunday afternoon. An audience estimated at 4,000 music lovers preempted the shed of the opera auditorium and distributed the overflow to the spacious lawns, in the immediate vicinity.

Sunday afternoon's concert was playing of the Mozart piano concerto in C minor by the distinguished virtuoso, Robert Cassadesus, whose technical ease and poetic interpretation won for him one of the most enhusiasic responses during he entire series of concerts. Especially appealing was his "singing tone" as evidenced in the second movement. The Bach suite, No. 3 and the Brandenburg Concerto, No. 3 were the preliminary crescendo to the magnificent reading and incomparable rendition of the Mozart symphony in E-flat major. Dr. Koussevitzky was recalled to the stage several times at the conclusion to acknowledge the tumultuous applause and tokens of affection of which the great Russian conductor was the central figure.

Saturday night's concert was one of the most interesting of the whole series, being a personally conducted tour of the lesser known instruments of the orchestra. The Brandenberg concerto featured the orchestra and solo work for trumpet, flute, oboe, violin and viola, with the first chair men of the various choirs featured as a chamber ensemble.

In many years of concert attendance, this reviewer has never had the priviledge of hearing the final number of Saturday night's program, which consisted of the Mozart serenade in B-flat for wind instruments. This fascinating and unique piece of Mozartiana, enlisted the artistic collaboration of oboes, flutes, clarinets, French horns and English horn by a hand-picked group of first chair men, and emerged as an informative and interesting demonstration of the various colors of the inner instruments of a modern orchestra, and a fascinating adventure in the domain of not frequently heard wind instrumentation, advanced for the moment to solo proportions. It is almost a certainty, in the light of present world events, that the great shed, seating 5,000 will be called into use, next summer, when the Berkshire festival will return to its former glory.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

AUG 1 4 1945

Music Festival At Tanglewood Is Concluded

Final Week End of Berkshire Event Brings Six Soloists To Listeners

The concluding week end of the Bach-Mozart festival at Tanglewood in the Berkshires brought six soloists—Richard Burgin, violinist, Georges Laurent and George Madsen, flutists for the Brandenburg Concerto No. 4; William Kroll, violinist, and Jascha Veissi, violist, for the Mozart Konzertante Sinfonie; and Robert Casadesus, pianist, for the Mozart Piano Concerto in C minor.

The most remarkable number presented during the entire festival was Mozart's "Serenade in B-flat for wind instruments" which Serge Koussevitzky programmed for the concluding number Saturday evening. String players walked off leaving what looked like good material for a fine sectional rehearsal on the stage and the lengthy serenade began. The program notes refer to the number as "one of the finest compositions for wind orchestra in the entire literature of music" and it certainly contains some unusual writing and effects. Admireres of wind instruments and their technique must have had a gorgeous time and the entire audience was most attentive even though often puzzled.

The little known "Konzertante Sinfonie for Violin and Viola" was played most admirably by William Kroll and Jascha Veissi. The double cadenza in the first movement was outstanding, while the elaborate trills in the introductory tutti were the beginning of a revelation of the intricate orchestral writing that the drab piano reduction of the score usually heard represents.

Sunday brought Robert Casadesus as soloist and he gave his usual polished performance. The introductory orchestral part presented the entire first section before the piano entered alone. Arpeggios from the soloist were answered by phrases in the woodwinds and the finale with its variations concluded the concerto.

Bach was represented this week end by the two Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 3 and 4, the Suite No. 3 in D major and two preludes from the sonatas for violin solo beautifully arranged for string orchestra by the contemporary Italian composer, Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli.

The Suite No. 3 in D major is vigorous and rich and the "Air" or second movement is the one on which the well known Wilhelmj transcription "Air on the G string" is based. The Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in the original contains two movements with a few chords taking the place of the slow movement. Sunday's performance introduced the short Sinfonia from Bach's cantata "Christ lag in Todesbanden."

The Mozart Symphony in E-flat major with the wistful Andante and the joyous Menuetto, Allegretto and Finale concluded the festival.

Last summer Dr. Koussevitzky brought the public a Mozart festival and this year Bach and Mozart supplemented each other. Whatever next year brings, we are sure it will be good and the summer home of the Boston Symphony orchestra will again be host to music lovers.

GREAT BARRINGTON,
MASS.
COURIER
[illegible]

CONCERT CLOSES

Mozart Symphony Concluding Number In Series of Concerts

The Tanglewood Festival opened on Saturday night for its final week-end performance this season with its usual capacity audience. There were hundreds of persons who were unable to buy tickets because of the large sale in advance. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the 40 principals and other members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Bach Brandenburg Concerto 4 as the opening number.

William Kroll, violinist, and Jascha Veissi, viola player, were soloists. They are known in the Berkshires for their association with the Coolidge Quartet, and Mr. Kroll as violinist of the Elshuco Trio and first violin of the South Mountain Quartet. Robert Casadesus of Grea tBarrington and New York, outstanding French pianist, who with Mrs. Casadesus conducts the Summer School of Music in Great Barrington, was soloist for the closing concert of last season's Mozart Festival played in Mozart's piano concert Sunday afternoon.

The closing concert of the Bach-Mozart festival at Tanglewood on Sunday afternoon opened with the "Suite No. 4 in D Major," by Bach. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director, and his men, caught the spirit of the lively, old rococo dances perfectly. There were 3300 in attendance in the afternoon and as one approached the grounds as the cars were coming out it was a bit of Park avenue in Stockbridge.

Mr. Casadesus played Mozart's piano concerto, that in C minor, No. 24 (K491). The soloist's conception of it was well proportioned, having both balance and perspicuilty and he played as well, an intuitive understanding of the Mozart style. The charm of "Larghetto" is another example of what genius can accomplish with a few simple chords.

Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3 in G major, for three violins, three violas, three 'cellos and cembalo, began the second half. Interpolated between the two fast movements which constitute the work, was the sublime 14-measure introductory "Sinfonia" to the master's fourth Cantata, "Christ Lay In Death's Dark Prison," played by the strings with a richness and depth of tone that was moving.

The festival closed with one of Mozart's three greatest symphonies, the E flat major, No. 39 (K543), the G minor and "Jupiter" having been played at previous concerts. This work with its solid first movement, noble, "Andante," "Minuetto" and "Allegro," all of which are the master at his best, was given a vivid, vital performance, adhering to the high standard set by the orchestra at its previous concerts.

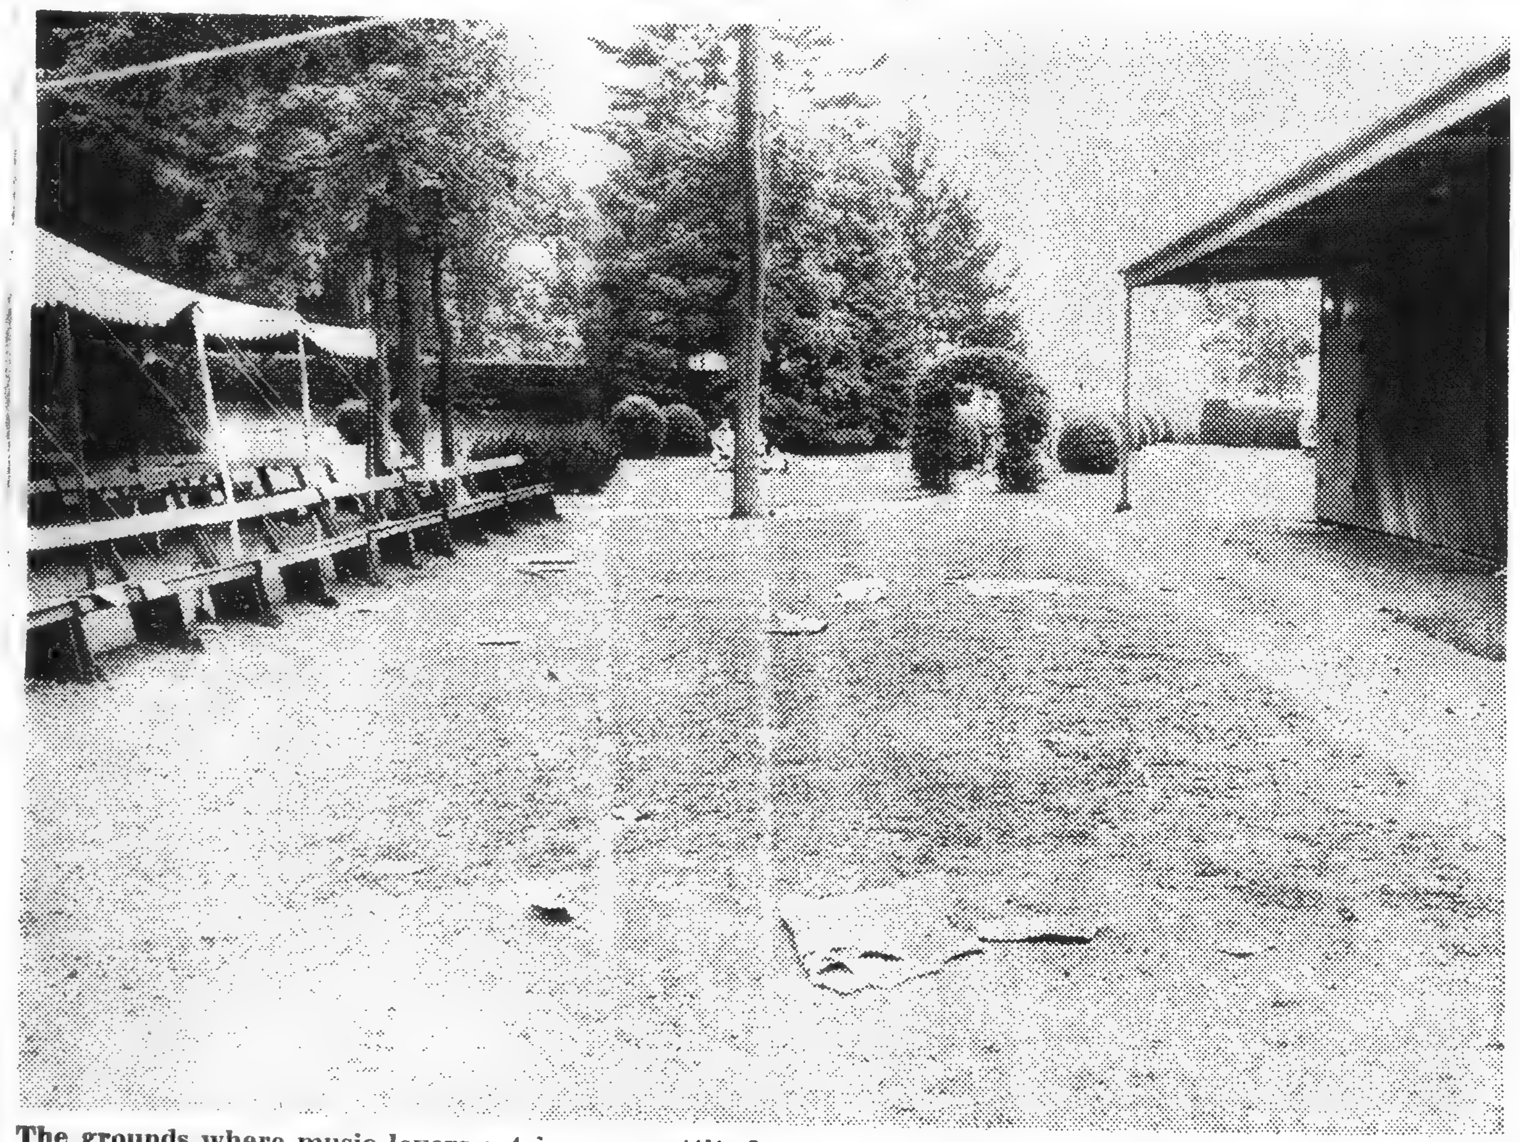
Next year the festival probably will be held in the large shed and once again blossom in a large way. In speaking of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky one could only use superlatives, so we join in with the thousands who thank him for his untiring efforts and idealism in keeping the festival alive in these trying times.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

AUG 13 1945

Curtain Goes Down on Music Festival

At the closing concert yesterday of the Bach-Mozart festival at Tanglewood, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky takes his final bow amid thunderous applause. Yesterday afternoon's program was the sixth and last of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.



The grounds where music lovers sat in every attitude are now empty and forsaken. Lovely weather over the week end brought out record crowds for both concerts. The theatre was completely sold out and the overflow of 1800 people stretched out on the lawn and under the large tent.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

AUG 1 [illegible] 1945

40,000 Hear Orchestra's V-J Concert

Players Return To Esplanade From Tanglewood

Special to THE EAGLE

BOSTON—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Arthur Fiedler, played to the largest crowd in its history in the season's final concert on the Esplanade in Boston last evening. An audience of 40,000 sat or stood along the Charles River for the program, opened by Governor Tobin, that completed 16 years of out-of-door concerts. Many of the players returned to Boston yesterday from Tanglewood, where they had taken part in the Bach-Mozart Festiva and the making of a Tanglewooc series of records.

Praising the contribution of the orchestra to the war, Gov. Tobin said, "They have performed in every veteran's hospital in this area. Eight of their number are in the armed forces, many have sons or daughters in uniform, and practically every member is a veteran of World War I."

He gave the number of Massachusetts residents in the military service as 257,849 in the Army, 140,643 in the Navy; 20,262 in the Marines; 12,700 in the Coast Guard and 4000 women in the nursing corps, of whom about 12,000 have given their lives.

The program, planned in honor of victory, included the Star Spangled Banner," "America," the "Stars and Stripes Forever," "Salute to Our Fighting Forces," "Finale from Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony," Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" and "Knightsbridge" from the London suite by Vaughan Williams.

The orchestra started its seven-weeks vacation today.

BALTIMORE, MD.
EVENING SUN

AUG 16 1945

Tanglewood Tunes

Music In The Berkshires

By GUSTAV KLEMM

SHEFFIELD, MASS.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, the suave, purple-faced, impeccable conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, built well when, in 1934, he laid the foundations for the annual summer concerts at Tanglewood, located between the Berkshire mountain towns of Stockbridge and Lenox. The festival just concluded was the eleventh, and no visitor to the six concerts comprising the three-week series could fail to have been impressed by their vitality, high musical standards and superb execution — qualifications that have characterized each summer's concerts since their inauguration, a decade ago, in a horse-show ring under a tent on the Hanna farm.

Conditions weren't too ideal that first summer especially on rainy, muggy nights, but the musical seeds planted went deep and their sturdy flowering has rewarded the wisdom shown by Koussevitzky and his fellow enthusiasts in selecting this serenely beautiful spot as the enduring home of America's finest summer festival.

This summer's concerts, devoted entirely to the music of Bach and Mozart, were given on Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons for three consecutive week ends. The audience for the opening concert braved a downpour that started at 5 in the afternoon and continued throughout the evening, a watery handicap from which the following afternoon's audience also suffered to some extent. The last four concerts, however, benefited from the finest weather this region can offer, and the total attendance ran to nearly 18,000.

The concerts were given in the weird-looking but acoustically almost perfect theater-concert hall, built in 1941 at a cost of $40,000 and designed by the Finnish architect, Eliel Saarinen. The auditorium, built completely of wood and suspended from massive beams that arch over the roof, seats 1,200. The average attendance per concert of approximately 3,000 is explained by the fact that all doors to the auditorium were left open during the concerts, and rows of comfortable benches were placed around three sides of the building, a large tent covering those benches located in front of the four main entrance doors. Several hundred people also sat behind the orchestra on the stage which had been cleared to the back wall. The resonant construction of the building serves as a perfect sounding board for the music, which was clearly audible to the audience outside, even to those distant listeners stretched out on blankets and cushions beneath the towering elms and pines that make of the grounds one of the show places of the East. Tanglewood receives its name from the "Tanglewood Tales" written there by Hawthorne while he was a guest of the Tappan family, former owners of the 200-acre estate.

—o—

Our last visit to Tanglewood was made in the summer of 1941. In that happy, prewar summer the full Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 members gave nine concerts in the huge Shed, seating 6,500, and the total attendance neared 100,000. Plans were afoot for an even more ambitious season the following year, but these plans were abandoned after the fateful December happenings of 1941. The Shed was boarded up and the concerts the following summer were moved to the theater-concert hall, where, in 1941, we had witnessed rehearsals for a coming performance of Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte." In 1942 Koussevitzky, conducting a students' orchestra, gave a few concerts in this same auditorium. An awesome silence filled the summer of 1943, but in 1944 life stirred again, and a series of four all-Mozart concerts were given. This year two more concerts and Bach were added.

The orchestra for this summer's concerts numbered 40 players and included all the first-chair men, plus other members, of the venerable Boston Symphony, a completely ideal setup, both as to numbers and content, for this completely ideal summer musical fare. The programs were gems of construction. Working within his rather restricted frame, the 71-year-old Russian-born conductor achieved marvels in contrast. He wandered far afield in the works of both composers, selecting, in addition to long-standing favorites, many compositions only rarely heard, this explaining the presence in the audience, of some of this country's most celebrated musicians, conductors, composers and critics. (In connection with the last-mentioned, we recall the two elderly, obviously aristocratic, dowagers who took seats amid a flurry of sachet, directly in front of ours shortly before the beginning of the final concert. After settling themselves, they turned to a long, calm appraisal of the program. Then one, putting aside her lorgnette, turned her head, high on its circling wall of pearls, to her companion and made the devastating observation: "Too damned much Bach!")

Few present will soon forget the Mozart "Serenade in B-flat for Wind Instruments" (K. 361) that closed the fifth concert, a work of lusty folk quality exquisitely performed by paired clarinets (plus alto and bass clarinet), oboes, trumpets, horns and bassoons (plus contra-bassoon). Or the Mozart "Adagio and Fugue for String Orchestra" (K. 546), a short but brilliant tour de force that hardly deserves the long neglect from which it has suffered. The programs achieved an extraordinary, almost unbelievable, variety and the soloists included such distinguished pianists as Alexander Brailowsky, Robert Casedesus and Alexander Borowsky, all of whom were heard in concertos. William Kroll and Jascha Veissi were soloists in Mozart's "Konzertante Sinfonie for Violin and Viola" (K. 364), while Abram Chasins and Constance Keene presented a pair of Bach concertos for two pianos. The balance of the soloists were drawn from the orchestra's personnel.

—o—

Those who were unable to attend this summer's festival may derive some solace from the knowledge that much of the music was recorded by Koussevitzky and the "Tanglewood" orchestra during the three days following the festival's conclusion, the cuttings being made in the same auditorium that had housed the concerts.

In some ways, a visit to this summer's Tanglewood Festival provided an even deeper satisfaction than the gala one of 1941. Both the Shed and the Chamber Music Hall were boarded up; the administration building was closed and large portions of the vast rolling lawns were left uncut. Gone were the mobile telephone units, the luncheon tents, the music shop and all the rest of the de luxe trappings that marked the last major festival. From present indications, they will all be back next year, but few who visited this summer's concerts will soon forget the high enthusiasm and the profound, spiritual enjoyment of the audiences, many of whom traveled long distances and braved the difficulties imposed by war times, to hear music by two of its greatest masters, music as enduring and firmly reassuring as the surrounding green covered mountains which echoed to its immortal melodies.

4 X + Aug 19

FESTIVAL'S OBJECT LESSONS

By OLIN DOWNES

THE Berkshire Symphonic Festivals given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction at Tanglewood in Stockbridge were suspended after 1942 on account of the war. But last year Dr. Koussevitzky, whose summer home is at adjacent Lenox, and who, if he is not working on music, is in the mood of Othello with his occupation gone, decided that dwellers in the immediate vicinity should have concerts, though they would be few, of modest pretentions, but of a distinctive nature. With this intention he assembled from the ranks of the Boston Symphony what amounted to a chamber orchestra, headed by first desk men, and arranged some concerts of music by Mozart. The concerts were given in the Theatre-Concert Hall, an auditorium of intimate dimensions, admirably suited for the purpose.

The experiment was highly successful. This season the idea was somewhat expanded. Six programs were offered, two each week-end, of works by Bach and Mozart.

For sheer quality, for the most distinguished finish of technique and style, it could be said that these were concerts for the élite. Perhaps only the most informed and sensitive auditors, fortunate to be present, could be expected fully to value them. But, happily, the measure of a musical impression is not the sophistication of the recipient. The audiences that gathered, and their instantaneous response, proved this. The Theatre-Concert Hall seats 1,200. Thirty-six hundred gathered outside and inside the theatre for the occasion. The occasion was electric with the vibration and the excitement that greatly interpretive performances of sovereign music entail.

Best Players Present

The best players were there, for one of the greatest conductors of the age to mold to his will. On the preparation of two concerts of a week-end Dr. Koussevitzky expended almost the amount of time that he would have given to the rehearsing of the orchestra for a winter tour. His insistence upon tonal and technical persistence was unlimited. Yet this was only the beginning of his efforts. The quest was for the ideal and innermost realization of the composer's spirit. It was a task to which the conductor brought the last iota of his wisdom and experience, and the last drop of the blood in his heart. One day he rehearsed all morning and much of the afternoon. A man of limitless enthusiasms, Koussevitzky worked with a consuming fire felt by the players and finally the audience alike. No one present was unaffected by this. The effect was as selfless as it was a transformative effort by a master.

Not only this: The programs were singularly well chosen. They included works not well known despite the names of their authors. There were, for instance, on the single program of the 11th, the Mozart "Sinfonie concertante" for violin and viola, and the B-flat Serenade (K. 361) belonging to his best period; also on another program, his C minor piano concerto (K. 491) infrequently played and a towering creation even in the production of a Mozart.

Not for nothing did Dr. Hugo Leichtentritt, in the program notes he wrote for this concert call the first movement of the C minor concerto "a little Eroica in itself." As for the finale, it is one of the very few sets of variations which do not leave the predominant impression of a composer doing all sorts of transformative things to an unresisting theme, but instead brings awareness of a central idea sweeping in a great line to its climax. The soloist in the performance of this concert was Robert Casadesus, who with magnificent art realized in every way the qualities of the music.

The Bach of the G major Brandenburg concerto for solo violin and two solo flutes, was hardly less arresting. And here was the occasion for remarkable and highly appropriate virtuosity. Mr. Burgin, the orchestra's concert master, gave a performance astonishing for its certainty, its brilliancy, and rhythm. This violin part is more elaborate and breathtaking than the solo flute parts of the same score. It is believed that Bach wrote with a certain violinist in mind. But the flute of Mr. Laurent conferred its own beauty, and the second flute part, played by George Madsen, was keyed to the performance's level.

Sinfonia Inserted

The third Brandenburg concerto, for the strings, is the one in which two measures of modulation separate the first movement from the last. Between these, as an excellent device, was inserted the Sinfonia from the Bach cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbanden"—an admirably conceived contrast and balance for what now became a three-part design. And then the "Sinfonie concertante!"

Its performance enlisted two first-class soloists—William Kroll, always a brilliant player, who seemed to this observer to have developed remarkably in authority, quality of tone and depth of perception, and Jascha Veissi, the violist with a noble command of the resources of his instrument. It could be said of this performance that the soloists, with all their eloquence, played as parts of the ensemble, while the ensemble sounded as if every one of the virtuosos in it was individually responsible for its beauty.

And yet, for many who listened, the feature of the program was the Serenade for wind instruments. The piece gave the opportunity for an impeccable performance by the wind players of the Boston Symphony. But that was not the half of it. Here is the lighthearted veritable triumph of Mozart's classicism. Within clear, simple, restricted forms sounds the endless play of his invention, his intense individualism, his free, wayward fantasy. We hear imposing ceremony, passionate song, shadowed tragedy; gallantry, badinage, jocose humor. A god plays with a melody that is almost infantile, and you are struck dumb by the wonder of it.

Performance Qualities

What more does one want than this perfection equally of form and content? Mozart was followed at an interval by the romantic composers — by the Webers and Wagners, the Chopins and Schumanns, who brought new and very exciting things to their art. And yet, for the moment, listening to Mozart, one just wondered whether there was any particular reason for those people—whether romanticism had ever been particularly necessary! Just for a moment. Then the qualities of the performance took the attention—the chiselled attacks and releases; the wealth of nuance; suavity of which only the strings had been considered capable; and the Dionysiac spirit of the rondo. There are, of course, no limits to Mozart's genius.

If the Berkshire Symphonic Festival is resumed at full length and with the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, as probably it will be, it must have as a feature additional to the full orchestral concerts in the big tent these more intimate and even more distinguished achievements.

There is another lesson to be learned from them. It is concerned with the strange superstition that in the summertime American audiences don't particularly care about the quality of the concerts they attend. The fact is precisely the contrary and the evidence should be heeded. The public wants the best quality of performance that can be given. Only by thus earning public patronage at any series of summer concerts will that patronage be secured. This is merely evidence of the intelligence and genuineness of the American public's love of music.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

AUG 19 1945

Tanglewood's Success and Problems

Dr Serge ~~Koussevitzky,~~ who has been called by a music critic as "the greatest of living conductors," and his peerless Boston Symphony orchestra closed their Bach-Mozart festival at Tanglewood just three days before gasoline restrictions were lifted. The concert music hall with seating capacity of 1450 was sold out weeks in advance and for the final concert 1800 persons paid $1.50 for general admission tickets to hear the music outside the hall. By actual count Lieut-Col James Bruce McIntyre of Pittsfield said there were 850 cars parked in the grounds. The attendance at the final concert in 1943, the last year the shed was open, was 14,000.

Thus has grown the brain child of the late Dr Henry Hadley, who was associate conductor of the New York Philharmonic orchestra, when he disclosed his plan while recuperating in the Litchfield Hills from an operation at the home of his friend, Roy Chandler. In the autumn of 1933 Mr Chandler came to Berkshire as Dr Hadley's emissary in an effort to arouse interest in what he believed would develop into a broad educational and cultural undertaking for Berkshire county. Dr Hadley who was the conductor at the initial festival on the Dan R. Hanna farm at Stockbridge, in 1934, had faith in the idea because he believed it was sound, and such it has proved to be.

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival, inc., has been fortunate in having as its president from the start Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith who has given generously of her time and effort to make Tanglewood the notable musical center it has become in these 11 years.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, owner of Tanglewood land, has sponsored the festivals of 1944 and 1945. The music shed was built by the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, inc., and it is believed the cooperative understanding that prevailed before the war will be resumed in 1946 with the full orchestra of 100 pieces playing in at least nine concerts on the great stage. Dr Koussevitzky's Music foundation is an educational Tanglewood adjunct.

Several directors of the Berkshire Music Festival, inc., whose annual meeting is to be held in September, are known to favor limiting the attendance at festival concerts. They argue that, even with this year's restrictions, Berkshire hotels and inns could not care for the visitors. There are traffic limitations and Tanglewood has its parking problems, which this season's copious rains brought into the limelight.

Tanglewood is the symbol of the wealth, culture and refinement of the Berkshire hills and that it may continue to be is the ardent wish of all who have come under the spell of Dr Koussevitzky's magic wand.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS

AUG 26 1945

FROM THE BERKSHIRES—Mrs. Carol Luke writes of the Tanglewood Festival where 16,500 persons attended two days of symphonic music by the Boston Symphony under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, with crowds coming from long distances and failing to find living accommodations, remaining to sleep in their cars and on lawns, and the orchestra and conductor remaining over at Tanglewood to make recordings of the festival with Victor engineers who expressed satisfaction with the excellent acoustical properties of the opera-concert hall where the concerts are held and the discs were made. Mrs. Luke is visiting her son, Levin, who lives near Pittsfield, Mass., on a beautiful mountain lake.

* * *

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

AUG 20 1945

Music

A Setting for Mozart

His Symphonies Ideally Framed at Tanglewood

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

IF Mozart were living today and had the G minor Symphony to do over again, one could imagine that he would first compose Tanglewood and then the symphony. His original inspiration must have been circumstanced by such fabulous things as the reaching pines, the hemlock hedges, the blue-hilled horizon and the cool, intoxicating sunlight of the Berkshire heights. The setting will never be combed from the memory of those who heard this symphony on the afternoon of Aug. 5.

Actually Serge Koussevitzky composed Tanglewood. ~~His~~ is the kind of genius which turns handicaps to account. When wartime conditions made it impossible to continue the symphonic festival on the imposing dimensions to which it had grown, he did not simply project a miniature affair of the same type. What he created was smaller and consistent with the exigencies of the times, but it was something new in character. The ideal Mozart and Bach orchestra was created in a perfectly proportioned setting. No one would wish to hear a Brandenburg Concerto or the Jupiter symphony played in the big shed again. The opera-concert hall is the place for these things.

It will be greatly regretted if, when the large-scale popular concerts are resumed, the Bach-Mozart festival is not continued as an adjunct of Tanglewood and the Music Center.

* * *

THE SUGGESTION has been made by Frederick C. Schang Jr., concert manager, that a music center such as Salzburg be established in this country. He is all for creating it at Sante Fe, New Mexico, or somewhere else in the southwest, citing the climate, the natural beauty and growing art colonies in that region as reasons. Tanglewood was mentioned as a runner up.

It might be advanced that Tanglewood has superior claims in that it has already established a Mozart tradition. Its scenic attributes need no advocate.

But why bring up Salzburg at all?

Tanglewood is already a thing unique; it needs no nicknames, isn't a replica of anything, but certainly will not suffer by comparison with any music center in the world.

* * *

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

AUG 25 1945

The Vienna idyll is incomplete without the bucolic touch. We have it from Haydn and Beethoven and in its essence from Brahms, the Hamburg boy who grew up more Austrian than the Austrians.

His Third Symphony, which breathes a wondrously sweet outdoor fragrance, has been often recorded and fairly recently too but never with such charm and realism as Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra lends to it. This is one of those truly fine recordings which with increasing frequency are issuing from the Victor studios.

In so choice a set there is no need for special citation as to its parts for it is uniformly excellent. The last movement, nevertheless, constitutes a real triumph for the interpreters and technicians. Clarity is unmarred; nuances and shades are as appreciable as the stronger colors. A superlative recording by one of our greatest orchestras.

So with no more pains than a trip to your nearest record shop your broken Vienna is rebuilt for you.

AUGUST 26
1945 , 1945.

RECORDS: BRAHMS AND SCHOENBERG

By MARK A. SCHUBART

A NEW recording of Brahms' great Third Symphony in F Major, Op. 90, has been released by Victor, as performed by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra (album DM-1007, four twelve-inch records). Like the Koussevitzky album of Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" released some months ago, the present set is a remarkable achievement from both the musical and recording points of view and furnishes further proof that in the reproduction of serious music Victor has gone far beyond its prewar standards.

The performance of this symphony by Dr. Koussevitzky differs radically in many respects from that of Felix Weingartner and the London Philharmonic, another excellent recording of the work. The Weingartner performance has more power and drive and represents much less of a departure from the accepted interpretation. Dr. Koussevitzky takes the last movement, for example, at a much more leisurely pace and is more lenient in dealing with the tempi of various episodes in the first section. His reading is, on the whole, more poetic and more romantic, in the Chopinesque sense. Weingartner's version is sturdier, better integrated along broad lines and more Germanic.

As far as orchestral technique is concerned, the Boston Symphony continues to be the leading musical organization in this country, and Dr. Koussevitzky is a most meticulous workman. He is particularly careful in making records and the present album clearly shows the results of this care. It can be recommended without reservation.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

AUG 26 1945

BERKSHIRE MUSINGS

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

THREE years have passed since there was a major music festival at Tanglewood, and four since the last festival by the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra. But the six concerts of Bach and Mozart works presented this summer by a chamber orchestra of Boston Symphony musicians under Serge Koussevitzky's direction were no mere war-time substitute for the large-scale festival of pre-war days. They were distinguished not only by the quality of the music itself, but by their standards of performance. Several observers, for instance, thought that the Mozart serenade in B flat (K. 361) brought the best wind instrument ensemble playing that they had heard thus far in their musical experience.

The patronage of these concerts, in which the numbers listening outside, under canvas, on the grass or under the trees, seemed to equal the numbers sitting in Tanglewood's theater, suggested that there will be a large demand for a full-dress festival next summer. By then the conditions which have made such a festival impracticable should have become mere memories. And, while no announcement has yet been made, it is already rumored that such a festival is likely to take place in the Berkshires in July and August, 1946.

In the mean time, before such plans have taken definite shape, any one interested can indulge his own fancy on what he would like to see or hear in the first postwar festival series in Lenox, Mass., after the shutters have been raised in the large Music Shed. Doubtless, the large-scale concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will continue to be the principal feature. It was by these concerts that the Berkshire Festivals became firmly established, and the way was paved for the foundation of the Berkshire Music Center.

There is no readily apparent reason why the Center should not resume operation next summer, holding its usual classes and contributing materially to the festival. What it could accomplish on its own was shown in the series of 1942, when its student orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky replaced the Boston Symphony for the major concerts in the Music Shed. To the Center, one might look for an element which is often associated with the idea of a music festival, although not always present. That is, not only the presentation of programs outside of the regular course of a music season, but of programs of an exceptional character—programs such as one is unlikely to hear during a regular season.

Possible Developments

With some notable exceptions, the Boston Symphony's Tanglewood programs have been cross-sections of what the Boston Symphony's fall and winter patrons hear in Symphony Hall—with, perhaps, a somewhat smaller percentage of novelties. American music and more or less contemporary works are far from absent, but the character of the major concerts has been, more often than not, conservative. The present programmatic policy, no doubt, pleases most of its patrons best. But, if the character of the Boston Symphony's regular Tanglewood concerts follows the lines of 1936 to 1941, there is room for supplementary series of concerts of various kinds, which could be held on days when there are no major symphony concert programs, or at other unconflicting times. These could have many uses, such as providing a representative assortment of contemporary works of many kinds, or presenting valuable but unfamiliar works of earlier days. As Olin Downes suggested in a recent article in "The New York Times," the idea of a series of concerts by a chamber orchestra, such as this summer's Bach-Mozart festival, is well worth continuing. If the Boston Symphony's musicians are too busy, such concerts could be assigned to the Center's best instrumentalists.

Continuing the harmless occupation of dreaming about Tanglewood in 1946, let us imagine a few specific possibilities for series of supplementary concerts:

(1) Symphony concerts devoted mainly to new, and particularly American, music with, for relief and contrast, some more or less unfamiliar earlier works. This might include a judiciously chosen assortment of American works composed within the last fifty years.

(2) Chamber orchestra concerts of both new and old music.

(3) Concerts by vocal ensembles of a small or medium size, including both works for voices and instruments and a capella works.

(4) One or two concerts of large-scale choral works—besides those which may be presented in the regular symphony series.

(5) A forum-laboratory or experimental series presenting American compositions.

Opera Series

Opera was presented by the Center at Tanglewood in 1942 in the new theater-concert hall, and there should be room for several productions next summer. Considering the limited opportunity which we have in this country for experiments in this form, it would be well if the opera series could include at least one new work. Here, of course, even more than in other kinds of music, there is the consideration that the Center's forces are largely composed of students, and that the sessions are relatively short. In this case there may be a need for making allowances for shortcomings caused by a shortage of time for preparation. This difficulty might be partly met by engaging talented young professional singers as a nucleus for the casts. Or we might have a double series, one presented as part of the school's work in progress; the other on a professional basis.

It can be argued, indeed, that a school such as the Center is preparing most of its students for professional musical activities, and that from their point of view it is more profitable to learn works which they are likely to sing in their professional careers. But they should also find some value in learning not only works that are usually presented by the Metropolitan, and in taking part in performances that do not follow the lines of the Metropolitan's productions.

Past and Future

All this is not intended as a blueprint for a future Berkshire festival, but rather as a series of ideas of varying feasibility which may prove useful. A promising start in broadening the scope of the festival was, indeed, made in 1942, and might have well gone far by now, had the Center been able to carry on in the following two summers. The Berkshire Festival has become one of this country's principal events of its kind. The first two festivals, in 1934 and 1935, launched the idea of summer symphonic music in this attractive region. The engagement of the Boston Symphony under Dr. Koussevitzky in 1936 gave the series a definite high artistic standing. The presentation of the property for the use of the festivals, and the construction of the Music Shed, followed by other buildings, added the probability of permanence. The foundation of the Berkshire Music Center has opened notable possibilities for further development.

A danger which besets a successful institution, such as the Berkshire Festival, is that of marking time, of resting upon its laurels and falling into routine ways. But in this case the danger seems remote: the record of the last few years shows an appreciation of the possibilities of the festival and the Center as allied institutions making an important contribution to American musical life.

'Boston'

Herald, Aug. 29, '45

Most Bostonians will probably agree with George Sessions Perry's statement, in his sympathetic Saturday Evening Post article of this week, that the city is "complex and fascinating" and "one of the most distinctive" in the country. They may doubt, however, whether the "contrasts" to which he refers are "almost benumbing." Rather, they are stimulating and challenging. It is doubtful, too, whether these contrasts are more numerous or more startling than the differences which have developed in a score of other large cities, especially in the South. In those places also, are "antipathetic cultures," and they have caused more concern and trouble than those of Boston. When these cities have reached the ripe age of matured Boston, the "cacophony" of which Mr. Perry writes will probably be more discordant than it is now. Boston has solved many of the vexatious problems, racial, religious, social, economic, educational, etc., which lie ahead of our less venerable neighbors.

Mr. Perry's municipal psychograph of Boston is about as satisfying as any which has preceded it—and the colored pictures are especially well selected. Discerning residents will be especially thankful to him for his reminder that Boston considers "the skills of New England people . . . her greatest asset in the fight for postwar industry."

Persons who write about the old traditions, buildings, streets and customs which, it is too often assumed cripple Boston, usually overlook the fact that there is also an invaluable accumulation from the past of "skills" and craftsmanship and know-how which have come down to us for 300 years in an unbroken line. These abilities, as Mr. Perry comments, "just aren't to be found in the boll-weevil states or out where the tall corn grows . . . Her ultimate strength is her people." If he had dug into the activities of Greater Bostonians during the war and the magnificent cooperation in the Community Fund drive, perhaps he would edit out "antipathetic" and "almost benumbing" in his reference to our diverse cultures.

And "Tea Wharf" for "T Wharf!" Dear, dear, dear, Brother Perry! Again, those nth generation Bostonians who go dutifully and deferentially and decorously to Boston Symphony concerts on Saturday—just wait until they read that "social Boston" makes an emphatic point of "attending, in the wintertime, the Friday afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony." That's the truth, but not the whole truth. The Saturday nighters will certainly mark Mr. Perry down to an A-minus.

ALLENTOWN, PA.
CALL CHRONICLE

AUG 30 1945

On the RECORD

The first non-breakable, high fidelity phonograph record for home use has been developed by RCA. Victor, climaxing 11 years of research work in this field. A flexible disc made of synthetic plastic material, the new record, which greatly reduces surface sound, will make its initial appearance in October, according to an announcement by J. W. Murray, General Manager of the RCA Victor record division, who called it the greatest improvement in home phonograph records in 45 years.

The first of the new type non-breakable disc available to the public will present a performance of Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" by the Boston Symphony orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. At present, Mr. Murray said, it is planned to release only newly recorded musical works on the new type discs which will be known as Red Seal De Luxe records. The same musical work, he added, will be made available later on standard, high quality Red Seal shellac records.

The non-breakable home phonograph record, which is ruby red in color, was made possible, according to H. I. Reiskind, chief engineer of the RCA Victor record division, by the development of a formula for compound composed almost entirely of vinyl resin plastic which produces a durable, long-life record.

While vinyl materials have been used for many years in the manufacture of expensive transcription records, particularly for radio broadcast and for V discs used by our armed forces overseas, they have hitherto been prohibitively costly for use in home phonograph records, Mr. Reiskind said.

The new formula, one of several evolved by RCA Victor record engineers, according to Mr. Reiskind, results in a record that can be dropped or bent without breaking or cracking, has less surface sound, and enhances the fidelity of reproduction.

Surface sound reduction, he said, is made possible because the plastic compound does not require the mineral filler used in shellac records. The new De Luxe records, he added, are lighter in weight than the shellac discs. Extensive tests have demonstrated, he added, that they can also be played on practically all types of home phonographs, including those equipped with automatic changers, and with varied types of needles.

In declaring that the new non-breakable records would be made available in limited quantities, Mr. Murray emphasized that RCA Victor will not discontinue its production of the standard Red Seal and Victor shellac records. He likened the album containing the new type records to limited editions of fine books and pointed out that they offered music lovers a still finer recorded performance than that possible on the best shellac records.

"We anticipate that the use of this material for non-breakable, high fidelity home phonograph records will eventually be expanded to other types of RCA Victor records," Mr. Murray stated. "This will depend in some measure on the building up of facilities to produce the new type records in sufficient quantities."

RCA Victor engineers started their search for a non-breakable, higher quality record in 1934 when they set out to develop a "quiet" disc for the film industry. The final development of the flexible plastic record also suggested the answer to one of the biggest problems of the home phonograph record—the problem of breakage of shellac records. But, until now, the high cost of the plastic material used in transcription discs made such records for home use prohibitive. RCA Victor's policy of continued research to bring about technical and manufacturing improvements led to the development of this practical, relatively low cost non-breakable reco of the required durability for ho use, Mr. Murray said

HENRY
THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
NEW YORK
220 West 19th St., New York 11, N. Y
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

CONN. CIRCLE
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
AUGUST 1945

The Tanglewood Series

Of interest to many hundreds of Connecticut residents were the series of six concerts July 28-29, August 4-5-11-12 in the Bach-Mozart Festival which were held at Tanglewood—two on each of three week ends.

Of course, the numbers were restricted due to the gasoline rationing and there were not the 14,000 music lovers who under normal conditions, with good weather, listen to the Boston Symphony on the beautiful Berkshire estate at Lenox. However, it is certain that there will be increasing numbers this year over the past several years, and those who enjoy symphonies at their best will be present to see Kousavitzky raise his baton each week end.

NEW YORK HERALD TRI

AUG 30

New Unbreakabl

Eleanor Steber, oper new unbreakable p
R. C. A. Victor Co

Non-Brea
Record S
By RCA

Plastic Disk, Pri
Manages to Usual Surfac

A new and quiete record which may bent—and no harm
troduced yesterday b
It was developed plastic restricted du for use in submari combat items.

J. W. Murray, ge of the record divisi hands shoulder hig on the fifty-second RCA Building, 1270 and with all his m
the record on his slammed it sideway on the floor. Then played on a standar ment—and from it
Symphony performa
Strauss's "Til Eulen
Pranks."

"After all, there children under fiv
the United States," ray, in pointing up of the non-breakab compared its signi of the first flat pho forty-five years ago clumsy cylinders o
the phonograph.

The new record discs, which were after hour broadca the armed forces o
red in color. H. I. engineer of RCA V its appearance c years of research o records.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

AUG 26 1945

BERKSHIRE MUSINGS

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

THREE years have passed since there was a major music festival at Tanglewood, and four since the last festival by the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra. But the six concerts of Bach and Mozart works presented this summer by a chamber orchestra of Boston Symphony musicians under Serge [redacted] direction were no mere war-time substitute for the large-scale festival of pre-war days. They were distinguished not only by the quality of the music itself, but by their standards of performance. Several observers, for instance, thought that the Mozart serenade in B flat (K. 361) brought the best wind instrument ensemble playing that they had heard thus far in their musical experience.

The patronage of these concerts, in which the numbers listening outside, under canvas, on the grass or under the trees, seemed to equal the numbers sitting in Tanglewood's theater, suggested that there will be a large demand for a full-dress festival next summer. By then the conditions which have made such a festival impracticable should have become mere memories. And, while no announcement has yet been made, it is already rumored that such a festival is likely to take place in the Berkshires in July and August, 1946.

In the mean time, before such plans have taken definite shape, any one interested can indulge his own fancy on what he would like to see or hear in the first post-war festival series in Lenox, Mass., after the shutters have been raised in the large Music Shed. Doubtless, the large-scale concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will continue to be the principal feature. It was by these concerts that the Berkshire Festivals became firmly established, and the way was paved for the foundation of the Berkshire Music Center.

There is no readily apparent reason why the Center should not resume operation next summer, holding its usual classes and contributing materially to the festival. What it could accomplish on its own was shown in the series of 1942, when its student orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky replaced the Boston Symphony for the major concerts in the Music Shed. To the Center, one might look for an element which is often associated with the idea of a music festival, although not always present. That is, not only the presentation of programs outside of the regular course of a music season, but of programs of an exceptional character—programs such as one is unlikely to hear during a regular season.

Possible Developments

With some notable exceptions, the Boston Symphony's Tanglewood programs have been cross-sections of what the Boston Symphony's fall and winter patrons hear in Symphony Hall—with, perhaps, a somewhat smaller percentage of novelties. American music and more or less contemporary works are far from absent, but the character of the major concerts has been, more often than not, conservative. The present programmatic policy, no doubt, pleases most of its patrons best. But, if the character of the Boston Symphony's regular Tanglewood concerts follows the lines of 1936 to 1941, there is room for supplementary series of concerts of various kinds, which could be held on days when there are no major symphony concert programs, or at other unconflicting times. These could have many uses, such as providing a representative assortment of contemporary works of many kinds, or presenting valuable but unfamiliar works of earlier days. As Olin Downes suggested in a recent article in "The New York Times," the idea of a series of concerts by a chamber orchestra, such as this summer's Bach-Mozart festival, is well worth continuing. If the Boston Symphony's musicians are too busy, such concerts could be assigned to the Center's best instrumentalists.

Continuing the harmless occupation of dreaming about Tanglewood in 1946, let us imagine a few specific possibilities for series of supplementary concerts:

(1) Symphony concerts devoted mainly to new, and particularly American, music with, for relief and contrast, some more or less unfamiliar earlier works. This might include a judiciously chosen assortment of American works composed within the last fifty years.

(2) Chamber orchestra concerts of both new and old music.

(3) Concerts by vocal ensembles of a small or medium size, including both works for voices and instruments and a capella works.

(4) One or two concerts of large-scale choral works—besides those which may be presented in the regular symphony series.

(5) A forum-laboratory or experimental series presenting American compositions.

Opera Series

Opera was presented by the Center at Tanglewood in 1942 in the new theater-concert hall, and there should be room for several productions next summer. Considering the limited opportunity which we have in this country for experiments in this form, it would be well if the opera series could include at least one new work. Here, of course, even more than in other kinds of music, there is the consideration that the Center's forces are largely composed of students, and that the sessions are relatively short. In this case there may be a need for making allowances for shortcomings caused by a shortage of time for preparation. This difficulty might be partly met by engaging talented young professional singers as a nucleus for the casts. Or we might have a double series, one presented as part of the school's work in progress; the other on a professional basis.

It can be argued, indeed, that a school such as the Center is preparing most of its students for professional musical activities, and that from their point of view it is more profitable to learn works which they are likely to sing in their professional careers. But they should also find some value in learning not only works that are usually presented by the Metropolitan, and in taking part in performances that do not follow the lines of the Metropolitan's productions.

Past and Future

All this is not intended as a blueprint for a future Berkshire festival, but rather as a series of ideas of varying feasibility which may prove useful. A promising start in broadening the scope of the festival was, indeed, made in 1942, and might have well gone far by now, had the Center been able to carry on in the following two summers. The Berkshire Festival has become one of this country's principal events of its kind. The first two festivals, in 1934 and 1935, launched the idea of summer symphonic music in this attractive region. The engagement of the Boston Symphony under Dr. Koussevitzky in 1936 gave the series a definite high artistic standing. The presentation of the property for the use of the festivals, and the construction of the Music Shed, followed by other buildings, added the probability of permanence. The foundation of the Berkshire Music Center has opened notable possibilities for further development.

A danger which besets a successful institution, such as the Berkshire Festival, is that of marking time, of resting upon its laurels and falling into routine ways. But in this case the danger seems remote: the record of the last few years shows an appreciation of the possibilities of the festival and the Center as allied institutions making an important contribution to American musical life.

'Boston'

Herald, Aug. 29, '45

Most Bostonians wi probably agree with George Sessions Pe y's statement, in his sympathetic Satur Evening Post article of this week, th he city is "complex and fascinating" a "one of the most distinctive" in the co ry. They may doubt, however, whether the "contrasts" to which he refers are "almost benumbing." Rather, they are stimulating and challenging. It is doubtful, too, whether these contrasts are more numerous or more startling than the differences which have developed in a score of other large cities, especially in the South. In those places also, are "antipathetic cultures," and they have caused more concern and trouble than those of Boston. When these cities have reached the ripe age of matured Boston, the "cacophony" of which Mr. Perry writes will probably be more discordant than it is now. Boston has solved many of the vexatious problems, racial, religious, social, economic, educational, etc., which lie ahead of our less venerable neighbors.

Mr. Perry's municipal psychograph of Boston is about as satisfying as any which has preceded it—and the colored pictures are especially well selected. Discerning residents will be especially thankful to him for his reminder that Boston considers "the skills of New England people . . . her greatest asset in the fight for postwar industry."

Persons who write about the old traditions, buildings, streets and customs which, it is too often assumed cripple Boston, usually overlook the fact that there is also an invaluable accumulation from the past of "skills" and craftsmanship and know-how which have come down to us for 300 years in an unbroken line. These abilities, as Mr. Perry comments, "just aren't to be found in the boll-weevil states or out where the tall corn grows . . . Her ultimate strength is her people." If he had dug into the activities of Greater Bostonians during the war and the magnificent cooperation in the Community Fund drive, perhaps he would edit out "antipathetic" and "almost benumbing" in his reference to our diverse cultures.

And "Tea Wharf" for "T Wharf!" Dear, dear, dear, Brother Perry! Again, those nth generation Bostonians who go dutifully and deferentially and decorously to Boston Symphony concerts on Saturday—just wait until they read that "social Boston" makes an emphatic point of "attending, in the wintertime, the Friday afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony." That's the truth, but not the whole truth. The Saturday nighters will certainly mark Mr. Perry down to an A-minus.

ALLENTOWN, PA.
CALL CHRONICLE

30 1945

On the RECORD

The first non-breakable, high fidelity phonograph record for home use has been developed by RCA. Victor, climaxing 11 years of research work in this field. A flexible disc made of synthetic plastic material, the new record, which greatly reduces surface sound, will make its initial appearance in October, according to an announcement by J. W. Murray, General Manager of the RCA Victor record division, who called it the greatest improvement in home phonograph records in 45 years.

The first of the new type non-breakable disc available to the publi will present a performance of Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merr Pranks" by the Boston Symphony orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. At present, Mr. [redacted] said, i is planned to release only newly recorded musical works on the new typ discs which will be known as Re Seal De Luxe records. The same musical work, he added, will be mad available later on standard, hig quality Red Seal shellac records.

The non-breakable home phonograph record, which is ruby red i color, was made possible, accordin to H. I. Reiskind, chief engineer o the RCA Victor record division, b the development of a formula for compound composed almost entirel of vinyl resin plastic which produce a durable, long-life record.

While vinyl materials have bee used for many years in the manufacture of expensive transcription records, particularly for radio broadcast and for V discs used by our arme forces overseas, they have hithert been prohibitively costly for use i home phonograph records, Mr. Reiskind said.

The new formula, one of severa evolved by RCA Victor record engineers, according to Mr. Reiskind, results in a record that can be droppe or bent without breaking or cracking has less surface sound, and enhance the fidelity of reproduction.

Surface sound reduction, he said, i made possible because the plastic compound does not require the mineral filler used in shellac records. The new De Luxe records, he added, are lighter in weight than the shellac discs. Extensive tests have demonstrated, he added, that they can also be played on practically all types of home phonographs, including those equipped with automatic changers, and with varied types of needles.

In declaring that the new non-breakable records would be made available in limited quantities, Mr. Murray emphasized that RCA Victor will not discontinue its production of the standard Red Seal and Victor shellac records. He likened the album containing the new type records to limited editions of fine books and pointed out that they offered music lovers a still finer recorded performance than that possible on the best shellac records.

"We anticipate that the use of this material for non-breakable, high fidelity home phonograph records will eventually be expanded to other types of RCA Victor records," Mr. Murray stated. "This will depend in some measure on the building up of facilities to produce the new type records in sufficient quantities."

RCA Victor engineers started their search for a non-breakable, higher quality record in 1934 when they set out to develop a "quiet" disc for the film industry. The final development of the flexible plastic record also suggested the answer to one of the biggest problems of the home phonograph record—the problem of breakage of shellac records. But, until now, the high cost of the plastic material used in transcription discs made such records for home use prohibitive. RCA Victor's policy of continued research to bring about technical and manufacturing improvements led to the development of this practical, relatively low cost non-breakable reco of the required durability for ho use, Mr. Murray said.

HENRY THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU NEW YORK
220 West 19th St., New York 11, N. Y
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

CONN. CIRCLE
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
AUGUST 1945

The Tanglewood Series

Of interest to many hundreds of Connecticut residents were the series of six concerts July 28-29, August 4-5-11-12 in the Bach-Mozart Festival which were held at Tanglewood—two on each of three week ends.

Of course, the numbers were restricted due to the gasoline rationing and there were not the 14,000 music lovers who under normal conditions, with good weather, listen to the Boston Symphony on the beautiful Berkshire estate at Lenox. However, it is certain that there will be increasing numbers this year over the past several years, and those who enjoy symphonies at their best will be present to see Kousavitzky raise his baton each week end.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

AUG 30 1945

New Unbreakable Phonograph Record Introduced

Herald Tribune—Acme

Eleanor Steber, operatic soprano, demonstrating the flexibility of a new unbreakable plastic phonograph record developed by the R. C. A. Victor Company. It will be placed on sale in October

Non-Breakable Record Shown By RCA Victor

Plastic Disk, Priced at $2, Manages to Eliminate Usual Surface Sounds

A new and quieter phonograph record which may be banged or bent—and no harm done—was introduced yesterday by RCA Victor. It was developed from vinyl, a plastic restricted during the war for use in submarines and other combat items.

J. W. Murray, general manager of the record division, raised his hands shoulder high, in his office on the fifty-second floor of the RCA Building, 1270 Sixth Avenue, and with all his might whammed the record on his desk. Next he slammed it sideways and threw it on the floor. Then the record was played on a standard home instrument—and from it issued a Boston Symphony performance of Richard Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

"After all, there are 10,000,000 children under five years old in the United States," said Mr. Murray, in pointing up the importance of the non-breakable record. He compared its significance to that of the first flat phonograph record, forty-five years ago, following the clumsy cylinders of early days of the phonograph.

The new record, similar to V discs, which were used for hour after hour broadcasts of music to the armed forces overseas, is deep red in color. H. I. Reiskind, chief engineer of RCA Victor, said that its appearance climaxes eleven years of research on non-breakable records.

In order to afford comparison, a conventional shellac record was played first. Auditors noted the soft but steady hiss, which was absent, so far as could be heard in the room, when the new record was played. It was explained that the surface sound reduction is due to the elimination, in the new record, of a mineral filler which was required for the shellac records.

Vinyl, the new record's plastic, results from a reaction of acetylene gas and hydrochloric acid, Mr. Reiskind said. He explained that the company has been interested in non-breakable records ever since they were produced in 1932 for use with talking pictures and afterward for radio transcriptions. But the costs were prohibitive for home-use development. R. C. A. had to develop a new formula for the material and new method of molding the record. Priced at $2, the record will be available to the public on Oct. 10.

The "Til Eulenspiegel" was conducted by Serge Koussevitsky especially for the introduction of the new record, Mr. Murray explained, and for the present it is planned to release only newly recorded musical works on the new discs. He stressed that standard shellac records of the company will be continued, and soon these will include "Til Eulenspiegel." R. C. A.-Victor expects to be able to supply the demand for the first non-breakable recording and will issue other numbers as conditions warrant, possibly one a month, said Mr. Murray.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

AUG 30 1945

UNBREAKABLE DISK DEVELOPED BY RCA

First of Its Kind Completed With Plastic Material for Phonographs in Homes

The first non-breakable, high-fidelity phonograph record for home use will appear about Oct. 10, it was announced yesterday by J. W. Murray, general manager of the RCA Victor Record Division. He called the new record the "greatest improvement in home phonograph records" in the forty-five years since the disk began to displace the early cylinders.

The new record is a flexible disk made of a synthetic plastic material that greatly reduces surface sound, is easier to handle, is more attractive to look at—it is ruby red and transparent—and can be hurled to the floor, hammered against the table—if the children happen to feel so disposed—bent, twisted and sat upon completely without damage. The cost of materials and labor is so much greater, however, that the new record will be priced at $2 instead of $1, but the present Red Seal $1 record will continue to be made and marketed, as will the Victor record.

The first of the new non-breakable disks available to the public, heard at a demonstration yesterday at the RCA Victor Division's rooms on the fifty-second floor of the RCA Building in Rockefeller Plaza, presents the opening of a performance of Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky.

For the present, Mr. Murray said, it was planned to release only newly recorded works on the new disks, which will be known as Red Seal De Luxe records. The same musical work will be made available later on standard, high-quality Red Seal shellac records.

The non-breakable home phonograph record results from research beginning in 1934, when the RCA Victor engineers set out to develop a "quiet" disk for the film industry. The first "non-breakable" disk had been made in 1930, but was not satisfactory. With the development of "transcription" records for the films in 1932, the need for such quiet disks became important.

The new non-breakable disk was made possible, according to H. I. Reiskind, chief engineer of the RCA Victor Record Division, by the development of a formula for a compound composed almost entirely of vinyl resin plastic, which produces a durable, long-life record. Vinyl materials have been in use for many years in the manufacture of transcription records, but they have been prohibitively expensive for home phonograph records. Surface sound reduction is due to the elimination of the mineral filler of the shellac records.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
AUG 31 1945

stayed in formation and dropped its

Recordings

By Willard M. Clark

So many fine records are coming from Victor that it is a bit difficult to know just where to begin. Tops in the piano field are two recent volumes. The first by Horowitz includes his own arrangement of the Liszt arrangement of "Danse Macabre," a seldom heard "Theme and Variations" by Czerny and the "Dumka" by Tschaikowsky. These are played with superlative technique which leaves the listener a bit breathless. The Victor Company has completely captured the piano. Arthur Rubinstein is featured in two superb recordings. The first contains a group of pieces by Debussy, the second, Franck's "Prelude Chorale and Fugue." Both albums are notable and splendid additions for any collection.

Brahms' Third Symphony is given a magnificent reading by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony players. For five years we had no recordings by this distinguished organization, but those being issued now make up for the long absence. The Boston players will be the first to be recorded on the new type of nonbreakable disc just perfected by Victor. The first recording will be a performance of Richard Strauss "Til Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." These new discs, by the way, will be known as Red Seal De Luxe records. According to advanced report, the new formula results in a record that can be dropped or bent without breaking or cracking, has less surface sound and enhances the fidelity of reproduction.

Jose Iturbi, who became known to millions through his playing in "Music to Remember," has just recorded Chopin's "Polonaise in A-Flat." Mr. Iturbi is not too happy in this work. The left hand is weak and the balance incorrect. Iturbi can be heard at his best on records in the "Ritual Fire Dance" and "Danse of Terror" by DeFalla.

A "must" for every devotee of fine singing and admirer of Latin-American music is the Columbia album of a set of Serenades by Villa-Lobos, sung by Jennie Tourel. Miss Tourel is one of the greatest artists of this generation and she brings to these Portuguese songs just the voice and expressiveness they demand. Indeed, the "Song of the Ox-Driver" is one of the most thrilling bits of singing to be heard on the discs. The recording is splendid.

For those who like their operas purely instrumental, the album of Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier" played by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Eugene Goosens should satisfy. Cleverly arranged for orchestra, the discs include all the high lights and end with the delectable waltzes.

The St. Louis Orchestra and Golschmann provide wondrous fare in the album devoted to Shoenburg's "Transfigured Night." The arrangement for full string orchestra is used and with dazzling effect. A new recording of this work has long been needed.

Finally, for those who like their vocal music on the soft side, it is suggested that they hear Blanche Thebom, the Metropolitan Opera's young mezzo-soprano, sing the "Cradle Song" by Brahms and "The Virgin's Slumber Song." Miss Thebom has a lovely voice which will probably sound better in songs and arias more pretentious, but she sings the two Brahms songs simply and with feeling.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

AUG 31 1945

RCA PLASTIC RECORD IS NONBREAKABLE

Offers High Fidelity on Home Reproducers; Goes on Sale in October

The first nonbreakable, high fidelity phonograph record for home use has been developed by RCA Victor, climaxing 11 years f research work in this field.

A flexible disc made of synthetic lastic material, which greatly reuces surface sound, will make its ppearance in October.

J. W. Murray, general manager f the RCA Victor Record Division escribes the new record as the reatest improvement in home phonograph records in 45 years.

The first of the new type nonreakable disc available to the public will present a performance of Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenpiegel's Merry Pranks" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

At present, Murray said, it is planned to release only newly recorded musical works on the new discs, which will be known as Red Seal De Luxe records. The same musical work, he added, will be made available on standard Red Seal shellac records.

The nonbreakable home phonograph record, which is ruby in color, was made possible, according to H. I. Reiskind, chief engineer of the RCA Victor Record Division, by the development of a formula for a compound composed almost entirely of vinyl resin plastic which produces a durable, long-life record.

While vinyl materials have been used for many years in the manufacture of expensive transcription records, particularly for radio broadcasts and for V discs used for our armed forces overseas, they have hitherto been prohibitively costly for use in home phonograph records, Reiskind said.

Murray emphasized that RCA Victor will not discontinue its production of the standard Red Seal and Victor popular shellac records.

"We anticipate that the use of this material for nonbreakable, high fidelity home phonograph records will eventually be expanded to other types of RCA Victor records," Murray stated. "This will depend in some measure on the building up of facilities to produce the new type records in sufficient quantities."

DAILY VARIETY
HOLLYWOOD, CAL.

AUG 31 1945

RCA VICTOR PREVIEWS ITS NEW PLASTIC RECORD

RCA's new unbreakable Victor record made its first appearance on the Coast yesterday. Platter, which will be sold over the counters beginning in October, is made of vinylite plastic and is translucent. Disc came wrapped in a package with the unusual statement on the outside: "May Be Dropped."

Initial disc was sample pressing of "Till Eulenspiegel" with Serge Koussetvitzky conducting the Boston Symphony orchestra. Recording, by means of the new plastic material, which is red, cuts down surface scratch generally heard on regular shellac pressings. Higher fidelity is guaranteed by the company and lifetime wear.

Vinylite has been in use for several years by the armed forces for transcriptions. Material has proven durable in all conditions, having been dropped to troops by parachute with no damage to the discs and also in all types of weather, from extreme heat to extreme cold.

Platter itself weighs one-third less than the normal shellac record now on sale. In tests conducted for Daily Variety, the disc was bent over the edge of a desk and dropped, with no damage either to the record or to the playing surface.

RCA plans to keep the new type disc restricted to the Red Seal platters for the time being, before converting their Black Seal and Bluebird popular discs to the new material.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

AUG 30 1945

New Unbreakable Phonograph Record Introduced

Herald Tribune—Acme

Eleanor Steber, operatic soprano, demonstrating the flexibility of a new unbreakable plastic phonograph record developed by the R. C. A. Victor Company. It will be placed on sale in October

Non-Breakable Record Shown By RCA Victor

Plastic Disk, Priced at $2, Manages to Eliminate Usual Surface Sounds

A new and quieter phonograph record which may be banged or bent—and no harm done—was introduced yesterday by RCA Victor. It was developed from vinyl, a plastic restricted during the war for use in submarines and other combat items.

J. W. Murray, general manager of the record division, raised his hands shoulder high, in his office on the fifty-second floor of the RCA Building, 1270 Sixth Avenue, and with all his might whammed the record on his desk. Next he slammed it sideways and threw it on the floor. Then the record was played on a standard home instrument—and from it issued a Boston Symphony performance of Richard Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

"After all, there are 10,000,000 children under five years old in the United States," said Mr. Murray, in pointing up the importance of the non-breakable record. He compared its significance to that of the first flat phonograph record, forty-five years ago, following the clumsy cylinders of early days of the phonograph.

The new record, similar to V discs, which were used for hour after hour broadcasts of music to the armed forces overseas, is deep red in color. H. I. Reiskind, chief engineer of RCA Victor, said that its appearance climaxes eleven years of research on non-breakable records.

In order to afford comparison, a conventional shellac record was played first. Auditors noted the soft but steady hiss, which was absent, so far as could be heard in the room, when the new record was played. It was explained that the surface sound reduction is due to the elimination, in the new record, of a mineral filler which was required for the shellac records.

Vinyl, the new record's plastic, results from a reaction of acetylene gas and hydrochloric acid, Mr. Reiskind said. He explained that the company has been interested in non-breakable records ever since they were produced in 1932 for use with talking pictures and afterward for radio transcriptions. But the costs were prohibitive for home-use development. R. C. A. had to develop a new formula for the material and new method of molding the record. Priced at $2, the record will be available to the public on Oct. 10.

The "Til Eulenspiegel" was conducted by Serge Koussevitsky especially for the introduction of the new record, Mr. Murray explained, and for the present it is planned to release only newly recorded musical works on the new discs. He stressed that standard shellac records of the company will be continued, and soon these will include "Til Eulenspiegel." R. C. A.-Victor expects to be able to supply the demand for the first non-breakable recording and will issue other numbers as conditions warrant, possibly one a month, said Mr. Murray.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

AUG 30 1945

UNBREAKABLE DISK DEVELOPED BY RCA

First of Its Kind Completed With Plastic Material for Phonographs in Homes

The first non-breakable, high-fidelity phonograph record for home use will appear about Oct. 10, it was announced yesterday by J. W. Murray, general manager of the RCA Victor Record Division. He called the new record the "greatest improvement in home phonograph records" in the forty-five years since the disk began to displace the early cylinders.

The new record is a flexible disk made of a synthetic plastic material that greatly reduces surface sound, is easier to handle, is more attractive to look at—it is ruby red and transparent—and can be hurled to the floor, hammered against the table—if the children happen to feel so disposed—bent, twisted and sat upon completely without damage. The cost of materials and labor is so much greater, however, that the new record will be priced at $2 instead of $1, but the present Red Seal $1 record will continue to be made and marketed, as will the Victor record.

The first of the new non-breakable disks available to the public, heard at a demonstration yesterday at the RCA Victor Division's rooms on the fifty-second floor of the RCA Building in Rockefeller Plaza, presents the opening of a performance of Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky.

For the present, Mr. Murray said, it was planned to release only newly recorded works on the new disks, which will be known as Red Seal De Luxe records. The same musical work will be made available later on standard, high-quality Red Seal shellac records.

The non-breakable home phonograph record results from research beginning in 1934, when the RCA Victor engineers set out to develop a "quiet" disk for the film industry. The first "non-breakable" disk had been made in 1930, but was not satisfactory. With the development of "transcription" records for the films in 1932, the need for such quiet disks became important.

The new non-breakable disk was made possible, according to H. I. Reiskind, chief engineer of the RCA Victor Record Division, by the development of a formula for a compound composed almost entirely of vinyl resin plastic, which produces a durable, long-life record. Vinyl materials have been in use for many years in the manufacture of transcription records, but they have been prohibitively expensive for home phonograph records. Surface sound reduction is due to the elimination of the mineral filler of the shellac records.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

AUG 31 1945

stayed in formation and dropped its

Recordings

By Willard M. Clark

So many fine records are coming from Victor that it is a bit difficult to know just where to begin. Tops in the piano field are two recent volumes. The first by Horowitz includes his own arrangement of the Liszt arrangement of "Danse Macabre," a seldom heard "Theme and Variations" by Czerny and the "Dumka" by Tschaikowsky. These are played with superlative technique which leaves the listener a bit breathless. The Victor Company has completely captured the piano. Arthur Rubinstein is featured in two superb recordings. The first contains a group of pieces by Debussy, the second, Franck's "Prelude Chorale and Fugue." Both albums are notable and splendid additions for any collection.

Brahms' Third Symphony is given a magnificent reading by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony players. For five years we had no recordings by this distinguished organization, but those being issued now make up for the long absence. The Boston players will be the first to be recorded on the new type of nonbreakable disc just perfected by Victor. The first recording will be a performance of Richard Strauss "Til Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." These new discs, by the way, will be known as Red Seal De Luxe records. According to advanced report, the new formula results in a record that can be dropped or bent without breaking or cracking, has less surface sound and enhances the fidelity of reproduction.

Jose Iturbi, who became known to millions through his playing in "Music to Remember," has just recorded Chopin's "Polonaise in A-Flat." Mr. Iturbi is not too happy in this work. The left hand is weak and the balance incorrect. Iturbi can be heard at his best on records in the "Ritual Fire Dance" and "Danse of Terror" by DeFalla.

A "must" for every devotee of fine singing and admirer of Latin-American music is the Columbia album of a set of Serenades by Villa-Lobos, sung by Jennie Tourel. Miss Tourel is one of the greatest artists of this generation and she brings to these Portuguese songs just the voice and expressiveness they demand. Indeed, the "Song of the Ox-Driver" is one of the most thrilling bits of singing to be heard on the discs. The recording is splendid.

For those who like their operas purely instrumental, the album of Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier" played by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Eugene Goosens should satisfy. Cleverly arranged for orchestra, the discs include all the high lights and end with the delectable waltzes.

The St. Louis Orchestra and Golschmann provide wondrous fare in the album devoted to Shoenburg's "Transfigured Night." The arrangement for full string orchestra is used and with dazzling effect. A new recording of this work has long been needed.

Finally, for those who like their vocal music on the soft side, it is suggested that they hear Blanche Thebom, the Metropolitan Opera's young mezzo-soprano, sing the "Cradle Song" by Brahms and "The Virgin's Slumber Song." Miss Thebom has a lovely voice which will probably sound better in songs and arias more pretentious, but she sings the two Brahms songs simply and with feeling.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

AUG 31 1945

RCA PLASTIC RECORD IS NONBREAKABLE

Offers High Fidelity on Home Reproducers; Goes on Sale in October

The first nonbreakable, high idelity phonograph record fo ome use has been developed by CA Victor, climaxing 11 year f research work in this field.

A flexible disc made of synthetic lastic material, which greatly re uces surface sound, will make it ppearance in October.

J. W. Murray, general manage f the RCA Victor Record Division escribes the new record as th reatest improvement in hom honograph records in 45 years.

The first of the new type no reakable disc available to th ublic will present a performanc f Richard Strauss' "Till Eulen piegel's Merry Pranks" by th Boston Symphony Orchestra, co ucted by Serge Koussevitzky.

At present, Murray said, it planned to release only newly r corded musical works on the ne discs, which will be known as Re Seal De Luxe records. The sam musical work, he added, will b made available on standard Re Seal shellac records.

The nonbreakable home phonograph record, which is ruby i color, was made possible, accord ing to H. I. Reiskind, chief en gineer of the RCA Victor Recor Division, by the development of formula for a compound compose almost entirely of vinyl resin plas tic which produces a durable, long life record.

While vinyl materials have been used for many years in the manu facture of expensive transcription records, particularly for radio broadcasts and for V discs used for our armed forces overseas they have hitherto been prohibi tively costly for use in home phonograph records, Reiskind said.

Murray emphasized that RCA Victor will not discontinue its pro duction of the standard Red Seal and Victor popular shellac records.

"We anticipate that the use o this material for nonbreakable high fidelity home phonograph rec ords will eventually be expanded to other types of RCA Victor rec ords," Murray stated. "This will depend in some measure on the building up of facilities to produce the new type records in sufficient quantities."

DAILY VARIETY
HOLLYWOOD, CAL.

AUG 31 1945

RCA VICTOR PREVIEWS ITS NEW PLASTIC RECORD

RCA's new unbreakable Victor record made its first appearance on the Coast yesterday. Platter, which will be sold over the counters beginning in October, is made of vinylite plastic and is translucent. Disc came wrapped in a package with the unusual statement on the outside: "May Be Dropped."

Initial disc was sample pressing of "Till Eulenspiegel" with Serge Koussetvitzky conducting the Boston Symphony orchestra. Recording, by means of the new plastic material, which is red, cuts down surface scratch generally heard on regular shellac pressings. Higher fidelity is guaranteed by the company and lifetime wear.

Vinylite has been in use for several years by the armed forces for transcriptions. Material has proven durable in all conditions, having been dropped to troops by parachute with no damage to the discs and also in all types of weather, from extreme heat to extreme cold.

Platter itself weighs one-third less than the normal shellac record now on sale. In tests conducted for Daily Variety, the disc was bent over the edge of a desk and dropped, with no damage either to the record or to the playing surface.

RCA plans to keep the new type disc restricted to the Red Seal platters for the time being, before converting their Black Seal and Bluebird popular discs to the new material.

BLANK PAGE

END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 75

BSO Pops
Tanglewood

1945 - 1946

NATIONAL FLAT BACK SCRAP BOOKS

NATIONAL Made in U.S.A.

FULL DUCK COVER, MANILA PAPER
Without Index, Ruling, Paging or Title

NUMBER	THICKNESS	SIZE
1032	72 Leaves	12⅝ × 10¼
1033	72 Leaves	15 × 10
1034	100 Leaves	15 × 10
1036	90 Leaves	16 × 11⅝
1038	150 Leaves	16 × 11⅝
1039	90 Leaves	18 × 13
→ 1041	150 Leaves	18 × 13
1042	150 Leaves	25 × 20

To duplicate this book Order Number indicated by arrow

THE PHILA.FORUM
PHILA., PA
MAY, 1945

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
THE FORUM will again present the most distinguished musical event of the season, the Annual Philadelphia Concert by "the king of orchestras," with Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

THE PHILA.FORUM
PHILA., PA
MAY, 1945

For the Twenty-fifth Season

NEXT season will be The Philadelphia Forum's twenty-fifth, and we are hoping to make this Anniversary Season the most brilliant in The Forum's history.

The Forum continues to provide Philadelphia with one of America's most distinguished platforms, and most of the artists and lecturers on it appear in this city for us only.

Let's take one more glance at the line-up:

The unrivaled Boston Symphony Orchestra in its only Philadelphia concert;

Blanche Thebom, whose magnificent debut at the Metropolitan is still the talk of New York musical circles;

Jimmy Melton, leading Metropolitan tenor and star of the Texaco Theatre, generally regarded as the top variety show on the air.

The first Piano Quartet, which last season made one of the most sensational debuts within the memory of local music lovers;

Egon Petri, a really great pianist who curiously has never been in Philadelphia.

Verdi's "Rigoletto," the Charles L. Wagner production with cast, direction and orchestra from the Metropolitan Opera Association, plus new scenery;

Nathan Milstein, than whom there is no more brilliant living violinist, returning to the platform of his introduction to Philadelphia.

Ballet will be amply provided for by the one and original Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, introduced to Philadelphia by The Forum and making its eighth appearance with us, and Rosario and Antonio, stars of musical comedy, motion picture and concert, bringing to Philadelphia for the first time their ensemble of Spanish dancers and instrumentalists.

The twenty-fourth Presentation of The Philadelphia Award, "the Nobel Prize for service to our city," once more honoring The Forum.

Sir Thomas Beecham, world-famous conductor, musical authority, composer and eminent Mozartian, in one of his unique lecture-piano recitals.

Discussions of the problems facing a chaotic world will be illumined by some of the foremost publicists and masters of the platform, General Romulo, H. R. Knickerbocker, Vincent Sheean, "Singapore Joe" Fisher, chronic globe circumnavigator and Forum favorite, and others to be announced.

And there may be additional surprises.

It is expected that this Twenty-fifth Anniversary Season will be inaugurated by an address by a distinguished person who cannot yet be announced.

Isn't this a tempting list, and shouldn't you renew your membership immediately?

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

AUG 29 1945

BERNSTEIN TO LEAD THE CITY SYMPHONY

Young Conductor Chosen for 1945-46 Season to Take Place of Stokowski

Leonard Bernstein, 26-year-old American composer and conductor, has been named music director of the symphony concert programs of the New York City center of Music and Drama for the 1945-46 season, it was announced yesterday by Mayor La Guardia at City Hall. Mr. Bernstein will take the place of Leopold Stokowski, who has received a year's leave of absence to fill engagements that he has postponed for the last two seasons in this country and in Latin America.

Like Mr. Stokowski, who organized the New York City Symphony and acted as music director and conducted the orchestra for the last two seasons, Mr. Bernstein will serve without pay.

Asked if he had any plans for his work for the coming season at the City Symphony, he pointed out that the season would begin on Oct. 8, only a little more than a month away, and that he had heard of his appointment only three days ago.

Too Early to Tell Plans

"I might talk about plans for fifteen years," he said, "but it is too early to talk specifically about plans for the season just ahead. America is now definitely the cultural center of the world and New York is the cultural center of America, and hence of the world. There should be a fountain-head in the city for music and art, and it seems to me that the City Center [illegible] that need.

"No change in the personnel of the orchestra is now in view, although, in consideration of the end of the war, it is impossible to say what might happen in the next month. Undoubtedly many changes will occur in time."

In presenting the new director, Mayor La Guardia praised him as an outstanding figure among the younger musicians of the day.

"I am happy to introduce Maestro Leonard Bernstein as music director of the New York City Symphony for the 1945-46 season," the Mayor said. "I consider him one of America's most promising musicians.

Elated by the Choice

"I was certainly elated by the selection of Mr. Bernstein by the Board of Directors. It typifies so well the purpose of City Center, which is to give the very best by the very best. I look forward to a successful season.

"I now announce to the world that the selection of conductors at City Center is not a matter of patronage—that will be up to my successor."

Looking at Newbold Morris, who was present, the Mayor added with a chuckle, "You will be able to handle it very well."

Mr. Bernstein, who studied two years at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia after his graduation from Harvard College, and then took lessons in conducting from Serge Ko[illegible]zky, first came into prominence in 1943 when, as assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, he substituted on over-night notice for Bruno Walter as conductor of a Carnegie Hall concert and scored a great success with both the public and the critics.

Stokowski Has No Comment

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LOS ANGELES, Calif., Aug. 28—Leopold Stokowski said tonight that he had asked for and received a year's leave of absence but made no comment on the appointment of Leonard Bernstein. He added that he planned to take a delayed wedding trip to South America at the end of September. Last April he married Gloria Vanderbilt di Cicco. On Sept. 22 he will conduct a special benefit concert with the Hollywood Bowl Orchestra and on his return from South America, he said, would go to Hollywood to make a picture.

MEMPHIS, TENN.
COMMERCIAL APPEAL

AUG 19 1945

WMPS Once Again Is To Broadcast Boston Symphony

Orchestra Returns To Air On ABC Oct. 6

FOR the third consecutive season the American Broadcasting Co. and WMPS will present concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

~~Under its~~ distinguished conductor Dr. Serge Koussevitzky,, the Boston Symphony ~~director has~~ presented the works of the recognized music masters without regard to the time from which they came, for in his opinion, good music is ageless.

The broadcast again will be on Saturday evenings, starting Oct. 6. This will be the 65th season of the orchestra. It will mark Dr. Koussevitzky, 22nd year as musical director of this world famous ensemble.

"Warsaw Concerto," will be featured by Harry Sosnick's Orchestra on the N-K Ranch program, heard on ABC and WMPS at 3:30 p.m. . . . All the young hearts in Lakeview skip a beat when a handsome young man arrives during the Charlotte Greenwood Show to be heard via the American and WMPS at 4:30 p.m. . . .

PARKERSBURG, W. VA.
NEWS

AUG 19 1945

Boston Symphony To Be Broadcast For Third Season

NEW YORK, Aug. 18—For the third consecutive season, the American Broadcasting Co. will present concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra under the sponsorship of the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co., of Milwaukee, Wis., it was announced today by Mark Woods, ABC president.

"The American Broadcasting Co. is very appreciative of the renewed sponsorship of the Boston Symphony orchestra broadcasts by the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co." Woods declared.

"This collaboration of one of the outstanding business organizations of the country with a musical organization which has made artistic history is, in a sense, an evidence of the way in which business and the arts are joining to give the American audience the best possible in broadcast entertainment.

"Allis-Chalmers is synonymous with excellence in its field of equipment manufactured for industry and agriculture; the Boston Symphony is synonymous with the best in the field of good music.

"Under its distinguished conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony has presented the works of the recognized music masters without regard to the time from which they came, for in his opinion, good music is ageless. News of their new season will gladden the hearts of hundreds of thousands of music lovers."

The broadcasts will again be on Saturday evenings starting on Oct. 6. This will be the 65th season of the orchestra which was founded in 1881. It will mark Dr. Koussevitzky's 22d year as musical director of this world famous ensemble.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

AUG 29 1945

CONDUCTOR, 26, IN MAJOR ROLE

Bernstein to Direct Concerts at City Center.

Leonard Bernstein, 26-year-old composer and conductor, who studied under Serge Koussevitzky, will replace Leopold Stokowski this season as director of the symphony concert programs of the New York City Center of Music and Drama. Announcement of his appointment has been made by Mayor LaGuardia, who said that Bernstein will serve without pay.

Stokowski has been granted a year's leave of absence to fill engagements he has postponed for the last two seasons in this country and Latin America. The mayor said that he was much elated "as it typifies so well the purpose of the center to give the very best in music by the very best, and at the same time afford an outlet to young but competent and accomplished American artists."

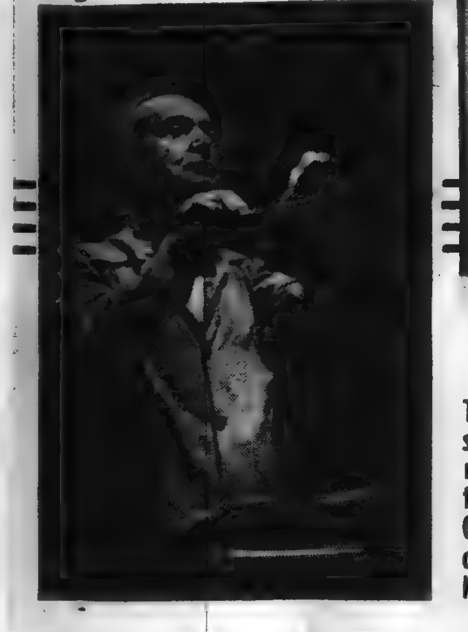
While serving as music director of the municipally sponsored theater and concert hall at 31 West 55th street, Bernstein will be free to accept engagements elsewhere from time to time. LaGuardia presented the new director and tsated: "I now announce to the world that the selection of conductors at the City Center is not a matter of patronage—that will be up to my successor." He looked over at Newbold Morris and said with a laugh: "You will be able to handle it very well."

Bernstein said that there should be a fountain-head in the city for music and art and that the center filled that need. He added that no change of the personnel of the orchestra is now in view, "although considering the war's end, it is impossible to say what might happen in the next month."

The young conductor pointed out that the season would begin on October 8 and that he had heard of his appointment only four days ago. Bernstein, after his graduation from Harvard College, studied two years at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia. He then took lessons in conducting from Koussevitzky. He attracted no little attention in November, 1943, when, as assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, he substituted on over-night notice for Bruno Walter as conductor of a Carnegie Hall concert and was warmly greeted by critics and public.

He won the annual award of the Music Critics Circle of New York in the spring of 1944 for his "Jeremiah" Symphony as the most worthwhile new American work of the season. He also composed the score for the ballet, "Fancy Free," which he conducted with the Ballet Theater at the Metropolitan Opera House, and the score of the Broadway musical show, "On the Town."

THE PHILA.FORUM
PHILA., PA
MAY, 1945



THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
THE FORUM will again present the most distinguished musical event of the season, the Annual Philadelphia Concert by "the king of orchestras," with Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

THE PHILA.FORUM
PHILA., PA
MAY, 1945

For the Twenty-fifth Season

NEXT season will be The Philadelphia Forum's twenty-fifth, and we are hoping to make this Anniversary Season the most brilliant in The Forum's history.

The Forum continues to provide Philadelphia with one of America's most distinguished platforms, and most of the artists and lecturers on it appear in this city for us only.

Let's take one more glance at the line-up:

The unrivaled Boston Symphony Orchestra in its only Philadelphia concert;

Blanche Thebom, whose magnificent debut at the Metropolitan is still the talk of New York musical circles;

Jimmy Melton, leading Metropolitan tenor and star of the Texaco Theatre, generally regarded as the top variety show on the air.

The first Piano Quartet, which last season made one of the most sensational debuts within the memory of local music lovers;

Egon Petri, a really great pianist who curiously has never been in Philadelphia.

Verdi's "Rigoletto," the Charles L. Wagner production with cast, direction and orchestra from the Metropolitan Opera Association, plus new scenery;

Nathan Milstein, than whom there is no more brilliant living violinist, returning to the platform of his introduction to Philadelphia.

Ballet will be amply provided for by the one and original Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, introduced to Philadelphia by The Forum and making its eighth appearance with us, and Rosario and Antonio, stars of musical comedy, motion picture and concert, bringing to Philadelphia for the first time their ensemble of Spanish dancers and instrumentalists.

The twenty-fourth Presentation of The Philadelphia Award, "the Nobel Prize for service to our city," once more honoring The Forum.

Sir Thomas Beecham, world-famous conductor, musical authority, composer and eminent Mozartian, in one of his unique lecture-piano recitals.

Discussions of the problems facing a chaotic world will be illumined by some of the foremost publicists and masters of the platform, General Romulo, H. R. Knickerbocker, Vincent Sheean, "Singapore Joe" Fisher, chronic globe circumnavigator and Forum favorite, and others to be announced.

And there may be additional surprises.

It is expected that this Twenty-fifth Anniversary Season will be inaugurated by an address by a distinguished person who cannot yet be announced.

Isn't this a tempting list, and shouldn't you renew your membership immediately?

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

AUG 29 1945

BERNSTEIN TO LEAD THE CITY SYMPHONY

Young Conductor Chosen for 1945-46 Season to Take Place of Stokowski

Leonard Bernstein, 26-year-old American composer and conductor has been named music director of the symphony concert programs of the New York City center of Music and Drama for the 1945-46 season, it was announced yesterday by Mayor La Guardia at City Hall. Mr. Bernstein will take the place of Leopold Stokowski, who has received a year's leave of absence to fill engagements that he has postponed for the last two seasons in this country and in Latin America.

Like Mr. Stokowski, who organized the New York City Symphony and acted as music director and conducted the orchestra for the last two seasons, Mr. Bernstein will serve without pay.

Asked if he had any plans for work for the coming season at the Symphony, he pointed out that the season would begin on [illegible] only a little more than a [illegible] away, and that he had [illegible] of his appointment only [illegible] ago.

Early to Tell Plans

[illegible] talk about plans for fif- [illegible] he said, "but it is too [illegible] specifically about [illegible] ahead. [illegible] the cul- [illegible] New [illegible] change in the personnel of the orchestra is now in view, although, in consideration of the end of the war, it is impossible to say what might happen in the next month. Undoubtedly many changes will occur in time."

In presenting the new director, Mayor La Guardia praised him as an outstanding figure among the younger musicians of the day.

"I am happy to introduce Maestro Leonard Bernstein as music director of the New York City Symphony for the 1945-46 season," the Mayor said. "I consider him one of America's most promising musicians.

Elated by the Choice

"I was certainly elated by the selection of Mr. Bernstein by the Board of Directors. It typifies so well the purpose of City Center, which is to give the very best by the very best. I look forward to a successful season.

"I now announce to the world that the selection of conductors at City Center is not a matter of patronage—that will be up to my successor."

Looking at Newbold Morris, who was present, the Mayor added with a chuckle, "You will be able to handle it very well."

Mr. Bernstein, who studied two years at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia after his graduation from Harvard College, and then took lessons in conducting from Serge Koussevitzky, first came into prominence in 1943 when, as assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, he substituted on over-night notice for Bruno Walter as conductor of a Carnegie Hall concert and scored a great success with both the public and the critics.

Stokowski Has No Comment

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LOS ANGELES, Calif., Aug. 28—Leopold Stokowski said tonight that he had asked for and received a year's leave of absence but made no comment on the appointment of Leonard Bernstein. He added that he planned to take a delayed wedding trip to South America at the end of September. Last April he married Gloria Vanderbilt di Cicco. On Sept. [illegible] he will conduct a special [illegible] concert [illegible] Hollywood [illegible]

WMPS Once Again Is To Broadcast Boston Symphony

Orchestra Returns To Air On ABC Oct. 6

FOR the third consecutive season the American Broadcasting Co. and WMPS will present concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Under its distinguished conductor Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony director has presented the works of the recognized music masters without regard to the time from which they came, for in his opinion, good music is ageless.

The broadcast again will be on Saturday evenings, starting Oct. 6. This will be the 65th season of the orchestra. It will mark Dr. Koussevitzky, 22nd year as musical director of this world famous ensemble.

"Warsaw Concerto," will be featured by Harry Sosnick's Orchestra on the N-K Ranch program, heard on ABC and WMPS at 8:30 p.m. . . . All the young hearts in Lakeview skip a beat when a handsome young man arrives during the Charlotte Greenwood Show to be heard via the American and WMPS at 4:30 p.m. . . .

Boston Symphony To Be Broadcast For Third Season

NEW YORK, Aug. 18—For the third consecutive season, the American Broadcasting Co. will present concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra under the sponsorship of the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co., of Milwaukee, Wis., it was announced today by Mark Woods, ABC president.

"The American Broadcasting Co. is very appreciative of the renewed sponsorship of the Boston Symphony orchestra broadcasts by the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co." Woods declared.

"This collaboration of one of the outstanding business organizations of the country with a musical organization which has made artistic history is, in a sense, an evidence of the way in which business and the arts are joining to give the American audience the best possible in broadcast entertainment.

"Allis-Chalmers is synonymous with excellence in its field of equipment manufactured for industry and agriculture; the Boston Symphony is synonymous with the best in the field of good music.

"Under its distinguished conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony has presented the works of the recognized music masters without regard to the time from which they came, for in his opinion, good music is ageless. News of their new season will gladden the hearts of hundreds of thousands of music lovers."

The broadcasts will again be on Saturday evenings starting on Oct. 6. This will be the 65th season of the orchestra which was founded in 1881, It will mark Dr. Koussevitzky's 22d year as musical director of this world famous ensemble.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

AUG 29 1945

CONDUCTOR, 26, IN MAJOR ROLE

Bernstein to Direct Concerts at City Center.

Leonard Bernstein, 26-year-old composer and conductor, who studied under Serge Koussevitzky, will replace Leopold Stokowski this season as director of the symphony concert programs of the New York City Center of Music and Drama. Announcement of his appointment has been made by Mayor LaGuardia, who said that Bernstein will serve without pay.

Stokowski has been granted a year's leave of absence to fill engagements he has postponed for the last two seasons in this country and Latin America. The mayor said that he was much elated "as it typifies so well the purpose of the center to give the very best in music by the very best, and at the same time afford an outlet to young but competent and accomplished American artists."

While serving as music director of the municipally sponsored theater and concert hall at 31 West 55th street, Bernstein will be free to accept engagements elsewhere from time to time. LaGuardia presented the new director and tsated: "I now announce to the world that the selection of conductors at the City Center is not a matter of patronage—that will be up to my successor." He looked over at Newbold Morris and said with a laugh: "You will be able to handle it very well."

Bernstein said that there should be a fountain-head in the city for music and art and that the center filled that need. He added that no change of the personnel of the orchestra is now in view, "although considering the war's end, it is impossible to say what might happen in the next month."

The young conductor pointed out that the season would begin on October 8 and that he had heard of his appointment only four days ago. Bernstein, after his graduation from Harvard College, studied two years at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia. He then took lessons in conducting from Koussevitzky. He attracted no little attention in November, 1943, when, as assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, he substituted on over-night notice for Bruno Walter as conductor of a Carnegie Hall concert and was warmly greeted by critics and public.

He won the annual award of the Music Critics Circle of New York in the spring of 1944 for his "Jeremiah" Symphony as the most worthwhile new American work of the season. He also composed the score for the ballet, "Fancy Free," which he conducted with the Ballet Theater at the Metropolitan Opera House, and the score of the Broadway musical show, "On the Town."

[2]

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

SEP 1 - 1945

Recording the Records

Victor's New Plastic Disc Won't Break

A NEW plastic record, unbreakable and (compared to the present products) noiseless to a remarkable degree, will be put on the market by Victor in "De Luxe" form next month.

The material had been used for radio broadcasting and transcriptions for some time, but this will be its initial "public appearance." Made of vinyl resin plastic, the records are a deep red color, may be bent, dropped on the floor and trampled on—yet they will stay whole. But they are subject to warping, as are today's materials.

The first of the new type discs was sent out by Victor for "review." It plays the first and last sides of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," by the Boston Orchestra, conducted by Sergei Koussevitzky. The fidelity of reproduction is wonderful. No scratches and surface noises are detectable.

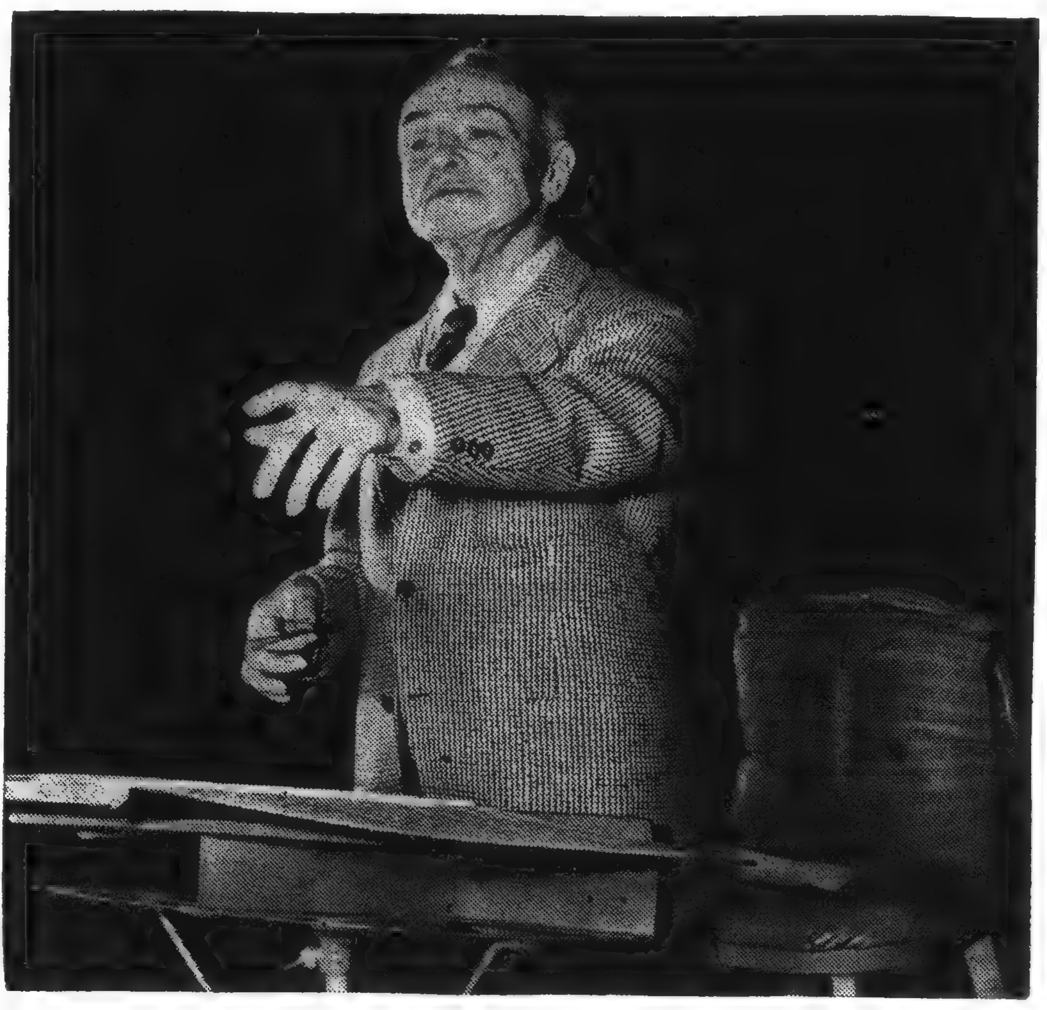
At present only new works will be recorded on the "de luxe" records, which will sell for $2 apiece. Later these new works will be added to the standard shellac record repertory. Victor officials emphasized that the company will not discontinue its production of the shellac records. The new type of releases will be "limited editions," according to J. W. Murray, general manager of R. C. A.'s Victor division.

The A-C News

MILWAUKEE 1, WISCONSIN

BULLETIN!

A-C Renews Boston Symphony Radio Series For Another Year



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at Rehearsal

MILWAUKEE—Following a recent meeting of the Allis-Chalmers board of directors, it was announced that the company had renewed its contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

It was stated that the new series of concerts will be broadcast over American Broadcasting Company stations (Blue Network) on Saturday evenings as were the programs of the last two years. A change of hour was made, however. The 1945-1946 broadcasts will be aired from 9:30 to 10:30 pm, EWT . . . one hour later than previously.

Reasons for the time change, new type of promotion to be used, and other program variations will be told in the complete story appearing in the October issue of the NEWS.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

SEP 2 - 1945

—Simon—

On Discs . . .

RCA Victor's latest shot in its battle with Columbia for superiority in masterworks is a non-breakable, flexible disc. It is the color of red gum, translucent and rather pretty. For the present, only masterworks will be released on this material, and the discs will cost $2 apiece — double the price of the ordinary discs, which Columbia first forced down in 1941.

The first general release will appear on the regular October list—a two-disc album of Till Eulenspiegel by Richard Strauss played by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky. Some months later, the same performance will be released on regular shellac discs at the regular price.

At a preview demonstration of both these pressings, the plastic one sounded slightly superior. There is a little less surface sound because the plastic disc is made without "filling," and the high frequencies seemed to be caught with greater fidelity. It will be necessary to hear more recordings to make this superiority convincing. It will take time, too, to substantiate the Victor engineers' claim that the plastic records will outwear the shellac and that they will warp less readily.

Meantime, Victor may reasonably expect a good sale of their first plastic releases partly on the basis of novelty, partly because the youngsters in the family won't be able to crack these discs, partly because they are thinner and lighter and therefore easier to store. But the difference in price will not be warranted unless the actual performance turns out to sound regularly superior to the old discs.

Many members of the armed forces will recognize these plastic discs as being made of material very similar to the V-discs our government sent them all over the world. Victor claims that these are the "first non-breakable, high fidelity phonograph records for home use," and for all practical purposes, their claims are just. Some plastic children's records have been on the market from time to time, and many years ago both Edison and Columbia published non-breakable cylindrical records. So sturdy were these last that we used to bat out flies with them when I was a boy and later take them home again and play them none the worse for wear. But they could scarcely lay claim to being "high fidelity."

—Henry Simon

September, 1945

ELIE SHIFTS SMOOTHLY FROM WAR TO SYMPHONY

Pacific Reporter Music Critic Again

RUDOLPH F. ELIE, JR.

Less than 24 hours after his return from six months' service on the Pacific battlefronts as a Herald war correspondent, Rudolph Elie, Jr.—still wearing his uniform—stepped back into his old job of music critic on The Herald yesterday and covered the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 65th season.

Elie returned with many pleasant, thrilling and frightening memories and but one major gripe: "the fantastic censorship set up by MacArthur's command," which, he said, "seemed designed primarily to build up MacArthur and make him look good."

Among other memories, are the comradeship and bravery of American fighting men; the times he experienced a Japanese suicide-plane attack and "personalized" sniper fire; the signing of the Japanese surrender on the battleship Missouri; and the unhappy five days and nights spent on a train enroute from the West Coast to Boston. Transportation by land, sea and air was fine, he said, until he boarded that train, at Oakland.

(Continued on Page Two)

"BEEF" EXPLAINED

Elie explained that his "beef" and those of other correspondents on the MacArthur censorship stemmed from the censors' practice of not only deleting from but adding to a correspondent's stories. Admiral Nimitz's censorship on the other hand was "tough but fair," Elie said, "and you could get some place if you proved to them that you had a legitimate argument against deletion."

During his travels Elie visited Kwajalein, Guam, Saipan, Iwo Jima, Okinawa and Tokyo. It was off Okinawa that five Japanese suicide planes attacked his and other ships. Four were shot down, but the fifth crashed into and sunk a vessel just off the ship Elie was on. Later, on Okinawa, as he dwelt in the front lines with the 96th Division, he and another correspondent were pinned down in a ditch by a Japanese sniper for more than an hour. They were rescued by a Seabee crew on a bulldozer, all of whom were anxious to get a crack at a Jap after a period of tedium.

And in all the time that Elie was away from his wife and three children and from his beloved music assignments, the only "live" music he heard was from a small jazz band at a Nimitz picnic, a few harmonicas "and the fellow who used to practice on his clarinet, to the accompaniment of shellfire, on a hillside on Okinawa."

KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR

SEP 2 - 1945

RECORDED MUSIC.

MAKE A DURABLE RECORD.

RCA-Victor Disc May Be Dropped Without Breaking.

Samples of RCA-Victor's new non-breakable phonograph record were received last week, bearing promise of another new era in the history of musical recording.

The fragility of records, with the recent increased strain placed upon them by the various types of record changing devices, has long been a source of worry to collectors and owners of record libraries, who were aware that steps were being taken for their relief, but hardly dared to believe the relief would come so soon after the war and its shortages.

The new record is made, of course, of plastic—a vinyl compound of very hard but very durable material which, when grooved for sound reproduction, provides a record that can be dropped, stepped upon, scratched and bent without harm. The Victor sample record is a translucent wine-colored disc, with an amazingly smooth and noiseless playing surface, rather thinner than the average wax disc and calling, perhaps, for a bit of adjustment for certain types of record changers.

Victor's first recording, to be released very soon, is a 4-sided play-through of Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegels Merry Pranks," played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra. The sample reveals splendid recording of a fine performance.

The plastic record is a pre-war-time development, that has received refinements from time to time. It has been used for some time for radio transcriptions, where its absence of surface noise makes it ideal for amplified radio broadcasting. It is said to be quite expensive, and until ways are found for economical mass production, may be confined at first to the higher-type, more expensive releases.

SYMPHONY HALL, 65th SEASON 1945-1946

Boston Symphony Orchestra

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor
RICHARD BURGIN, Associate Conductor

OPENING CONCERTS, OCTOBER 5-6

24 Friday Afternoons at 2:30
24 Saturday Evenings at 8:30

The Soloists Will Include:

HOROWITZ, Piano
SPALDING, Violin
BRAILOWSKY, Piano
GARBOUSOVA, 'Cello
MENUHIN, Violin
PIATIGORSKY, 'Cello
FIRKUSNY, Piano
ZIMBALIST, Violin

Guest Conductors

SIR ADRIAN BOULT
FRITZ REINER
LEONARD BERNSTEIN
IGOR STRAVINSKY

6 Sunday Afternoons at 3:30
6 Monday Evenings at 8:15

6 Wednesday Evenings at 8:00
Sanders Theatre, Cambridge

Season Tickets for each of the above series are now on sale at the Box Office, Symphony Hall (Tel. COMmonwealth 1492).

AMARILLO, TEXAS
GLOBE

SEP 7 - 1945

Greatest auditory thrill from th new record is the complete lack o surface, background or needle nois through elimination of minera filler used in shellac records. Sample pressing which was rushed t the turntable by the junior commando is a performance of Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel' Merry Pranks" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted b Serge Koussevitzky. The complet album will be available next month

---

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

SEP 2 - 1945

Can't Break Record

Singer Gladys Swarthout looks perplexed as she bends highly flexible phonograph record. Plastic non-breakable disc will be released for home use in October in an album of "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Boston Symphony.

[3]

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

SEP 1 - 1945

Recording the Records

Victor's New Plastic Disc Won't Break

A NEW plastic record, unbreakable and (compared to the present products) noiseless to a remarkable degree, will be put on the market by Victor in "De Luxe" form next month.

The material had been used for radio broadcasting and transcriptions for some time, but this will be its initial "public appearance." Made of vinyl resin plastic, the records are a deep red color, may be bent, dropped on the floor and trampled on—yet they will stay whole. But they are subject to warping, as are today's materials.

The first of the new type discs was sent out by Victor for "review." It plays the first and last sides of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," by the Boston Orchestra, conducted by Sergei Koussevitzky. The fidelity of reproduction is wonderful. No scratches and surface noises are detectable.

At present only new works will be recorded on the "de luxe" records, which will sell for $2 apiece. Later these new works will be added to the standard shellac record repertory. Victor officials emphasized that the company will not discontinue its production of the shellac records. The new type of releases will be "limited editions," according to J. W. Murray, general manager of R. C. A.'s Victor division.

The A-C News

MILWAUKEE 1, WISCONSIN

BULLETIN!

A-C Renews Boston Symphony Radio Series For Another Year

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at Rehearsal

MILWAUKEE—Following a recent meeting of the Allis-Chalmers board of directors, it was announced that the company had renewed its contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

It was stated that the new series of concerts will be broadcast over American Broadcasting Company stations (Blue Network) on Saturday evenings as were the programs of the last two years. A change of hour was made, however. The 1945-1946 broadcasts will be aired from 9:30 to 10:30 pm, EWT . . . one hour later than previously.

Reasons for the time change, new type of promotion to be used, and other program variations will be told in the complete story appearing in the October issue of the NEWS.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

SEP 2 - 1945

—Simon—

On Discs . . .

RCA Victor's latest shot in its battle with Columbia for superiority in masterworks is a non-breakable, flexible disc. It is the color of red gum, translucent and rather pretty. For the present, only masterworks will be released on this material, and the discs will cost $2 apiece – double the price of the ordinary discs, which Columbia first forced down in 1941.

The first general release will appear on the regular October list—a two-disc album of Till Eulenspiegel by Richard Strauss played by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky. Some months later, the same performance will be released on regular shellac discs at the regular price.

At a preview demonstration of both these pressings, the plastic one sounded slightly superior. There is a little less surface sound because the plastic disc is made without "filling," and the high frequencies seemed to be caught with greater fidelity. It will be necessary to hear more recordings to make this superiority convincing. It will take time, too, to substantiate the Victor engineers' claim that the plastic records will outwear the shellac and that they will warp less readily.

Meantime, Victor may reasonably expect a good sale of their first plastic releases partly on the basis of novelty, partly because the youngsters in the family won't be able to crack these discs, partly because they are thinner and lighter and therefore easier to store. But the difference in price will not be warranted unless the actual performance turns out to sound regularly superior to the old discs.

Many members of the armed forces will recognize these plastic discs as being made of material very similar to the V-discs our government sent them all over the world. Victor claims that these are the "first non-breakable, high fidelity phonograph records for home use," and for all practical purposes, their claims are just. Some plastic children's records have been on the market from time to time, and many years ago both Edison and Columbia published non-breakable cylindrical records. So sturdy were these last that we used to bat out flies with them when I was a boy and later take them home again and play them none the worse for wear. But they could scarcely lay claim to being "high fidelity."

—HENRY SIMON

September 1945

ELIE SHIFTS SMOOTHLY FROM WAR TO SYMPHONY

Pacific Reporter Music Critic Again

RUDOLPH F. ELIE, JR.

Less than 24 hours after his return from six months' service on the Pacific battlefronts as a Herald war correspondent, Rudolph Elie, Jr.—still wearing his uniform—stepped back into his old job of music critic on The Herald yesterday and covered the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 65th season.

Elie returned with many pleasant, thrilling and frightening memories and but one major gripe: "the fantastic censorship set up by MacArthur's command," which, he said, "seemed designed primarily to build up MacArthur and make him look good."

Among other memories, are the comradeship and bravery of American fighting men; the times he experienced a Japanese suicide-plane attack and "personalized" sniper fire; the signing of the Japanese surrender on the battleship Missouri; and the unhappy five days and nights spent on a train enroute from the West Coast to Boston. Transportation by land, sea and air was fine, he said, until he boarded that train, at Oakland.

(Continued on Page Two)

"BEEF" EXPLAINED

Elie explained that his "beef" and those of other correspondents on the MacArthur censorship stemmed from the censors' practice of not only deleting from but adding to a correspondent's stories. Admiral Nimitz's censorship on the other hand was "tough but fair," Elie said, "and you could get some place if you proved to them that you had a legitimate argument against deletion."

During his travels Elie visited Kwajalein, Guam, Saipan, Iwo Jima, Okinawa and Tokyo. It was off Okinawa that five Japanese suicide planes attacked his and other ships. Four were shot down, but the fifth crashed into and sunk a vessel just off the ship Elie was on. Later, on Okinawa, as he dwelt in the front lines with the 96th Division, he and another correspondent were pinned down in a ditch by a Japanese sniper for more than an hour. They were rescued by a Seabee crew on a bulldozer, all of whom were anxious to get a crack at a Jap after a period of tedium.

And in all the time that Elie was away from his wife and three children and from his beloved music assignments, the only "live" music he heard was from a small jazz band at a Nimitz picnic, a few harmonicas "and the fellow who used to practice on his clarinet, to the accompaniment of shellfire, on a hillside on Okinawa."

KANSAS CITY, MO.
STAR

SEP 2 - 1945

RECORDED MUSIC.

MAKE A DURABLE RECORD.

RCA-Victor Disc May Be Dropped Without Breaking.

Samples of RCA-Victor's new non-breakable phonograph record were received last week, bearing promise of another new era in the history of musical recording.

The fragility of records, with the recent increased strain placed upon them by the various types of record changing devices, has long been a source of worry to collectors and owners of record libraries, who were aware that steps were being taken for their relief, but hardly dared to believe the relief would come so soon after the war and its shortages.

The new record is made, of course, of plastic—a vinyl compound of very hard but very durable material which, when grooved for sound reproduction, provides a record that can be dropped, stepped upon, scratched and bent without harm. The Victor sample record is a translucent wine-colored disc, with an amazingly smooth and noiseless playing surface, rather thinner than the average wax disc and calling, perhaps, for a bit of adjustment for certain types of record changers.

Victor's first recording, to be released very soon, is a 4-sided play-through of Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegels Merry Pranks," played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra. The sample reveals splendid recording of a fine performance.

The plastic record is a pre-war-time development, that has received refinements from time to time. It has been used for some time for radio transcriptions, where its absence of surface noise makes it ideal for amplified radio broadcasting. It is said to be quite expensive, and until ways are found for economical mass production, may be confined at first to the higher-type, more expensive releases.

SYMPHONY HALL, 65th SEASON 1945-1946

Boston Symphony Orchestra

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor
RICHARD BURGIN, Associate Conductor

OPENING CONCERTS, OCTOBER 5-6

24 Friday Afternoons at 2:30
24 Saturday Evenings at 8:30

The Soloists Will Include:

HOROWITZ, Piano
SPALDING, Violin
BRAILOWSKY, Piano
GARBOUSOVA, 'Cello
MENUHIN, Violin
PIATIGORSKY, 'Cello
FIRKUSNY, Piano
ZIMBALIST, Violin

Guest Conductors

SIR ADRIAN BOULT
FRITZ REINER
LEONARD BERNSTEIN
IGOR STRAVINSKY

6 Sunday Afternoons at 3:30
6 Monday Evenings at 8:15

6 Wednesday Evenings at 8:00
Sanders Theatre, Cambridge

Season Tickets for each of the above series are now on sale at the Box Office, Symphony Hall (Tel. COMmonwealth 1492).

AMARILLO, TEXAS
GLOBE

SEP 7 - 1945

Greatest auditory thrill from the new record is the complete lack of surface, background or needle noise through elimination of mineral filler used in shellac records. Sample pressing which was rushed to the turntable by the junior commando is a performance of Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. The complete album will be available next month.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

SEP 2 - 1945

Can't Break Record

Singer Gladys Swarthout looks perplexed as she bends highly flexible phonograph record. Plastic non-breakable disc will be released for home use in October in an album of "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Boston Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

SEP 4 - 1945

Music

By Louis Biancolli

An American Salzburg Should Be International

Talk of an "American Salzburg"—a star-studded replica of the midsummer music fete of prewar Austria—is spreading. Conductors, managers, and critics are weighing it. Sites are being debated, and the kind of summer music to be programmed discussed.

This department has long plugged for a permanent summer music festival here. The partial demise of the Tanglewood idea due to war and whatnot was a real loss. Its partial revival was a hopeful sign, and Serge Koussevitzky may be counted on to stump for a full-scale return.

Perhaps too much of the talk accents the "Salzburg" note. Some find it hard to plan American festivals without bringing in European parallels. America is far enough advanced to think in terms of its own. Resources and technics here are plentiful enough to assure original planning. The vision is there, too.

Can Learn From Europe.

That doesn't mean we can't learn from European models. Skilled Europeans long linked with Europe's best summer seasons are here to guide us where needed. They may save us needless trial and error, and their good work is already noted in the Tanglewood scheme and elsewhere.

My question is whether the Salzburg-Zurich-Bayreuth fetes should be prototypes in drafting native plans. Many features like schedules and administration are worth duplicating here. Also the stern standards of skill may safely prevail. Repertory, I think, should be the main line of divergence.

A truly new and American summer music festival would be one restricted to contemporary music. Such fetes were not uncommon in prewar Europe. The Maggio Fiorentino was an example, though Fascist politics marred some aspects of it. The climate here would foster freer action and fresher outlook.

Hand of Tradition.

Most European music centers hugged tradition jealously. Wagner bulked over Bayreuth like an Alp, and Mozart was a kind of patron-saint of Salzburg. We have no equivalent of that here, and maybe it's just as well. America can afford to eye the future, without cheating its past.

Tradition is a fine and noble thing—where it belongs. When transplanted it can become dead-weight. Technical criteria involved are good for export, but not to the point of numbing creative talent at home. The American music festival I have in mind would be new tradition in the making.

It could also be the greatest clearing-house to date of new world music. In a way, the pattern was set by the World's Fair music section. There the nations took turns at displaying latest music wares. Famed conductors, soloists, and composers held forth in their own national corners.

Site Unimportant.

No harm could come from planning the "American Salzburg" along those lines. Whether the site is Tanglewood, Santa Fe, Ravina Park, as Erich Leinsdorf suggests in proposing a whole circuit, isn't important. New York, with air-cooled music centers, would do very nicely.

The stress should be on the present and future. Other festivals might feature the classics. Mozart and Bach votaries would gravitate toward their chosen habitats. Even an "American Bayreuth" might be in order. But these would be secondary to the real center, given over to modern music.

International Character.

There, all modes and styles could be given a hearing. American, Latin-American and Russian scores would mingle with English and French music. Pavilions might be set up for each foreign unit, with one big music temple for the bigger and better scores.

The eyes of the world are said to be on America. Why be modest. So are the ears of the world. America owes it to itself to launch an international music festival. And maybe some day, instead of Tanglewood being called the "American Salzburg," Salzburg will be dubbed the "Austrian Tanglewood."

Symphony Plans 6 Sunday Concerts

Her. Sept 1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitky, conductor, will give a series of six concerts on Sunday afternoons in Symphony Hall, these concerts to be given approximately once a month, on Oct. 21, Dec. 30, Jan. 27, March 3, March 31 and April 21, at 9:30. Soloists announced at this time will be the 'cellist Raya Carbousova and the violinist Efrem Zimbalist. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct three of the concerts and three will be taken over by notable guests. Sir Adrian Boult, the conductor of the British Broadcasting Corporation Orchestra in London, will return to America, after last visiting this country ten years ago. Leonard Bernstein, composer of serious and light music, has conducted this orchestra as guest in previous seasons and will return. He has just been appointed the regular conductor of the New York City Center Symphony Orchestra. The other guest will be Morton Gould. Mr. Gould, first generally known by his career in radio, has appeared notably as conductor, and our orchestras (including this one) have performed his music.

MADISON, WIS.
CAPITAL TIMES

SEP 2 - 1945

The new record is ruby red in color and semi-transparent. H. I. Reiskind, chief engineer of the Victor Record Division, says the new record was made possible by the development of a formula for a compound composed almost entirely of vinyl resin plastic which is flexible, preventing cracking or breaking, but durable for a lifetime.

The public will get its first glimpse of these new records in October when Victor issues in album form a performance of Richard Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Until facilities have been built up to produce this new type record in quantities, its use will be limited to newly recorded musical works, the present type shellac records being used for other recordings.

This Clipping From
RADIO & TELEVISION WEEKLY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

SEP 5 - 1945

Records AND Accessories

RCA VICTOR DEVELOPS NON-BREAKABLE RECORD; PLASTIC DISC PERFECTED AFTER A LONG STUDY

FIRST ALBUM TO BE AVAILABLE TO PUBLIC NEXT MONTH

Eleven-Year Research Produces a Flexible, High-Fidelity Record — Demonstrated in New York — Heralded as "Greatest Improvement in Home Phonograph Discs in Forty-five Years."

Examining New Plastic Record

The first non-breakable high fidelity phonograph record for home use has been developed by RCA Victor, climaxing eleven years of research work in this field. A flexible disc made of synthetic plastic material, the new record, which is said to greatly reduce surface sound, will make its initial appearance in October, according to an announcement by J. W. Murray, general manager of the RCA Victor Record Division, who called it the greatest improvement in home phonograph records in forty-five years. The disc was introduced last Wednesday at a special demonstration in New York.

The first of the new type non-breakable record available to the public will present a performance of Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitsky. At present, Mr. Murray said, it is planned to release only newly recorded musical works on the new type discs, which will be known as Red Seal De Luxe records. The same musical work, he added, will be available later on the standard, high quality Red Seal shellac records.

The non-breakable home phonograph record, which is ruby red in color, was made possible, according to H. I. Reiskind, chief engineer of the RCA Victor Record Division, by development of a formula for a compound composed almost entirely of vinyl resin plastic which produces a durable, long-life record.

While vinyl materials have been used for many years in the manufacture of expensive transcription records, particularly for radio broadcasts and for V discs used by our armed forces overseas, they have hitherto been prohibitively costly for use in home phonograph records, Mr. Reiskind said.

The new formula, one of several evolved by RCA Victor record engineers, according to Mr. Reiskind, results in a record that can be dropped or bent without breaking or cracking, has less surface sound, and enhances the fidelity of reproduction.

Surface sound reduction, he said, is made possible because the plastic compound does not require the mineral filler used in shellac records. The new de luxe records, he added, are lighter in weight than the shellac discs. Extensive tests have demonstrated, he added, that they can also be played on practically all types of home phonographs, including those equipped with automatic changers, and with varied types of needles.

In declaring that the new non-breakable records would be made available in limited quantities, Mr. Murray emphasized that RCA Victor will not discontinue its production of the standard Red Seal and Victor popular shellac records. He likened the album containing the new type records to limited editions of fine books and pointed out that they offered music lovers a still finer recorded performance than that possible on the best shellac discs.

"We anticipate that the use of this material for non-breakable, high-fidelity home phonograph records eventually will be expanded to other types of RCA Victor records," Mr. Murray declared. "This will depend in some measure on the building up of facilities to produce the new type records in sufficient quantities."

RCA Victor engineers started their search for a non-breakable, higher quality record in 1934 when they set out to develop a "quiet" disc for the film industry. The final development of the flexible plastic record also suggested the answer to one of the biggest problems of the home phonograph record—the problem of breakage of shellac records. But, until now, the cost of the plastic material used in transcription discs made such records for home use prohibitive. RCA Victor's policy of continued research to bring about technical and manufacturing improvements led to the development of this practical, relatively low cost non-breakable record of the required durability for home use, Mr. Murray said.

Cost of producing the new record is so much greater than the old standard type that it will be priced at $2 instead of $1 for the first recording. The present Red Seal $1 record will continue to be made.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 395,201) (Sat. 294,296)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

SEP 6 - 1945

Boston Symphony Plans.

The Boston Symphony opens its 65th season Friday, Oct. 5, one day later than the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. Serge Koussevitzky, beginning his 22nd year with the orchestra, will conduct. Five visits to New York are planned this season, the first scheduled for Nov. 14-17.

Pianists to appear as soloists include Rudolf Firkusny, Vladimir Horowitz and Alexander Brailowsky. Among violinists will be Albert Spalding, Yehudi Menuhin and Efrem Zimbalist. Gregor Piatigorsky and Raya Garbousova will be the season's cello soloists.

Guest conductors will include Igor Stravinsky, Fritz Reiner, Sir Adrian Boult of the BBC Orchestra and Leonard Bernstein.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 226,333)

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

SEP 8 - 1945

Brahms—Symphony No. 3 in F Major—Op. 90. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor. Victor M-1007.

★★★ Despite the clarity of this new recording of Brahms' F Major Symphony, it is one that is not wholly and unreservedly successful. Perhaps the reason for this might be traced to Dr. Koussevitsky's tempos. For the first three movements, the pace is very slow and even Brahms cannot always stand such a drag. On the other hand, there is much to admire in this recording. The tone of the Boston Orchestra is always winning, the individual sections and even the individual players in those sections stand out amazingly well, and the balance is perfect. Handsomely recorded. Other versions are by the Chicago Symphony under Frederick Stock and the London Philharmonic under Felix Weingartner for Columbia and the National Symphony under Hans Kindler and the Vienna Philharmonic under Bruno Walter for Victor.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

SEP 3 - 1945

Brahms: Symphony No. 3 in F Major (Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting; Victor, 8 sides). Disappointingly glossy treatment. Performance: fair. Recording: good.

MUSIC

Better & Brighter

To a handful of music critics, Victor last week sent samples of the first non-breakable records ever made for home use—an album of Richard Strauss's Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks (played by Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony) on transparent, ruby-red plastic discs. They were the shape and size of Victor's familiar twelve-inch Red Seals, but engineers promised that they would exceed the shellac Red Seals' normal life expectancy of some 1,000 playings. The samples seemed to have more fidelity and less surface noise than ordinary records.

Two jumps ahead of its competitors, Victor fondly believed that its vinyl resin plastics were the biggest thing in records since Soprano Emma Albani first cut Angels Ever Bright and Fair in 1903. But Victor is going slow. Till Eulenspiegel will be released Oct. 15, and it will be followed by only as many plastic albums as the public demands.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

SEP 4 - 1945

Music

By Louis Biancolli

An American Salzburg Should Be International

Talk of an "American Salzburg"—a star-studded replica of the midsummer music fete of prewar Austria—is spreading. Conductors, managers, and critics are weighing it. Sites are being debated, and the kind of summer music to be programmed discussed.

This department has long plugged for a permanent summer music festival here. The partial demise of the Tanglewood idea due to war and whatnot was a real loss. Its partial revival was a hopeful sign, and Serge Koussevitzky may be counted on to stump for a full-scale return.

Perhaps too much of the talk accents the "Salzburg" note. Some find it hard to plan American festivals without bringing in European parallels. America is far enough advanced to think in terms of its own. Resources and technics here are plentiful enough to assure original planning. The vision is there, too.

Can Learn From Europe.

That doesn't mean we can't learn from European models. Skilled Europeans long linked with Europe's best summer seasons are here to guide us where needed. They may save us needless trial and error, and their good work is already noted in the Tanglewood scheme and elsewhere.

My question is whether the Salzburg-Zurich-Bayreuth fetes should be prototypes in drafting native plans. Many features like schedules and administration are worth duplicating here. Also the stern standards of skill may safely prevail. Repertory, I think, should be the main line of divergence.

A truly new and American summer music festival would be one restricted to contemporary music. Such fetes were not uncommon in prewar Europe. The Maggio Fiorentino was an example, though Fascist politics marred some aspects of it. The climate here would foster freer action and fresher outlook.

Hand of Tradition.

Most European music centers hugged tradition jealously. Wagner bulked over Bayreuth like an Alp, and Mozart was a kind of patron-saint of Salzburg. We have no equivalent of that here, and maybe it's just as well. America can afford to eye the future, without cheating its past.

Tradition is a fine and noble thing—where it belongs. When transplanted it can become deadweight. Technical criteria involved are good for export, but not to the point of numbing creative talent at home. The American music festival I have in mind would be new tradition in the making.

It could also be the greatest clearing-house to date of new world music. In a way, the pattern was set by the World's Fair music section. There the nations took turns at displaying latest music wares. Famed conductors, soloists, and composers held forth in their own national corners.

Site Unimportant.

No harm could come from planning the "American Salzburg" along those lines. Whether the site is Tanglewood, Santa Fe, Ravina Park, as Erich Leinsdorf suggests in proposing a whole circuit, isn't important. New York with air-cooled music centers would do very nicely.

The stress should be on the present and future. Other festivals might feature the classics. Mozart and Bach votaries would gravitate toward their chosen habitats. Even an "American Bayreuth" might be in order. But these would be secondary to the real center, given over to modern music.

International Character.

There, all modes and styles could be given a hearing. American, Latin-American and Russian scores would mingle with English and French music. Pavilions might be set up for each foreign unit, with one big music temple for the bigger and better scores.

The eyes of the world are said to be on America. Why be modest. So are the ears of the world. America owes it to itself to launch an international music festival. And maybe some day, instead of Tanglewood being called the "American Salzburg," Salzburg will be dubbed the "Austrian Tanglewood."

Symphony Plans 6 Sunday Concerts

Her. Sept 6

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitky, conductor, will give a series of six concerts on Sunday afternoons in Symphony Hall, these concerts to be given approximately once a month, on Oct. 21, Dec. 30, Jan. 27, March 3, March 31 and April 21, at 9:30. Soloists announced at this time will be the 'cellist Raya Carbousova and the violinist Efram Zimbalist. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct three of the concerts and three will be taken over by notable guests. Sir Adrian Boult, the conductor of the British Broadcasting Corporation Orchestra in London, will return to America, after last visiting this country ten years ago. Leonard Bernstein, composer of serious and light music, has conducted this orchestra as guest in previous seasons and will return. He has just been appointed the regular conductor of the New York City Center Symphony Orchestra. The other guest will be Morton Gould. Mr. Gould, first generally known by his career in radio, has appeared notably as conductor, and our orchestras (including this one) have performed his music.

RADIO & TELEVISION WEEKLY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

SEP 5 - 1945

Records AND Accessories

RCA VICTOR DEVELOPS NON-BREAKABLE RECORD; PLASTIC DISC PERFECTED AFTER A LONG STUDY

FIRST ALBUM TO BE AVAILABLE TO PUBLIC NEXT MONTH

Eleven-Year Research Produces a Flexible, High-Fidelity Record — Demonstrated in New York — Heralded as "Greatest Improvement in Home Phonograph Discs in Forty-five Years."

Examining New Plastic Record

The first non-breakable high fidelity phonograph record for home use has been developed by RCA Victor, climaxing eleven years of research work in this field. A flexible disc made of synthetic plastic material, the new record, which is said to greatly reduce surface sound, will make its initial appearance in October, according to an announcement by J. W. Murray, general manager of the RCA Victor Record Division, who called it the greatest improvement in home phonograph records in forty-five years. The disc was introduced last Wednesday at a special demonstration in New York.

The first of the new type non-breakable record available to the public will present a performance of Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitsky. At present, Mr. Murray said, it is planned to release only newly recorded musical works on the new type discs, which will be known as Red Seal De Luxe records. The same musical work, he added, will be available later on the standard, high quality Red Seal shellac records.

The non-breakable home phonograph record, which is ruby red in color, was made possible, according to H. I. Reiskind, chief engineer of the RCA Victor Record Division, by development of a formula for a compound composed almost entirely of vinyl resin plastic which produces a durable, long-life record.

While vinyl materials have been used for many years in the manufacture of expensive transcription records, particularly for radio broadcasts and for V discs used by our armed forces overseas, they have hitherto been prohibitively costly for use in home phonograph records, Mr. Reiskind said.

The new formula, one of several evolved by RCA Victor record engineers, according to Mr. Reiskind, results in a record that can be dropped or bent without breaking or cracking, has less surface sound, and enhances the fidelity of reproduction.

Surface sound reduction, he said, is made possible because the plastic compound does not require the mineral filler used in shellac records. The new de luxe records, he added, are lighter in weight than the shellac discs. Extensive tests have demonstrated, he added, that they can also be played on practically all types of home phonographs, including those equipped with automatic changers, and with varied types of needles.

In declaring that the new non-breakable records would be made available in limited quantities, Mr. Murray emphasized that RCA Victor will not discontinue its production of the standard Red Seal and Victor popular shellac records. He likened the album containing the new type records to limited editions of fine books and pointed out that they offered music lovers a still finer recorded performance than that possible on the best shellac discs.

"We anticipate that the use of this material for non-breakable, high-fidelity home phonograph records eventually will be expanded to other types of RCA Victor records," Mr. Murray declared. "This will depend in some measure on the building up of facilities to produce the new type records in sufficient quantities."

RCA Victor engineers started their search for a non-breakable, higher quality record in 1934 when they set out to develop a "quiet" disc for the film industry. The final development of the flexible plastic record also suggested the answer to one of the biggest problems of the home phonograph record—the problem of breakage of shellac records. But, until now, the cost of the plastic material used in transcription discs made such records for home use prohibitive. RCA Victor's policy of continued research to bring about technical and manufacturing improvements led to the development of this practical, relatively low cost non-breakable record of the required durability for home use, Mr. Murray said.

Cost of producing the new record is so much greater than the old standard type that it will be priced at $2 instead of $1 for the first recording. The present Red Seal $1 record will continue to be made.

MADISON, WIS.
CAPITAL TIMES

SEP 2 - 1945

The new record is ruby red in color and semi-transparent. H. I. Reiskind, chief engineer of the Victor Record Division, says the new record was made possible by the development of a formula for a compound composed almost entirely of vinyl resin plastic which is flexible, preventing cracking or breaking, but durable for a lifetime.

The public will get its first glimpse of these new records in October when Victor issues in album form a performance of Richard Strauss' Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Until facilities have been built up to produce this new type record in quantities, its use will be limited to newly recorded musical works, the present type shellac records being used for other recordings.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 395,201) (Sat. 294,296)
This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

SEP 6 - 1945

Boston Symphony Plans.

The Boston Symphony opens its 65th season Friday, Oct. 5, one day later than the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. Serge Koussevitzky, beginning his 22nd year with the orchestra, will conduct. Five visits to New York are planned this season, the first scheduled for Nov. 14-17.

Pianists to appear as soloists include Rudolf Firkusny, Vladimir Horowitz and Alexander Brailowsky. Among violinists will be Albert Spalding, Yehudi Menuhin and Efrem Zimbalist. Gregor Piatigorsky and Raya Garbousova will be the season's cello soloists.

Guest conductors will include Igor Stravinsky, Fritz Reiner, Sir Adrian Boult of the BBC Orchestra and Leonard Bernstein.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 226,333)
This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
SEP 8 - 1945

Brahms—Symphony No. 3 in F Major—Op. 90. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor. Victor M-1007.

★★★ Despite the clarity of this new recording of Brahms' F Major Symphony, it is one that is not wholly and unreservedly successful. Perhaps the reason for this might be traced to Dr. Koussevitsky's tempos. For the first three movements, the pace is very slow and even Brahms cannot always stand such a drag. On the other hand, there is much to admire in this recording. The tone of the Boston Orchestra is always winning, the individual sections and even the individual players in those sections stand out amazingly well, and the balance is perfect. Handsomely recorded. Other versions are by the Chicago Symphony under Frederick Stock and the London Philharmonic under Felix Weingartner for Columbia and the National Symphony under Hans Kindler and the Vienna Philharmonic under Bruno Walter for Victor.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

SEP 3 - 1945

Brahms: Symphony No. 3 in F Major (Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting; Victor, 8 sides). Disappointingly glossy treatment. Performance: fair. Recording: good.

MUSIC

Better & Brighter

To a handful of music critics, Victor last week sent samples of the first non-breakable records ever made for home use—an album of Richard Strauss's Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks (played by Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony) on transparent, ruby-red plastic discs. They were the shape and size of Victor's familiar twelve-inch Red Seals, but engineers promised that they would exceed the shellac Red Seals' normal life expectancy of some 1,000 playings. The samples seemed to have more fidelity and less surface noise than ordinary records.

Two jumps ahead of its competitors, Victor fondly believed that its vinyl resin plastics were the biggest thing in records since Soprano Emma Albani first cut Angels Ever Bright and Fair in 1903. But Victor is going slow. Till Eulenspiegel will be released Oct. 15, and it will be followed by only as many plastic albums as the public demands.

[4]

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

SEP 7 - 1945

Recorded Music

News and Reviews

By CLIF BRADT

Some inquiries as to the identity of the music contained on the new Victor plastic mentioned as having been received should be rewarded. It is a section out of the middle of the Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel," a sample by Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra, which will be commented on when it is complete. Meanwhile:

BRAHMS' SYMPHONY NO. 3 IN F. OP. 90; Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky; 12-inch, 8 sides. (Victor).

This is superior to the previous Victor leader in the Brahms Third by Walter and the Vienna Philharmonic, for in many instances of reading and playing and certainly in recording it surpasses even the Weingartner album, which was the best of all.

This Brahms work is one of the milestones of the symphony. Its form is unusual for the time, with broad and powerful first and fourth movements, between which lie more intimate sections, the second and the brief third movement. The symphony concludes on a quiet drift into serenity. It is as if Brahms had met you stormily at the door, relented to a warm friendliness on your earnest assurance of understanding and then sped you heartily on your way, but with a last, silent handshake.

Koussevitzky has been smooth, lyrical and careful, but strong on the sondrities. His feeling shows strongly in statements of the third movement thematic material. This attitude is not misplaced, as it might have been with some other score under his baton.

NESDAY, SEPTEMBER 5, 1945

Symphony Will Open Oct. 5, New Air Schedule Planned

At a meeting yesterday noon of music critics from Boston and out of town newspapers, George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced that the orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitzky, would present the same schedule of concerts—one of the largest of any of the major symphony orchestras of the country—during its 65th season as was presented last year; that the Berkshire Festival would continue and probably be augmented, and added further interesting details concerning broadcasting, recording, soloists and guest conductors.

A novel touch was added to the occasion by the fact that for the first time this luncheon was attended by feminine representatives of the press and therefore was held in the dining room of the women's section of the Harvard Club. Mr. Judd gallantly remarked that so enlivening was the result that he felt the ladies should always be invited, as the gentleman, left alone, would be the duller for their absence.

The most important of the announcements made was that the broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, hitherto given at 8:30 P. M. every Saturday evening during the 30-week season, will be held from now on at 9:30 P. M. instead. This means that the radio audience will hear the second half of the program instead of the first and will have a chance to hear the soloists, who usually appear during the latter part of the evening. It also will provide Mr. Koussevitzky with opportunity for greater flexibility of program selections in the first portion of the evening.

There have been tremendous strides in recording by the orchestra, which has recently made the first of its special non-breakable plastic de luxe records, no less than 150 sides having been made during the past year, a greater number than in any two previous seasons. By this heroic and concentrated effort, the orchestra has now made virtually the equivalent of the recordings it was unable to produce during the past four years when the recording ban was in effect.

Guest soloists will include Vladimir Horowitz, Albert Spalding, Alexander Brailowsky, Raya Garbusova, Yehudi Menuhin, Gregor Piatigorsky, Rudolph Firkusny and Efrem Zimbalist. Special importance was attached by Mr. Judd to the appearance of Sir Adrian Boult, Fritz Reine and the two gifted young American composer-conductors, Morton Gould and Leonard Bernstein, as guest conductors with the orchestra.

The Symphony season will start on Oct. 5, and will continue through April 27. There are to be 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday night concerts; six Sunday afternoon, six Monday evening and six in Sanders Theater, Cambridge. Seats for the Boston and Cambridge series are now on sale at Symphony Hall, and seating plans showing prices will be mailed on request.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STAR

SEP 8 - 1945

platter-patter

By Stylus

EVER SINCE the capitulation of Germany this job of watching the radio industry has been like waiting for the man in the room upstairs to drop that other shoe. Only the situation has contained less of certainty. We have known that sooner or later one of the recording companies would drop something into the market with a resounding thud—and it would not be a shoe.

It is here now. The RCA Victor people have dropped a jewel-like, ruby-red plastic record into the competition and a glowing, plastic-bright, new postwar world dawns over the recorded music field.

This new disc, Victor's Red Seal DeLuxe record is so far beyond the old type of record in clarity of recorded detail; absence of surface noise and freedom from the hazard of breakage that you will not believe it until you hear it.

The first of the new type nonbreakable disc available to the public will present a performance of Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. At present it is planned to release only newly recorded musical works on the new type discs. The same musical work will be made available later on standard, high quality Red Seal shellac records.

The nonbreakable home phonograph record was made possible by the development of a formula for a compound composed almost entirely of vinyl resin plastic which produces a durable, long-life record.

While vinyl materials have been used for many years in the manufacture of expensive transcription records, particularly for radio broadcasts and for V discs used by our armed forces overseas, they have hitherto been prohibitively costly for use in home phonograph records.

The new formula, one of several evolved by RCA Victor record engineers, results in a record that can be dropped or bent without breaking or cracking, has less surface sound, and enhances the fidelity of reproduction.

Surface sound reduction is made possible because the plastic compound does not require the mineral filler used in shellac records. The new DeLuxe records are lighter in weight than the shellac discs. Extensive tests have demonstrated, he added, that they can also be played on practically all types of home phonographs, including those equipped with automatic changers, and with varied types of needles.

The new nonbreakable records would be made available in limited quantities but RCA Victor will not discontinue its production of the standard Red Seal and Victor popular shellac records. The album containing the new type records is likened to limited editions of fine books. They offer music lovers a still finer recorded performance than that possible on the best shellac records.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY

SEP 8 - 1945

Unmuffled Basses

ONE of the earliest and least appalling triumphs of the postwar world is a nonbreakable and otherwise improved phonograph record that has been developed by alchemists at Victor. With no more than the usual misgivings, we journeyed up to a Victor office in the R.C.A. Building one afternoon last week, whence we had been summoned, along with hundreds of other journalists, to attend a demonstration of the product. A Mr. Lansdale took us hospitably in hand and provided us with a dry Martini, hors-d'œuvres, and a restrained press release. "J. W. Murray, our general manager, and H. I. Reiskind, our chief engineer, are both here," he then informed us. "Ask them any questions you like. But maybe you'd like to look over the release first, away from this din." He led us swiftly down a hall, flung open an office door, smiled us in, and departed, instructing us to rejoin him at our pleasure. This we did, after learning, among other things, that "the new plastic formula results in a record that can be dropped or bent without breaking or cracking, has less surface sound, and enhances the fidelity of reproduction."

We found Mr. Lansdale hard at work easing a group of cheerful guests away from a bar for the next demonstration. "Mr. Murray and Mr. Reiskind are playing the record—we've only made one recording so far, incidentally—for just a few people at a time," he said. "Our idea is to approximate living-room conditions. The phonograph we're using is just an ordinary machine, too, the kind you'd find in thousands of homes." Mr. Lansdale led the group, which by now included us, to a large office containing several rows of chairs, a phonograph, and a desk, behind which Mr. Murray and Mr. Reiskind stood smiling smiles suitable to a historic occasion. Mr. Murray opened the demonstration by holding up a dark-red translucent record of conventional shape and size. He then bent it into a half circle and let it snap back into shape, slapped it on the desk, and threw it against a wall. It fell undamaged, and as quietly as a piece of cardboard, to the carpeted floor. Mr. Reiskind retrieved it nimbly and moved over to the phonograph. The recording, Mr. Murray announced, was of Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," played by the Boston Symphony, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. At his words, a small, intense man seated next to us began to hum the theme of the work under his breath. First, Mr. Murray added, Mr. Reiskind would play a recording of the same performance on an ordinary shellac, lampblack, clay, and resin Victor disc. Our neighbor cocked an ear and listened as the music filled the room. We asked him how it sounded, and he shrugged and shook his head. "Well, I think that's enough of that," Mr. Reiskind said suddenly, turning off the record. "Now for the Red Seal De Luxe." Nobody moved until that record had played through. We glanced inquiringly at our neighbor. "So clear," he murmured. "The basses were no longer muffled."

While Mr. Murray was explaining that the new record is red because Victor likes red, we sidled up to Mr. Reiskind and asked him whether the new magnetic recording, which records sound on wire or metal tape, might not soon make this Victor record, and all other records, obsolete. He said no. "In our opinion," he added, "the disc will always be the most convenient and economical thing for recorded music in the home. The magnetic recordings, you know, have the advantage of providing you with an entire thirty-minute symphony or a couple of hours of opera without changing records. That's fine for that, but what about a three-minute popular tune? It looks to me as though they'd have to put out a thirty-minute recording of various selections—like Muzak." As we were leaving, we met Mr. Lansdale once more and he pressed still another gift on us—the Red Seal De Luxe recording of "Till," attractively done up in a box plainly labelled "May Be Dropped."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

SEP 9 - 1945

65TH SEASON LISTED BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra begins its 65th season with its initial broadcast of the season slated for October 6. Dr Koussevitsky will launch his 22d year as director of the world famous ensemble, originated in 1881.

Mark Woods, president of the American Broadcasting company, in announcing the continued sponsorship of the programs by its current backer, stated, "The Boston Symphony is synonymous with the best in the field of good music.

"Under its distinguished conductor. Dr Serge Koussevitsky, the Boston Symphony has presented the works of the recognized music masters without regard to the time from which they came, for in his opinion, good music is ageless."

This Clipping From
GREENSBORO, N. C.
NEWS

SEP - 9 1945

THIS WEEK ON WAX

BRAHMS, SYMPHONY NO. 3 IN F, OPUS 90. Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Victor DM-1007. Eight sides.

A German critic has said that Brahms' Third Symphony is his "most typical, personal and important symphonic work. In no other symphony has Brahms unveiled his individual nature so wonderfully, in no other has his whole personality found such marvelously pure and undisguised expression, in no other symphony has he displayed such spiritual independence as this."

Certainly the sonorous third movement of this symphony, which has been called the most famous movement in all of the four Brahms symphonies, is the essence of romanticism in music.

This third movement, although it exhibits certain dance-suggestive rhythms, is not so much of the traditionally dance movement, as is usually the case with symphonys' third movements, that it is out of character with the main body of the work which embodies a spirit of calm and mellow joy.

The earliest critics of Brahms pronounced his music heavy, recondite, obscure, for no one before Brahms had built the symphony into such a gigantic structure. No one had conceived a pattern so broad in outline and at the same time so exquisite in detail.

But today the Brahms symphonies are recognized for their greatness and for their charm of revelation in new and unsuspected loveliness. In his symphonies we find the joy of discovering new and personal beauty.

The famed Boston symphony, conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky, has given the work a superlative performance and technical quality of the record is excellent.—M. F. C.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 6, 1945 ı Screen — Symphony Forecast

Alfredo Valente

Serge Koussevitzky

Who will open the sixty-fifth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Oct. 5-6. It will be the conductor's twenty-second year in Boston.

First Concert Of Season To Hail Victory

In honor of the fighting forces and in celebration of victory, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will include in the opening program of the sixty-fifth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Oct. 5-6, Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and Third "Leonore" Overture. The other items will be Copland's "Appalachian Spring" Suite and Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet" Suite No. 2.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who is beginning his twenty-second year as conductor of the Boston Orchestra, also announces these programs for the three following Friday and Saturday concerts:

Oct. 12-13—Haydn, Symphony No. 94, "Surprise"; Menotti, Two Interludes from "The Island of God"; Pescara, Commedia del Arte (first performance); Sibelius, "The Swan of Tuonela" and Symphony No. 1.

Oct. 19-20—Mozart, Adagio and Fugue (K. 546); Martinů, Symphony No. 3 (first performance); Berlioz, Symphonie "Fantastique."

Oct. 26-27—Mozart, Symphony in D Major, "Parisian" (K. 297); Kabalevsky, Symphony No. 2; Rachmaninov, Piano Concerto No. 2 (Soloist: Alexander Brailowsky); Rimsky-Korsakov, Capriccio Espagnol.

There will be the usual Symphony Hall series of 24 Friday afternoon and Saturday evening programs, six Sunday afternoon and six Monday evening concerts.

A soloist named for the Boston series is Rudolf Firkusny, pianist. He is a new name in Symphony announcements. Remembered names are the pianist Vladimir Horowitz and Alexander Brailowsky. Three familiar violinists are mentioned—Albert Spalding, Yehudi Menuhin, and Efrem Zimbalist. Cellists are Gregor Piatigorsky and Raya Garbousova.

Conductors secured for periodic relief of Dr. Koussevitzy are Sir Adrian Boult, leader of the British Broadcasting Corporation Orchestra in London; Igor Stravinsky, the composer; Fritz Reiner, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, and Leonard Bernstein, representing American ideas of orchestral interpretation.

* * *

"American Ball- I C'

RALEIGH, N. C.
NEWS-OBSERVER

SEP 9 - 1945

Speaking of Records—

Brahms: Symphony No. 3 in F, Op. 90. ~~Boston Symphony~~ Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor. Album DM-1007. $4.50.

A German critic once remarked that Johannes Brahms' Third Symphony is his "most typical, personal, and important symphonic work." And many people are inclined to agree with the critic, for this symphonic movement is certainly one of the most expressive of Brahm's individual nature in music.

The sonorous Third Movement of this symphony, which has been called the most famous movement in all of the four Brahms symphonies, is the essence of romanticism in music.

Resuming its practice of releasing scheduled lists monthly, RCA Victor presents in its September Red Seal album releases, a new recording of this performance in a performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky.

Dr. Koussevitsky directs the orchestra in a superb rendition of Brahms' masterpiece.

Strauss: Der Rosenkavalier, Suite, Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, Eugene Goossens, conductor. Album DM-997. $3.50.

"Der Rosenkavalier," one of the most popular modern operas in the Metropolitan repertory, was first produced in Dresden in 1911, and was heard at the Met two seasons later. In 1926, Strauss himself prepared the first of many orchestral versions of the score for a film version of "The Rose Cavalier." Now it has been arranged again for symphony orchestra, this time by the ballet conductor, Antal Dorati.

Victor presents Dorati's arrangement for the post-ban record debut of the Cincinnati Symphony under Eugene Goossens.

The album opens with the love scene between Octavian and the Marschallin, continues with the celebrated Rose scene between Octavian and Sophie, and, after hitting the other musical high spots of the opera, winds up with a rousing recording of the "Great Waltz," probably the best beloved of Richard Strauss' compositions.

SYMPHONY SEASON

Post Sept 9

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It doesn't seem so very long ago that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was celebrating its 50th birthday. Now its 65th season is almost upon us. As for Dr. Koussevitzky, the impending season, which begins on Friday and Saturday, Oct. 5 and 6, will be his 22d. In these later years the conductor has been quite willing to share his responsibilities. We may again expect some concerts from associate conductor Richard Burgin, who always gives us music of interest and whose powers as director steadily increase. Young Mr. Leonard Bernstein is fast becoming a habit hereabouts. He will return, presumably, for a pair of concerts. An even more familiar figure will be Igor Stravinsky, who has been absent for two seasons. The program he will offer will contain new music of his own and music by other composers.

But this is just the beginning of the conductor story. The real news is that Sir Adrian Boult will return and will take over the orchestra in mid-season and that Hungarian-born Fritz Reiner, now of the Pittsburgh Symphony, will make his belated first appearance in this city. Mr. Reiner has been around these parts for some time and like George Szell, Bruno Walter, Sir Thomas Beecham and many others who might be mentioned, he is equally at home in the concert hall and the opera house. A few years ago he conducted notable operatic performances in Philadelphia, particularly of works by Strauss and Wagner. Doubtless many readers of this column listened to the program of French and Spanish music that he conducted last Sunday afternoon with the orchestra of the Columbia Broadcasting Company. The radio tends to reduce all conductors, all orchestras to a common level, yet it was quite easy to see that Mr. Reiner was fully at home in the music of Debussy, Ravel and Manuel de Falla.

* * *

As for Sir Adrian Boult, the able leader of the British Broadcasting Company in London, familiarily known as the B. B. C., will be making his second visit to this city. It was in January, 1935, that he came here first and made an altogether favorable impression. Two performances that stand out in recollection were those of Schubert's Symphony in C major and of the Second Symphony of Elgar. None of our prospective conductors, nor even Dr. koussevitzky, has as yet made any announcement as to programs. It is to be hoped, however, that Sir Adrian will help boost the Boston repertory on the British side, where it has lagged a bit of late. We could do with more Elgar. There are symphonies of Vaughan Williams that we do not know. There is a flourishing younger generation by whom the British themselves set much store, yet most of these men are known to us by name only. We are told that Dr. Koussevitsky will shortly announce some new music of striking interest and importance. It is to be expected that the various guest conductors will also do their share in this respect and that none of the leaders will neglect the equally important issue of significant revivals.

A few soloists have been announced and other names may appear later on.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

SEP 9 - 1945

Leo R. Lewis, 50 Years at Tufts As Music Professor, Dies at 80

Special to the Herald Tribune

MEDFORD, Mass., Sept. 8.—Professor Leo Rich Lewis, eighty, music composer and conductor and professor of music at Tufts College for the last fifty years, died today of a heart ailment. He lived at 20 Professors Row, Tufts College.

Professor Lewis is credited with developing Tufts as a "singing college." He established numerous musical organizations and was the author of many college songs. Many of his compositions have been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the last half century and for several years he conducted a group of members of the Boston Symphony at the annual Tufts Pops Night.

Born in Woodstock, Vt., he was graduated from Tufts in 1887, being one of four generations in his family to attend that institution. After studying music for three years in Europe he was graduated from the Akademie der Tonkunst (Conservatory of Music), of Munich, in 1892.

He returned to Tufts the same year as an instructor of French but three years later became professor of theory and history of music.

In 1894, with his father, John Jay Lewis, he edited a hymnal which popularized J. B. Upham's "Pledge of Allegiance to the Flag."

Professor Lewis was a visiting instructor at the Harvard Summer School from 1915 through 1922. He was appointed professor of music and an associate professor of modern languages at Tufts in 1920 and four years later became Fletcher Professor of Music there. He held to a theory that glee club music should express college life, but that it should be neither poorly written nor cheap, and built up what has been called the largest collection of original college music in existence. It was published in a collection of eighty numbers by thirty-six student composers.

As an undergraduate at Tufts he organized the Glee Club in 1886, and at the first concert his composition, "The Barnum Song," was sung.

His musical compositions included "R. E. Porter," an operetta which he composed as a Tufts undergraduate in 1886; "The Consolation of Music," a cantata, in 1895; "School Songs With College Flavors," in 1805; "Symphonic Prelude to Browning's 'A Blot in the 'Scutcheon,'" in 1907; "Intercollegiate Inklings for Symphonic Orchestra," in 1927, and "Trumpet," a concertino, in 1937.

He also was the author of "The Ambitious Listener" and "Masterpieces of Music," written in 1928, and "The Gist of Sight-Singing," the following year. Books of music which he edited include "The National School Library of Song," two volumes; "Church Harmonies, New and Old;" "Tufts Song Book," "Book of Tufts Music" and "Orchestra and Band Series of Tufts Music."

Professor Lewis was vice-president of the Music Teachers' National Association, 1910-'12. In 1930 he was appointed chairman of the State Music Committee for the Massachusetts Tercentenary.

In addition to composing and conducting, he was credited with originating a card system of thematic cataloguing applicable to all music.

Surviving are his wife, Mrs. Carrie Nichols Bullard Lewis, who also composed music as Carrie Bullard and Caryl B. Rich; a son, Philip, and a granddaughter, Mrs. Barbara Lewis Robertson.

A funeral will be held Tuesday afternoon at Goddard Chapel, Tuft College.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

SEP 9 - 1945

Boston Symphony Starts Oct. 5

On Friday and Saturday, Oct. 5 and 6, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will open in Symphony Hall, Boston, its 65th season. Dr. Koussevitzky will then begin his 22d successive year as its conductor. The orchestra will make five visits to New York to give concerts in Carnegie Hall on Wednesday evenings and Saturday afternoons, Friday evenings in Brooklyn, and concerts on the intervening Thursday evenings at New Brunswick, Washington, Newark and Philadelphia.

The soloists to appear in the Boston concerts are now announced. A newcomer at these concerts will be the Czech pianist, Rudolf Firkusny. Pianists remembered from the past are Vladimir Horowitz and Alexander Brailowsky. The violinists will include Albert Spalding, Yehudi Menuhin and Efrem Zimbalist. There will be two cellists, Gregor Piatigorsky and Raya Garbousova.

Serge Koussevitzky will shortly announce some new music of interest and importance to be performed in the course of the season. The major part of the programs, of course, will be drawn from the established repertory of the past. Although Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct throughout the season, there will be occasional guests. Igor Stravinsky will return after two years' absence to appear as composer and as conductor, likewise presenting music other than his own. A newcomer to these concerts will be Fritz Reiner, the conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, who has appeared many times in other of our cities but so far not in Boston. Sir Adrian Boult, the leader of the British Broadcasting Corporation Orchestra in London, is to return to America and will conduct the orchestra as guest in mid-season. It was ten years ago (January, 1935) that the English conductor last visited this country, when he visited Boston and conducted there. Leonard Bernstein, the American conductor and composer, will lead the orchestra as guest.

Bo Glo Sept 9

Boston Symphony Begins 65th Season Oct. 5

The 65th season of the Boston Symphony will begin at Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon, Oct. 5. Serge Koussevitzky will then enter his 22d year as conductor of the great orchestra.

The soloists will include pianists Rudolf Firkusny, a Czech, new to these concerts, Vladimir Horowitz and Alexander Brailowsky; violinists Albert Spalding, Yehudi Menuhin and Efrem Zimbalist, and the cellists Gregor Piatigorsky and Raya Garbousova.

There will be a number of guest conductors: Sir Adrian Boult, leader of Britain's B. B. C. Orchestra, who will come to Boston in midseason; Fritz Reiner, conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, who will appear for the first time in Boston; Leonard Bernstein, remembered from past appearances; Igor Stravinsky, who will present his own music and some by others, and Morton Gould, who will conduct a Sunday concert.

There will be 24 Friday afternoon concerts at Symphony Hall, 24 on Saturday evenings, six on Sunday afternoons, beginning Oct. 21, and six on Monday evenings, beginning Oct. 8.

The first four Friday-Saturday programs will be as follows:

Oct. 5-6: "Leonore" Overture No. 3, Beethoven; Suite from "Appalachian Spring," Copland; Second Suite from "Romeo and Juliet," Prokofieff; "Eroica" Symphony, Beethoven.

Oct. 12-13: "Surprise" Symphony, Haydn; Two Interludes from "The Island God," Menotti; "Commedia del Arte" (first performances), Pescara; "The Swan of Tuonela," First Symphony, Sibelius.

Oct. 19-20: Adagio and Fugue (K. 546), Mozart; Third Symphony (first performances), Martinu; "Fantastic" Symphony, Berlioz.

Oct. 26-27: "Paris" Symphony (K 297), Mozart; Second Symphony, Kabalevsky; Third Piano Concerto, Rachmaninoff (Alexander Brailowsky, soloist); Spanish Caprice, Rimsky=Korsakoff.

DURHAM, N. C.
HERALD-SUN

SEP 9 - 1945

Victor Recordings

BRAHMS: SYMPHONY NO. 3 IN F, OP. 90. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. ~~Victor: M or~~ DM-1007; four 12-inch records.

No one can point to any one of Brahms' four symphonies and say that it is the best without meeting with healthy disagreement. For each of them is great in its own right, being able to stand alone as a masterpiece. It is true that the present popular taste seems to indicate a preference for the First and Fourth Symphonies; but I believe that that is because those two works have been played more often on the radio and in concert-halls. Those who are familiar with the Second and Third Symphonies will unhesitatingly argue their high merits.

The point is that Brahms was able, through 16 separate movements, to maintain the same high level of inspiration and masterly symphonic character. Into the First Symphony he put storm and stress, into the Second a distinctive pastoral quality, into the Third a glorious romantic nature, and into the Fourth a masterpiece of classic design. And in all four he put harmonic coloration and ravishing melodies, all basically different and of unmatched quality. In none of his symphonies does Brahms belittle himself; his genius is always in full display.

It is the Third Symphony which Victor is featuring this month. No finer orchestra and conductor could have been chosen to record this work than the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky. The result is an album sparkling in all the glory of the master symphonist. From the opening thrilling theme, which belongs with Beethoven's famous motive of four notes of his Fifth Symphony as a superb and forceful symphonic introduction, to the poetical end, which was a bold venture in Brahms' day, the recording is excellent.

No discussion of Brahms' Third Symphony is complete without mentioning the Third Movement. This has been called the most famous movement in all of the four Brahms symphonies. Certainly he was never more melancholy and introspective, and perhaps never quite so deliberately lyrical. Without this movement the symphony would be less romantic; the listener impatiently waits for the movement to appear, and then regrets when it has been passed. But, like the other three movements, the Third lingers in the mind.

[6]

Hill Loses 'Grand Old Man'

TUFTS WEEKLY
Vol. XLIX Z303 Sept. 13, 1945 No. 48

Students Share Cherished Memories of Loved Leo

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

SEP 9 - 1945

RCA Victor will introduce in October a new nonbreakable high fidelity phonograph record which is called the greatest improvement in home phonograph records in 45 years. The new record is ruby red in color and is made of a compound composed entirely of vinyl resin plastic. Since the new record will be available at first only in limited quantities the company will continue to produce standard shellac records. At present it is planned to release only newly recorded musical works on the new type disc, which will be known to the trade as Red Seal De Luxe records. The first release will be Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," played by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

SEP 10 1945

Boston Symphony Announces Dates

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky begins his twenty-second successive year as conductor of the Boston Symphony in the new season beginning Oct. 5 and 6 in Boston's Symphony Hall. The season will include twenty-four pair of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall, likewise six Monday evening and six Sunday afternoon concerts. The orchestra will continue its periodical visits to New York and cities en route and will make a week's autumn tour of the West.

This Clipping From MILFORD, MASS.
NEWS

SEP 945

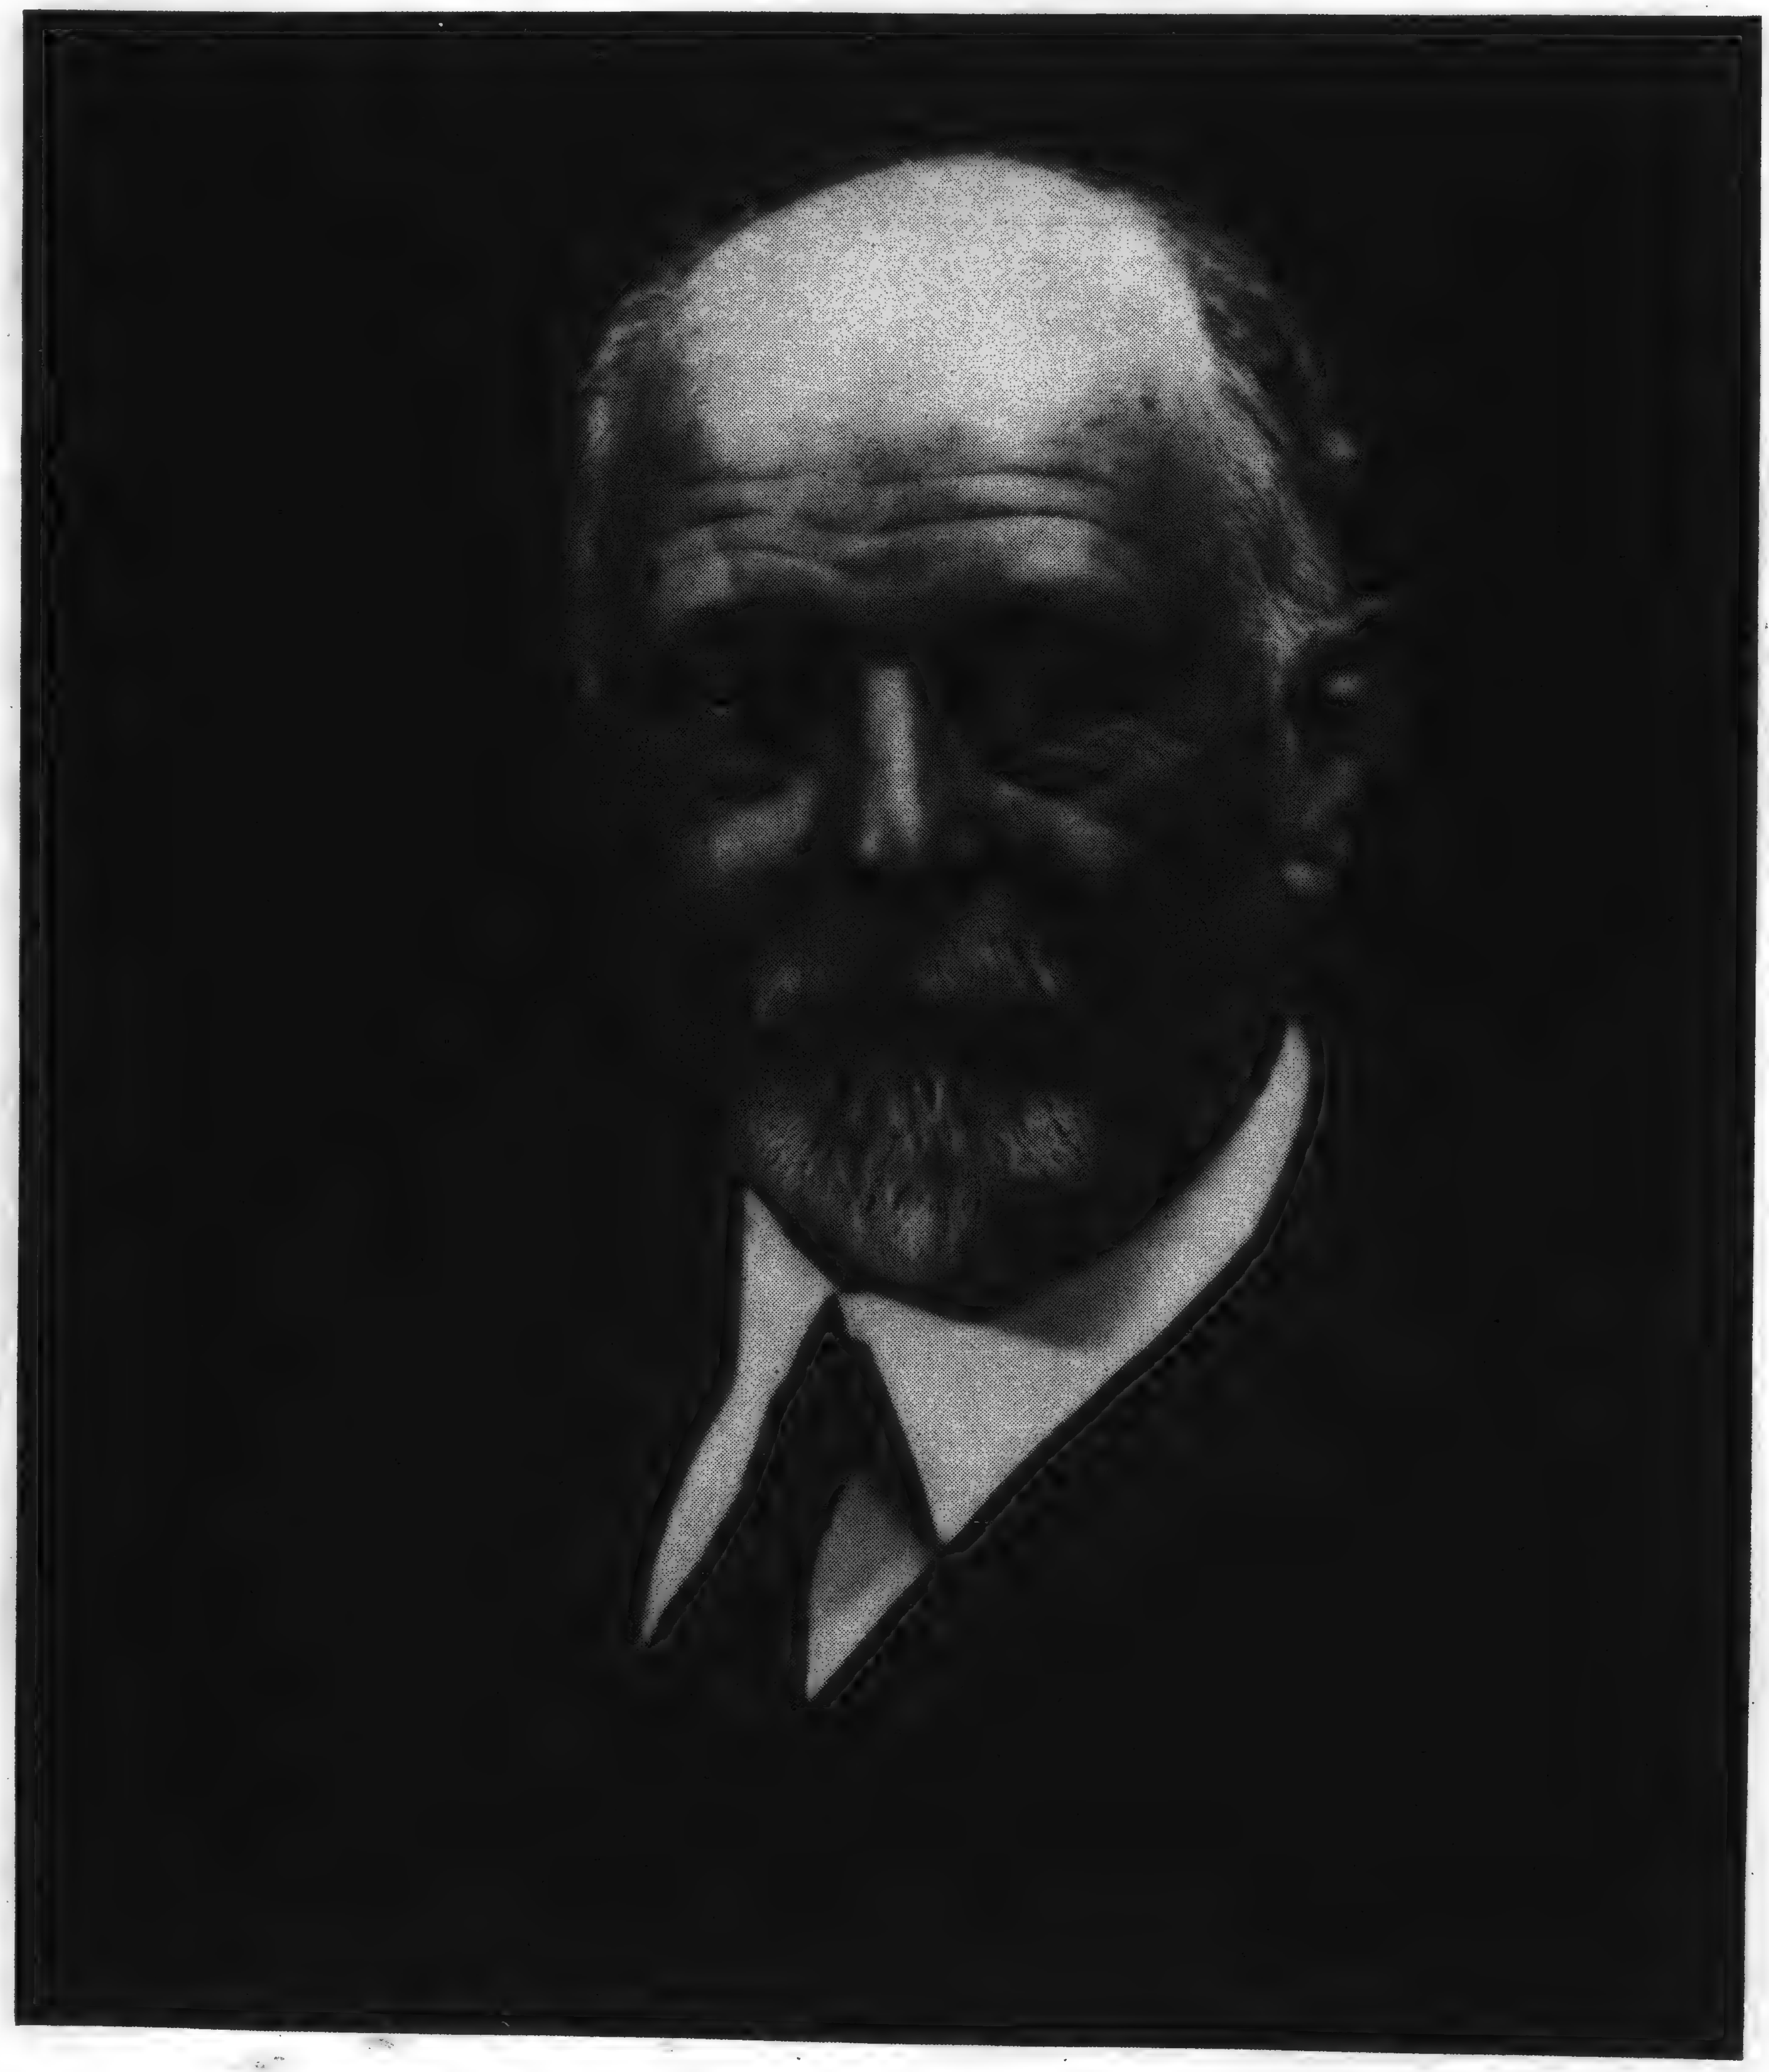
WAR SEASON TICKETS

It is reported from Symphony hall that a larger number of people than usual in the further outlying districts are applying for season tickets for the coming concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. This is accounted [illegible] part by the release from war occupation and in part by the anticipated improvement in transportation conditions, which will make these concerts more accessible. Serge Koussevitzky will open Oct. 5 his 22nd successive year as the orchestra's great conductor.

Hill Loses 'Grand Old Man'

TUFTS WEEKLY
Vol. XLIX Z303 Sept. 13, 1945 No. 48

Students Share Cherished Memories of Loved Leo



This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

SEP 9 - 1945

RCA Victor will introduce in October a new nonbreakable high fidelity phonograph record which is called the greatest improvement in home phonograph records in 45 years. The new record is ruby red in color and is made of a compound composed entirely of vinyl resin plastic. Since the new record will be available at first only in limited quantities the company will continue to produce standard shellac records. At present it is planned to release only newly recorded musical works on the new type disc, which will be known to the trade as Red Seal De Luxe records. The first release will be Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," played by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

SEP 10 1945

Boston Symphony Announces Dates

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky begins his twenty-second successive year as conductor of the Boston Symphony in the new season beginning Oct. 5 and 6 in Boston's Symphony Hall. The season will include twenty-four pair of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall, likewise six Monday evening and six Sunday afternoon concerts. The orchestra will continue its periodical visits to New York and cities en route and will make a week's autumn tour of the West.

MILFORD, MASS.
NEWS

SEP 11 1945

WAR SEASON TICKETS

It is reported from Symphony hall that a larger number of people than usual in the further outlying districts are applying for season tickets for the coming concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. This is accounted [illegible] part by the release from war occupation and in part by the anticipated improvement in transportation conditions, which will make these concerts more accessible. Serge Koussevitzky will open Oct. 5 his 22nd successive year as the orchestra's great conductor.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THE TUFTS WEEKLY

The Tufts Weekly is printed throughout the college year except July 5, Sept. 6, Oct. 18, Oct. 25, and Nov. 1, 1945, and Feb. 14, Feb. 21, Feb. 29, June 20 and June 27, 1946.

The columns of The Weekly are at all times open to alumni, undergraduates and friends of the college for the free discussion of matters of interest to Tufts.

All communications and other material intended for publication must be signed, but the name will be withheld from publication at the author's request. The Editors assume no responsibility for opinions in communications.

Entered as second class matter, November 12, 1913, at the Post Office, Boston, Mass., under the act of March 3, 1879. (Boston Postal District)

National advertising by National Advertising Service, Inc., 420 Madison Avenue, New York City.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE, $1.00 PER TERM — OFFICE — BALLOU HALL

Editor-in-Chief — Betty Hubers
Staff Photographer — Joseph R. Whelan
Faculty Adviser — Cecelia VanAuken
Faculty Business Manager — Prof. Myron J. Files
Advertising Managers — Andrew Campoli, Stephen Harris

SUMMER EDITORIAL BOARD

Claire Dexter
Laura Hayward
Dick Howland
Dorothy Johnson
Barbara Lichtig
Jim McKean
Maria von Mering
Larsh B. Mewhinney
Nancy Potter
Sy Rayner
John Rogers
David Wyman

VOL. XLIX Z303 THURSDAY, SEPT. 13, 1945 NO. 48

Leo Rich Lewis, 1865-1945

Sun threw long shadows of the heavy trees, green pools and bays
Of coolness spilled from the rich crest of the last of summer days.
This long year neared its end, and full and warm and calm, it ended.
And the great sun from the last of all its singing noons descended.
This year-of-years, this life, this calendar of music and of peace
Was at the last dark page, where legends, choirs, and trumpets cease.
Then in the evening of this passing, at the first of the fallen night,
We heard his music rise, his morning shout. We heard his heart in light.
Hymns, towers, and marching hours of sunny brass, of joy in strings Stretched to the top of the sky and plucked and played on, ponderings
Of minutes passing, measures past, and months and men and melodies —
The night, the light, was crowded with these, and more and more than these.
It was a long shining from dawn through afternoon till the dark, long,
Long, with the symphonic movement of a scored and quartered day,
With gay and slow, with good and great, by skill and care made strong;
And done and down now, and nothing more and everything to say.

John Holmes

He Belongs to Tufts History

Leo has gone—but in the minds of the student body he will never be forgotten. We will never forget his classroom lectures sprinkled with modern humorous anecdotes, the twinkle in his eye when he was amused, the proud look when he conducted at Pops, his willingness at helping "his boys and girls" at anytime with good sound advice.

Leo was an institution in himself—everything Tufts stands for—such characteristics as friendliness, culture, honesty, and frankness—he gave much to Tufts as a leader and what he gave is embodied forever in younger minds. Music took on many new meanings with Leo for a professor, for somehow composers became alive and their notes more a part of their personalities.

Yes, all of us have many cherished memories of "the grand old man of the college" and these we will keep forever. Leo had a rich full life, teaching his beloved music till the very end. This was the way he would have wanted to go, and now it is up to us to carry on in the best way we know how and to g to others that which we acquired from his personality teachings.

"He took the many fragments of his dreams
Such scattered shreds as others toss aside —
And with them wrought another dream so fair,
That others made his dream their faith and guide."

Hubers

Tufts Mourns Death Of Prof. Leo R. Lewis

By CECELIA VanAUKEN

Thousands of Tufts alumni, students and faculty membe mourned the death of Prof. Leo Rich Lewis who died last Sa urday at Wyman House, Cambridge. Noted as one of the lea ing music educators of the country, Professor Lewis had bee a member of the faculty for more than 53 years and was th only one to head the department of music of the college.

Funeral services were held Tuesday afternoon at Goddar Chapel. Dean Clarence R. Skinner of the School of Religio officiated. Alumni from far and wide came to pay last tribu to Tufts "grand old man" who had become a veritable traditio of all the best which Tufts stands for.

Honorary pallbearers were Dr. Leonard Carmichael, Tufts president; Arthur Fiedler, Pops concert conductor, whose baton Professor Lewis wielded annually in the playing of the famous Tufts hymn, "Dear Alma Mater," his composition, at Tufts night at the Pops; Harold E. Sweet, chairman of the Tufts board of trustee, and Vice-President George S. Miller.

Also Capt. Preston B. Haines, commanding officer of the Tufts Naval Unit; Arthur B. Newhall, '08, of Framingham, alumni trustee; Prof. William R. Ransom, '98, of Tufts College; the Rev. Harry Adams Hersey, D.D., '03, of Danbury, Conn.; Lt.-Comdr. Ronald R. Moore, USNR, classmate of Professor Lewis's son, Philip B. Lewis, '18; C. Elmore Watkins, '04, of Manchester, Conn.; Dr. A. Warren Stearns, M'10, former dean of the Tufts Medical School; and Dr. R. B. Wingate, '26, of Belmont.

'LAST LINK'

Dean Skinner called Professor Lewis, who was the second in a four-generation family of graduates from Tufts, "the last link in what was the older Tufts College." "No one has built himself more into the college than did Leo," Dean Skinner said, citing that Professor Lewis, as a member of the faculty since 1892, had seen the growth of Tufts from a small college into a large and important educational institution.

An arrangement by Albert Herling of a movement of Professor Lewis's "Second String Quartet," and "Dear Alma Mater" were among the selections played by Professor William K. Provine, organist at the services.

Beloved by thousands of graduates of Tufts and remembered for his life-time influen on college music, as well as f his composition of the Tuf hymn, "Dear Alma Mater," D Lewis, Fletcher professor music at the college, taught h courses until the end of t term last month, meeting h always popular classes daily.

Born in South Woodstoc Vt., Feb. 11, 1865, Profess Lewis was the son of the Re John Jay Lewis, Universali clergyman, who was graduat from Tufts in 1863, and Abb Goodwin (Davis) Lewis. 1867 the family moved to Sou Boston, and Leo Lewis attend Boston schools, being graduat from both the Boston Engli High School and the Lat School before entering Tufts 1883. His son, Philip B. Lew of West Medford was graduat from Tufts in 1918 and h granddaughter, Mrs. Barba Lewis Robertson, also of We Medford, was graduated fro the college in 1942.

MET BRAHMS

After receiving his Tufts d gree in 1887, Professor Lew attended Harvard where took a second A.B. degree 1888 and a master of arts d gree in 1889 with highe honors in music. From 1889 1892 he studied at the Mus Conservatory in Munich, gra uating with honorable mentio in composition. While studyi abroad he met Brahms a had an interesting intervie with this great composer, whose works he was very fon

Upon his return from abroa he joined the Tufts faculty an instructor in French 1892. In 1895 he became pr fessor of the history a theory of music, in 1920

(Continued on page 4)

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

SEP 9 - 1945

RCA Victor will introduce in October a new nonbreakable high fidelity phonograph record which is called the greatest improvement in home phonograph records in 45 years. The new record is ruby red in color and is made of a compound composed entirely of vinyl resin plastic. Since the new record will be available at first only in limited quantities the company will continue to produce standard shellac records. At present it is planned to release only newly recorded musical works on the new type disc, which will be known to the trade as Red Seal De Luxe records. The first release will be Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," played by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

SEP 10 1945

Boston Symphony Announces Dates

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky begins his twenty-second successive year as conductor of the Boston Symphony in the new season beginning Oct. 5 and 6 in Boston's Symphony Hall. The season will include twenty-four pair of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall, likewise six Monday evening and six Sunday afternoon concerts. The orchestra will continue its periodical visits to New York and cities en route and will make a week's autumn tour of the West.

MILFORD, MASS.
NEWS

SEP 1945

WAR SEASON TICKETS

It is reported from Symphony hall that a larger number of people than usual in the further outlying districts are applying for season tickets for the coming concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. This is [illegible] part by the release from war occupation and in part by the anticipated improvement in transportation conditions, which will make these concerts more accessible. Serge Koussevitzky will open Oct. 5 his 22nd successive year as the orchestra's great conductor.

[7]

Dr. Lewis

(Continued from page 2)

was made associate professor of French, and in 1926 became Fletcher Professor of Music. He has headed the department of music at the college for 50 years.

He married Carrie Bullard of Brookline on Dec. 21, 1892. Mrs. Lewis is the sister of the composer, Frederic Field Bullard, who died in 1904, and is, like her husband and brother, a composer of note. Both Professor and Mrs. Lewis hold honorary degrees from Tufts the former an honorary doctor of letters, and the latter a master of arts degree.

WROTE COLLEGE HYMN

From his undergraduate days up until his death the veteran Tufts professor has been identified with the musical life and history of Tufts College. His inspiration for "Dear Alma Mater," came at the first Tufts Night on College Hill, Sept. 26, 1898. The evening was spirited, and he felt keenly the lack of a song to match the final moment of such an occasion. He wrote the song that night, David L. Maulsby '87 wrote the words, and since then it has always climaxed Tufts Nights at Pops at Symphony Hall. No one who has heard this great college hymn can forget the moment when Leo, as he was affectionately known, led the Boston Symphony orchestra, augmented by the organ, through the simple and stately measures of this classic song.

Professor Lewis has edited countless items of school and college music, composed and produced operettas and concerts, and directed formal college exercises. The works published and edited by him include "School Songs with College Flavor," "Incidental Music to Dekker's Fortunatus," "Symphonic Prelude to Browning's 'A Blot on the 'Scutcheon,'" "Church Harmonies, New and Old," the Book of Tufts Music, the Zeta Psi Song Book, and many others.

TEXTBOOKS POPULAR

He has also written numerous textbooks on the techniques of teaching music and French. These include "Vocabulary of French Words and Idioms," "Gist of Sightsinging," and "Ambitious Listener." His most recent volume, "Do and Don't in Harmony," published by the Tufts College Press, has been widely adopted as a textbook on music techniques throughout the country.

With his father, he edited a hymnal in 1894, notable for first generaly circulating the now-famous Pledge of Allegiance to the Flag. Its author, J. B. Upham of the Youth's Companion, was a friend of the family.

Added to Dr. Lewis's original methods of drama production and French verb-teaching, are patented methods and devices. Inventor of the Strapflex Binder, his genius was featured greatly in the perfection of Strapflex Patented Methods of Pamphlet and Magazine Binding developed by his son. In many parts of the nation both library and educational fields regard these methods as vital.

Also a typically "Leo" invention is his thematic index by which thousands of tunes may be rapidly recognized and identified.

OTHER HONORS

Professor Lewis has served as chairman of the board of examiners in music of the College Examination board; as vice-president of the Music Teachers' National Association; as chairman of the music committee of the Massachusetts Tercentenary in 1930, and as secretary of the North American branch of the National Education Association. He was a Fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, and a member of Phi Beta Kappa, Kappa Gamma Psi, Zeta Psi, Harvard Musical Association, and the University Club of Boston.

Besides his wife, Mrs. Carrie Bullard Lewis of Professors Row, Professor Lewis leaves a son, Philip B. Lewis; a daughter, Mrs. Barbara Lewis Robertson; and a great grandson, David Lewis Robertson, born last Memorial Day.

Scuttlebutt

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

SEP 13

Boston Symphony to Open Its 65th Season Oct. 5

Serge Koussevitzky will open his 22nd successive year as the Boston Symphony orchestra's conductor, when the orchestra's 65th season in Symphony hall opens Oct. 5, to extend to April 26, with two series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts, and two series of six concerts each, one on Sunday afternoons and one on Monday evenings. Soloists will include Vladimir Horowitz, piano; Albert Spalding, violin; Alexander Brailowsky, piano; Raya Garbousova, 'cello; Yehudi Menuhin, violin; Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cello; Rudolf Firkusny, piano, and Efrem Zimbalist, violin. The guest conductors will be Sir Adrian Boult, Fritz Reiner, Leonard Bernstein and Igor Stravinsky.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER

SEP 9 - 1945

Right Off the Record

By Stewart Matter

THE most revolutionary advance in recording since the advent of the electrical process is the development of the first non-breakable, high fidelity record for home use, just announced by R. C. A. Victor, climaxing 11 years of research. It is a flexible disc, ruby-red in color, made of synthetic plastic and will first be available to the public in early October when a new recording of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky will be marketed in this new material.

While vinyl materials have been used for some time in the manufacture of transcription discs for radio broadcast and in V discs for the armed forces, they have hitherto been prohibitively costly for use in home phonograph records. The new formula results in a record that can be dropped or bent without breaking or cracking, has almost no surface sound and greatly enhances the fidelity of reproduction. This reduction in surface sound is made possible because the plastic compound does not require the mineral filler used in shellac records.

The vinyl discs are considerably lighter in weight than the shellac and will operate on any automatic changer and with any standard needle. Any change in reproducing equipment in the home is thus not necessary. When I received the plastic discs I immediately ran them through various tests and the results were amazing. Imagine a record which will not break or crack, one which has almost no surface noise, one which requires no change-over in equipment, and above all one which raises fidelity of reproduction to a level never before realized. It is likewise due to the absense of the rough mineral filler in the shellac which permits the positive impression of the most minute sound wave.

It is planned to release only newly recorded material on these new discs, which will be known as Red Seal de luxe records. The same work will be made available later on standard Red Seal shellac records at the regular price. These discs have been likened to limited editions of fine books and thus will bring music lovers still finer recorded performances than those possible on the regular shellac discs. This is actually the first major improvement in the disc itself, but it truly is one worth waiting for.

Other Methods Slower

Other companies have through their representatives informed us they, too, were to have "tremendous" advances soon, but this is the first actual example. Numerous inquiries have likewise come in from readers as to the possibility of recording on wire or on film in the near future. There has been a great amount of idle gossip on this score, and it all boils down to a bit of wishful thinking on the part of many. After carefully checking with a dozen of the country's major sound laboratories, I am assured that no such thing is in the offing. The dics record as we have it today and the present method of reproduction is here to stay for some time.

There definitely will be wire recording available immediately after the present emergency, but every concern which is incorparting this into its own units makes no claim for permanency through this medium. It is being designed for home recording and nothing more, for the wire will become demagnetized after a time. There is no question about this being an accepted mode of recording for permanence sometime in the future, but today and in the near future, at least, it still retains its own peculiar bugs.

Likewise, recording on film for the home is not feasible. No film has been developed which is either sufficiently transparent or fireproof for anything other than strictly professional use. Fireproof vaults maintained at an unvarying level of humidity and temperature are out of the question for the home. And film, as well as wire, would require a considerable change-over of equipment.

The new vinyl dics completely stops any argument in favor of wire or film except that of break in continuity, and it is only reasonable that with the tremendous resources of American science and research this problem will be oversome. This new discovery is revolutionary, a towering milestone in the history and development of home recording.

ALLENTOWN, PA.
CHRONICLE

SEP 13 1945

On the RECORD

BRAHMS: SYMPHONY NO. 3 IN F, OP. 90, BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor. M- or DM-[illegible]. [illegible] 12-in. records, $4.50 list.

RCA Victor presents, in its September Red Seal album releases, a new recording of the Brahms Symphony No. 3. The recording is the second Brahms Symphony recorded by the Bost Symphony orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky; the other is the "Symphony No. 4 in E Minor." He gives them both a superlative performance and the technical quality of the recording is excellent.

Although the Brahms first symphony is perhaps his most popular, one German critic remarked of the Third Symphony that it "is Brahms' most typical, personal and important symphonic work." Certainly the third movement of this symphony, which has been called the most famous movement in all of the four Brahms symphonies, is the essence of romanticism in music.

* * *

NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

SEP 23 1945

New Opera Due in U. S.

Eddie Dowling and Louis J. Singer, producers of "The Glass Menagerie," have acquired the American rights to "Peter Grimes," a contemporary opera by Benjamin Britten and Montague Slater, which had its world premiere in London on June 5, receiving high critical acclaim.

Britten, the composer, is a protege and student of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and is well known for his several symphonies and instrumental compositions.

Slater authored the libretto. The work is the result of a fellowship given by the Koussevitsky Music Foundation to Britten.

The locale of "Peter Grimes" is a fishing and shipbuilding hamlet. Peter Grimes, is a fisherman, ambitious, far-seeing, impetuous and hemmed-in. He meets a tragic end after causing the death of two young boys he kidnapped and made to slave on his fishing trips.

In addition to 16 principals, the presentation calls for an orchestra of 56, a chorus of 60, and a ballet of 48.

Seats Available for Sunday Symphonies

Sept 13 Her

Subscription tickets are still available for the series of six concerts on Sunday afternoons at 3:30 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This series will include concerts on Oct. 21, Dec. 30, Jan. 27, March 3, March 31 and April 21. Two of the programs will be conducted by Morton Gould and Sir Adrian Boult. The soloists to be heard in this series will include Raya Garbousova, 'cellist, and Efrem Zimbalist, violinist.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

SEP 11 1945

Boston Symphony Names Soloists For Coming Season

Guest soloists and guest conductors have been announced by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, as he begins his twenty-second successive year as conductor of the Boston Symphony.

The orchestra's out of town concerts include visits here in concerts of the Bushnell symphony series, as well as a week's autumn tour of the West.

Soloists Announced

A newcomer will be the Czech pianist, Rudolf Firksny. Pianists remembered from the past are Vladimir Horowitz and Alexander Brailowsky; violinsts, Albert Spalding, Yehudi Menuhin and Efram Zimbalist; 'cellists. Gregor Piatigorsky and Raya Garbousova. Serge Koussevitzky will shortly announce some new music of striking interest and importance to be performed in the course of the season. The major part of the program, of course, will be drawn from the established repertory of the past.

Guest Conductors

Although Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct throughout the season, there will be occasional guests. Igor Stravinsky will return after two years' absence to appear as composer and as conductor. New to these concerts will be Fritz Reiner, the conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra. Sir Adrian Boult, the leader of the British Broadcasting Corporation Orchestra in London, is to return to America and will conduct the orchestra as guest in mid-season. It was ten years ago that the English conductor last visited this country, when he conducted in Boston. Leonard Bernstein, the American conductor and composer, is also scheduled for an appearance.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
NORWOOD, MASS.
MESSENGER

SEP 14 1945

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
NEWS

SEP 13 1945

Deep Interest in Symphony Concerts

It is reported from Symphony hall in Boston that a larger number of people than usual in the further outlying districts are applying for season tickets for the coming concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. This is accounted for in part by the release from war occupation and in part by the anticipated improvement in transportation conditions, which will make these concerts more accessible.

Serge Koussevitzky will open on Oct. 5 his twenty-second successive year as the orchestra's great conductor.

Special attention is called to the series of six Sunday afternoon concerts which were instituted last year. These concerts will be given approximately once a month, on Oct. 21, Dec. 30, Jan. 27, March 3, March 31 and April 21, at 3:30. Soloists announced at this time will be the 'cellist Raya Garbousova and the violinist Efrem Zimbalist. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct three of the concerts and three will be taken over by notable guests. Sir Adrian Boult ,the conductor of the British Broadcasting Corporation orchestra in London, will return to America, after last visiting this country ten years ago. Leonard Bernstein, composer of serious and light music, has conducted this orchestra as guest in previous seasons and will return. He has just been appointed the regular conductor of the New York City Center Symphony orchestra. The other guest will be Morton Gould. Mr. Gould, first generally known by his career in radio, has appeared notably as conductor, and our orchestra (including this one) have performed his music.

The Boston Symphony orchestra's 65th season in Symhony hall will extend from Oct. 5 to April 26, with two series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts, and two series of six concerts each, one on Sunday afternoons and one on Monday evenings. Soloists for the longer series will include Vladimir Horowitz, piano; Albert Spalding, violin; Alexander Brailowsky, piano; Raya Garbousova, 'cello; Yehudi Menuhin, violin; Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cello; Rudolf Firkuany, piano, and Efrem Zimbalist, violin. The guest conductors will be Sir Adrian Boult, Fritz Reiner, Leonard Bernstein and Igor Stravinsky.

Dr. Lewis

(Continued from page 2)

was made associate professor of French, and in 1926 became Fletcher Professor of Music. He has headed the department of music at the college for 50 years.

He married Carrie Bullard of Brookline on Dec. 21, 1892. Mrs. Lewis is the sister of the composer, Frederic Field Bullard, who died in 1904, and is, like her husband and brother, a composer of note. Both Professor and Mrs. Lewis hold honorary degrees from Tufts the former an honorary doctor of letters, and the latter a master of arts degree.

WROTE COLLEGE HYMN

From his undergraduate days up until his death the veteran Tufts professor has been identified with the musical life and history of Tufts College. His inspiration for "Dear Alma Mater," came at the first Tufts Night on College Hill, Sept. 26, 1898. The evening was spirited, and he felt keenly the lack of a song to match the final moment of such an occasion. He wrote the song that night, David L. Maulsby '87 wrote the words, and since then it has always climaxed Tufts Nights at Pops at Symphony Hall. No one who has heard this great college hymn can forget the moment when Leo, as he was affectionately known, led the Boston Symphony orchestra, augmented by the organ, through the simple and stately measures of this classic song.

Professor Lewis has edited countless items of school and college music, composed and produced operettas and concerts, and directed formal college exercises. The works published and edited by him include "School Songs with College Flavor," "Incidental Music to Dekker's Fortunatus," "Symphonic Prelude to Browning's 'A Blot on the 'Scutcheon,'" "Church Harmonies, New and Old," the Book of Tufts Music, the Zeta Psi Song Book, and many others.

TEXTBOOKS POPULAR

He has also written numerous textbooks on the techniques of teaching music and French. These include "Vocabulary of French Words and Idioms," "Gist of Sightsinging," and "Ambitious Listener." His most recent volume, "Do and Don't in Harmony," published by the Tufts College Press, has been widely adopted as a textbook on music techniques throughout the country.

With his father, he edited a hymnal in 1894, notable for first generaly circulating the now-famous Pledge of Allegiance to the Flag. Its author, J. B. Upham of the Youth's Companion, was a friend of the family.

Added to Dr. Lewis's original methods of drama production and French verb-teaching, are patented methods and devices. Inventor of the Strapflex Binder, his genius was featured greatly in the perfection of Strapflex Patented Methods of Pamphlet and Magazine Binding developed by his son. In many parts of the nation both library and educational fields regard these methods as vital.

Also a typically "Leo" invention is his thematic index by which thousands of tunes may be rapidly recognized and identified.

OTHER HONORS

Professor Lewis has served as chairman of the board of examiners in music of the College Examination board; as vice-president of the Music Teachers' National Association; as chairman of the music committee of the Massachusetts Tercentenary in 1930, and as secretary of the North American branch of the National Education Association. He was a Fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, and a member of Phi Beta Kappa, Kappa Gamma Psi, Zeta Psi, Harvard Musical Association, and the University Club of Boston.

Besides his wife, Mrs. Carrie Bullard Lewis of Professors Row, Professor Lewis leaves a son, Philip B. Lewis; a daughter, Mrs. Barbara Lewis Robertson; and a great grandson, David Lewis Robertson, born last Memorial Day.

Scuttlebutt

[illegible]
SEP 9 - 1945

Right Off the Record

By Stewart Matter

THE most revolutionary advance in recording since the advent of the electrical process is the development of the first non-breakable, high fidelity record for home use, just announced by R. C. A. Victor, climaxing 11 years of research. It is a flexible disc, ruby-red in color, made of synthetic plastic and will first be available to the public in early October when a new recording of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" by the Boston Symphony under Kou[illegible] will be marketed in this new material.

While vinyl materials have been used for some time in the manufacture of transcription discs for radio broadcast and in V discs for the armed forces, they have hitherto been prohibitively costly for use in home phonograph records. The new formula results in a record that can be dropped or bent without breaking or cracking, has almost no surface sound and greatly enhances the fidelity of reproduction. This reduction in surface sound is made possible because the plastic compound does not require the mineral filler used in shellac records.

The vinyl discs are considerably lighter in weight than the shellac and will operate on any automatic changer and with any standard needle. Any change in reproducing equipment in the home is thus not necessary. When I received the plastic discs I immediately ran them through various tests and the results were amazing. Imagine a record which will not break or crack, one which has almost no surface noise, one which requires no change-over in equipment, and above all one which raises fidelity of reproduction to a level never before realized. It is likewise due to the absense of the rough mineral filler in the shellac which permits the positive impression of the most minute sound wave.

It is planned to release only newly recorded material on these new discs, which will be known as Red Seal de luxe records. The same work will be made available later on standard Red Seal shellac records at the regular price. These discs have been likened to limited editions of fine books and thus will bring music lovers still finer recorded performances than those possible on the regular shellac discs. This is actually the first major improvement in the disc itself, but it truly is one worth waiting for.

Other Methods Slower

Other companies have through their representatives informed us they, too, were to have "tremendous" advances soon, but this is the first actual example. Numerous inquiries have likewise come in from readers as to the possibility of recording on wire or on film in the near future. There has been a great amount of idle gossip on this score, and it all boils down to a bit of wishful thinking on the part of many. After carefully checking with a dozen of the country's major sound laboratories, I am assured that no such thing is in the offing. The dics record as we have it today and the present method of reproduction is here to stay for some time.

There definitely will be wire recording available immediately after the present emergency, but every concern which is incorparting this into its own units makes no claim for permanency through this medium. It is being designed for home recording and nothing more, for the wire will become demagnetized after a time. There is no question about this being an accepted mode of recording for permanence sometime in the future, but today and in the near future, at least, it still retains its own peculiar bugs.

Likewise, recording on film for the home is not feasible. No film has been developed which is either sufficiently transparent or fireproof for anything other than strictly professional use. Fireproof vaults maintained at an unvarying level of humidity and temperature are out of the question for the home. And film, as well as wire, would require a considerable change-over of equipment.

The new vinyl dics completely stops any argument in favor of wire or film except that of break in continuity, and it is only reasonable that with the tremendous resources of American science and research this problem will be oversome. This new discovery is revolutionary, a towering milestone in the history and development of home recording.

Seats Available for Sunday Symphonies

Subscription tickets are still available for the series of six concerts on Sunday afternoons at 3:30 by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This series will include concerts on Oct. 21, Dec. 30, Jan. 27, March 3, March 31 and April 21. Two of the programs will be conducted by Morton Gould and Sir Adrian Boult. The soloists to be heard in this series will include Raya Garbousova, 'cellist, and Efrem Zimbalist, violinist.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
SEP 11 1945

Boston Symphony Names Soloists For Coming Season

Guest soloists and guest conductors have been announced by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky as he begins his twenty-second successive year as conductor of the Boston Symphony.

The orchestra's out of town concerts include visits here in concerts of the Bushnell symphony series, as well as a week's autumn tour of the West.

Soloists Announced

A newcomer will be the Czech pianist, Rudolf Firksny. Pianists remembered from the past are Vladimir Horowitz and Alexander Brailowsky; violinsts, Albert Spalding, Yehudi Menuhin and Efram Zimbalist; 'cellists. Gregor Piatigorsky and Raya Garbousova. Serge Koussevitzky will shortly announce some new music of striking interest and importance to be performed in the course of the season. The major part of the program, of course, will be drawn from the established repertory of the past.

Guest Conductors

Although Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct throughout the season, there will be occasional guests. Igor Stravinsky will return after two years' absence to appear as composer and as conductor. New to these concerts will be Fritz Reiner, the conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra. Sir Adrian Boult, the leader of the British Broadcasting Corporation Orchestra in London, is to return to America and will conduct the orchestra as guest in mid-season. It was ten years ago that the English conductor last visited this country, when he conducted in Boston. Leonard Bernstein, the American conductor and composer, is also scheduled for an appearance.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE

NORWOOD, MASS.
MESSENGER
SEP 14 1945

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
NEWS
SEP 13 1945

Deep Interest in Symphony Concerts

It is reported from Symphony hall in Boston that a larger number of people than usual in the further outlying districts are applying for season tickets for the coming concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. This is accounted for in part by the release from war occupation and in part by the anticipated improvement in transportation conditions, which will make these concerts more accessible.

Serge Koussevitzky will open on Oct. 5 his twenty-second successive year as the orchestra's great conductor.

Special attention is called to the series of six Sunday afternoon concerts which were instituted last year. These concerts will be given approximately once a month, on Oct. 21, Dec. 30, Jan. 27, March 3, March 31 and April 21, at 3:30. Soloists announced at this time will be the 'cellist Raya Garbousova and the violinist Efrem Zimbalist. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct three of the concerts and three will be taken over by notable guests. Sir Adrian Boult, the conductor of the British Broadcasting Corporation orchestra in London, will return to America, after last visiting this country ten years ago. Leonard Bernstein, composer of serious and light music, has conducted this orchestra as guest in previous seasons and will return. He has just been appointed the regular conductor of the New York City Center Symphony orchestra. The other guest will be Morton Gould. Mr. Gould, first generally known by his career in radio, has appeared notably as conductor, and our orchestras (including this one) have performed his music.

The Boston Symphony orchestra's 65th season in Symphony hall will extend from Oct. 5 to April 26, with two series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts, and two series of six concerts each, one on Sunday afternoons and one on Monday evenings. Soloists for the longer series will include Vladimir Horowitz, piano; Albert Spalding, violin; Alexander Brailowsky, piano; Raya Garbousova, 'cello; Yehudi Menuhin, violin; Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cello; Rudolf Firkusny, piano, and Efrem Zimbalist, violin. The guest conductors will be Sir Adrian Boult, Fritz Reiner, Leonard Bernstein and Igor Stravinsky.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
SEP 13 1945

Boston Symphony to Open Its 65th Season Oct. 5

Serge [illegible] will open his 22nd successive year as the Boston Symphony orchestra's conductor, when the orchestra's 65th season in Symphony hall opens Oct. 5, to extend to April 26, with two series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts, and two series of six concerts each, one on Sunday afternoons and one on Monday evenings. Soloists will include Vladimir Horowitz, piano; Albert Spalding, violin; Alexander Brailowsky, piano; Raya Garbousova, 'cello; Yehudi Menuhin, violin; Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cello; Rudolf Firkusny, piano, and Efrem Zimbalist, violin. The guest conductors will be Sir Adrian Boult, Fritz Reiner, Leonard Bernstein and Igor Stravinsky.

ALLENTOWN, PA.
CHRONICLE
SEP 13 1945

On the RECORD

BRAHMS: SYMPHONY NO. 3 IN F, OP. 90, BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor. [illegible] of DM-[illegible] 4 12-in. records, $4.50 list.

RCA Victor presents, in its September Red Seal album releases, a new recording of the Brahms Symphony No. 3. The recording is the second Brahms Symphony recorded by the Bost Symphony orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky; the other is the "Symphony No. 4 in E Minor." He gives them both a superlative performance and the technical quality of the recording is excellent.

Although the Brahms first symphony is perhaps his most popular, one German critic remarked of the Third Symphony that it "is Brahms' most typical, personal and important symphonic work." Certainly the third movement of this symphony, which has been called the most famous movement in all of the four Brahms symphonies, is the essence of romanticism in music.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
SEP 23 1945

New Opera Due in U. S.

Eddie Dowling and Louis J. Singer, producers of "The Glass Menagerie," have acquired the American rights to "Peter Grimes," a contemporary opera by Benjamin Britten and Montague Slater, which had its world premiere in London on June 5, receiving high critical acclaim.

Britten, the composer, is a protege and student of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and is well known for his several symphonies and instrumental compositions.

Slater authored the libretto. The work is the result of a fellowship given by the Koussevitsky Music Foundation to Britten.

The locale of "Peter Grimes" is a fishing and shipbuilding hamlet. Peter Grimes, is a fisherman, ambitious, far-seeing, impetuous and hemmed-in. He meets a tragic end after causing the death of two young boys he kidnapped and made to slave on his fishing trips.

In addition to 16 principals, the presentation calls for an orchestra of 56, a chorus of 60, and a ballet of 48.

FREDERICKSBURG, VA.
FREE LANCE-STAR

SEP 12 1945

PLATTER CHATTER

By DOVIE A. REYNOLDS

It's Here! A Phonograph Record That Can Be Bent or Dropped Without Damage.

SURPRISE! SURPRISE! We almost couldn't believe our eyes when we got that package containing a phonograph record and marked in big black type "CAN BE DROPPED". We avidaly tore open the wrappings to see what new piece of magic was being turned loose from Victor. And there it was . . . the new unbreakable plastic record. It's light as a feather and bends like an old shoe and that isn't all. You can hold it up to the light and see right through the ruby-red plastic.

You can well imagine that we didn't waste any time in getting the disc on our spinner to listen to "Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" as recorded by Boston Symhony Orchestra on this [redacted] disc. [redacted] is when we REALLY began to appreciate this new kind of recording, for even on our audition machine, using a needle that had been grinding out Red Seals and Pops for goodness knows how long, surface noise was practically non existent. And that, as you platter fans well know, is news in anybody's recreation room.

J. W. Murray, general manager of the RCA Victor Record Division, says its the greatest improvement in home phonograph records in 45 years . . . and although we haven't been messing around with flipovers for quite that long . . . we will go along with him on that statement

---

Herald Sept [illegible]

Symphonic Month For Boston Orchestra

A musically eventful October in Symphony Hall is promised by Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Koussevitsky will open on the fifth of next month his 22nd successive season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His opening program will end with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, which the conductor has chosen for its timeliness as retrospective of war and final victory and as in keeping with thoughts of the peace to come. The music of Beethoven will also open this program (the Overture to "Leonore" No. 3). Aaron Copland's Suite from his Ballet "Appalachian Spring" will have its first performance here and Prokofieff's Suite from "Romeo and Juliet" will be revived. Music to be heard for the first time in Boston in the remaining Friday and Saturday programs of the month will be two interludes from Menotti's opera "The Island God," lately performed by the Metropolitan Opera Company, the Third Symphony of Bohuslav Martinu, which was written for this orchestra and is to have its first performance, and the Second Symphony by the Soviet composer Kabalevsky. The composer Pescara will be first heard at these concerts when his "Commedia del Arte" will have its first performance. Aurelio Pescara was born in Spezia, Italy, in 1900 and came to America about 20 years ago. Also on these programs will be Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, Mozart's "Parisian" Symphony (K. 297) and Adagio and Fugue for strings (K. 546), the First Symphony and "The Swan of Tuonela" by Sibelius, the Symphonie Fantastique by Berlioz, Rimsky-Korsakov's Capriccio Espagnol and the second piano concerto by Rachmaniofi.

NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER

SEP 16 1945

'PETER GRIMES'

SUCCESSFULLY SUNG IN LONDON, DUE IN N. Y.

Eddie Dowling and Louis J. Singer, producers of "The Glass Menagerie," have acquired the American rights to "Peter Grimes," a contemporary opera by Benjamin Britten and Montague Slater, which had its world premiere in London, on June 5, of this year, receiving the highest critical acclaim.

Benjamin Britten, the composer, is a protege and student of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and is well known for his several symphonies, as well as instrumental compositions. Montague Slater is the author of the libretto. The work is the result of a fellowship given by the Koussevitsky Music Foundation to Benjamin Britten.

The plot of "Peter Grimes" finds its locale in a fishing and shipbuilding hamlet, with the principals enmeshed in the community's activities. Peter Grimes, bearer of the title role, is a fisherman who is ambitious, far-seeing, impetuous and hemmed-in. He meets a tragic end after having caused the death of two young boys kidnaped by him and made to slave on his fishing trips.

Dowling and Singer are discussing with Dr. Koussevitsky and the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra an association in the presentation of the production. Dr. Herbert Graf, at present stage director of the Metropolitan Opera Company, is being considered for the staging of the work.

In addition to 16 principals the presentation calls for an orchestra of 56 musicians, a chorus of 60, and a corps de ballet of 48.

Dowling and Singer are hopeful that Koussevitsky will conduct the American premiere and that Leonard Bernstein, another student and protege of Koussevitsky, will become the permanent conductor.

It is expected that the directors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will formulate plans soon for the Berkshire Music Festival, for the coming season, and it is hoped that the American premiere of "Peter Grimes" will take place at Tanglewood, Mass.

Thereafter, the opera will open in New York and a tour of the larger cities of the American continent is being planned to follow the New York engagement.

Sept 16
[illegible] Times

EVENTS IN

DMITRI SHOSTAKOVICH'S recently completed Ninth symphony is "gay and whimsical," according to a report from Robert Magidoff, NBC Moscow correspondent. It has five movements, but lasts only twenty-five minutes and has been described by Shostakovich as "a lark."

The Soviet composer originally intended his Ninth to complete the war trilogy which began with the Seventh ("Leningrad") and Eighth symphonies, both of which are monumental works of over an hour's duration. Instead the Ninth, reports Magidoff, is an intermezzo separating the two huge symphonies from the final section, which presumably will appear as the Tenth.

The composer said that he made three attempts during the year to complete the trilogy, with the final work depicting the spirit of victory. He discarded the results each time, and wrote the present work instead. It will be given its first performance in the U.S.S.R. next month.

Shostakovich played a piano version of the new work for Magidoff and a few friends, and told them: "It's something musicians will love to play and critics will delight in blasting."

FORT WAYNE, IND.
JOURNAL-GAZETTE

SEP 13 1945

Fond Hope of Record Fans Now Realized

BY WALTER A. HANSEN
(News-Sentinel Music Critic)

For many years collectors of phonograph records have been asking, "Will it ever be possible to manufacture nonbreakable discs?" The most of them, I suppose, were sure that their fond dream would never come true. "It's utterly useless," they said, "even to think of a development so desirable and so wonderful." I confess that I, too, was one of the skeptics; but my skepticism was shattered a few days ago when I received, examined, played and tested an advance copy of one of the new ruby-red, translucent discs made of vinyl resin plastic. One could ruin the record by mauling it with a hammer or by jumping up and down on it; but disc collectors do not, as a rule, resort to such queer practices. Eleven years of research have gone into the development of the material. The first album of the De Luxe records will be available in October. It will contain a superb performance of Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky (Victor Album DV 1). Since the new plastic compound need not be reinforced with the mineral filler used in shellac records, there is far less surface sound. Furthermore, the fidelity is higher than ever before, and the discs are much lighter in weight. Present facilities do not permit large-scale production of the nonbreakable discs. Therefore the shellac discs will not be discontinued. The De Luxe pressings will be comparable to particularly fine editions of books.

Summer Discs Reviewed

The following recorded performances—all engraved on shellac discs—have come to my attention during the summer months:

Leopold Stokowski and the New York City Symphony Orchestra give a tonally beautiful exposition of Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" (Victor Album 1006). There is marked intenseness in the reading.

Artur Rubinstein, a great master of the piano, plays Cesar Franck's "Prelude, Chorale and Fugue" with the most meticulous attention to every detail and with a thorough grasp of the sublime poetic beauty contained in the work (Victor Album 1004).

Those who enjoy the music of George Gershwin's "Porgy and Bess" will find much to please them in the symphonic picture for orchestra which Robert Russell Bennett composed on the basis of the fine folk opera. It is played with highly praiseworthy artistry by the Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra under Fabien Sevitzky (Victor Album 799). Jesus Maria Sanroma, the able pianist, presents a spine-tingling performance of Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" in conjunction with the Boston "Pops" Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler (Victor Album SP 3).

Recordrama Made

A truly magnificent reading of some of the finest portions of Modeste Moussorgsky's "Boris Godounoff" is contained in a recently issued recordrama album (Victor Album 1000). The selections are presented by Alexander Kipnis, basso, with the Victor Symphony Orchestra and Chorus under Nicolai Berezowsky. Ilya Tamarin, tenor, sings the role of Prince Shouisky. Pipnis' artistry is impressive and remarkably sensitive, the orchestra plays exceedingly well, and the singing of the chorus reveals the fine ability of Robert Shaw, choral director.

Richard Crooks, the eminent tenor, is heard to excellent advantage in J. Airlie Dix's "The Trumpeter" and in the Negro spiritual, "Were You There?" with the Victor Orchestra under Maximilian Pilzer (Victor 11-8814). He reveals the same impressive ability in renditions of Fay Foster's "The Americans Come" and in Felix Fourdrain's "A Cossack's Prayer for His Horse" (Victor 10-1150).

Jose Iturbi's performance of Chopin's "Polonaise in A Flat Major, Op. 53, No. 6" (Victor 11-8843) has its merits; but I greatly prefer previous recordings of the brilliant composition made by Artur Rubinstein and Josef Lhevinne.

Jeanette MacDonald, soprano, with an orchestra conducted by Mr. Pilzer, sings the "Italian Street Song" from Victor Herbert's "Naughty Marietta" and a "Summer Serenade" based on a tune from Herbert's "Sweethearts" in a truly delightful manner (Victor 10-1134). It is safe to say that many will derive much joy and edification from her pleasing renditions of six well-known religious songs (Victor Album 996). She sings Mason's "Nearer, My God, to Thee," Monk's "Abide With Me," Bizet's "Agnus Dei," Adams' "The Holy City," Franck's "O Lord Most Holy" ("Panis Angelicus") and Steffe's "Battle Hymn of the Republic."

Globe Sept 16

New Music to Be Played in October by Symphony

Serge Koussevitzky will enter on Oct. 5 his 22d season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His opening program will end with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, which the conductor has chosen for its timeliness as retrospective of war and final victory and in keeping with thoughts of the peac to come. Beethoven will also open this program with the Overture "Leonore" No. 3. Aaron Copland's Suite from his Ballet "Appalachian Spring" will have its first performance here and Prokofieff's Suite from "Romeo and Juliet" will be revived.

Music to be heard for the first time in Boston in the remaining Friday and Saturday programs of the month will be Two Interludes from Menotti's Opera "The Island God," the Third Symphony of Bohuslav Martinu, which was written for this orchestra and is to have its first performance, and the Second Symphony by the Soviet composer Kabalevsky.

The composer Pescara will be first heard at these concerts when his "Commedia del Arte" will have its first performance. Aurelio Pescara was born in Spezia, Italy, in 1900 and came to America about 20 years ago. Also on these programs will be Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, Mozart's "Parisian" Symphony (K. 297) and Adagio and Fugue for Strings (K. 546), the First Symphony and "The Swan of Tuonela" by Sibelius, the Symphonie Fantastique by Berlioz, Rimsky-Korsakov's Capriccio Espagnol and the Second Piano Concerto by Rachmaninoff, with Alexander Brailowsky as soloist.

The Boston Symphony will give another series of six concerts on Sunday afternoons in Symphony Hall, on Oct. 21, Dec. 30, Jan. 27, March 3, March 31 and April 21, at 3:30. Soloists will include cellist Raya Garbousova and violinist Efrem Zimbalist. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct three of the concerts and three will be taken over by notable guests, Sir Adrian Boult, the conductor of the British Broadcasting Corporation orchestra in London; Leonard Bernstein and Morton Gould.

Sept 13
[illegible]

Boston Symphony Season Opens Friday, October 5

On Friday and Saturday, October 5 and 6, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitsky, will open in Symphony Hall its Sixty-Fifth Season. Dr. Koussevitsky will then begin his twenty-second successive year as the orchestra's famous conductor. The season to come will continue through April, 1946, with twenty-four pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts in Symphony Hall, likewise six Monday evening and six Sunday afternoon concerts. The Monday series will begin on October 8, and the Sunday series on October 21. The orchestra will continue its periodical visits to New York and cities en route and will make a week's autumn tour of the West.

The soloists to appear in the Boston concerts are now announced. A newcomer at these concerts will be the Czech pianist, Rudolph Firkuany. Pianists remembered from the past are Vladimir Horowitz and Alexander Brailowsky. The violinists will include Albert Spalding, Yehudi Mennhin, and Efrem Zimbalist. There will be two 'cellists, Gregor Piatigorsky and Raya Garbousova.

Serge Koussevitsky will shortly announce some new music of striking interest and importance to be performed in the course of the season. The major part of the programs, of course, will be drawn from the established repertory of the past. Although Dr Koussevitsky will conduct the orchestra throughout the season, there will be occasional guests. Igor Stravinsky will return after two years' absence to appear as composer and conductor, likewise presenting music other than his own. A newcomer to these concerts will be Fritz Reiner, the conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, who has appeared many times in other cities but so far not in Boston. Sir Adrian Boult, the leader of the British Broadcasting Corporation Orchestra in London, is to return to America and will conduct the orchestra as guest in mid-season. It was ten years ago (January, 1935) that the English conductor last visited this country, when he visited Boston and conducted here. Leonard Bernstein, the American conductor and composer, will lead the orchestra as guest.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

SEP 17 1945

Berkshire Music Festival May Get Premiere

Berkshire music festival audiences may get the first performance next season of a new kind of opera if Eddie Dowling and Louis J. Singer succeed in completing plans to produce "Peter Grimes," the joint work of Benjamin Britten and Montague Slater. Mr Dowling and Mr Singer are said to be conferring with Dr Serge Koussevitsky in regard to it. Handled ~~more~~ [illegible] dramatic than operatic presentation it calls for 16 principals, a chorus of 60, orchestra of 56 pieces and a ballet of 48. Since Mr Britten is a protege of Dr Koussevitsky the Berkshire premiere is a definite possibility. London already has heard the work.

Symphony Season Starting Soon

Globe Sept 18

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will open his 22d season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on October 5 with a program which will end with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. The opening program will also include Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Prokofieff's Suite from "Romeo and Juliet" and Aaron Copeland's Suite from his ballet "Appalachian Song," which will here have its first Boston performance.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

SEP 19 1945

Committee Plans Concert At Museum

Many Assisting With Arrangements For Coolidge Sonata

A large committee met yesterday at the Pittsfield Community Music School to further the concert Sept. 29 at the Berkshire Museum when the first public performance of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge's sonata for oboe and piano will be given. The artists for this work will be Lukas Foss, pianist, and Louis Speyer, oboist, both of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Besides the sonata, the program will comprise two trios for oboe, piano and cello and a composition by Mr. Foss, conductor, and now resident pianist of the Boston Orchestra. Jean Bedetti, Boston Orchestra, cellist, will be the third artist.

Tickets may be obtained at the Music School, the Curtis Hotel, the Lenox Library, England Brothers and the Gold Shop or from the following committee members:

Mrs. F. M. Myers, Miss Anne Kelly, Mrs. Donald McPherson, Mrs. Alan J. Blau, Peter Hunt, Mrs. Stanley P. Benton, Mrs. George W. Edman, Mrs. Engelbert Krisheis, George Norton, Mrs. Zenas C. Colt, Mrs. Grenville Willis, Mrs. Samuel G. Colt Sr., Mrs. William A. Whittlesey, Mrs. E. H. Acton, Mrs. Irving C. Bullock, Mrs. Francis DeL. Cunningham, Miss Margaret Hall, Miss Anna Peck, Mrs. Herman Fink, Carl Germeck, Rev. Floyd L. Roberts, Mrs. Priscilla E. Fitch, Miss Marie Sylvester, Mrs. George P. Hunt, Mrs. Leon Mohill, Franklin C. Pillsbury, Miss Franc Epping, James C. Morton, Walter Powell, Miss Margaret Kaliher, Mrs. Owen Johnson, Miss Inez Eldridge, Herbert C. Dunkley and Thomas F. Plunkett.

Symphony Announces Plans for October

Her Sept 23

Serge Koussevitzky's plans for October, the first month of the pending season of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, promise an eventful season to come. The First Symphony of Sibelius and "The Swan of Tuonela," announced for the second program, will be followed through the season by the principal symphonies and other works of the Finnish composer in honor of his 80th birthday, which will take place this year (Dec. 8). New music by Copland, Menotti, Pescara, Martinu and Kabalevsky in October give further promise of a musically important season. The first program, Oct. 5 and 6, will consist of Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture, the "Eroica" Symphony, Copland's Suite from "Appalachian Spring" and the Second Suite from Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet." The soloists of the season will include Alexander Brailowsky (who is to play in October), Vladimir Horowitz, Albert Spalding, Raya Garbousova, Yehudi Menuhin, Gregor Piatigorsky, Rudolf Firkusny and Efrem Zimbalist. Guest conductors will be Sir Adrian Bout, Fritz Reiner, Leonard Bernstein and Igor Stravinsky.

The series of six Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall will begin on Oct. 21. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct three of the concerts, and the other three will be conducted by Sir Adrian Boult, Leonard Bernstein and Morton Gould. Soloists will include Raya Garbousova, the Russian 'cellist, and Efrem Zimbalist, the violinist.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

SEP 20 1945

Sir Adrian, conductor of the BBC orchestra in London, returns to this country just 10 years after he last conducted the Boston symphony. He is expected to appear about midseason.

Of the 30 concerts to be heard, 24 will come from Symphony Hall in Boston, five from Hunter College, New York City, and one, Dec. 8, from Milwaukee, the home of the sponsors. On that night the orchestra will commemorate the eightieth anniversary of Jan Sibelius, eldest contemporary composer.

The broadcasts will be heard from 8:30 to 9:30 p. m. this year, an improvement over the two former seasons, when the first half of the two hour concert was aired. According to Dr. Koussevitzky, the latter half provides for more presentations of soloists and allows the radio audience to enjoy the natural climax of each concert.

* * *

Guess Who's Back

Yes, George and Gracie are at it again, or will be Thursday night at 7, WTMJ, with Meredith Willson for "perfection in musical direction" and Bill Goodwin as announcer (despite all rumors to the contrary). Les Paul, electric guitarist who has been turning out the

---

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

SEP 23 1945

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PLAY 'EROICA' AS SEASON OPENS

Dr Koussevitsky Says Beethoven Work 'Epitomizes Heroes of All Times'—First Program October 6

Dr Serge Koussevitsky once again steps to the podium of the Boston Symphony orchestra Saturday night, October 6, to conduct the opening program of a new season from Symphony hall where the broadcasts will originate over American stations.

For the opening number inaugurating the new season, Dr Koussevitsky has chosen Beethoven's "Eroica," No 3 symphony. A year ago he used this same number as his opening piece in a concert dedicated to the "heroes of all nations." In explaining his reason for selecting this number again as his opening choice, Dr Koussevitsky said that to him it "epitomizes the heroes of all time."

"We still have to think of the heroes of the past, present and future," he added. "The first movement is music of victory achieved through heroic valor — the expression of tremendous will power. The funeral march is a march only in outward form. It is a requiem for heroism—the greatest requiem in all instrumental music. The scherzo and finale are no longer retrospective. This is music courageous and joyous where the spirit is triumphant. It deeply inspires the kind of conviction which will make possible a peaceable world."

This season observes the anniversaries of two renowned composers. The 175th anniversary of Beethoven's birth occurs Sunday, December 16, the day following the Boston Symphony broadcasts from Symphony hall, at which Dr Koussevitsky pays tribute to the composer.

Jan Sibelius, eldest contemporary composer, observes his 80th birthday December 8 as Dr Koussevitsky conducts the orchestra in a program of tribute from Milwaukee, Wis. The "Second Symphony" of the Finnish composer has been scheduled for this program.

Sibelius's works have been further introduced to this country under the baton of Dr Koussevitsky, who during one season, conducted the seven symphonies in chronological order. The maestro, in 1935, visited the Finnish composer who was celebrating his 70th birthday at the time and opened a Sibelius festival at Helsinki which the composer attended. The Finnish government awarded Dr Koussevitsky a medal and citation for his musical endeavors in behalf of Finnish music at the festival.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

SEP 23 1945

Koussevitzky In 22d Season

Boston Symphony Special Events Told

A musically eventful October in Symphony Hall is promised by Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky will open on the 5th of next month his 22d successive season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchesra. His opening program will end with Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, which the conductor has chosen for its timeliness as retrospective of war and final victory and as in keeping with thoughts of the peace to come. The music of Beethoven will also open this program (the Overture to "Leonore" No. 3).

Aaron Copland's Suite from his Ballet "Appalachian Spring" will have its first performance here, and Prokofieff's Suite from "Romeo and Juliet" will be revived. Music to be heard for the first time in Boston in the remaining Friday and Saturday programs of the month will be Two Interludes from Menotti's Opera "The Island God," lately performed by the Metropolitan Opera Company, the Third Symphony of Bohuslav Martinu, which was written for this orchestra and is to have its first performance, and the Second Symphony by the Soviet composer Kabalevsky.

The composer Pescara will be first heard at these concerts when his "Commedia del Arte" will have its first performance. Aurelio Pescara was born in Spezia, Italy, in 1900 and came to America about 20 years ago. Also on these programs will be Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, Mozart's "Parisian" Symphony (K. 297) and Adagio and Fugue for Strings (K. 546), the First Symphony and "The Swan of Tuonela" by Sibelius, the Symphonie Fantatisque by Berlioz, Rimsky-Korsakov's Capriccio Espagnol, and the Second Piano Concerto by Rachmaninoff, with Alexander Brailowsky as soloist.

The soloists to appear in the Boston concerts are now announced. A newcomer at these concerts will be the Czech pianist, Rudolf Firkusny. Pianists remembered from the past are Vladimir Horowitz and Alexander Brailowsky. The violinists will include Albert Spalding, Yehudi Menuhin and Efrem Zimbalist. There will be two 'cellists, Gregor Piatigorsky and Raya Garbousova.

Igor Stravinsky will conduct a program, and other guest conductors will be Fritz Reiner, Sir Adrian Boult and Leonard Bernstein.

Out-of-Towners Go to Symphony

It is reported from Symphony Hall that an unusually large number of patrons from outside Boston are applying for season tickets to the Boston Symphony concert series. This is doubtless due in part to the improved transportation situation.

The Sunday afternoon concerts, which were instituted last year, promise to be very popular. Serge Koussevitsky will conduct three of them, and the other three will have as guest conductors Sir Adrian Boult of London, Leonard Bernstein and Morton Gould.

Glo. Sept 23 1945

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

SEP 23 1945

Recorded Music: Brahms' No. 3

BRAHMS: SYMPHONY NO. 3 IN F, OP. 90. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is one of the most satisfactory recordings your reviewer has yet heard, and a remarkable achievement both from the standpoint of superlative performance and exceptionally fine mechanical reproduction. The playing is of the usual grand manner of the Boston Symphony, the epic and romantic qualities of Brahms' expression being revealed with the sensitiveness and care which Koussevitsky bestows. The orchestra sounds brilliant, opulent, poignant, romantic, as the conductor wishes. Without qualification this album should be acquired. (Victor, four 12-inch records).

Richard Strauss: Suite from Rosenkavalier. Eugene Goossens and Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. Antal Dorati, distinguished ballet conductor, has arranged this suite from one of the most popular and delightful of modern operas, hitting the musical high spots. It is lovely music, played colorfully and recording is quite satisfactory. (Victor, three 12-inch records).

Gretry: Cephale et Procris (Airs de Ballet). Desire DeFauuw and Chicago Symphony Orchestra. Clean and spirited playing of captivating music. (Victor, 12-inch single).

Villa-Lobos: Bachianas Brasileiras No. 5. Bidu Sayao, soprano, with eight celli and bass, conducted by Heitor Villa-Lobos. This is a thoroughly enjoyable item. The name won't attract, but hear it and buy it. The soprano's voice is lovely, as is the music.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

SEP 23 1945

Records in Review:

Brahms' Third in New Album Of Unusual Technical Merit

BRAHMS, Johannes (1833-1897): Symphony No. 3 in F Major, Opus 90. Played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. Victor Album 1007, four 12-inch disks, eight sides. $4.50.

For lifelike quality this recording is one of Victor's finest achievements. And what you get, of course, is the incomparable Boston Symphony with notable balance of its mellowness, brilliance, power and tenderness. Obviously Victor has reached a postwar advance in recording technique.

Serge Koussevitzky's reading of Brahms' F Major Symphony is rather individual. He stresses the heroic quality and the tonal pageantry less than the composer's sturm and drang. He approaches the work as if it were the intensely personal message of Tchaikovsky's Fourth. This is especially evident in the dripping phraseology of the andante as Koussevitzky takes it. The allegro finale is also deliberate and soft-spoken by traditional standards.

This is not to say that the conductor has breached good judgment or good taste. It is merely his conception of the F Major as soul-wrenching and frequently agonized expression of Nineteenth Century romanticism.

Weingartner's famous Columbia album with the London Philharmonic, Bruno Walter's Victor set with the Vienna Philharmonic, the recent Stock-Chicago recording by Columbia and the routine Victor album by Kindler and the National Symphony of Washington are competitors on the market. Weingartner, Stock and Walter are more dramatic than Koussevitzky.

No other set, however, can stand up to this new one for range and fidelity.

—JOHN ROSENFIELD.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

SEP 24 1945

Lenox

Koussevitzky Leaves for Boston Tomorrow

LENOX—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will close his summer home, Seranak, on Bald Head Mountain tomorrow and will leave for Boston to prepare for the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts at Symphony Hall the first week in October. He will be accompanied by his niece and secretary, Miss Olga Naumoff.

Globe Sept 23

Koussevitzky to Honor Sibelius' 80th Birthday

Serge Koussevitzky's plans for October, the first month of the 65th season of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall, promise an eventful season to come. The First Symphony of Sibelius and "The Swan of Tuonela," announced for the second program, will be followed through the season by the principal symphonies and other works of the Finnish composer in honor of his 80th birthday, which will take place this year (Dec. 8).

New music by Copland, Menotti Pescara, Martinu and Kabalevsky in October give further promise of a musically important season The first program, Oct. 5 and 6 will consist of Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture, the "Eroica" Symphony; Copeland's Suite from "Appalachian Spring" and the Second Suite from Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet."

The soloists of the season will include Alexander Brailowsky (in October), Vladimir Horowitz, Albert Spalding, Raya Garbousova, Yehudi Menuhin, Gregor Piatigorsky, Rudolf Firkusny and Efrem Zimbalist. Guest conductors will be Sir Adrian Boult, Fritz Reiner, Leonard Bernstein and Igor Stravinsky.

The series of six Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall will begin on Oct. 21. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct three of the concerts, and the other three will be conducted by Sir Adrian Boult, Leonard Bernstein and Morton Gould. Soloists will include Raya Garbousova, the Russian cellist, and Efrem Zimbalist, violinist.

9/21/45

LETTERS TO THE SUN

McCormack as Artist

An Appreciative Word From His Concert Manager.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SUN—Sir: Your splendid editorial article on John McCormack last Thursday was quite the best thing that has been written about him since his death. I want to thank you for it. Most of the critics today cannot remember McCormack's great days, 1913-1926—they were not old enough. The voice began to fail at 40, but during those great years, thirteen of them, he was not only one of the greatest artists of our time, but certainly the most popular singer. I inaugurated the McCormack concert tours and managed him for these thirteen years, and heard 90 per cent of these concerts. The "real miracle" that you mention proves that the general public are good judges and cannot be fooled. You were not quite right in your quotation, which seems to have come from McCormack himself. No program ever contained more than one group of Irish songs. The programs were made up in four groups. The first, Handel, Beethoven and Mozart. The second, German lieder, some in English. The third, modern American songs and English classics. The fourth, the Irish group. Occasionally by request, he would either give an aria for an encore, or would put it in with his first group.

During the thirteen years, John McCormack drew over $5,000,000 at the box office in concerts. In San Francisco alone, we played five consecutive tours, giving two concerts, each time, within fifteen days, to receipts that averaged over $35,000 for the two concerts. They would vary a few hundred dollars according to the standees. All these could not have been Irish. The Irish were very proud and happy when he sang Handel, Beethoven and Mozart.

When he first sang with the Boston Symphony there was, of course, tremendous interest created. I think Dr. Muck was not altogether happy over the announcement. In fact, with 72 per cent Irish in Boston, we managed to get the date in spite of Dr. Muck. But, after the rehearsal, this great maestro turned to me and said: "This is among the finest Mozart singing of my time. I am happily surprised."

Seven or eight years ago, on my last trip to Europe, I met Dr. Felix Weingartner in Salzburg. I had not seen him since the days of the Boston Opera twenty years previous, when John McCormack sang Don Ottavio in "Don Giovanni." Dr. Weingartner greeted me, as follows: "We gave the finest 'Don Giovanni' ever given in your country, and John McCormack is the only tenor I have ever heard who really sang the music of Don Ottavio."

The reason for all this is that John McCormack was a very fine musician. In fact, a very intelligent musician, playing both the piano and the violin. I know his good friend, Fritz Kreisler, would bear me out on this. As to John's own attitude toward his fellow artists, his choice of tenors was expressed quite often to me personally and at least one time in a public interview. He considered Edward Johnson from every standpoint, the best tenor of our time, judged by his voice, his intelligence, his personality and musicianship and his great art. John really meant it. He was a great friend of Caruso's, who was probably the greatest of operatic tenors, but not a great musician. McCormack was unquestionably the most loyal singer and the hardest worker. Possibly that is the reason for the "real miracle" you mention. He always had four new programs prepared every season, and was willing to learn new numbers for the various orchestras. I doubt if we will have his equal, ever.

CHARLES L. WAGNER.

New York.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

SEP 30 1945

This is the third consecutive year that the Boston Symphony will be heard under the same sponsor. Incidentally, it is the 65th season of the orchestra. Thirty broadcasts will be presented during the season, in which four guest conductors will direct. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, starting his 22nd year as conductor of the ensemble, will open the series with Beethoven's "Eroica" (No. 3.) symphony. Gene Hamilton continues as announcer-commentator.

Continued from Page Eight

LA PORTE, IND.
HERALD-ARGUS

SEP 25 1945

* * *

The Boston Symphony opens on ~~Oct. 5 under~~ Serge Koussevitzky. Besides 60 concerts in Boston, the orchestra will make a tour of the Middle West and visit the usual eastern cities. Guest conductors will include Sir Adrian Boult, of the British Broadcasting Corporation Orchestra; Igor Stravinsky, Fritz Reiner, Leonard Bernstein and Morton Gould.

* * *

The Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra under Eugene Goossens also opens on Oct. 5. The orchestra has scheduled 52 concerts at home and 43 on tour. Leonard Bernstein will make his first Cincinnati appearance as a guest conductor. Soloists include such names as Horowitz, Kreisler, Iturbi, Rubinstein, etc.

* * *

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

SEP 26 1945

Mrs. Coolidge To Hear Her Composition

Foss, Pianist, Well Know Artist In Berkshire

Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, whose sonata for oboe and piano will receive its first public hearing at the Berkshire Museum Saturday night, will be in the audience, it was announced today. Mrs. Coolidge wrote the sonata after she had reached 80 years of age, a feat which would prove formidable for one less than half her years.

The sonata, along with other chamber music works, will be performed by an exceptionally able group of musicians: Lukas Foss, pianist, conductor and composer, and Louis Speyer, oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, play~~ing the Coolidge work, and~~ Jean Bedetti, Boston Orchestra first cellist joining in other parts of the program.

Mr. Foss is one of America's younger musicians. He first came to public attention as a student of conducting at the Berkshire Music Center several years ago. He was born in 1922 in Europe and has studied with Paul Hindemith; Julius Herford, Serge Koussevitzky and Fritz Reiner. He studied first at the Paris Conservatory and later graduated from the Curtis Institute of Music.

His composition "Suite to the Tempest of Shakespeare" won him a Pulitzer scholarship in 1942 and his work "The Prairie" gained him the Guggenheim Fellowship in 1945. At present he is working on commissions for the Cleveland Orchestra, the League of Composers and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. He is now the official resident pianist of the Boston Orchestra.

Foss was heard in Berkshire most recently at the Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood when he played a Mozart concerto with the Boston Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

SEP 16 1945

PLANS FOR THE ORCHESTRA SEASON

THE season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, opening Oct. 5, ~~will comprise~~ twenty-four pairs of Friday-Saturday concerts, six Monday night concerts and six Sunday afternoon concerts in Boston, a tour of the Middle West, six concerts in Cambridge, Mass., and the usual visits to New York, Brooklyn and Providence. Guest conductors will include Sir Adrian Boult, leader of the British Broadcasting Corporation Orchestra in London; Igor Stravinsky, Fritz Reiner, Leonard Bernstein and Morton Gould. Among the soloists engaged are Rudolf Firkusny, Vladimir Horowitz, Alexander Brailowsky, Albert Spalding, Yehudi Menuhin, Efrem Zimbalist, Gregor Piatigorsky and Raya Garbousova. On the program of the first pair of concerts Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and "Leonora" overture, No. 3, will be performed in recognition of those who brought about the war victory.

The Philadelphia Orchestra, under Eugene Ormandy, will give twenty-eight pairs of regular subscription concerts, ten Monday night concerts, five youth concerts and five concerts for children, this season in its home city. Pierre Monteux, Bruno Walter and Saul Caston will appear as guest conductors and the list of batonists includes Alexander Hilsberg, the orchestra's associate conductor. Fourteen soloists are listed. Of the ten concerts in New York to be presented in Carnegie Hall Mr. Ormandy will direct eight and the other two will be led respectively by Mr. Walter and Mr. Monteux. Novelties in the New York series will include Martinu's Fourth Symphony, which will be played here following its world première by the orchestra in Philadelphia; Zimbalist's "Portrait of an Artist," and Dubensky's arrangement of a Concerto Grosso of Leclair. The Philadelphia concerts start Sept. 28 and the New York series Oct. 2.

The Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, under Eugene Goossens, opens its season Oct. 5 and 6, with a program featuring the Brahms sextet for strings in G in a transcription by Mr. Goossens, and a Victory Fanfare, also written by the conductor. Twenty pairs of concerts are scheduled, including fourteen afternoon and six Sunday afternoon concerts on the matinee series and twenty concerts on the Saturday night series. Sixteen guest artists will be presented. These include Leonard Bernstein, who makes his first Cincinnati appearance as guest conductor and piano soloist. Others are Horowitz, Kreisler, Iturbi, Rubinstein, Francescatti, Serkin, Steber, Pinza, Melchior, MacDonald, Levant, Crooks, Travers and Argentinita. The season's activities will be completed by forty-three concerts on tour, five Young People's concerts and seven Pop concerts.

Fourteen midweek concerts, twelve Sunday night concerts and five concerts for young people will be presented this season by the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, under Reginald Stewart. In addition, the orchestra will appear in Annapolis, Washington, D. C., and twenty other cities. To meet its extended schedule the season has been lengthened to eighteen weeks, instead of the former sixteen. Soloists to appear are Alexander Brailowsky, Witold Malcuzynski, Adele Marcus and Pasquale Tallarico, pianists; Yehudi Menuhin; Albert Spalding and Ilya Scholnik, and Isaac Stern, violinists; Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist; Helen Traubel and Rose Bampton, sopranos, and Joachim Heinz, tenor.

THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

SEP 28 1945

* * *

The annual "Boston Symphony Orchestra" broadcasts over Station KGO and the American Broadcasting Company will be heard at a new time this season, from 6:30 to 7:30 p.m., it was announced today by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. The opening broadcast will be tomorrow.

"I am happy," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "that the new time has been selected. This will mean that we shall be able to bring the natural climax of each Saturday night's program to the radio audience. It is something that we have been considering for some time. However, until this season, it has been impossible to do it."

(The Saturday night concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are of two hours' duration. In former seasons, the first half of each concert was broadcast During the 1945-46 season the second half of each program will be aired.)

"The new time also assures us the opportunity of reaching a still larger audience," Dr. Koussevitzky continued. "For example, listeners on the Pacific Coast now will not be obliged to change their engagements in order to hear the programs. As a matter of fact, the concerts now will be at a time when listeners normally are at home. Thus, we take advantage of the time difference.

* * *

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

SEP 26 1945

BELA BARTOK COMPOSER, DIES

NEW YORK (U.P.) — Bela Bartok, 64, Hungarian composer and authority on musical folklore, died today in West Side hospital. He had been ill for some time. His most recent compositions included "Concerto for Orchestra" which was presented by the Boston Symphony orcnestra last year ~~and was described as~~ one of the most important contemporary symphonies. He lectured in the music schools of Columbia university and Harvard university. Barook, born in Hungary in 1881, came to the United States as a voluntary refugee after the Nazis took over control of his country.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER

SEP 29 1945

Koussevitzky Interviewed on WJZ

A special program, Visit with Dr. Koussevitzky, will be presented by WJZ-ABC, on Saturday, Sept. 29, from 7:15 to 7:30 p. m., EWT. The program will be an informal interview with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who weekly will conduct the Boston Symphmony over WJZ-ABC beginning Saturday, Oct. 6 from 9:30 to 10:30 p. m. EST.

PORTLAND, OREGON
OREGONIAN

SEP 30 1945

Record Section Opens Monday

On the fourth floor of Olds & King, decorators are putting their finishing touches to fixtures and walls of an area nearly 40 feet square which is to comprise the new record department opening to the public Monday.

Having this firm back in the business of phonograph discs will remind some of the older customers that there was a smaller section nearly six or eight years ago headed by Helen Day. But records were not so popular then as they are now, and the space was badly needed for other and more profitable merchandise.

Disc Trade Increases

Nowadays the incentive for merchants to stock and sell records is incontestable. During 1944 the retail trade mounted to approximately $80,000,000, and that of Oregon alone soared somewhere between three-quarters and a full million. The national increase is ten-fold since 1931.

Olds & King will be one of a dozen outlets offering recorded music, both classical and popular, in Portland, but it will also be one of the largest outlets. The department will be under the supervision of Betty Gray, an experienced record saleswoman who is conversant with recordings from Sammy Kaye to Serge Koussevitzky.

New Features Offered

Outstanding among features of the new department on 10th avenue are the many self-service album racks, the effective lighting, and the picturesque wall panels suggested by the various recording companys' poster work.

Companies currently represented on the shelves are RCA-Victor, Columbia, Decca, Musicraft, Capitol, and Asch.

9/21/45

LETTERS TO THE SUN

McCormack as Artist

An Appreciative Word From His Concert Manager.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SUN—Sir: Your splendid editorial article on John McCormack last Thursday was quite the best thing that has been written about him since his death. I want to thank you for it. Most of the critics today cannot remember McCormack's great days, 1912-1926—they were not old enough. The voice began to fail at 40, but during those great years, thirteen of them, he was not only one of the greatest artists of our time, but certainly the most popular singer. I inaugurated the McCormack concert tours and managed him for these thirteen years, and heard 90 per cent of these concerts. The "real miracle" that you mention proves that the general public are good judges and cannot be fooled. You were not quite right in your quotation, which seems to have come from McCormack himself. No program ever contained more than one group of Irish songs. The programs were made up in four groups. The first, Handel, Beethoven and Mozart. The second, German lieder, some in English. The third, modern American songs and English classics. The fourth, the Irish group. Occasionally by request, he would either give an aria for an encore, or would put it in with his first group.

During the thirteen years, John McCormack drew over $5,000,000 at the box office in concerts. In San Francisco alone, we played five consecutive tours, giving two concerts, each time, within fifteen days, to receipts that averaged over $35,000 for the two concerts. They would vary a few hundred dollars according to the standees. All these could not have been Irish. The Irish were very proud and happy when he sang Handel, Beethoven and Mozart.

When he first sang with the Boston Symphony there was, of course, tremendous interest created. I think Dr. Muck was not altogether happy over the announcement. In fact, with 72 per cent Irish in Boston, we managed to get the date in spite of Dr. Muck. But, after the rehearsal, this great maestro turned to me and said: "This is among the finest Mozart singing of my time. I am happily surprised."

Seven or eight years ago, on my last trip to Europe, I met Dr. Felix Weingartner in Salzburg. I had not seen him since the days of the Boston Opera, twenty years previous, when John McCormack sang Don Ottavio in "Don Giovanni." Dr. Weingartner greeted me, as follows: "We gave the finest 'Don Giovanni' ever given in your country, and John McCormack is the only tenor I have ever heard who really sang the music of Don Ottavio."

The reason for all this is that John McCormack was a very fine musician. In fact, a very intelligent musician, playing both the piano and the violin. I know his good friend, Fritz Kreisler, would bear me out on this. As to John's own attitude toward his fellow artists, his choice of tenors was expressed quite often to me personally and at least one time in a public interview. He considered Edward Johnson from every standpoint, the best tenor of our time, judged by his voice, his intelligence, his personality and musicianship and his great art. John really meant it. He was a great friend of Caruso's, who was probably the greatest of operatic tenors, but not a great musician. McCormack was unquestionably the most loyal singer and the hardest worker. Possibly that is the reason for the "real miracle" you mention. He always had four new programs prepared every season, and was willing to learn new numbers for the various orchestras. I doubt if we will have his equal, ever.

CHARLES L. WAGNER.

New York.

NEW YORK TIMES
SEP 16 1945

PLANS FOR THE ORCHESTRA SEASON

THE season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, opening Oct. 5, will comprise twenty-four pairs of Friday-Saturday concerts, six Monday night concerts and six Sunday afternoon concerts in Boston, a tour of the Middle West, six concerts in Cambridge, Mass., and the usual visits to New York, Brooklyn and Providence. Guest conductors will include Sir Adrian Boult, leader of the British Broadcasting Corporation Orchestra in London; Igor Stravinsky, Fritz Reiner, Leonard Bernstein and Morton Gould. Among the soloists engaged are Rudolf Firkusny, Vladimir Horowitz, Alexander Brailowsky, Albert Spalding, Yehudi Menuhin, Efrem Zimbalist, Gregor Piatigorsky and Raya Garbousova. On the program of the first pair of concerts Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony and "Leonora" overture, No. 3, will be performed in recognition of those who brought about the war victory.

The Philadelphia Orchestra, under Eugene Ormandy, will give twenty-eight pairs of regular subscription concerts, ten Monday night concerts, five youth concerts and five concerts for children, this season in its home city. Pierre Monteux, Bruno Walter and Saul Caston will appear as guest conductors and the list of batonists includes Alexander Hilsberg, the orchestra's associate conductor. Fourteen soloists are listed. Of the ten concerts in New York to be presented in Carnegie Hall Mr. Ormandy will direct eight and the other two will be led respectively by Mr. Walter and Mr. Monteux. Novelties in the New York series will include Martinu's Fourth Symphony, which will be played here following its world première by the orchestra in Philadelphia; Zimbalist's "Portrait of an Artist," and Dubensky's arrangement of a Concerto Grosso of Leclair. The Philadelphia concerts start Sept. 28 and the New York series Oct. 2.

The Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, under Eugene Goossens, opens its season Oct. 5 and 6, with a program featuring the Brahms sextet for strings in G in a transcription by Mr. Goossens, and a Victory Fanfare, also written by the conductor. Twenty pairs of concerts are scheduled, including fourteen afternoon and six Sunday afternoon concerts on the matinee series and twenty concerts on the Saturday night series. Sixteen guest artists will be presented. These include Leonard Bernstein, who makes his first Cincinnati appearance as guest conductor and piano soloist. Others are Horowitz, Kreisler, Iturbi, Rubinstein, Francescatti, Serkin, Steber, Pinza, Melchior, MacDonald, Levant, Crooks, Travers and Argentinita. The season's activities will be completed by forty-three concerts on tour, five Young People's concerts and seven Pop concerts.

Fourteen midweek concerts, twelve Sunday night concerts and five concerts for young people will be presented this season by the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, under Reginald Stewart. In addition, the orchestra will appear in Annapolis, Washington, D. C., and twenty other cities. To meet its extended schedule the season has been lengthened to eighteen weeks, instead of the former sixteen. Soloists to appear are Alexander Brailowsky, Witold Malcuzynski, Adele Marcus and Pasquale Tallarico, pianists; Yehudi Menuhin, Albert Spalding and Ilya Scholnik, and Isaac Stern, violinists; Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist; Helen Traubel and Rose Bampton, sopranos, and Joachim Heinz, tenor.

LA PORTE, IND.
HERALD-ARGUS
SEP 25 1945

* * *

The Boston Symphony opens on Oct. 5 under Serge Koussevitzky. Besides 60 concerts in Boston, the orchestra will make a tour of the Middle West and visit the usual eastern cities. Guest conductors will include Sir Adrian Boult, of the British Broadcasting Corporation Orchestra; Igor Stravinsky, Fritz Reiner, Leonard Bernstein and Morton Gould.

* * *

The Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra under Eugene Goossens also opens on Oct. 5. The orchestra has scheduled 52 concerts at home and 43 on tour. Leonard Bernstein will make his first Cincinnati appearance as a guest conductor. Soloists include such names as Horowitz, Kreisler, Iturbi, Rubinstein, etc.

* * *

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
SEP 26 1945

Mrs. Coolidge To Hear Her Composition

Foss, Pianist, Well Know Artist In Berkshire

Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, whose sonata for oboe and piano will receive its first public hearing at the Berkshire Museum Saturday night, will be in the audience, it was announced today. Mrs. Coolidge wrote the sonata after she had reached 80 years of age, a feat which would prove formidable for one less than half her years.

The sonata, along with other chamber music works, will be performed by an exceptionally able group of musicians: Lukas Foss, pianist, conductor and composer, and Louis Speyer, oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing the Coolidge work, and Jean Bedetti, Boston Orchestra first cellist joining in other parts of the program.

Mr. Foss is one of America's younger musicians. He first came to public attention as a student of conducting at the Berkshire Music Center several years ago. He was born in 1922 in Europe and has studied with Paul Hindemith; Julius Herford, Serge Koussevitzky and Fritz Reiner. He studied first at the Paris Conservatory and later graduated from the Curtis Institute of Music.

His composition "Suite to the Tempest of Shakespeare" won him a Pulitzer scholarship in 1942 and his work "The Prairie" gained him the Guggenheim Fellowship in 1945. At present he is working on commissions for the Cleveland Orchestra, the League of Composers and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. He is now the official resident pianist of the Boston Orchestra.

Foss was heard in Berkshire most recently at the Bach-Mozart Festival at Tanglewood when he played a Mozart concerto with the Boston Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
SEP 30 1945

This is the third consecutive year that the Boston Symphony will be heard under the same sponsor. Incidentally, it is the 65th season of the orchestra. Thirty broadcasts will be presented during the season, in which four guest conductors will direct. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, starting his 22nd year as conductor of the ensemble, will open the series with Beethoven's "Eroica" (No. [illegible].) symphony. Gene Hamilton continues as announcer-commen-

Continued from Page Eight

---

THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
SEP 28 1945

* * *

The annual "Boston Symphony Orchestra" broadcasts over Station KGO and the American Broadcasting Company will be heard at a new time this season, from 6:30 to 7:30 p.m., it was announced today by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. The opening broadcast ~~will be tomorrow~~.

"I am happy," said Dr. Koussevitzky, "that the new time has been selected. This will mean that we shall be able to bring the natural climax of each Saturday night's program to the radio audience. It is something that we have been considering for some time. However, until this season, it has been impossible to do it."

(The Saturday night concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are of two hours' duration. In former seasons, the first half of each concert was broadcast During the 1945-46 season the second half of each program will be aired.)

"The new time also assures us the opportunity of reaching a still larger audience," Dr. Koussevitzky continued. "For example, listeners on the Pacific Coast now will not be obliged to change their engagements in order to hear the programs. As a matter of fact, the concerts now will be at a time when listeners normally are at home. Thus, we take advantage of the time difference.

* * *

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
SEP 26 1945

BELA BARTOK COMPOSER, DIES

NEW YORK (U.P.) — Bela Bartok, 64, Hungarian composer and authority on musical folklore, died today in West Side hospital. He had been ill for some time. His most recent compositions included "Concerto for Orchestra" which was presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra last year ~~and was [illegible]~~ of the most important contemporary symphonies. He lectured in the music schools of Columbia university and Harvard university. Bartok, born in Hungary in 1881, came to the United States as a voluntary refugee after the Nazis took over control of his country.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY WORKER
SEP 29 1945

Koussevitzky Interviewed on WJZ

A special program, Visit with Dr. Koussevitzky, will be presented by WJZ-ABC, on Saturday, Sept. 29, from 7:15 to 7:30 p. m., EWT. The program will be an informal interview with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who weekly will conduct the Boston Symphmony over WJZ-ABC beginning Saturday, Oct. 6 from 9:30 to 10:30 p. m. EST.

PORTLAND, OREGON
OREGONIAN
SEP 30 1945

Record Section Opens Monday

On the fourth floor of Olds & King, decorators are putting their finishing touches to fixtures and walls of an area nearly 40 feet square which is to comprise the new record department opening to the public Monday.

Having this firm back in the business of phonograph discs will remind some of the older customers that there was a smaller section nearly six or eight years ago headed by Helen Day. But records were not so popular then as they are now, and the space was badly needed for other and more profitable merchandise.

Disc Trade Increases

Nowadays the incentive for merchants to stock and sell records is incontestable. During 1944 the retail trade mounted to approximately $80,000,000, and that of Oregon alone soared somewhere between three-quarters and a full million. The national increase is ten-fold since 1931.

Olds & King will be one of a dozen outlets offering recorded music, both classical and popular, in Portland, but it will also be one of the largest outlets. The department will be under the supervision of Betty Gray, an experienced record saleswoman who is conversant with recordings from Sammy Kaye to Serge Koussevitzky.

New Features Offered

Outstanding among features of the new department on 10th avenue are the many self-service album racks, the effective [illegible], and the picturesque [illegible] [illegible] tested by the [illegible] recording companys' [illegible] [illegible] currently repre- [illegible]

[11].

Sept 30

THE BOSTON HERALD, S

New Brahms Album by BSO; Other Records Just Released

By ELINOR HUGHES

There is only one quarrel that anyone can have with the Boston Symphony's recordings for RCA Victor, and that is there isn't anything like enough of them. This has a way of making them stand out in spectacular fashion when they do come out, but still, we could do with more. Meanwhile, there is every reason for rejoicing over the new recording by the BSO and Serge Koussevitsky of Brahm's Symphony No. 3 in F, Op. 90 (M D-M 1007, $4.50, plus tax) which is an admirable album from all standpoints and a most welcome addition to anyone's musical library. It has great feeling but at no point is it sentimentalized or distorted, and the beauty of the music emerges with complete clarity and richness of tone. The absence of surface noise is also highly commendable.

The substantial music public which can never have enough of Wagner, will be interested in a

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens its 65th season on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall.

Koussevitzky Starts Orchestra Rehearsals

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin rehearsals tomorrow in Symphony Hall under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky for the opening of its 65th season next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This will be the 22d successive season of the orchestra under its eminent conductor. Dr. Koussevitzky will present Beethoven's Third Symphony, the "Eroica," on the opening program and will dedicate the performance to the peace of the world and the heroism which has made it possible. The program will open with the same composer's Third "Leonore" Overture. The second number will be the Orchestral Suite which Aaron Copland has made from his Pulitzer Prize-winning Ballet, "Appalachian Spring." The ballet was written for Martha Graham by commission of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge and was presented in Boston by Miss Graham last January. Prokofieff's Second Suite from the Ballet "Romeo and Juliet" will also be performed.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

Circ. (33,169)

This Clipping From NATION
NEW YORK, N.Y.

SEP 29 1945

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

ON VICTOR'S September list are Brahms's Symphony No. 3, performed by Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony (Set 1007; $4.50); Schönberg's "Verklärte Nacht" for string orchestra, performed by Golschmann with the St. Louis Symphony (Set 1005; $4.50); a sequence of passages from Strauss's "Rosenkavalier," performed by Goossens with the Cincinnati Symphony (Set 997; $3.50); and Airs de Ballet from Grétry's "Céphale et Procris," performed by Defauw with the Chicago Symphony (11-8825; $1).

The group is interesting for what it reveals about American orchestras. Cities like St. Louis and Cincinnati have no trouble in finding the players for excellent string sections; but—judging from the Cincinnati performance—equally good players for the woodwinds are not available. Chicago, however, can provide its orchestra with woodwinds as fine as the strings; and one hears the playing of a great orchestra. But then one listens to Boston's orchestra, and hears strings, brass, woodwinds, and refinements of execution and sonority that carry one into the realm of the fabulous.

The group also is interesting for what it demonstrates about Victor's recording of orchestras. One hears those fabulous things in the Boston performance of Brahms's symphony because they are reproduced by the recording as I cannot recall their having been done before. This time Victor's engineers managed to prevent the noisy confusion from excessive reverberation and the slight coarseness of the other recently made Boston Symphony recordings; and in the quiet the sound is cleanly defined and retains its real-life refinement. Played with a Brush pick-up, the recording is well balanced; with an Astatic Tru-tan it sounds limited in the upper frequency-range.

The Chicago Symphony recording is even better than the ones Victor made with that orchestra three years ago: the hall is reverberant, but the sound now is marvelously clear and clean and bright. The Cincinnati Symphony performance is beautifully reproduced except at a few points where excessive reverberation creates noisy confusion. And the St. Louis Symphony performance also is excellently recorded—even to the occasional thickness and heaviness of the sound produced by Schönberg's writing for strings or by Golschmann's performance of this writing.

I like the second and fourth movements of Brahms's symphony; but I don't like them with the sentimentalities and overemphases imparted to them by Koussevitzky's tempos and changes of tempo. I might acquire the Victor set to have a good reproduction of the fabulous playing of the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky's direction; but if I wanted a good performance of Brahms's symphony I would take Weingartner's in Columbia Set 353.

The music from Grétry's "Céphale et Procris" is charming and well-performed. Schönberg's "Verklärte Nacht," best listened to with Tudor's "Pillar of Fire" to distract one during its interminable length, also is well-performed. And so is the pointless collection of the few scraps of orchestral luxuriance and sugary melody from Strauss's "Rosenkavalier."

Also on Victor's September list is Beethoven's Sonata Opus 30 No. 2 for violin and piano played by Yehudi and Hephzibah Menuhin (Set 1008; $4.50). Nos. 1 and 3 of Opus 30 are among the best of Beethoven's early works; but the dramatic first movement of No. 2 is, for me, one of those in

---

WINONA, MINN.
REPUBLICAN HERALD

SEP 27 1945

The first of several soloists to be heard with the Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard from 8:30 to 9:30 p. m. today when Alexander Brailowsky, pianist, is featured in the "Second Piano Concerto" by Rachmaninoff. Following Brailowsky's solo, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Capricio Espagnol."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

SEP 30 1945

MUSIC'S OVERTONES

Victor Steps Up Release of Albums In Launching Fall Program of Recordings

By MILES KASTENDIECK

That the first column of the music season should be devoted to a summary of recordings should come as no surprise. The effects of the lifting of the ban have only just now given the record companies a chance to catch up with themselves and launch a series of new albums. Also, the advent of Victor's non-breakable record, after 11 years of research, opens up still another avenue of interest on the threshold of the season. Victor considers this new kind of record the most revolutionary some record development in 45 years. Beginning next month it will be available in limited quantities, in a special deluxe edition, the first of which is to be Strauss' tone poem "Til Eulenspiegel."

With renewed vigor Victor started off its Fall program with a list of varied albums which hold considerable interest and make available two works of special account. Leading the group is another version of the Brahms' Third Symphony, this time played by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky. To say that the performance of this work is as typical as it is worthy of the performers should be sufficient. Record collectors might also be reminded that at the beginning of the Summer Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2, also played by the Bostonians and recognized as a Koussevitzky warhorse, was released.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

SEP 30 1945

AN INTERESTING

. . . story about Dr. Serge Koussevitsky came to light this week. During the war years, letters and reports which the conductor received from Russian informed him that the composers there had no paper on which to write. In May of 1944 Dr. Koussevitsky made arrangements with an American publishing firm to send over a large amount of manuscript paper at his expense. The other day he had a letter from Prokofieff expressing his gratitude and the composer said that he was sending his latest symphony to Mr. Koussevitsky and offered him the opportunity of giving it its world premiere.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

SEP 30 1945

SATURDAY NIGHT over WFCI at 9:30 Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its opening concert of the new season. The group will play Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Fred Allen (above) will be Charlie McCarthy's guest tonight over WJAR at 8.

FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL

SEP 29 1945

Recording by Koussevitzky Given Praise

BY WALTER A. HANSEN
News-Sentinel Music Critic

Hans Richter (1843-1916), the famous Hungarian-born conductor, used to speak of Johannes Brahms' "Symphony No. 3" as Brahms' "Eroica." He knew, of course, that it was radically different in many respects from Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony." Eduard Hanslick (1825-1904), of the glib and vitriolic pen, wrote in a similar vein about Brahms' "Third." "Its fundamental note," he said, "is proud strength that rejoices in deeds." But he found "no warlike flavor" in its "heroic element."

No listener is bound to subscribe heart and soul to what Richter and Hanslick wrote about the character of Brahms' impressive work. One can thrill to its abiding beauty without discovering heroic elements in its warp and woof. The structure of the symphony is monumental; its melodic content is spine-tingling. James Gibbons Huneker once declared that Brahms reminded him of "one of those medieval architects whose life was a prayer in marble." Students of musical form marvel at the craftsmanship revealed in Brahms' "Third." It is true that some scholars state bluntly and categorically that, in the final analysis, it is chamber music scored none too effectively for the orchestra; but others disagree violently with such a pronouncement. Brahms' "Third" abounds in color; but only conductors of exceptional ability know how to give pertinent and effective emphasis to its many hues. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra do so with fine success in a recent recording of the work (Victor Album 1007).

Did Brahms Quote?

Why did Brahms quote from Richard Wagner in the first movement of the "Third," immediately before the statement of the second subject? Or was he actually quoting? At any rate, as J. B. Fuller-Maitland pointed out many years ago, Brahms here used "phrases first uttered by another composer, for the harmonies and melodic phrase recall a phrase from the Venusberg scene in 'Tannhaeuser.'" Was it a coincidence? Was it intentional? Who knows?

Eugene Goossens and the Cincinnati Orchestra give an excellent performance of the suite which Antal Dorati derived from Richard Strauss' delightful opera, "Der Rosenkavalier" (Victor Album 997), and Vladimir Golschmann, conducting the St. Louis Orchestra, presents an admirable reading of Arnold Schoenberg's "Transfigured Night" (Victor Album 1005). Schoenberg's intense music is used in the Ballet Theater's production of Antony Tudor's "Pillar of Fire."

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra, under Desire Defauw, plays the "Airs de Ballet" from Andre Gretry's "Cephale et Procris" with infectious rhythmical life and sparkling brilliance (Victor 11-8825).

BILLINGS, MONT.
EVENING GAZETTE

SEP 30 1945

The Boston Symphony opens on October 5 under Serge Koussevitzky. Besides 60 concerts in Boston, the orchestra will make a tour of the middle west and visit the usual eastern cities. Guest conductors will include Sir Adrian Boult, of the British Broadcasting Corporation orchestra; Igor Stravinsky, Fritz Reiner, Leonard Bernstein and Horton Gould.

14

[12]

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

SEP 9 - 1945

Boston Symphony Plans Its 65th Season

By RAYMOND MORIN

At a press luncheon at Boston's Harvard Club during the past week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, plans were released for the Orchestra's 65th season. Hosts for the occasion were George E. Judd, manager for the orchestra, and John N. Burk, historian and program annotator.

Many phases of the Orchestra's difficulties (some for publication and some not) were discussed with unusual frankness. To all appearances most of these difficulties are at an end. The ban against broadcasting and recording has of course been terminated by the Orchestra's agreement to operate under Union supervision. As a result, the Boston Symphony has recorded 150 sides during the past season for future release. This far exceeds the usual quota for one season.

The Saturday night broadcast will continue but will be adanced by one hour so that the adio audience, like the attending audience, will hear the climax of each program. This has been arranged at Dr. Koussevitzy's express request.

Series Starts Oct. 5

The Symphony Hall series will gin on Friday and Saturday, tober 5 and 6. At that time Dr. ussevitzky will begin his nty-second successive year as the Orchestra's famous conductor. The season will continue through April, 1946, with 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts. The Monday series will begin on Oct. 8, and the Sunday series on Oct. 21. The Orchestra will continue its periodical visits to New York, and will make its one-week Autumn tour of the West.

All except two of the soloists are familiar to Worcester. Those who are not are the Czech pianist, Rudolf Firkusny, and Alexander Brailowsky, the Russian pianist who is to open our Civic Music season on Oct. 19. Other soloists are violinists Albert Spalding, Yehudi Menuhin, and Efrem Zimbalist; pianist Vladimir Horowitz; 'cellists Gregor Piatigorsky and Raya Garbousova.

Cambridge Schedule

When the question was raised as to why Cambridge's schedule of Boston Symphony concerts had been decreased from eight to six, it was explained that Dr. Koussevitzky's health no longer permitted him to make an adequate percentage of appearances there. This also explains why the last Civic Music concert by the Boston Symphony was conducted by Richard Burgin.

A number of guest-conductors have been engaged for the forthcoming season—among them Igor Stravinsky (remembered here for his 1937 appearance on the Fine Arts Course), Fritz Reiner, Sir Adrian Boult, Leonard Bernstein, and Morton Gould.

The Boston Symphony will make its only Worcester appearance on March 19 in the Civic Music series.

NEWBURYPORT, MASS.
NEWS

SEP 17 1945

WELL, ARE WE going to the Symphony this season? We enjoy the glamor and worthwhile musical offerings of Boston's Symphony hall and wish it were a tiny bit nearer home, because we like to be in bed before 1 a. m. It is reported a larger number of people than usual in the outling districts are applying for season tickets for the coming concerts. This is accounted for in part by the release from war occupation and in part by the anticipated improvement in transportation conditions. Serge Koussevitzky will open Oct. 5 his 22nd succesive year as the orchestra's great conductor. There will be six Sunday afternoon concerts. These will be given approximately once a month, on Oct. 21, Dec. 30, Jan. 27, Mar 3, March 31 and April 21, at 3.30. Soloists will include the 'celist, Raya Garbousova and the violinist, Efrem Zimbalist. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct three of the concerts and three will be taken over by notable guests. Sir Adrian Boult, the conductor of the British Broadcasting corporation Orchestra in London, will return to America, after last visiting this country 10 years ago. Leonard Bernstein, composer of serious and light music, has conducted this orchestra as guest in previous seasons and will return. He has just been appointed the regular conductor of the New York City Center Symphony Orchestra. The other guest will be Morton Gould. Mr. Gould, first generally known by his career in radio, has appeared notably as conductor. The season in Symphony hall will extend from Oct. 5 to April 26, with two series of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Boston Symphony Orchestra's 65th Saturday evening concerts, and two series of six concerts each, one on Sunday afternoons and one on Monday evenings. Soloist for the longer series will include Vladimir Horowitz, piano; Albert Spalding, violin; Alexander Brailowsky, piano; Raya Garbousova, 'cello; Yahudi Menuhin, violin; Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cello; Rudolf Firkusny, piano and Efrem Zimbalist, violin. The guest conductors will include Igor Stravinsky.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

SEP 9 - 1945

Progress in Reproduction Shown in Flexible Discs

Sample Recording Eliminates Surface Noise, Gives Purer Tonal Texture—Month's Offerings Unusually Rich in Musical Substance

By VICTOR PRAHL

A sample of the much heralded nonbreakable, flexible disc has arrived from RCA Victor, the opening and closing section of Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel," played by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky, which will be released in its entirety next month. We did not try to break it but had fun bending it, and holding it up to the sunlight, the rich ruby red color shining through reminded us of the stained glass windows of the Chartres cathedral. On the musical side it represents progress and achievement. There is no surface noise whatsoever, the tonal texture of the instruments is purer and the volume increased. In fact the orchestra sounds as if it were in the same room. Now if the baby chooses to play a game of tiddly winks with "Beethoven's Ninth," or one of your more uninhibited friends decides to practice his juggling act with "Scheherazade" at your next cocktail party, you may continue nonchalantly with your cigaret, with the comforting thought that there will be no breakage. Just make sure the discs are the flexible, nonbreakable reds.

Although this month's contribution is pressed on the old breakable blacks, they too sound all right and are unusually rich in musical substance. With previous recordings by Felix Weingartner, Frederick Stock, Bruno Walter, Hans Kindler, and their respective orchestras, Victor now offers a fifth choice of Brahms's "Symphony No 3 in F" played by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitsky (Victor album DM 1007, four 12-inch records). More leisurely and expansive as to tempo than the Weingartner recording but less suavely nuanced in the Viennese manner than that of Bruno Walter, it is nevertheless an externally brilliant performance, beautifully balanced, and played with an appreciation of the work's grandeur. Just having heard Dr Koussevitsky in a series of six concerts devoted to the works of Bach and Mozart, we are reminded in this magnificent recording that he can be equally great in Brahms.

We belong to the group, no doubt a large one, which has not been able to keep apace with the musical evolution and artistic progress of Arnold Schonberg. But having been deeply moved some 25 years ago when we heard the Franz Kneisel quartet with two assisting players, in a first performance of "Verklarte Nacht," this composer's sextet for strings, we have always given him the benefit of the doubt when listening to his later works, such as the dissonant "Pietrot Lunaire." Arranged at a later date for full string orchestra, "Transfigured Night," as the sextet is usually known in translation, is now played by the St Louis Symphony under Vladimir Golschman in its postban recording debut (Victor album DM-1005, four 12-inch records). There has been a revival of interest in the work since Antony Tudor, the talented English choreographer used the music as inspiration for his successful ballet, "Pillar of Fire," under which title it is now issued. Strangely enough, with the passing of the years, this youthful work, the composer's opus 4, obviously written while under the spell of Wagner's "Tristan," sounds rather trite and at times hollow and banal, producing no such reaction as it did in our student days. Mr Golschman and his orchestra, however, give it a sensitive performance, and the gifted young conductor reinforces the very favorable impression made in his concerts on the Connecticut valley circuit last season. The eighth side is a noble "Adagio" by Corelli, well transcribed by Amadeo de Filippi and played by the orchestra with a richly vibrant tone.

While there have been numerous arrangements of the waltzes from Strauss's "Rosenkavalier," Antal Dorati's orchestral arrangement is the first to include the other major high lights of the opera. Heard in sequence is the music of the opening love scene between the Marschallin and Octavian, the presentation of the rose, Baron Ochs's scene from the second act, the lovely trio for the Marschallin, Sophie, and Octavian, the final duet, and a brilliant waltz finale. The instruments of the orchestra cannot replace the human voice, but this postban debut of the Cincinnati orchestra under Eugene Goosens is highly successful in reminding one of how appealing the opera is in luscious themes even when dressed in orchestral garb alone (Victor album DM 997, three 12-inch records).

A "must" for lovers of the quaint is the ballet music from the opera, "Cephale et Procris," by Gretry (1741-1813), friend of Voltaire, Napoleon and Louis VIII. It consists of three dances, a "Tambourin," "Menuetto" and "Gigue," played exquisitely by the Chicago Symphony under Desire Defauw, with lightness, grace, verve and precision (Victor single 12-inch record, LL-8825).

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

SEP 16 1945

Boston Symphony Time to Be Changed

BEGINNING Oct. 6, the time of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts on KXOK will be changed to 8:30 Saturday nights. . . . The interior of the Detroit Music Hall is being altered for better accoustical effects when the Detroit Symphony Orchestra begins its broadcasts Sept. 30 on a 7:00-8:00 p.m. Sunday schedule on KXOK.

Raymond Massey's long-talked-of series has been set for KSD. It will be scheduled at 1 p. m. Sundays.

Jack Berch, singer and whistler, is back on KXOK at 3 p.m. Monday through Friday with Charles Magnante, the accordion player, heading a supporting trio. . . . The Jack Kirkwood program has returned on KMOX, at 6 p.m., the first five week days. . . . Jack Smith, the tenor, who sang with Eileen Farrell in the 4 p.m. Sunday concert series, has a new KMOX series at 6:15 Tuesday through Friday. . . . William Janney, Broadway and movie actor, who was recently discharged from the Army, is playing Interne Adams in KSD's Portia Faces Life serial.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

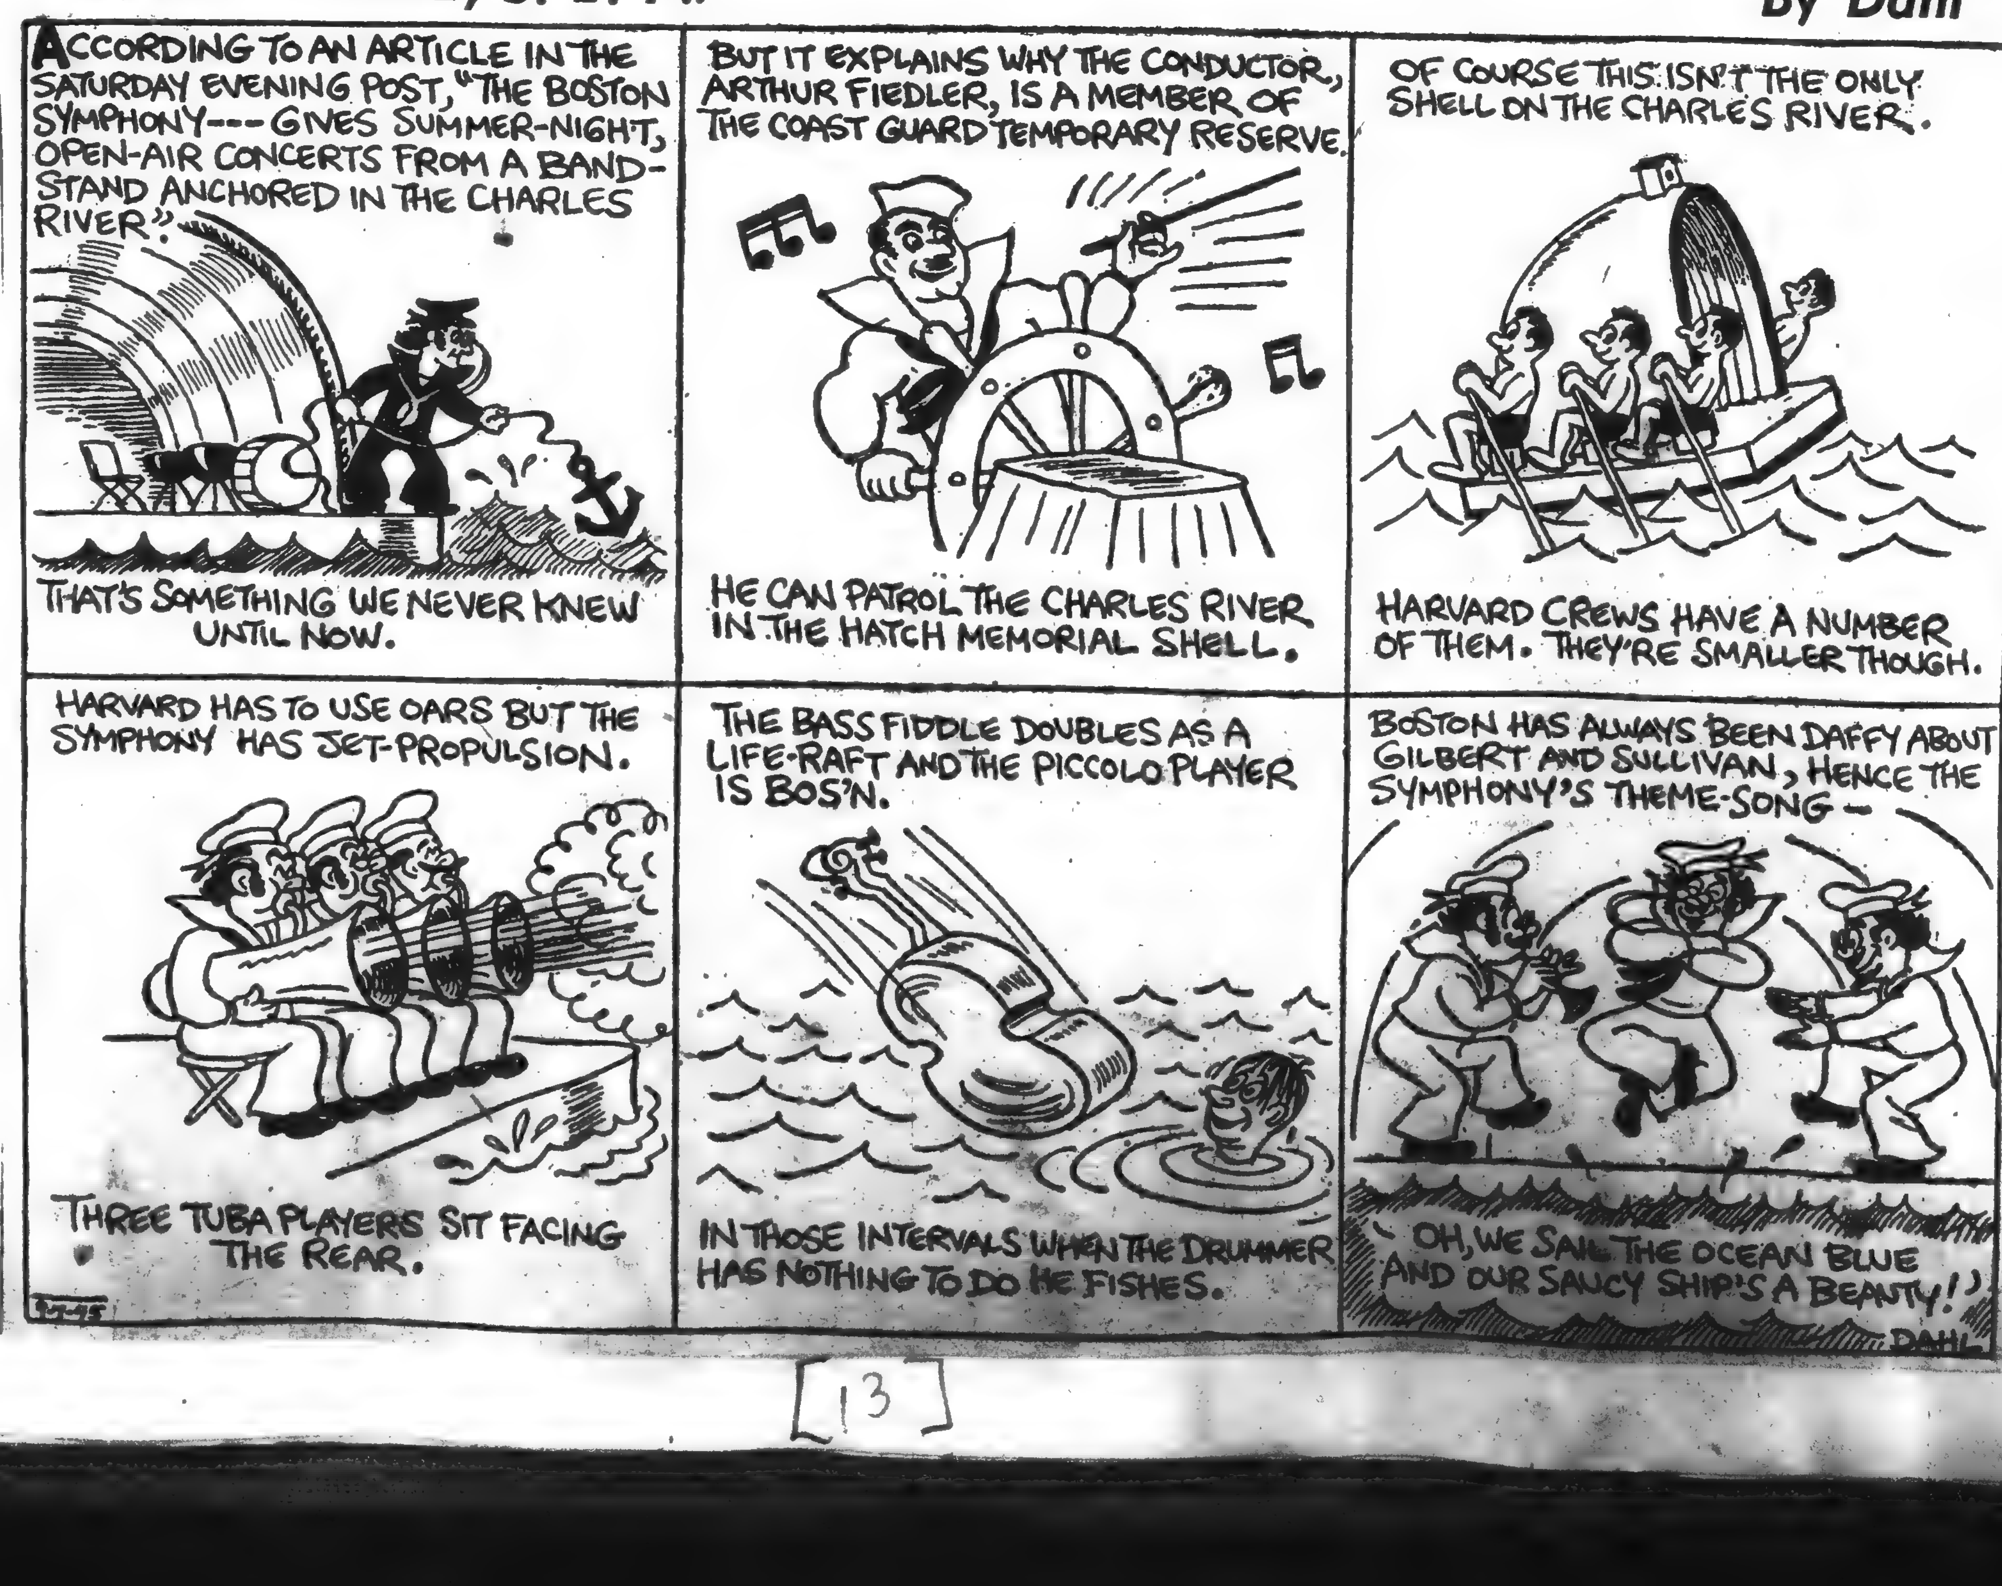
SEP 16 1945

THE DIRECTORS OF
. . . the Boston Symphony soon will make plans for next season's Berkshire Music festival. One of the events will probably be the American premiere of Benjamin Britten's opera, "Peter Grimes," which was first presented in London on June 5 of this year. The American rights have been purchased by Eddie Dowling and Louis J. Singer and they are conferring with Dr. Koussevitsky and the management of the orchestra.

THE BOSTON HERALD, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 1945

AVAST THERE, S. E. P.!

By Dahl



ACCORDING TO AN ARTICLE IN THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, "THE BOSTON SYMPHONY--- GIVES SUMMER-NIGHT, OPEN-AIR CONCERTS FROM A BAND-STAND ANCHORED IN THE CHARLES RIVER".
THAT'S SOMETHING WE NEVER KNEW UNTIL NOW.
BUT IT EXPLAINS WHY THE CONDUCTOR, ARTHUR FIEDLER, IS A MEMBER OF THE COAST GUARD TEMPORARY RESERVE.
HE CAN PATROL THE CHARLES RIVER IN THE HATCH MEMORIAL SHELL.
OF COURSE THIS ISN'T THE ONLY SHELL ON THE CHARLES RIVER.
HARVARD CREWS HAVE A NUMBER OF THEM. THEY'RE SMALLER THOUGH.
HARVARD HAS TO USE OARS BUT THE SYMPHONY HAS JET-PROPULSION.
THREE TUBA PLAYERS SIT FACING THE REAR.
THE BASS FIDDLE DOUBLES AS A LIFE-RAFT AND THE PICCOLO PLAYER IS BOS'N.
IN THOSE INTERVALS WHEN THE DRUMMER HAS NOTHING TO DO HE FISHES.
BOSTON HAS ALWAYS BEEN DAFFY ABOUT GILBERT AND SULLIVAN, HENCE THE SYMPHONY'S THEME-SONG — "OH, WE SAIL THE OCEAN BLUE AND OUR SAUCY SHIP'S A BEAUTY!"
9-7-45
DAHL

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

SEP 23 1945

FUTURE FOR MUSIC IN RADIO

By MARK A. SCHUBART

WITH a large percentage of its air time devoted to the transmission of music of various kinds, the radio industry is rapidly becoming the nation's leading consumer of musical talent. Technically proficient and progressive, financially secure, and with an audience of unparalleled size, it is an industry whose musical potential has been visualized but not as yet fully achieved; whose artistic possibilities at the present time are being explored rather than exploited.

Radio is, of course, a young industry; a mere stripling of 25 years or so. And in dealing with serious music—a much older industry—it is, by comparison, still younger. In the past decade or so it has found its public and perfected its methods of reaching this public. Now it is just beginning to consider seriously the difficulties involved in the programming of, and winning acceptance for, so-called art music.

Thus far, radio's ventures into serious music have not been uniformly stimulating, nor have they shown any hardened policy in regard to music. Leading programs have often demonstrated a disconcerting tendency to follow the easy and well-trodden paths laid out in our less progressive concert halls, playing and replaying the most popular works of the standard repertoire. This is a policy which obviously will not offend. But there seems to be no reason why radio's technical daring should not be matched in artistic daring, or why its presentation of serious music should not be as free and unprecedented as its mechanical function.

Orchestras on the Air

It is true, of course, that radio's most substantial serious music offerings are broadcasts of regular concerts by our major symphony orchestras and musical organizations—the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (CBS), the Boston Symphony (American), the Detroit Symphony (Mutual), the Metropolitan Opera (American) and others—and in these broadcasts it is inevitable that radio should conform to the well-defined objectives established by these organizations' musical direction. It is, rather, to the strictly radio concerts we must look for the key to radio's musical future.

Despite its commercial necessities, radio's achievement in the field of serious music thus far has by no means been small, and the large networks have sustained, and are sustaining, many excellent concert programs. CBS's "Invitation to Music," for example, has consistently avoided the musically hackneyed, and has, under the direction of Bernard Herrmann, built up a faithful audience for contemporary music as well as for the classics. Mutual's Sinfonietta, which is, unfortunately, not carried by WOR, the local outlet, at this time, has also presented richly varied programs under the supervision of Alfred Wallenstein and his successor, Sylvan Levin. The NBC Symphony, a much larger orchestra, and commercially sponsored, has been much more conservative in its programming, though performance standards have been exceptionally high.

Probably the greatest distinction in the radio presentation of art music has, however, been achieved by two local stations—WQXR, and the municipally sponsored WNYC. Both of these devote a major portion of their air time each day to serious music, and the fact that they can exist—and even flourish—under such a policy augurs well for the future of music in radio. Both stations, of course, rely heavily on recorded music, since they do not have the resources to present ambitious live programs; and this naturally limits experimental possibilities.

The live programs these stations present have been generally interesting. WQXR's small orchestra under the direction of Leon Barzin, has specialized in less ambitious works by well-known composers and has presented engaging young soloists. There have been other excellent programs on this station of lieder and instrumental chamber music. WNYC has taken more active recognition of the necessity for airing contemporary music and its ten-day Festival of American Music which is presented each spring remains one of the most valued contributions radio has made to the current musical scene, and one which the composers and performers represented have found a heartening experience.

Another encouraging sign is to be found in the fact that more and more the guiding of musical policy in radio is being placed in the hands of men aware of both radio's needs and music's. Sylvan Levin, Mutual's new music director; Alfred Wallenstein, who has just taken over the same post at the American; Leon Barzin at WQXR; James Fassett at CBS; Samuel Chotzinoff at NBC; Eddy Brown at WLIB, and Morris Novik at WNYC, are all men of different backgrounds and qualifications. But almost without exception they are men of vision and experience.

Distinct Identity Sought

Essentially, what these men must continue to strive for is a separate and distinct identity for radio music. It seems likely that the great strides made in the technical reproduction of art music will continue, with such improvements as frequency modulation and wire recording leading the way. But over and above these accomplishments, music itself must be scrutinized and reconsidered in terms of broadcasting.

All of the major networks have already recognized the importance of the composer in radio and have commissioned him to write new works, with timing and instrumentation designed to fill radio's needs. The quantity of music consumed by radio is so tremendous that unless new music is produced at a far faster rate than at present the so-called standard repertoire threatens to be played to death. Radio's policy makers are beginning to recognize and act upon this important truth, and the composers are more than willing to cooperate.

For it is now becoming obvious that radio can offer composers—and instrumentalists as well—a field of activity which, if fully implemented, will carry with it not only adequate financial reward but great distinction and public recognition as well. The millennium has not as yet arrived. But accomplishments thus far represent a great hope for the present generation of musicians, offering them a possible new and expanded market for their artistic wares, and showing them at least a vision of a new world to conquer.

Symphony Season Opened; 'Appalachian Spring' Heard

By L. A. Sloper

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, beginning his twenty-second year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opened its sixty-fifth season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program, "dedicated to the peace of the world, and to the heroism which made it possible," contained two works chosen for their suitability to this purpose—Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3 and the "Eroica" Symphony. It also contained Aaron Copland's Suite from the ballet, "Appalachian Spring," which was played for the first time in Boston.

Dr. Koussevitzky returned to his post filled with all the old vigor, intensity and enthusiasm. He directed the Overture and the Symphony with the familiar fervor and dramatic power; indeed it may be said that his reading of the "Leonore" No. 3 is more dramatic than the opera, and it was warmly received by the audience, which had stood with the orchestra to welcome him back.

* * *

Even more remarkable than his interpretation (and the orchestra's performance) of these works was the eloquence with which he and they played Copland's "Appalachian Spring" Suite. This score was very impressive when heard last season with Martha Graham's ballet for which it was written. But at that time it was played by a small ensemble which could hardly bring out all of its beauties.

Yesterday it made an even stronger impression. Indeed it seemed to me one of the finest products of the modern American school. It adapts the harmonic schemes and rhythmical complexities of the experimental early years of this century to the purposes of expression rather than of exhibition. It succeeds by the use of sophisticated technical resources in achieving an effect of simplicity, evoking the atmosphere and feeling of the early Colonial days, their striving, their devotion, their trials and joys.

Singularly well designed to accompany Miss Graham's dances, it is equally expressive in the concert hall. It is possible that memory of the ballet helped understanding of the music, just as the music originally helped comprehension of the ballet. But the music yesterday seemed so clear, so well knit, so redolent of its theme that it could hardly fail of its effect, I felt, even with those who had not seen the ballet. And the quick and generous applause with which it was greeted confirmed this opinion. Mr. Copland was in attendance, and was recalled several times to bow his thanks.

* * *

It is interesting to observe the increasingly successful collaboration between composers and choregraphers. This score of Copland's marks one of its high points. Although its scale is smaller, it may rank with Hindemith's music for Massine's "St. Francis." These are serious works. Equally interesting and successful examples may be found in the lighter forms, such as Leonard Bernstein's "Fancy Free," Norman Dell Joio's "On Stage!" and quite possibly, Lukas Foss' "The Gift of the Magi," which at this writing I have not yet heard. For some reason, ballet seems nowadays to inspire better music than opera.

The personnel of the orchestra remains virtually unchanged. The first performance of Martinů's Third Symphony, originally announced for the third pair of concerts, has been advanced to next week.

Today IN SOCIETY

Familiar Faces Seen at Symphony Opening

Boston's most traditional audience filled Symphony Hall to its hallowed rafters yesterday for the opening of the 65th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For 24 Fridays, from now until April, the hours between 2:30 and 4:30 will be held sacred to Symphony, and only dire illness or emergency ever keeps a season-goer at home.

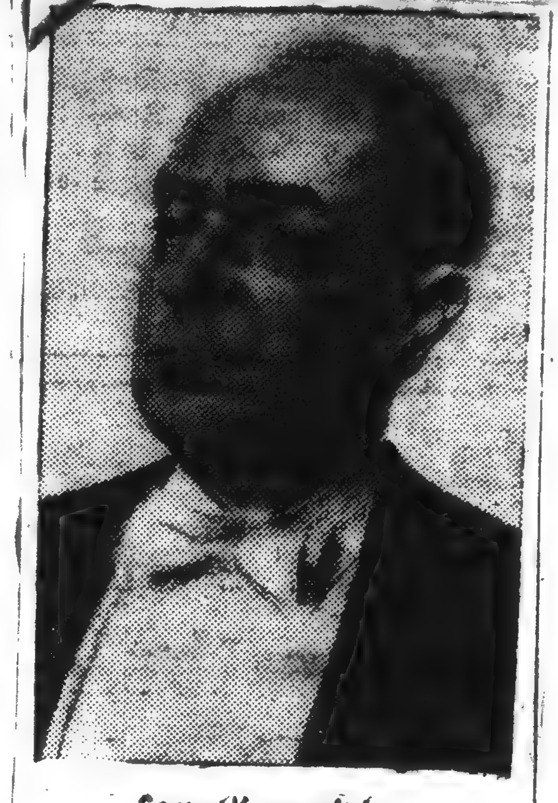
There were familiar faces in every row yesterday afternoon as the great audience rose to pay its usual respects to its erect, beloved conductor, and Dr. Koussevitzky faced them for several minutes before the storm of applause quieted enough for the Star Spangled Banner to be sung.

SYMPHONY SNAPSHOTS—The Roger Wolcotts in their usual places—the George Lewises in theirs—Eben Draper and his wife, talented composer Hazel Draper—Mrs. Francis P. Sears, her slim black wool suit collared in ermine—Mrs. Robert H. Stevenson—Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs and Miss Rebekah Hobbs—Mrs. George H. Swift and her daughter, Mrs. Lawrence Lowell Reeve—Mrs. John G. Palfrey and a small grandchild very intent on the new Ballet Suite—Mrs. Richard King Thorndike and her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike Jr., Lucy Rantoul Thorndike with a nice pale blue cap of feathers on her smooth fair hair—Mrs. Richard Thompson and her sister, Mrs. J. Burke Wilkinson, Maxim Karolik off to see the musicians at intermission—Arthur Fiedler, also backstage between symphonies—Mrs. Dudley L. Pickman and her daughter, Mrs. Alfred Wright, blonde Nancy out of her WAC uniform after three years' service—the Guy Warren Walkers, his Lt Col's uniform changed for civvies—Mrs. Malcolm Bradley French and Mrs. William H. Coburn sharing their usual third-row seats—Mrs. Paul F. Clark and her daughter, Mrs. Randolph Post Eddy, and Capt Eddy—Mrs. Charles F. Hovey and Mrs. Gordon Abbott Jr.—Mrs. William Dana Orcutt greeting friends from her usual place in Row B—Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller and Mrs. Fuller Halsey and Hope Halsey Talbot—Mrs. Bernard Fox in slim smart navy from top to toe—debutante Mary K. Arnold—Mrs. John Lyman—Mrs. C. Chauncey Gray—Mrs. Frank C. Paine—the Oliver Wolcotts—and many many more.

WORLD PREMIERE — Another capacity audience filled the Opera House almost to the roof last night to applaud a program that included the first performance of Lukas Foss' exciting ballet "The Gift of the Magi," and three other favorites.

Dr. Koussevitzky brought a box party that included composer Copland, to hear Symphony's brilliant young pianist Lukas Foss conduct his new ballet, and others of the huge audience included many of the afternoon's symphony goers.

COMMERCIAL APPEAL
DANVILLE, VA.
10/1/45



Serge Koussevitzky

INDISPUTABLY among the top American conductors is Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who leads the Boston Symphony for the 22nd consecutive season. "The Boston," considered by musical authorities the finest symphony in the United States, can again be enjoyed by music lovers throughout the country when the Symphony begins its new fall series Saturday, Oct. 6, over WBTM.

THE BOSTON HERALD,

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1945

Tanglewood Shed Given to Symphony

STOCKBRIDGE, Oct. 4—Miss Gertrude R. Smith, president of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, announced that the board of trustees today voted to make a gift of their Tanglewood music shed to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This gives the orchestra entire control and management of future festivals.

MAKES GIFT TO HUB SYMPHONY

Post Oct 5

Given Use of Music Shed of Berkshire Festival

STOCKBRIDGE, Oct. 4—Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, announced tonight that the board of trustees at their annual meeting held this afternoin voted to make a gift of their music shed and its contents at Tanglewood, Stockbridge, to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, thus giving them the entire control and management of future festivals.

Only two conditions are attached: one, that all patrons, members and subscribers will have the opportunity of resubscribing for their regular seats before public sale and, second, that if in future years the Boston Symphony Orchestra should decide to discontinue the festivals at Tanglewood the music shed would revert to an authorized committee of Berkshire citizens.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

OCT 5 - 1945

MUSIC SHED MAY GO TO BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Stockbridge, Mass., Oct. 5—The board of directors of the Berkshire symphonic festival has made a gift of its music shed at Tanglewood to the Boston Symphony orchestra. Miss Gertrude Smith, festival president, said that the action was subject to the Boston orchestra agreeing that festival patrons, members and subscribers be allowed to re-subscribe before public sale, and another condition that the property should revert to a committee of Berkshire citizens in the event the orchestra discontinued Tanglewood festivals.

Tanglewood Given to Boston Symphony

STOCKBRIDGE, Oct. 4—Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, announced that the board of trustees, at their annual meeting this afternoon, voted to make a gift of their music shed and its contents at Tanglewood to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, thus giving the orchestra entire control and management of future festivals.

Only two conditions are attached, one that all patrons, members and subscribers will have the opportunity of resubscribing for their regular seats before public sale, and two, if in future years the Boston Symphony should decide to discontinue the festivals at Tanglewood the music shed would revert to an authorized committee of Berkshire citizens.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

OCT 5 1945

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass. (AP)—The board of directors of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival has made a gift of their music shed at Tanglewood to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Miss Gertrude Smith, festival president, said that the action was subject to the Boston Orchestra agreeing that festival patrons, members and subscribers be allowed to re-subscribe before public sale, and another condition that the property should revert to a committee of Berkshire citizens in the event the orchestra discontinued Tanglewood festivals.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

1945

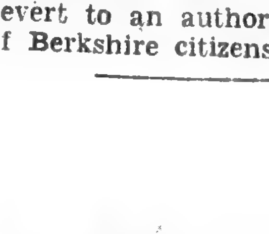
Boston Orchestra Given Music Shed

Now Has Entire Control and Management of Future Berkshire Symphonic Festivals.

The music shed and its contents at Tanglewood in Stockbridge were presented yesterday to the Boston Symphony orchestra, thus giving it the entire control and management of future Berkshire symphonic festivals. Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, festival president, said that trustees made two conditions to the gift.

One is that all patrons, members and subscribers will have the opportunity of resubscribing for their regular seats before public sale and, two, that if in future years the Boston Symphony orchestra should decide to discontinue the festivals at Tanglewood, the music shed will revert to an authorized committee of Berkshire citizens.

Symphony to Present Red Feather Concert; Third of Fund Near



The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will give an hour's concert at the Red Feather rally on Oct. 11 at Boston Garden, headquarters of the Greater Boston United War Fund announced last night. At the same time it was revealed that contributions to the War Fund to date are about 31 percent of the goal.

THE BOSTON HERALD, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1945

Tanglewood Shed Given to Symphony

STOCKBRIDGE, Oct. 4—Miss Gertrude R. Smith, president of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, announced that the board of trustees today voted to make a gift of their Tanglewood music shed to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This gives the orchestra entire control and management of future festivals.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

OCT 5 - 1945

The New Records

Enter Vynalite—With Koussevitzky's 'Till' as the First Issue—The Lighter Side.

Victor calls it Vynalite. What the competitors of Victor call it is slightly more acrid. What the public will call it hasn't yet been determined. In any case, "it" is the new De Luxe Red Seal record, for which the claims include proof against breakage, more nearly silent surfaces, "concert hall" fidelity. It is priced at twice the cost of the conventional shellac disk.

So far as can be determined from the introductory issue—a recording by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony of Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel"—only the claim concerning its durability stands up completely. The disk can be flexed in the hands, pounded on a desk, or actually stepped on without damage. In fact, this virtue might be a frustration in those moments when one wants to wreak proper justice on a wayward interpreter. And what will happen to the climax of Coward's "Private Lives"?

However, breakage is only an incidental annoyance to a record collector, rather than a fundamental problem. Surface noise and reproduction are more vital concerns. My copy of "Till" is decidedly erratic support for the claim of surface quietness. Some of it untracks with a silky suavity that is a delight, in other parts the string tone has a definite lisp, and still other portions crackle as merrily as any inferior shellac disk. It is no new story that a performance cut into an acetate disk can give wonderfully scratch-free reproduction. The problem would seem to be whether similar results can be achieved through the "biscuit" method of pressing records from a master. It hasn't been done yet. In fact, those wonderful English Parlophone (Decca) shellac disks we were getting over here just before the war were considerably more quiet than these Vynalites.

Quality of Sound.

The sound of the Boston Orchestra as reproduced here does have exceptional clarity, splendid balance and a magnitude of detail that those of us who haven't been hearing records for two years find ear-opening. But it is reasonable to suppose that a conventional pressing from the same master would be of similar quality. There is, after all, no difference in the recording process—it is merely a refinement in the processing from master to disk.

Victor's method of merchandising this item makes it impossible for the average person to make a direct comparison for himself, as this performance of "Eulenspiegel" will be available only in the $2 per disk Vynalite edition for a number of months. Thereafter, so the explanation goes, it will be available at the usual price of $1 per disk on shellac. Thus the person who craves a new item limited to Vynalite circulation must take it at this higher price, or else not have it.

Since the record is appreciably thinner and lighter than the common shellac disk, there is some skepticism that it will operate satisfactorily in record changing devices. The manufacturers contend that it has been weighted sufficiently so that it will. Wary dealers are warning their customers not to be surprised if it doesn't, for there are so many different types of changers in use that no single success or failure could prove the point.

For those who are concerned about the musical merits of this performance it may be said that it is a reading of robustious humor rather than impish wit, stronger in the hightlighting of musical detail than in the narative aspect of this "Rogue's Rondo." (Victor album DV 1, $4.50.)

This Clipping From
LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

OCT 5 - 1945

Tomorrow night at 9:30 o'clock! That's a date and time to write down in listening MUST books. WLAW is proud to announce that beginning Saturday evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will resume broadcasting activities over the American Broadcasting Company, locally by way of ~~that stations'~~ facilities. Considered by music authorities as being the finest symphonic group in the United States, the orchestra will be working under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction for the 22nd year. Four guest conductors are also scheduled for an appearance this season. Included will be Igor Stravinsky, returning after a two-year absence; Sir Adrian Boult, conductor of the BBC orchestra in London; Fritz Reiner, who batons the Pittsburgh Symphony; and Leonard Bernstein, one of Lawrence's own, who is known the country over as a famed American composer and conductor.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

OCT 5 - 1945

Tanglewood Shed Given to Orchestra

Boston Symphony Owning Estate Voted Complete Title to $100,000 Building; 9 Concerts Next Summer

The Boston Symphony ~~Orchestra,~~ presented the Music Shed at Tanglewood by the Berkshire Symphonic Festival trustees yesterday afternoon, today announced plans for the resumption of concerts next summer following war-time discontinuance. The gift was voted at the annual meeting of the Festival held at Stockbridge.

Officers Re-elected

Re-electing Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith president, Laurence R. Connor vice president, Mrs. Bruce Crane clerk and Henry W. Dwight treasurer, the board voted to transfer to the orchestra ownership of the $100,000 shed, giving with the building "entire control and management of future Festivals." The gift carried with it two conditions, agreeable to the orchestra management.

First, that "All patrons, members and subscribers will have the opportunity of resubscribing for their regular seats before public sale," and second, "If in future years the Boston Symphony Orchestra should decide to discontinue the festivals at Tanglewood the music shed would revert to an authorized committee of Berkshire citizens."

Informed of the gift, Jerome B. Greene, orchestra president, said, "The decision of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival Association . . . was a most generous recognition of the permanent place the Festival had won in the musical life of our country and of the Boston Orchestra's part in that achievement. Happily, the resumption of the Festival as a full responsibility of the orchestra, and the utilization of the superb facilities of its own Tanglewood estate, in no way lessens the co-operation which the concerts will receive from the residents of Berkshire County, to whose initiative the Berkshire Festival is wholly due. Among them, the music-loving public is especially indebted to the indomitable energy and public spirit of Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival Association.

Nine Concerts

Mr. Greene then outlined plans for next summer, which include nine symphony concerts over three weeks, beginning July 25, and resumption of the Berkshire Music Center July 1 on a pattern essentially like that of 1941. The concerts will be under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, and will be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons. Dr. Koussevitzky will direct the school, "assisted by principals and other members of the orchestra and distinguished leaders in charge of each department."

Dr. Koussevitzky, expressing his personal gratitude to Miss Robinson Smith and the festival officers, said, "When I first learned of the ambitious program which Miss Robinson Smith had in mind, it seemed like a dream, but I was soon to know that these dreams were to be brought into the realm of reality, and when in addition the orchestra was given Tanglewood, the most ideal location for these plans, I was convinced that nothing could interfere with our great ambition to widen musical horizons. I look forward with great anticipation to next summer."

Seats 6500 Persons

The Shed seating 6500 persons, designed by the Swedish-American architect, Eliel Saarinen, was erected in 1938, with Joseph Franz of Stockbridge as engineer.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 5 - 1945

BOSTON ORCHESTRA GETS FESTIVAL SHED

Berkshire Music Fete Trustees Give Its Concert Building, Contents to Symphony

The board of trustees of the Berkshire Music Festival voted at its annual meeting yesterday afternoon to make a gift of its music shed and contents to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Thus the Festival, of which Mrs. Gertrude Robinson-Smith is president, will give the entime control and management of the annual summer musical events—now in their eleventh year—to the orchestra.

This was regarded as an important step in the festival's development, since until this year, ownership of the festival properties had been divided between the two organizations. It will also be of material aid to Dr. Serge Koussevitsky's music school which ~~was or~~ganized by him at Tanglewood five years ago.

The huge shed, which seats more than 6,000 persons, was built in 1938 at a cost of nearly $100,000. Eighty-two per cent of the contributions to its cost came from neighbors in the Stockbridge vicinity.

In turning over the shed to the orchestra, two conditions were imposed:

First, that the first preference of seats shall continue to go to patrons of the concerts who, in previous years, purchased their seats through the festival.

Second, that if at any future time the Boston Symphony Orchestra should decide to discontinue these summer concerts, the ownership of the shed would revert to the festival organization.

WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL

OCT 5 - 1945

Tanglewood Music Shed Given Boston Symphony

STOCKBRIDGE, ~~Mass. (AP)~~—The board of directors of the Berkshire symphonic festival has made a gift of their music shed at Tanglewood to the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Miss Gertrude Smith, festival president, said the action was subject to the Boston orchestra agreeing that festival patrons, members and subscribers be allowed to resubscribe before public sale, and another condition that the property should revert to a committee of Berkshire citizens in the event the orchestra discontinued Tanglewood festivals.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

OCT 5 - 1945

Berkshire Festival To Be Resumed Next Summer

BOSTON, (U.P.) — The Boston Symphony orchestra's Berk~~shire festival con~~certs, which had gained national renown prior to Pearl Harbor, will be resumed on a full scale basis next summer after several seasons of substitute programs ,it was announced today.

The orchestra trustees have authorized resumption of the festival and the Berkshire music center on a pattern similar to that of 1941 when there were nine symphony concerts during a three-week period. The music center is a finishing academy for especially talented music students thruout the nation.

The 1946 concerts will be given at the traditional "Tanglewood" estate at Lenox under the baton of Conductor Serge Koussevitzky of the Symphony on Thursday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, beginning July 25.

While the orchestra owned the Tanglewood estate, until yesterday the huge music shed accommodating 800 listeners was owned by the Berkshire Symphonic Festival Ass'n. Now the shed has been presented to the orchestra, which will assume full direction of the festival rather than sharing the responsibility with the association.

Three Symphony Programs Announced

Tomorrow evening in Symphony Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give the first concert of the Monday evening series. The program will consist of Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 94 (the "Surprise"), the Second Suite from Prokofieff's Ballet "Roméo and Juliet," and the Second Symphony of Brahms in D major.

The second program of the longer series of concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will include the first public performance of the new Third Symphony by Bohuslav Martinu, which is dedicated to this orchestra. The symphony is in three movements: Allegro poco moderato, Largo, and Allegro; andante. The program will open with Mozart's Overture to "Idomeneo." The second portion of the program will be devoted to the music of Sibelius and will consist of "The Swan of Tuonela" (English horn solo: Louis Speyer) and the Symphony No. 1 in E minor.

Symphony Luncheons Resuming Oct. 19

Boris Goldovsky is renewing his talks on the Boston Symphony programs at a new series of ten Symphony Luncheons held in the Copley Plaza beginning Friday, Oct. 19. This series, sold by subscription only and limited to two hundred subscribers, is being sponsored by the Institute of Modern Art.

Post Oct 5

945

CONCERT IN GARDEN FOR FUND GROUP

Workers Will Hear Symphony Next Thursday

The Greater Boston United War Fund announced last night that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were preparing to give an hour's concert featuring the first symphonic performance of Richard Rodgers' waltzes from the current Broadway musical show, "Carousel," for Victory fund campaign workers in Boston Garden next Thursday night.

VARIETY SHOW, TOO

And there will be a variety show headed by Jimmy Durante and Garry Moore to highlight the first part of the program.

This word came back on the heels of revelation that campaign contributions to date totaled $2,428,258, or 31 per cent of the goal of $7,750,000 for the area's hospitals, health and social welfare agencies by Oct. 17.

Also, it was stated, the campaign's third "Dutch-Treat" report luncheon, featuring the four Industry and Finance Divisions, will be held at 12.30 today at the Hotel Statler with Col. Allan M. Pope, president of the First Boston Corp. and of the Welfare Council of New York, as main speaker.

Setting the pace for all-out residental solicitation over the week end, when contributors may be found at home, at least six of the 51 metropolitan communities participating in the drive are racing to top their local goals by Sunday night.

East Natick has callenged its neighbor, Wellesley, to a Sunday "Stay Home Day" competition. Braintree launched its campaign last Sunday with an "Over the Top By Monday Morning" slogan, and the town's 350 Red Feather workers are now striving to beat their own self-imposed deadline. Wakefield will observe "Door Bell Sunday" Oct. 7, and both Winchester and Melrose are straining hard to pull their own towns above the 100 per cent mark in time to turn their big Sunday night community rallies into true Victory celebration.

The Contributors

The War Fund acknowledged last night the following:

Subscriptions of Individuals

$10,000—Mrs. James Dean.

$3000—Mrs. John S. Curtis.

$2500—Mr. and Mrs. George R. Agassiz; Mrs. Fred R. Hayward.

$2000—Miss Fanny P. Mason.

$1600—Mr. and Mrs. Roland Gray.

$1000—Daniel R. Beggs; Miss Sanda Countway; Herbert W. Kendall.

$700—Mr. and Mrs. F. Andre Hunnewell.

$650—Mr. and Mrs. Irvin McD. Garfield.

$500—Robert W. Armstrong; Mrs. Russell Gray; Lt. Robert W. Sayles, Jr.; Mrs. Leverett S. Tuckerman.

Subscriptions of Companies

$37,500—Boston Edison Company.

$22,500—National Shawmut Bank of Boston.

$15,000—Draper Top Company.

$13,200—Munro, Kincaid, Edgehill, Inc.

$10,000—Foss & Company, Inc.

$7000—Boston Safe Deposit and Trust Company.

$6500—Blake & Company, Inc.

$500—Allied Kid Company.

$4400—Colonial Wool Company.

$4000—Walker Top Company.

$3500—Hotel Statler; Parker House-Hotel Bellevue.

$3300—Sheraton Corp.

$2000—The Carter's Ink Company.

$1600—Bird & Son, Inc.

$1500—Brown Brothers; Harriman & Co.; Doelcam Machine Tool Co.; Plimpton Press.

$1250 — Brockway-Smith-Haigh-Lovell Co.

$1000 — Barbour-Stockwell Company; Boston Varnish Company; Futurity Thread Company; Leigh Textile Company; A. S. MacDonald Commission Co.; Richard M. Ott & Son; The Vanta Company.

$825—Carter, Rice & Company Corp.

$800—J. Greenebaum Tanning Co.; C. Pappas Co., Inc.; White, Weld & Co.

$750—Webster-Thomas Co.; James O. Welch Company.

$650—Hotel Bradford.

$600—Hicks & Hodges Co.

$525—Glenside Hospital, Inc.

$500—Bay State Milling Company of N. E.; Cynthia Mills; D. C. Heath and Company; Hornblower & Weeks; Hotel Kenmore; Massachusetts Machine Shop, Inc.; T. Noonan & Sons Company; Paris Leather Company; Spaulding - Moss Company.

Oct 5 '45

VISION OF GREATNESS

When living in a great age it is well to know it. For more than two decades we in Boston and New England have been living in a great period of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. If a repertory theatre of virtuoso actors played in this city week after week the year round none but the classic dramas of ancient and modern literature, it could pour no greater stream of vital energy into our veins—if as much, for the literature of the stage is not as rich as that of music. Hardly two dozen tragedies of the first rank exist; the literature of music is almost an embarrassment of riches.

This afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its sixty-fifth season. Throughout the war this mighty instrument of joy, hope, peace, and the sacrament of beauty went on sounding. So far from letting us down, it held us up; never slackening its tours and schedules in the great concert halls of the land, it played devotedly in Army camps and war hospitals, and one of the historic moments in its career came last August when the Commonwealth of Massachusetts made the closing concert of the season at the Esplanade our public solemnization of the victory over Japan, with a moving address by the Governor and music by the Orchestra to an audience of forty thousand people, hushed and thankful.

The Orchestra has interwoven great music with the life of this community. Beginning more than six decades ago with a public that numbered hundreds, it widened like a majestic river to a public numbering thousands and, as its vibrations have extended to other cities, to Tanglewood, to the Esplanade, and to the broadcast of its Saturday evening concerts, these sightless couriers of the air now carry its art to the invisible millions. It would be hard to name an institution whose beneficence so easily, so naturally, so harmoniously transcends those barriers of nationality, race, color, creed or class which ordinarily divide mankind; for art is universal, and so is the response to it.

On December eighth, Dr. Jean Sibelius, the Finnish composer, will be eighty years old. In celebration of this world event in music, Dr. Koussevitzky will perform in the course of the season many of the symphonies and tone-poems of our—one says "our" for he belongs not alone to Finland but to the world—of our greatest living composer; and in these two men one sees how art, and the great figures which it animates, bestride the earth and dwarf its factional discords. Dr. Koussevitzky, born in Russia, has become a first citizen of Boston, a devoted servant of the greater community, and a passionate believer in the principles symbolized by the American social system. Their loyalty to the lands of their nativity does not preclude these two great artists from laboring to enrich and ennoble the life of other peoples.

"Moral education," says Whitehead, "is impossible apart from the habitual vision of greatness." Year after year the Boston Symphony Orchestra has kept before us the vision of greatness. We, its beneficiaries, can hardly imagine how different our lives would have been without it, and how much poorer. With the constant example of such excellence before us, we instinctively reject mediocrity, and our lives and this community abound in good work which could hardly have been done without the energization of such music sounding through a virtuoso orchestra from the brains and hearts of composers of genius. In the sociological evolution of our era, too, the Orchestra is moving powerfully forward into the new age, evolving from the instrument of a musical elite into a People's Orchestra, admired, prized, and loved by us, the multitude, who owe to it so many great occasions when it fortified our courage, assuaged our griefs, and made glad our hearts.

That majestic cathedral of sound which arises arch by arch and pinnacle by pinnacle when the Orchestra begins to play, is doubly dedicate—a temple of art and of religion.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT

OCT 5 - 1945

BERKSHIRE CONCERTS

Boston, Oct. 5—(UP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra's Berkshire festival concerts, ~~which had~~ gained national renown prior to Pearl Harbor, will be resumed on a full scale basis next summer after several seasons of substitute programs, it was announced today.

WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT

OCT 4 - 1945

BOSTON SYMPHONY

(Boston Post)

Boston has good reason to be proud of its own Boston Symphony Orchestra, now preparing to open its 65th seasn on Friday. This group has won world acclaim and seems to get better as the years go on. Not a little of this excellence is due to its exacting conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who has no thoughts of any let-down although he himself is starting his 22nd year as its director. There is a heritage and a permanence behind the brilliant record he and his musicians have built up through the years. There is every reason to believe Boston Symphony's 65th season will be its greatest.

LYNN, MASS.
ITEM

OCT 5 - 1945

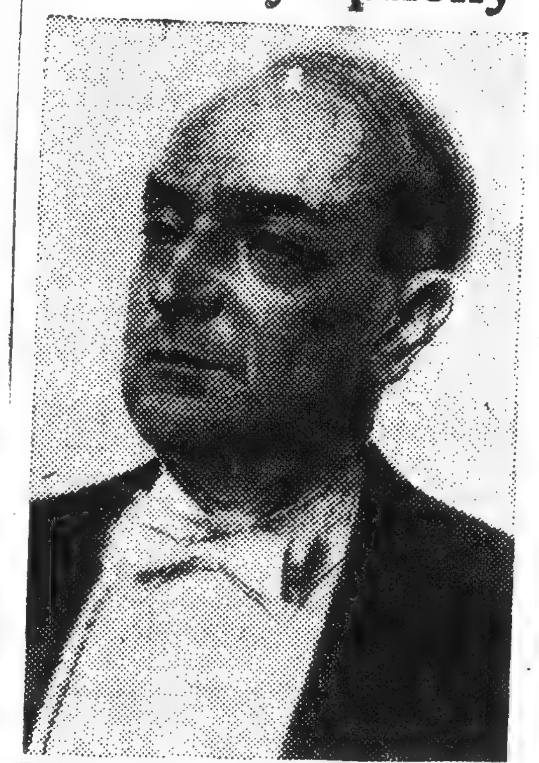
TANGLEWOOD A GIFT

STOCKBRIDGE, Oct. 5—(AP)—The board of directors of the Berkshire symphonic festival has made a gift of their music shed at Tanglewood to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

VICKSBURG, MISS.
POST

OCT 6 - 1945

Leads Symphony



Indisputably among the top American conductors is Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who leads the Boston Symphony for the twenty-second consecutive season. "The Boston," considered by musical authorities the finest symphony in the United States, can again be enjoyed by music lovers throughout the country when the Symphony begins its new fall series tonight at 8:30 over WQBC.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

OCT 6 - 1945

Symphony Hall Filled for Season's Opening

BOSTON—Symphony Hall was filled to the topmost seat in the second balcony as the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 65th season yesterday afternoon. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, was given an enthusiastic ovation as he appeared before the audience to start his 22d year.

The program included Beethoven's Eroica symphony, long a favorite in Boston, and Aaron Copland's suite for the ballet, "Appalachian Spring," which was its first performance in Boston. This work was commissioned by Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge and was played for the first time Oct. 30, 1944, in the Coolidge auditorium, Washington, on her 80th birthday.

Copland said that one of the themes he took from a collection of Shaker melodies compiled by Edward D. Andrews and published under the title "The Gift To Be Simple." He said he borrowed it and used it almost literally. The melodies were prepared for publication by Mr. Andrews with the help of Conrad Held formerly of the South Mountain String Quartet, Pittsfield.

Next week the orchestra will play the Sibelius Symphony No. 1 in honor of the composer's birthday.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

OCT 6 - 1945

Tanglewood Festival in '46

BOSTON, Oct. 5 (AP).—Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today that its festivals at Tanglewood in the Berkshires would be resumed next summer on the pre-war scale. Regular summer concerts were discontinued at the start of the war, but a substitute series with a smaller orchestra was held each season. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, today starting his twenty-second year as conductor with the opening of the orchestra's sixty-fifth season here, will conduct for the Thursday, Saturday and Sunday concerts in the Berkshires beginning July 25.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 419,447) (S 805,967)

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 6 - 1945

TANGLEWOOD FETES SET

Boston Symphony to Resume in Berkshires on Pre-War Scale

BOSTON, Oct. 5 (AP)—Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announced today that its festivals at Tanglewood in the Berkshires would be resumed next summer on the pre-war scale. Regular summer concerts were discontinued at the start of the war, but a substitute series with a smaller orchestra was held each season.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, today starting his twenty-second year as conductor with the opening of the orchestra's sixty-fifth season here, will conduct for the Thursday, Saturday and Sunday concerts in the Berkshires beginning July 25.

[16]

For immediate release

October 5 - Jerome D. Greene, President of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when informed today by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith of the action taken yesterday at the Annual Meeting of the Directors of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, said

"The recent decision of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival Association to turn over to the Boston Symphony Orchestra the great 'Shed' at Tanglewood, for which they had raised the funds to supply a satisfactory auditorium for the concerts of the Berkshire Festival, was a most generous recognition of the permanent place the Festival had won in the musical life of our country and of the Boston Orchestra's part in that achievement. Happily, the resumption of the Festival as a full responsibility of the Orchestra, and the utilization of the superb facilities of its own Tanglewood estate, in no way lessens the cooperation which the concerts will receive from the residents of Berkshire County, to whose initiative the Berkshire Festival is wholly due. Among them, the music-loving public is especially indebted to the indomitable energy and public spirit of Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, President of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival Association."

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's message to Miss Robinson Smith read as follows:

"Infinitely touched to receive your message. Your decision is a magnificent and far-seeing action which will be remembered by the musical world. To you personally and to the members of your Board go my deepfelt appreciation and greetings.'

Dr. Koussevitzky said -

"I look forward with great anticipation to next summer. When I first learned of the ambitious programme which Miss Robinson Smith had in mind, it seemed like a dream, but I was soon to know that this dream was to be brought into the realm of reality. When in addition the Orchestra was given Tanglewood, - the most ideal location for these plans - I was convinced that nothing could interfere with our great ambition to widen musical horizons."

Mr. Greene then outlined next summer's plans as follows:

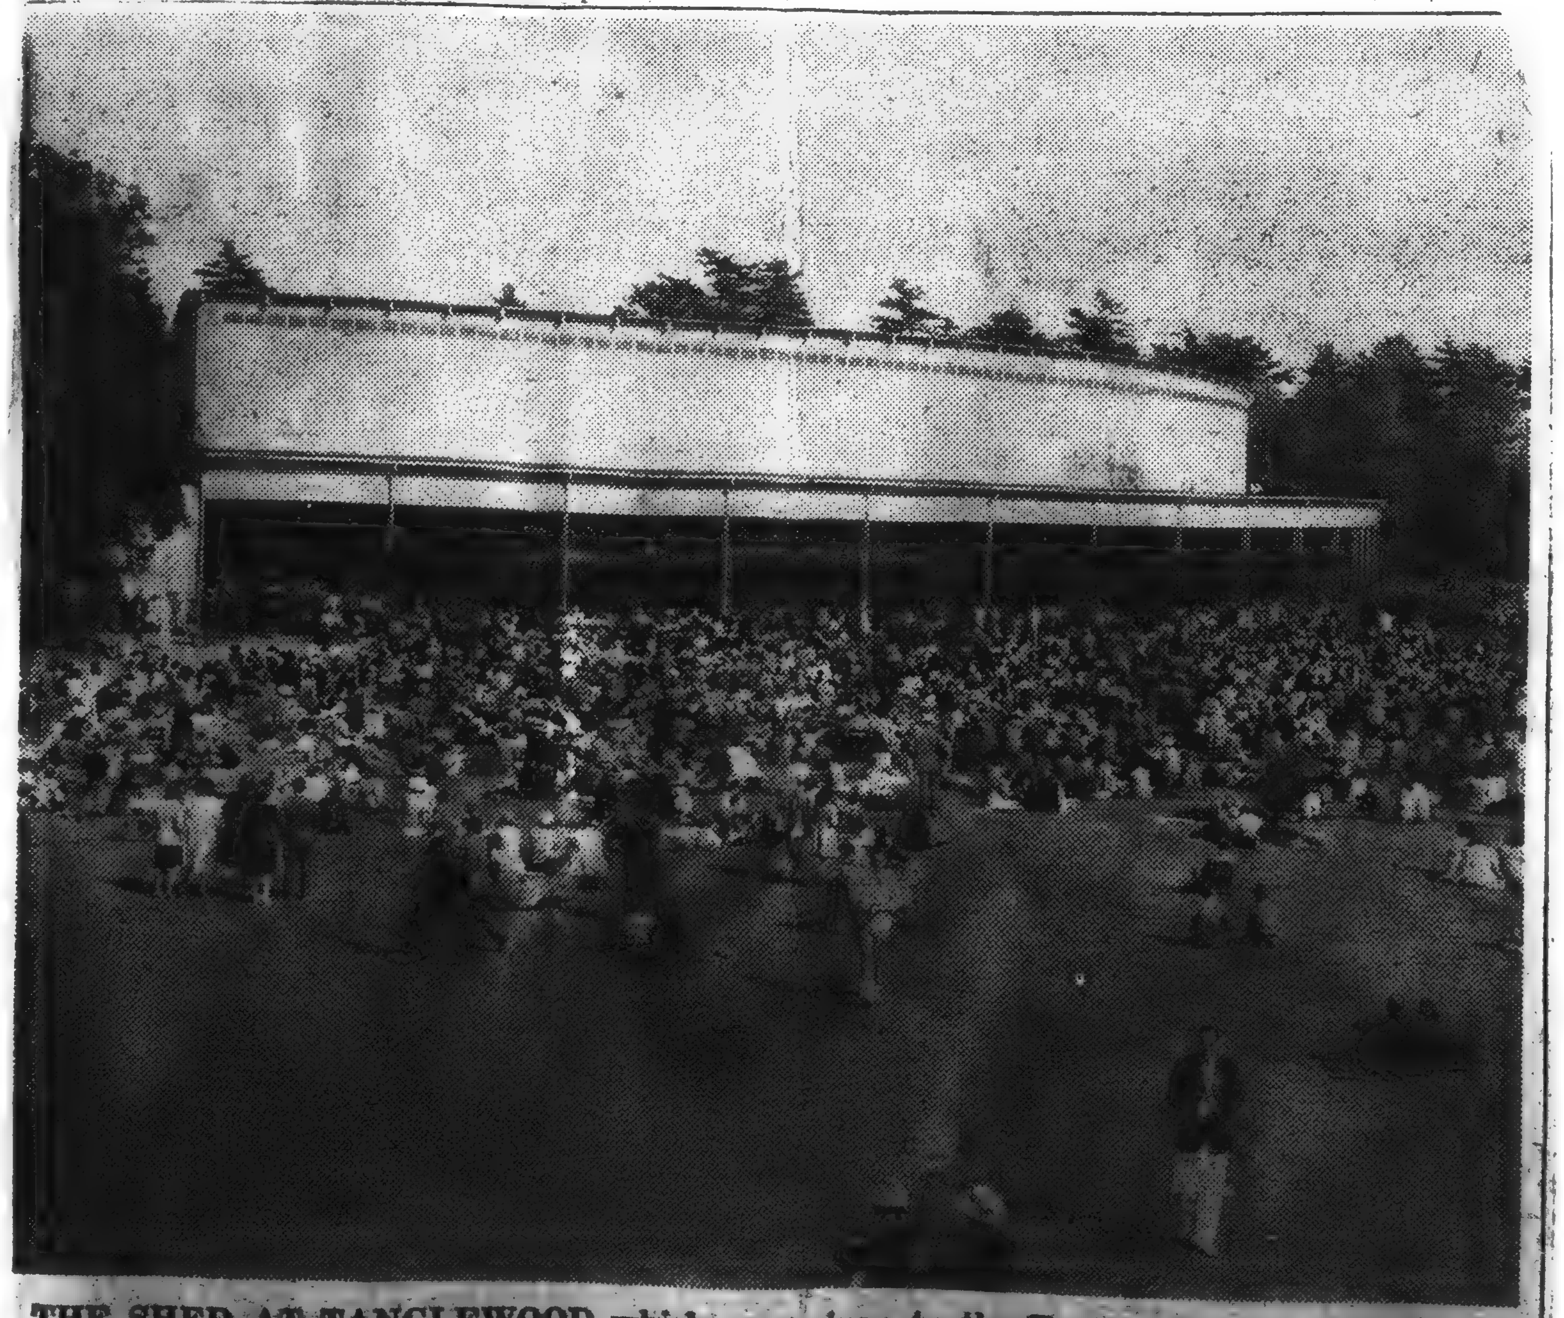
"The experience of the six summers, from 1936 to 1941, has carried the Festival from the stage of an experiment to that of an established feature of the musical calendar which nothing less than the world war could have interrupted. But if the war broke the continuity of the Festivals it also afforded ample evidence that the public's appreciation of symphonic music so far from being diminished by the war has been perceptibly increased.

"An important first chapter has already been written. The Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have authorized the resumption of the Festival and the Berkshire Music Center next summer on a pattern essentially like the one in operation in the last full season before the War, - that is, in the summer of 1941, when there were nine symphony concerts over a period of three weeks. These concerts under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will again be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, opening on July 25th. Former subscribers will be given first option on their seats. The School will open on July 1st, and will again have for its Director, Dr. Koussevitzky, who will be assisted by the principals and other members of the Orchestra, and by distinguished leaders in charge of each department.

All inquiries or communications about the Festival concerts or the School should be addressed to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall, Boston, 15, Massachusetts.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

OCT 5 1945



THE SHED AT TANGLEWOOD which was given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday by the Berkshire Festival Corporation as it appeared during [illegible] concert. The building, costing $100,000, was built on property owned by the orchestra.

Post Oct 6

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 65th season yesterday afternoon with no more important change than a slightly less ornate cover on the program book. The other innovation, that affects chiefly the radio audience, is the placing ahead of the hour that goes on the air Saturday evening—from 8:30 to 9:30. Everything else remains the same, even to "The Spangled Banner" at the beginning of the concert. One had imagined that this playing of the National Anthem would cease with the end of the war, as it did in 1918. However, the audience did not wait to be summoned to its feet by Dr. Koussevitzky but rose spontaneously in affectionate greeting when the conductor came upon the platform to begin his own 22nd season as the orchestra's leader.

It is more than a mere coincidence that both the Boston Symphony and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony are starting out the year with Beethoven's "Eroica" and the Suite from Aaron Copland's ballet "Appalachian Spring." The "Eroica" is more than just a symphony. First intended as a tribute to Napoleon, it remains a musical expression of the heroic spirit in any guise and it contains the most solemn of funeral marches. A note on yesterday's program stated that the performance was dedicated "to the peace of the world, and to the heroism which has made it possible."

As for Mr. Copland's Pulitzer Prize-winning ballet, the music is so appealing and attractive, so folksy, so tender and touching that one would expect conductors to seize the first opportunity of placing it on a program, and Koussevitzky, Rodzinsky and Erich Leinsdorf in Cleveland have done that very thing. The original score for Martha Graham's ballet called for a chamber ensemble of 13 instruments. It has now been arranged for full orchestra but the essential fragrance of the music has been retained. It has not been smothered or inflated. Actually the new score abounds in lovely sonorities and, when needed, there is plenty of brilliance. In its celebration of the emotions of a newly wedded mountain couple about to take possession of their home, this music is truly American in spirit, and with other recent works helps to proclaim Mr. Copland our leading native tone poet. He was present yesterday

---

PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS HERALD

OCT 6 19

Symphony Orchestra

Boston Globe

"Moral education," says Whitehead, "is impossible apart from the habitual vision of greatness." Year after year the Boston Symphony Orchestra has kept before us the vision of greatness. We, its beneficiaries, can hardly imagine how different our lives would have been without it, and how much poorer. With the constant example of such excellence before us, we instinctively reject mediocrity, and our lives and this community abound in good work which could hardly have been done without the energization of such music sounding through a virtuoso orchestra from the brains and hearts of composers of genius.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA
GAZETTE

OCT 6 1945

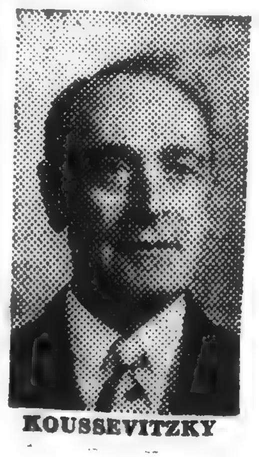
Radio

Boston Symphony Broadcasts Begin on ABC Tonight

BROADCAST OF concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will resume on the air Saturday in the 8:30 to 9:30 p.m. spot on ABC and KXEL. This is the orchestra's sixty-fifth season. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is conductor.

Thirty concerts will be presented. Four guest conductors—Sir Adrian Boult, Fritz Reiner, Igor Stravinsky and Leonard Bernstein—will be featured during the season.

Most of the programs will come from Symphony Hall, Boston.



KOUSSEVITZKY

* * *

[17]

For immediate release

October 5 - Jerome D. Greene, President of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when informed today by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith of the action taken yesterday at the Annual Meeting of the Directors of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, said

"The recent decision of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival Association to turn over to the Boston Symphony Orchestra the great 'Shed' at Tanglewood, for which they had raised the funds to supply a satisfactory auditorium for the concerts of the Berkshire Festival, was a most generous recognition of the permanent place the Festival had won in the musical life of our country and of the Boston Orchestra's part in that achievement. Happily, the resumption of the Festival as a full responsibility of the Orchestra, and the utilization of the superb facilities of its own Tanglewood estate, in no way lessens the cooperation which the concerts will receive from the residents of Berkshire County, to whose initiative the Berkshire Festival is wholly due. Among them, the music-loving public is especially indebted to the indomitable energy and public spirit of Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, President of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival Association."

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's message to Miss Robinson Smith read as follows:

"Infinitely touched to receive your message. Your decision is a magnificent and far-seeing action which will be remembered by the musical world. To you personally and to the members of your Board go my deepfelt appreciation and greetings."

Dr. Koussevitzky said -

"I look forward with great anticipation to next summer. When I first learned of the ambitious programme which Miss Robinson Smith had in mind, it seemed like a dream, but I was soon to know that this dream was to be brought into the realm of reality. When in addition the Orchestra was given Tanglewood, - the most ideal location for these plans - I was convinced that nothing could interfere with our great ambition to widen musical horizons."

Mr. Greene then outlined next summer's plans as follows:

"The experience of the six summers, from 1936 to 1941, has carried the Festival from the stage of an experiment to that of an established feature of the musical calendar which nothing less than the world war could have interrupted. But if the war broke the continuity of the Festivals it also afforded ample evidence that the public's appreciation of symphonic music so far from being diminished by the war has been perceptibly increased.

"An important first chapter has already been written. The Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have authorized the resumption of the Festival and the Berkshire Music Center next summer on a pattern essentially like the one in operation in the last full season before the War, - that is, in the summer of 1941, when there were nine symphony concerts over a period of three weeks. These concerts under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will again be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, opening on July 25th. Former subscribers will be given first option on their seats. The School will open on July 1st, and will again have for its Director, Dr. Koussevitzky, who will be assisted by the principals and other members of the Orchestra, and by distinguished leaders in charge of each department.

All inquiries or communications about the Festival concerts or the School should be addressed to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall, Boston, 15, Massachusetts.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 65th season yesterday afternoon with no more important change than a slightly less ornate cover on the program book. The other innovation, that affects chiefly the radio audience, is the placing ahead of the hour that goes on the air Saturday evening—from 8:30 to 9:30. Everything else remains the same, even to "The Spangled Banner" at the beginning of the concert. One had imagined that this playing of the National Anthem would cease with the end of the war, as it did in 1918. However, the audience did not wait to be summoned to its feet by Dr. Koussevitzky but rose spontaneously in affectionate greeting when the conductor came upon the platform to begin his own 22nd season as the orchestra's leader.

It is more than a mere coincidence that both the Boston Symphony and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony are starting out the year with Beethoven's "Eroica" and the Suite from Aaron Copland's ballet "Appalachian Spring." The "Eroica" is more than just a symphony. First intended as a tribute to Napoleon, it remains a musical expression of the heroic spirit in any guise and it contains the most solemn of funeral marches. A note on yesterday's program stated that the performance was dedicated "to the peace of the world, and to the heroism which has made it possible."

As for Mr. Copland's Pulitzer Prize-winning ballet, the music is so appealing and attractive, so folksy, so tender and touching that one would expect conductors to seize the first opportunity of placing it on a program, and Koussevitzky, Rodzinsky and Erich Leinsdorf in Cleveland have done that very thing. The original score for Martha Graham's ballet called for a chamber ensemble of 13 instruments. It has now been arranged for full orchestra but the essential fragrance of the music has been retained. It has not been smothered or inflated. Actually the new score abounds in lovely sonorities and, when needed, there is plenty of brilliance. In its celebration of the emotions of a newly wedded mountain couple about to take possession of their home, this music is truly American in spirit, and with other recent works helps to proclaim Mr. Copland our leading native tone poet. He was present yesterday

---

PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS HERALD

OCT 6 - 1945

Symphony Orchestra
Boston Globe

"Moral education," says Whitehead, "is impossible apart from the habitual vision of greatness." Year after year the Boston Symphony Orchestra has kept before us the vision of greatness. We, its beneficiaries, can hardly imagine how different our lives would have been without it, and how much poorer. With the constant example of such excellence before us, we instinctively reject mediocrity, and our lives and this community abound in good work which could hardly have been done without the energization of such music sounding through a virtuoso orchestra from the brains and hearts of composers of genius.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

OCT 5 - 1945

THE SHED AT TANGLEWOOD which was given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday by the Berkshire Festival Corporation as it [illegible] concert. The building, costing $100,000, was built on property owned by the orchestra

---

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA
GAZETTE

OCT 6 1945

Radio

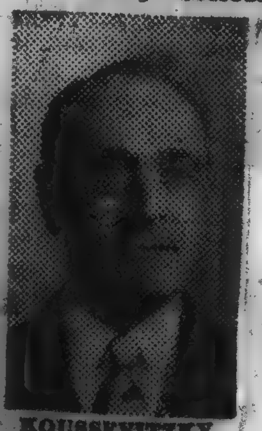
Boston Symphony Broadcasts Begin on ABC Tonight

BROADCAST OF concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will resume on the air Saturday in the 8:30 to 9:30 p.m. spot on ABC and KXEL. This is the orchestra's sixty-fifth season. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is conductor.

Thirty concerts will be presented. Four guest conductors—Sir Adrian Boult, Fritz Reiner, Igor Stravinsky and Leonard Bernstein—will be featured during the season.

Most of the programs will come from Symphony Hall, Boston.

* * *



KOUSSEVITZKY

[17]

Oct. 6

THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE

Symphony Opening Features Ballet 'Appalachian Spring' by Copland

By CYRUS DURGIN

The 65th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Everything looked, sounded and was much the same as it has been—blessedly—these several years. Once more the audience rose to greet Serge Koussevitzky as he entered to embark upon his 22d season as conductor of Boston's unparalleled orchestra. Once more, having acknowledged applause and bade his listeners be seated, Mr. Koussevitzky faced them and urged them to sing "The Star Spangled Banner."

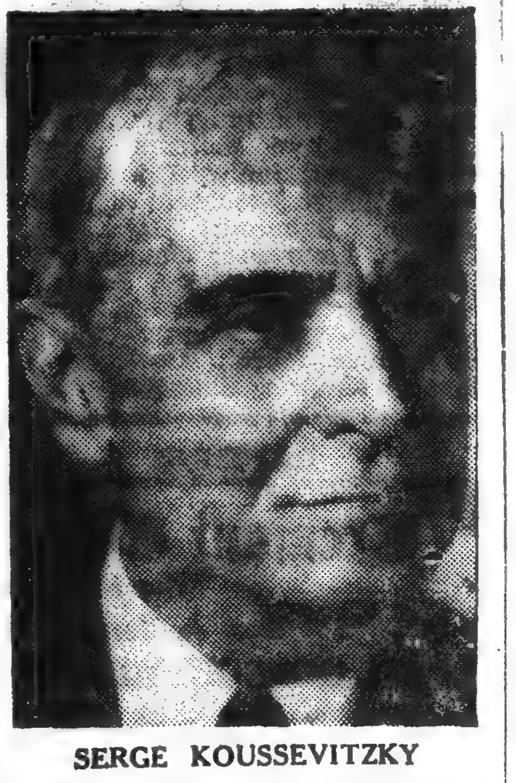
The concert began and ended with Beethoven: the "Leonore" Overture No. 3, and the "Eroica" Symphony. Over the years Mr. Koussevitzky has abandoned the tradition of performing only familiar music at opening and closing Boston Symphony concerts. Accordingly there was a new piece between overture and symphony: the Suite drawn by Aaron Copland from his ballet, "Appalachian Spring."

Music For Dancer

Mr. Copland wrote his ballet for the dancer, Martha Graham, upon commission from the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation. Originally designed for a chamber orchestra of 13 instruments, the composer enlarged his scoring for full symphonic ensemble, and that is the version heard this week.

There is always the danger, in transferring ballet music from theatre to concert hall, that what sounded engrossing as accompaniment to stage action may be less so when heard simply as music. "Appalachian Spring" does go on a bit long in concert performance, but mostly it holds attention by the ingenuity of its ideas and the general attractiveness of its style. It is good, clean, spare music whose orchestration is not just orchestration, but an indispensable and organic part of the score itself.

Of course the listener is helped if he reads the program of the ballet action, which tells of a bride-and-groom-to-be of the early 19th century and the festivities concerned with their new house. The beautiful introduction and the ending in similar manner would not necessarily evoke any tone-pictures in your mind, but the rhythmic dance interludes and the variations on the Shaker tune are very atmospheric. The main attribute of "Appalachian Spring," you might say, is lyricism.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The performance seemed to be excellent. Mr. Koussevitzky brought Mr. Copland upon the stage and there was applause for all concerned.

Performance Well Played

Boston's great conductor has given performances of the "Lenore" Overture and the "Eroica" Symphony that have been more exciting than the ones yesterday. Nevertheless, neither work could have been more clearly played with better style and pace or with a greater sense of symphonic growth and structure than Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra attained. Last season when he performed the "Eroica" at the opening concert, Mr. Koussevitzky dedicated the performance "to the heroes of the United Nations"; this week it is dedicated anew, to "the peace of the world and to the heroism which has made it possible."

There is something a little different, come to think of it. The design of the program book cover is changed.

Her. Oct 6

Society Packs First Concert Of Symphony

By ALISON ARNOLD

Boston's first peacetime symphony concert filled Symphony Hall to the topmost seat in the second balcony yesterday afternoon. The vast audience rose in salute to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the beloved conductor, as he appeared on the stage, and was wildly enthusiastic in its applause. The opening program of the orchestra's 65th season included Beethoven's Eroica Symphony, long a favorite in Boston, and as a complete contrast, Copland's suite from the ballet "Appalachian Spring," which was its first performance in this city.

Bostonians as a whole prefer Beethoven, and many were soothed into slumber by its quieter bits. One elderly lady tried unsuccessfully to nod her head in rhythm to the Copland selection, but gave it up with a puzzled frown. There weren't many naps taken during that number.

This first Friday afternoon concert is always festive, and this year, with the war over, it was more so than usual. During the intermission, friends greeted friends after the long summer, and everyone seemed glad to be back in town again for the winter season, which really begins with the opening of Symphony.

There were many mothers and daughters in the audience, as Symphony is traditional as family portraits and silver. With Mrs. Dudley L. Pickman, in a black caped suit, was her eldest daughter, Mrs. Alfred Wright, Jr., in black with touches of pink. Mrs. William Dexter was accompanied by her daughter, Miss Constance Dexter, and with Mrs. Fuller Halsey was her daughter, Mrs. Dudley Talbot, very glamorous in royal blue. Other mothers and daughters were Mrs. Augustus W. Soule and Miss Marjorie Soule; and Mrs. Homer F. Livermore and Miss Joan Livermore.

The new high-crowned hats were much in evidence, Mrs. Francis P. Sears sporting a white felt one with a huge red bow. Mrs. Robert Treat Paine's white felt had a perky black bow, and her pearls made another white accent with her smart black ensemble. Mrs. Alfred R. McIntyre, chic in black with sables, was telling friends that her son, Mr. Harry McIntyre, has been discharged from the Army Air Forces and is studying at Columbia University.

Mrs. Francis B. Crowninshield and Mrs. James Hammond attended together and among others in the audience were: Mrs. Ralph Bradley, Mrs. William Dana Orcutt, Mr. and Mrs. Eben Draper, Mrs. Allan Forbes, Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird, Mrs. Charles Higginson, Mrs. John G. Palfrey, Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, Mrs. Charles P. Howard, Mrs. Charles Gaston Smith, Mrs. Frederick J. Bradlee, Mrs. Frank Stewart, Mrs. John Lyman, Mrs. B. Harrison Ragle, Mrs. John Bartol, Mrs. Henry McBurney Parker, Mrs. Charles P. Ware, Mrs. Richard Thorndike, Mrs. Edward P. Roberts and Mrs. Parker Converse.

Herald Oct. 6

THE

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the first concert of its 65th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, performing the following program:

Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72 Beethoven
Suite from "Appalachian Spring" Copland
Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Op. 55 Beethoven

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

"The performance is dedicated to the peace of the world and to the heroism which has made it possible."

I don't know who wrote that small line of type, which appeared on the printed program of the opening concert of the 65th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, but I can't think of a simpler, more beautiful or more distinguished dedication attendant on a concert of music, and it lent additional distinction to what was—from any point of view—a most exceptional musical experience.

The opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra always is exceptional for that matter. It's as much a social (or rather, sociological) thing as a concert of music. It is gala—in a discreet sort of way—exciting—in a well-bred manner—and warm—in a reserved fashion all its own. It is also a sort of beginning, a renewal, a beckoning to think once again of more mature musical values, a challenge to accept the responsibility of listening with the heart and mind as well as the viscera.

All these things with the terrific—if nonetheless inexpressible—sense of relief, of thanksgiving, of joy that peace is at last here that must be felt by everyone contrived to give yesterday's concert a special meaning. For there was, with most of us, I think, the realization that there it was, untouched, intact, perfect. It had withstood the torments of a world five years at war and had emerged unscathed, more firmly rooted and greater than ever before. Why? Because there were young men (many of whom would have dearly loved to have been there yesterday) who lost their lives to see to it that it—and many other things we hold dear—would hold firm.

While I am afraid almost anything would have sounded incredibly good to me yesterday, I am quite sure that the music was unimpeachable from the most critical point of view. The Beethoven, both the Leonore Overture and the "Eroica" were superb as performances (I still can't believe that an orchestra of living men can sound so wonderful and be so in response to themselves and their conductor) and marvelous as interpretations. It was a performance by Dr. Koussevitzky of great technical virtuosity combined with a depth and a sincerity of appraoch while the orchestra was just unbelievable.

Aaron Copland's "Appalachian Spring" is a masterpiece, a thing of rare and fresh beauty and a delight from beginning to end. This is "American" music at its best; beguiling, humorous, gay, powerful, passionate but not voluptuous. No posing, no posturing, no straining for effects, no self-consciousness, no bombast, no Americana for Americana's sake, no tie-in with Sandburg, Walt Whitman or Abe Lincoln, no pretentiousness, no smart-alecks; nothing but musicality expressed in an idiom of the utmost ease and freshness without the slightest striving for newness or novelty (which it thereby seems to attain). I didn't see the ballet that goes along with it; didn't even read the program notes that explain the action, but I had a wonderful time just the same with it, and I think you will, too. It's a really delightful piece and Mr. Copland deserves all the prizes he got for it. He appeared on the stage and got a fine reception from the audience.

As for Dr. Koussevitzky, he never looked younger or better, and certainly never demonstrated more clearly his really stupendous musicianship. Moreover, in the Copland, he got the beat of that unequicably American music as if he had been born in Sioux Falls. He was, in short, superb, and so was his concert.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 7 - 1945

Boston Greets Music Season

Traditional Audience Attends Opening Concert Given by Symphony Orchestra

Special to the Providence Sunday Journal

BOSTON, Oct. 6.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 65th season Friday afternoon when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was greeted in Symphony Hall by an audience as traditional as the Bulfinch houses facing Boston Common.

The usual vast audience rose to applaud the world-renowned conductor on Friday, many from the same seat locations in which they have watched that dynamic figure since he first came to Boston. First row faces included those of Mrs. Henry H. Fay Jr., Mrs. William Dana Orcutt, Miss Harriet Rantoul and Miss Edith Rantoul.

Still other traditional symphony-goers who were present Friday were Mrs. Edwin S. Webster, Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, Mrs. Francis P. Sears, Mrs. Julian Crocker, Mrs. Louis Frothingham, Mrs. Thomas D. Cabot, Mrs. Robert Treat Paine, Mrs. Alexander Forbes, Mrs. John S. Ames, Mrs. George H. Lyman, Mrs. Henry Hornblower, Mrs. John W. Bartol, Mrs. Edward Jackson Holmes, Mrs. Roger

---

NEWPORT NEWS, VA.
PRESS

OCT 7 - 1945

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will inaugurate his Sibelious Festival over Station WGH and the American Broadcasting company next Saturday when the Boston Symphony orchestra is heard in its weekly concert from 9:30 to 10:30 p. m.

The Finnish master, who will be 80 years old in December, will be honored during the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra with Dr. Koussevitzky presenting his principal symphonies and tone poems. It was the Boston conductor who introduced many of Sibelius' scores to this country.

Ten years ago, when Sibelius was honored at Helsinki, Dr. Koussevitzky opened the festival there and received several awards from the Finland Government. Sibelius attended and both composer and conductor became close friends.

The first in the annual series of "Industrial Salutes," a feature of the ABC broadcasts will be heard during next Saturday's concert. On that accasion the iron and steel industry will be saluted.

The general theme of the tribute this year will be the contribution made by each industry to American good-living. Last year the salutes concerned the contributions made by the various industries to the war effort.

War time research has been responsible for many developments which will affect the American way of life and various industries have played important roles in this work. For this reason, on each of sever programs during the season, the special tributes will be paid.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

OCT 7 1945

DR. KOUSSEVITSKY . . . will inaugurate his Silbelius festival over the American Broadcasting network on Saturday, Oct. 13, when the Boston orchestra is heard in its regular weekly concert. The Finnish composer, who will be 80 years old in December, will be honored by Dr. Koussevitsky during the entire season and on Saturday night he will present the "Swan of Tuonela" and the First Symphony.

YOUNGSTOWN, O.
VINDICATOR

OCT 7 - 1945

Bostonians Heard in Records Of Brahms's Symphony No. 3

By Col. L. R. Boals

The featured item of RCA Victor's September Red Seal release is a recording of Brahms's Symphony No. 3, in F major, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Serge Koussevitzky. This symphony is considered by many to be the most appealing of the four which Brahms composed in this form.

It was given its first performance in Vienna Dec. 2, 1883, under the direction of Hans Richter, who christened it the "Eroica," probably with the heroic proportions of the first and fourth movements in mind. Early critics considered Brahms "heavy" and obscure. But music whose beauty is on the surface to be appreciated immediately is the kind of music that does not last. As someone has written, "One of the chiefest charms of the music of Brahms is its endless revelation of new and unsuspected loveliness; of hidden perfections, adumbrated to our perceptions even after the 10th and the 50th hearing."

Our great advantage over the early critics is that they could hear such a work only occasionally, while the possessor of a recording of the work can hear it, or any part of it, as often as he wishes. And the possessor of a recording by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky can hear it under the best conditions, for there is probably no better orchestra in the world than the Bostonians—in fact, many think this orchestra has no peer—and the interpretation of Mr. Koussevitsky is authoritative and convincing. The tone of the orchestra is lovely beyond words and is faithfully caught by the engineers. The symphony is recorded on the four 12-inch disks of the Masterpiece Album DM-1007.

KNOXVILLE, TENN.
JOURNAL

OCT 7 - 1945

Disc Data

by Virginia Ragsdale

Of course, music critics vary in their likes of great masterpieces but to us Brahms' Third Symphony is the most beautiful of them all

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzy has just completed the works in album form for Victor.

The Third Movement of this symphony is considered by many to be the outstanding one found in any of the four symphonies written by the great composer. To tie it up in a few words, it is the essence of romanticism in music.

Dr. Koussevitzky's beautiful interpretation of the works is beyond reproach. He has previously recorded the two first symphonies by the master and has but one to go, the No. 4 in E minor."

To give a little more vivid picture of this third symphony in F. Op. 90, a noted German critic said of it: "It is Brahms' most typical, personal and important symphonic work. In no other has his whole personality found such marvelously pure and undisguised expression, in no other symphony has he displayed such spiritual independence as this."

Victor lists the album as M or Dm-1007.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 7 - 1945

Hemidemisemiquavers: Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the first performance of Martinu's Third Symphony at the second concert of the season at Symphony Hall, Boston, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week. . . . Nicolai Lopatnikoff, Russian composer, recently assumed his new post as Assistant Professor of Composition and Theory at the Carnegie Institute of Technology in Pittsburgh. . . . Margit Bokor, Viennese soprano, has been invited by Bruno Walter to take the role of Susanna in Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro" during the Chicago Opera Company's season.

BOSTON

"Conductor Magic" of Boston Symphony Leader Explains Reason of Orchestra's Amazing Qualities in "Soft, soft—almost nothing!" is what Koussevitzky indicates here with his eloquent left hand, while his baton signals the instant of "attacking" the opening note.

All that the orchestra can give is bound to result when confronted by this look of command on Koussevitzky's face, preceded by the whip-like downward movement of the baton, and followed by a stabbing motion of that left forefinger.

These remarkable action photos were taken by Richard Tucker on the stage of Symphony Hall during a rehearsal. Koussevitzky made it a condition that he would not pose—that he must keep on uninterruptedly at the serious business of rehearsing. The resulting photos show Koussevitzky to the reader as he looks to his men, and as no audience ever sees him.

BY ELEANOR ROBERTS

When the incomparable Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 65th season last Friday night at venerable old Symphony Hall, an impeccably tailored, proud, gray-haired gentleman stepped on the podium, made his bow to an audience composed chiefly of Back Bay nobility, then turning imperiously to his orchestra, rapped his baton sharply for attention.

For the past 22 years Sergei Alexandrovich Koussevitzky has been the glue that held the Boston Symphony together. He has screamed at them, lunged at them, cajoled them sweetly, chattered crossly at them and even praised them, tongue-in-cheek saying, "Fine fine, iss iss fine, but now we must play it moch better!"

At 71 he is able to out-jitter the best jitterbug at Symphony rehearsals. But just as aptly he can transform himself into the picture of dejection if his men fail to achieve some artistic refinement he is driving at.

He will shake his head from side to side incredulously. His chest caves in, his shoulders droop and with a grief-stricken expression he will look at the 110 members of his great orchestra and say, "Gentlemen, iss eet possible, iss eet possible that ziss could be the Boston Symphony Orchestra? NO—we must play like zee Boston Symphony—one, two three!"

Conductor Magic

This is what Koussevitzky refers to as "conductor magic" or the psychological influence. In an exclusive interview, his first of the season, the famous conductor explained the intricate and elusive conductor-musician relationship that pulled the Boston Symphony out of its historic slump in 1924 and not only sent it zooming to one of the top-ranking organizations of its kind in the United States—but kept it there!

"Artistical discipline," smiled Koussevitzky, his bright blue eyes dancing. (The conductor has a world-wide reputation for tailoring the English language to meet his needs. "It boffles me!" he said once, whereupon he proceeded to invent his own phrases.)

"I give them everything—and they give it back to me. Understand me, eet iss not like a boss and employee. I drive them, yess, but we work together."

When Koussevitzky says he gives them everything, this is no mere understatement. He puts such terrific wear and tear on his mental, physical and emotional resources during rehearsals and performances that men half his age are exhausted.

"The moment I feel I cannot do this," said Koussevitzky, "I will stop conducting and give my stick to a younger man. I must be able to give this, so I can receive it back from my men!"

Koussevitzky's famous left forefinger pointed accusingly at some erring fiddler or over energetic wind instrument has appeared to many a Boston Symphony man in his dreams causing him to awake with a start, bathed in perspiration.

So well attuned to each other are the famous conductor and his men that a mere look from Koussevitzky will prompt a man to go up to his dressing-room after rehearsal and launch into a 15-minute apology.

Just Too Late

With a reputation as a hard master Koussevitzky is used to apologies. In fact, he expects them.

Although Koussevitzky admittedly has a volcanic temper he keeps it well in hand. Unlike other renowned conductors who in fits of temper toss the furniture around, yell at and abuse the men, Koussevitzky is always the gentleman. His anger may boil and bubble furiously but he always turns the gas down under the kettle before it overflows.

This virtue endears him to his men who are inordinately proud of playing under Koussevitzky. There isn't a musician among the 110 members of the orchestra who, from 10 in the morning to 1 in the afternoon, doesn't belong, heart and soul, to his conductor.

But Naturally!

Many people accuse Koussevitzky of being egotistical, but actually he only acknowledges his great worth as a conductor of note. He has heard such great composers as Tchaikowsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Saint-Saens and Debussy conduct their own works and as great as they were as composers, they were distinctly ordinary as conductors.

One admirer who had listened to both Koussevitzky and the composers confided to him, "You know, Dr. Koussevitzky, it sounded so much better when you conducted it than it did when the composers did."

"But naturally!" replied Koussevitzky.

This was no back-patting on the conductor's part for it is a well-known fact that most composers are unable to conduct their own music to perfection.

Koussevitzky's methods of getting what he wants are many and varied. Once a year, for instance, it has been his custom to put on one of the great masterpieces, calling for a full orchestra and a large chorus.

On one occasion before rehearsal when the orchestra and chorus began he turned to the chorus and addressing them with beaming face and in the friendliest voice said, "Ladies and gentlemen—you have beautiful voices and I have not.

"If you sing well you will have my deepest gratitude and admiration.

"But," and here he paused, "if you sing bad—then I will drown you out with my orchestra!"

Nobody is more aware of how bad Koussevitzky's voice is than his orchestra members. During rehearsals he often sings a few bars to illustrate the way he wants them played, in an unalluring voice. But unfailingly his men get the idea of what he wants and after a two-minute concert by their maestro are able to play it exactly as he wants it.

Rehearsal Jacket

Although Koussevitzky is a miracle of tailoring in evening clothes, he turns up for rehearsals in a shapeless, special rehearsal jacket. The collar slopes way down in the back, there is apparently no fit to it and Koussy or "old man," as his orchestra calls him, looks very unlike the firmly pedestaled idol that greets his audiences on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings.

The jacket, however, is a product of Koussevitzky's designing genius. As carefully as an architect makes a blueprint Koussevitzky designed a jacket that wouldn't bind his arms as he moved around in it, or split down the back when he threw up his arms in the familiar gesture of monumental despair.

Any normal jacket would have long ago, torn out at the armpits after just one morning of Koussevitzky's podium gymnastics. His evening clothes are designed along the same principles and he is one of the few men to wear a soft collar with an evening suit and escape detection.

Way back in the early days of his career when he was conducting in Moscow, he dressed in the standard fashion of the conductor, with a stiff wing-type collar that was in great wing-type collar that threatened to guillotine him. Every time he turned his head he expected it to roll at the orchestra's feet. He was completely miserable, and when Koussevitzky conducts he wants nothing to interfere with the job at hand.

So he conferred with an exclusive manufacturer of men's collars and together they designed one that neither severed his neck nor suffocated him.

Victor Anticipates

Responsible for keeping Koussevitzky the beau brummel of the baton is his moody-looking valet, Victor, who has been with his master ever since he came to America and who follows him around with great devotion. Victor is able to anticipate the conductor's needs almost before he knows what they are himself.

He is there to wipe Koussevitzky off after his performance when the great man comes off stage dripping with perspiration. It is Victor who hastily throws his master's European opera cloak over him as he leaves the stage.

Victor's wife is Koussevitzky's cook and she is as vigilant at seeing that the conductor gets regular, well-balanced meals as her husband is that his clothes are right at hand.

One thing that enables Koussevitzky to conserve so much of his energy for his music is the careful apportionment of all his time—so much for rehearsal, so much for seeing people, so much for eating, sleeping, program planning and exercising.

On the podium Koussevitzky is the Mordkin of the concert stage. He possesses all the physical eloquence of a ballet master. The graceful sweeps of the Koussevitzky wrists have been a delight to Boston Symphony goers for the last 22 years, the long, square fingers of the artistic hands are so expressive that his men can often tell from a mere gesture just what he wants.

There are two things Koussevitzky is famous for—one the amazingly transparent tone that only he seems able to draw from his orchestra, and the other, a repertory that is greater and gives more variety than any other conductor's in America.

Relentless Rehearsing

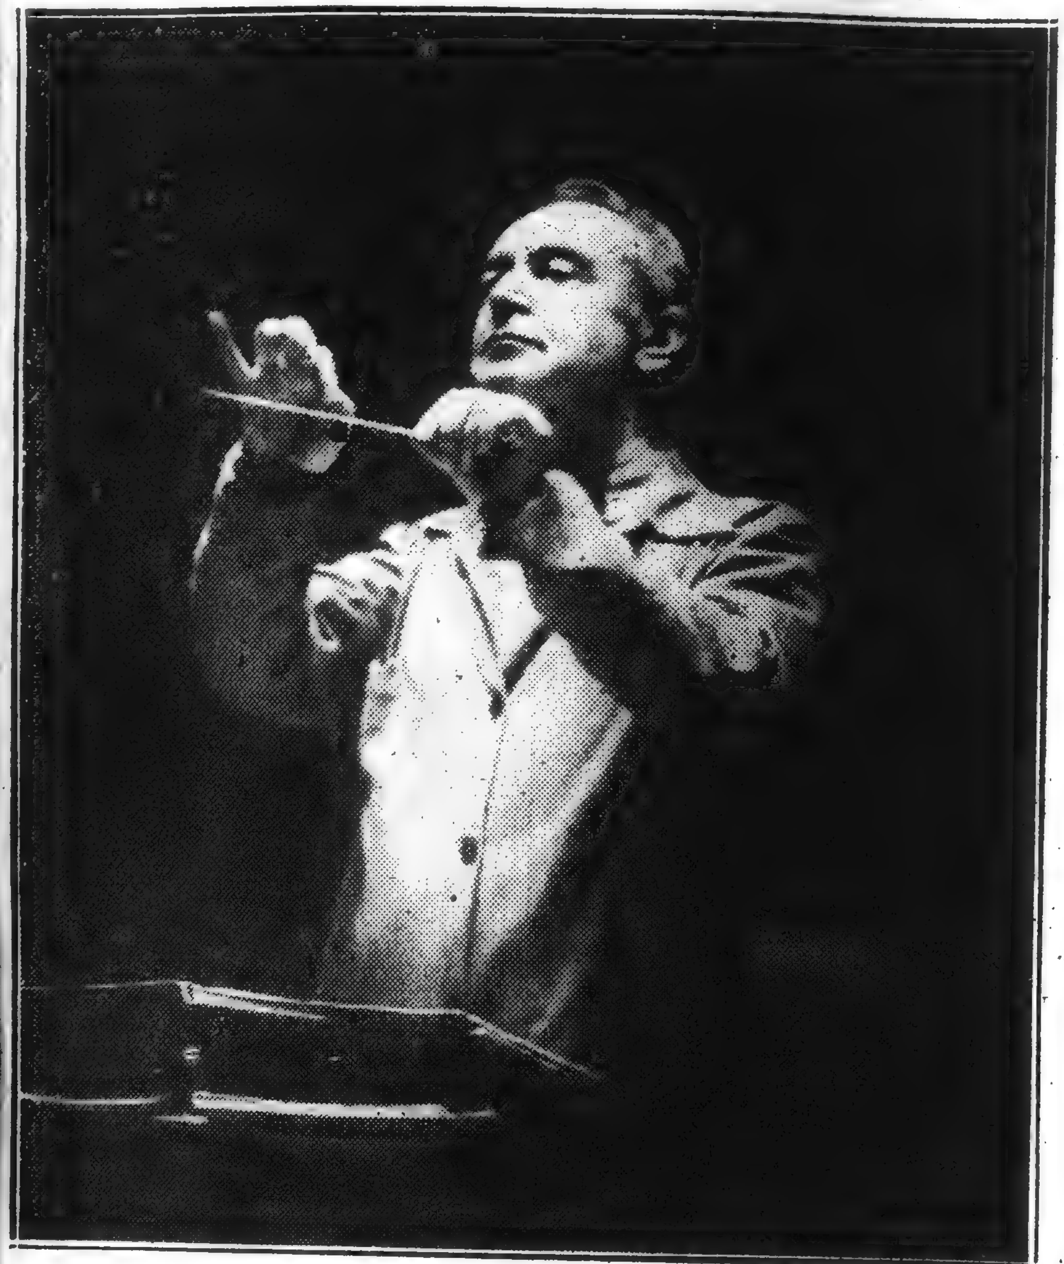
He probably conducts more kinds of music, ancient and modern, with a very high general average of brilliance than anyone else on the concert stage. But outstanding are his Tchaikovsky, Debussy, Ravel and Sibelius. It was Koussevitzky, in fact, who gave Debussy the final lift and sent him skyrocketing to fame when he invited Debussy to conduct his own composition in Moscow.

Certainly Koussevitzky has done more for American symphonic composers than any other conductor. He

SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 7, 1945

Koussevitzky

Interview as His 22nd Season Opens



The success or failure of a section of a composition, or maybe the whole of it, or even a whole program, depends, according to Koussevitzky, on the absolute perfection of the playing of the first note. He will therefore hold himself in a state of high tension, in such a statue-like pose as this, communicating equal tension to the orchestra, before signalling the "attack."

has introduced such important men as Hill, Piston, Harris, William Schuman, Leonard Bernstein, Lukas Foss, and Aaron Copland, whose "Appalachian Springs" had its first performance in Boston last Friday.. Instead of putting on only one performance of a modernist composer's works, allowing them to be forgotten afterwards, he repeats them so they won't fade into obscurity.

Few people realize the hours of rehearsing necessary for a successful concert. Koussevitzky is a relentless drillmaster. A story is told of the time he was preparing his ensemble for a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. He wanted a pianissimo from the 'cellos of the finest possible fibre sustained through a long passage, and he insisted that the 'cellos play it over and over again until the men gave him precisely what he wanted. He didn't stop until he got it!

While Koussevitzky's language, to the ordinary bystander, is a masterpiece of contradiction his men know perfectly well what he wants.. In rehearsing Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica," the orchestra worked up to a terrific crescendo that filled the hall with sound.

Rapping his baton sharply against the face of his conductor's score, Koussevitzky turned to his men and bellowed in an enraged tone, "Gentlemen, eet does not sound. Eet iss too noisy, I cannot hear!"

What Koussevitzky really meant was that he couldn't hear the clarity of tone he was working for, but to those not acquainted with the conductor's mode of speaking they wondered what it did, if not make noise!

Rise to Fame

Once when he and the orchestra tackled some new and very complex composition over which they had been struggling for hours, Koussevitzky brought them to a halt and said bitterly, "Gentlemen, if you cannot play this better you should take it the music home and study as more as you can!"

Koussevitzky has come a long way since the day he stood, as a little boy, in front of a row of empty chairs in his front parlor, conducting a dream orchestra. With the encouragement of his father, a violin teacher, Koussevitzky left home at 14, freshly graduated from the Philharmonic Conservatory, with a pack on his back and three rubles in his pocket for Moscow to apply for a scholarship in conducting.

But when he got to Moscow there was no scholarship in conducting available—only one for double bass. So proficient did Koussevitzky become on the bull fiddle that he toured Europe and Russia as a virtuoso and is still reckoned as one of the onlv three double bass players in history to achieve rank of virtuoso of the unwieldly instrument.

Always progressive, Koussevitzky inaugurated two great departures in the symphonic world after he formed his orchestra in 1907—he began a series of popular concerts in which young conductors, composers and soloists were given free rein to prove their worth, and he brought music to his people rather than have them come to him by chartering a steamer and touring the Volga for 2300 miles.

Today Koussevitzky is at the peak of his career. At 72 he is the No. 1 symphony conductor in the United States, with an orchestra unequalled in excellence anywhere. During this 65th season, Koussevitzky will, no doubt often look benignly at his men and, as is his custom when something pleases him very much murmur, "Vonderful, vonderful!"

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

OCT 7 - 1945

On the Records

Heralded as the greatest improvement in home phonograph records in 45 years, the new unbreakable, high-fidelity discs developed by RCA-Victor live up to advance notices in their debut.

The vehicle is the symphonic poem, Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, by Richard Strauss, as played by the Boston Symphony. Never, except in concert, has that organization been heard to better advantage, every facet of the brilliant performance being reflected with remarkable realism.

Surface Noise Curbed

Not alone for its fidelity is the new record remarkable. Surface noise has been reduced to the point where a close-bent ear can catch only a faint purr from the gliding pickup. Ruby-red in color, the 12-inch flexible disc weighs only 13 ounces compared with the standard 24, and is slightly thinner.

Incidentally, this "first edition" is another in a long list for the Boston Symphony, which was the first major orchestra ever recorded in America.

There are two records in the initial album.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

OCT 8 - 1945

This Week's Concert Programs Given

Tonight in Symphony Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give the first concert of the Monday night series. The program will consist of Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 94 (the "Surprise"), the Second Suite from Prokofieff's Ballet "Romeo and Juliet," and the Second Symphony of Brahms in D major.

The second program of the longer series of concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday night will include the first public performance of the new Third Symphony by Bohuslav Martinu, which is dedicated to this orchestra. The Symphony is in three movements: Allegro poco moderato, Largo, and Allegro; andante. The program will open with Mozart's Overture to "Idomeneo." The second portion of the program will be devoted to the music of Sibelius and will consist of "The Swan of Tuonela" (English horn solo: Louis Speyer) and the Symphony No. 1 in E minor.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

Cir. (D 82,213)

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 8 - 1945

MONTH or two ago this column surmised—one couldn't call so safe a bet sticking one's chin out—that the Tanglewood Festival would be resumed on a full scale next summer. Symphony Hall was still cagey when questioned but allowed that it was "anybody's guess."

Now the guessing is over. Unequivocally the Boston Symphony trustees have announced that the summer of 1946 will see the return of nine symphony concerts to be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons over a period of three weeks.

Simultaneously is announced the gift of the Music Shed to the orchestra by Gertrude Robinson Smith as president of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival Association. This means that the orchestra will have full control and management of the future Tanglewood festivals.

The only stipulations were that all patrons, members and subscribers of the association have opportunity to subscribe for their regular seats before the public seat sale begins and that if the festivals were ever discontinued the title to the Shed would revert to an authorized committee of Berkshire citizens.

The Music Center will be reopened under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky on July 1. Plans are also being made to develop the opera department. There is talk of producing Benjamin Britten's new opera "Peter Grimes."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

OCT 9 - 1945

BERNSTEIN DOES SHOSTAKOVITCH

By IRVING KOLODIN.

In many ways, the task Leonard Bernstein set himself last night in assuming the leadership of the New York City Symphony at the City Center was the most challenging he has faced in his brief two years' career here. But, as in the instance of most of the things which he has undertaken since his appearance as an emergency replacement at the Philharmonic two years ago—whether it has been as composer, conductor, tunesmith of Broadway's "On the Town" or pianist—music's current wonder boy survived the test with credit.

This is no virtuoso ensemble that Bernstein has to work with, and some of its solo performers trod a thin line of separation from disaster several times. I cannot testify to the comparative qualities of the ensemble as Bernstein inherited it from Leopold Stokowski, having not heard the orchestra under its previous conductor. But there was every indication that Bernstein has imposed his own restless, energetic, sometimes impulsive and uncontrolled but always musical personality on the players.

I doubt, for example, that New York has ever heard a more persuasive and well-balanced estimate of the Shostakovitch first symphony than Bernstein provided last night. The fact is that Bernstein has the musical and temperamental orientation to regard Shostakovitch without argumentative intent, as neither a tonal adventurer nor a cause for proselytizing, simply as a contemporary. The consequence was a performance of impressive clarity, equitable pacing and thoroughgoing logic. It was also extremely listenable.

Brahms and Copland.

The Bernstein versatility was exemplified by the following second symphony of Brahms. One might have asked for a more expansive lyricism in some moments of the first and second movements—it tended to be too uncompromisingly streamlined—but the reading had both sweetness and strength, a never-failing contact with musical realities. The orchestra's somewhat shallow string tone was annoyingly evident in this work, but it might well be attributed to the famously poor acoustic properties of this auditorium. He began with a lively, and occasionally inaccurate, playing of the Copland "Outdoor Overture."

If a dissonant ending may be appended here, it would have to do with some of Bernstein's performing mannerisms. It is no sin for any practitioner to seek out a good model, and Bernstein certainly has one in Serge Koussevitzky. But having come so far along the road to individuality, it seems unfortunate for Bernstein to remind us so constantly—in attitudes of arms, body and head, even in mouth breathing—of the famous man from Boston. The program will be repeated tonight at 6 o'clock.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

OCT 9 - 1945

MUSIC

By Miles Kastendieck

Leonard Bernstein Takes Over City Symphony, Scoring One More Triumph

To say that he "wowed" them is to sum up what happened when Leonard Bernstein took over as musical director of the New York City Symphony at the City Center last night. New life was certainly injected into the orchestral world on this occasion. Enthusiasm ran over on both sides of the stage. If he did nothing else, Mr. Bernstein created a kind of white heat while putting on an excellent show.

But he did more. Endowed with one of the greatest talents in the country today, he galvanized 75 players—more than half of them new — into a group of musicians. There was a true spirit of musicianship among them, and they gave what they had. The playing had a pristine quality that carried its own shiny newness and freshness. There were slips, to be sure, chiefly in the brasses, but these were of little consequence for a first concert.

With the temperament of a Stokowski, the gestures of Koussevitzky, and the showmanship of Bernstein, the young conductor tackled the "Outdoor Overture" of Copland, the First Symphony of Shostakovich, and the Second Symphony of Brahms. Each performance generated definite opinions, unquestioned effectiveness, and over-all brilliance. This was an evening of vigor, of color, of clarity. It was also one of imitation, for Mr. Bernstein has sat at the feet of his master, Koussevitzky, so long as to become the great conductor's shadow. It was amazing to note the resemblance of little gestures as well as large; they made one speculate on where the master leaves off and Bernstein begins. Whatever the mannerisms, they got results.

Of the Copland, let it be said that the music was quite characteristic of the man and that it was played as effectively as it was written. The Shostakovich was played too fast and too bright, however clear-cut the execution. The organic whole was often lost in anti-climax and unpoised assurance. To this taste the Brahms fared better. Not only did it show that the conductor has grown, but that his musical sensibilities are right, so far as getting the musicians to play well. Each movement became more progressively absorbing because it more to this work than came out last night: therein lies the question of Mr. Bernstein's future.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 10 1945

Boston Symphony On Radio Again

Allis-Chalmers will close its Oct. 13 broadcast of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, with a salute to the iron and steel industry. This is the first of a series of Allis-Chalmers salutes to the men and women in industry for their contribution to postwar "Good Living" in terms of scientific advancement.

The Oct. 13 broadcast will include Sibelius' Symphony No. 1 and "The Swan of Tuonela." The symphony broadcasts will be heard every Saturday, 9:30-10:30 p. m. over Station WHTD until Dec. 1 and from then on over Station WTHT.

OCTOBER 9, '4

MUSIC

Monday Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the first program of the Monday series of the 65th season in Symphony Hall last night, performing the following program:

Symphony in G, No. 94 ("Surprise"), Haydn
"Romeo and Juliet," Second Suite, Op. 64 .... Prokofieff
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73, Brahms

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

I can't think how last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra could have been improved. It was a beautiful concert, an ideal one in point of fact, and it seems to me that if all the remaining concerts in the Monday series are fiascos (which is not at all likely) everybody will still have got his money's worth.

Actually, except for the "Romeo and Juliet" suite of Prokofieff, there was nothing especially exciting on the program. Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony is no longer much of a surprise to anyone, and Brahms' Second hardly comes under the heading of novelty. Yet such is the magic of Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra he has fashioned in these 22 years, the Haydn was a surprise and the Brahms a novelty.

What he does—so far as I can make out—is approach everything as if he had just discovered for the first time how really marvelous it is. He, and his orchestra, have done the Brahms possibly a hundred times and most of us have heard it a score or more. Yet last night it was better than ever because he had found new facets, new aspects, new depths. And he had had the devotion to his art (not to mention the enthusiasm and the vigor) to re-create it for us with all the wisdom and the skill at his command not because we were customers but because he just couldn't do otherwise.

So the drive, the momentum of the opening, the expressivity of the slow movement, the delicacy and verve of the adagietto, the rugged strength of the finale; all these things seemed new and striking from a purely interpretative point of view. Of course he has the orchestra to work with—and who ever heard such cellos as those in the slow movement or such woodwinds as those in the adagietto?

For new music there was the second suite from Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" ballet, and the only trouble with that was that three of the numbers from it were not played at this concert. The work is typical of Prokofieff in the sense there are certain familiar idiomatic tricks, but it goes somewhat deeper than that. In fact, the final section seems about as powerful an emotional thing as I know in Prokofieff. Yet over all there is a certain wryness, a wit that never allows sentimentality to intrude, and the result is rare musical entertainment. In fine, here was a concert of the highest quality throughout, and a vast credit both to the conductor and the orchestra.

Victory Campaign
RALLY

BOSTON GARDEN
Thursday Evening, October 11, 1945

☆

Greater Boston United War Fund

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

OCT 12 1945

Thinks All Art Needs Government Subsidy

DR SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston, Oct. 12—Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, said today that "democratic governments have done nothing for art."

The gray-haired 71-year-old conductor told a press conference that democratic government "unfortunately forget that their people need spiritual food as much as physical food."

Now in his 22d consecutive year as Boston symphony conductor, Koussevitzky believes that the only way all forms of art can be brought to the most people is through governmental subsidies.

He added that the best way for "great factories with tremendous profits" to distribute their incomes was by sponsoring art for the people—not by giving out money. But even in that case, he said, federal or state support is a necessity.

"If the 30,000,000 persons in New England—to take only one section of the country as an example—would donate 50 cents yearly each, this region could have three symphony orchestras, a big hall in every city and a New England opera and ballet company," he declared.

However, he emphasized, such a fund must be kept "out of the hands of politicians and entrusted to special persons, such as musicians or orchestra trustees."

The Boston symphony, now in its 65th season, will give 18 works their local or world premiere here this year. Also scheduled are all seven symphonies of Sibelius in honor of the Finnish master's 80th birthday December 8.

Ambitious Tanglewood Plans Outlined by Koussevitzky

By L. A. Sloper

Serge Koussevitzky will offer 20 novelties in his twenty-second season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—a number which he surpassed only during the extravagant 'twenties. He also has ambitious plans for the production of opera at Tanglewood, in addition to restoring the full program of nine symphony concerts there next summer; and he is still plugging hard for public support of vast musical schemes.

All this, and more, the maestro revealed in the course of his first g[illegible] interview with the Boston [illegible] critics, whom he graciously [illegible]ed the other day in his new [illegible] in Brookline. The meeting was brought about by a curious circumstance which the conductor recounted with great good humor. There had been, he remarked, complaints from some of the Boston newspapers that he had given New York papers priority on some of his important announcements.

"But I say," he protested, spreading his arms, "that this is not my fault; it is your fault, because you do not come to see me and ask what I do. So-o, I have decided to invite you here to ask me questions."

* * *

The questions and answers were fruitful. It developed, for example, that 12 of the 20 novelties promised for this season will be world premieres, and that seven of these are by American composers.

Dr. Koussevitzky, we learned,

Continued on Page 4 Column 1

Koussevitzky Looks Ahead—

Ambitious Operatic Plans Outlined for Tanglewood

Continued from Page 1

will not himself conduct opera at Tanglewood. The preparation of an operatic production, he explained, takes more time than he can spare from his other duties. But he is eagerly anticipating the inauguration of opera performances in the Berkshires, and enthusiastic over the new young conductors he has been developing at the Tanglewood Music School.

Leonard Bernstein is only one of them. (The conductor hinted broadly that Bernstein might direct the first American performance of Benjamin Britten's English opera "Peter Grimes," next summer.) Another is Lukas Foss, composer of the ballet, "The Gift of the Magi," which had its world premiere in Boston last week, from the Ballet Theater. Foss is now the official pianist of the Symphony Orchestra. And there are other young batonists who have not yet been heard from.

* * *

"Peter Grimes," by the way, was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, and excerpts from the score will be played this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time anywhere. The opera had its first performance last season in London, and was reviewed at length in these columns.

Dr. Koussevitzky has some definite ideas about opera and opera production. He feels the need of new blood in the field of the lyric theater. He wants new operas by Americans and new production methods that will parallel the advances made in the speaking theater and in ballet. To this end he has enlisted the services at Tanglewood for several years past of three men who share his progressive views: Dr. Herbert Graf, Dr. Richard Rychtarik, and Boris Goldovsky. With the help of these men and of young American composers, singers, and conductors, he hopes to revivify opera in America.

Nor are Dr. Koussevitzky's plans limited to Boston and Tanglewood. He envisages a future in which music and the other arts will receive government aid instead of being dependent on private or corporate subsidy. He is very definite that art must be supported; it must not be placed on a commercial basis.

* * *

In this connection he mentioned a proposal that he made some time ago, applied to New England. We have, he said, 30,000,000 people in this section. Let each of them contribute half a dollar. In that way, we might have three major symphony orchestras instead of one in New England. Every city would have its large hall in which concert, opera and ballet would be presented; and every town would have its small hall in which the people would hear chamber music. The fund would be administered by a group similar to the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This enthusiasm for the spread of musical culture is an expression of Dr. Koussevitzky's love of democracy. He finds it strange that the democracies so far have not learned the necessity for providing all the people with the benefits of art, but he is confident that eventually this imperative need will be understood. He will be satisfied only with a singing nation.

The compositions which will be played this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time anywhere are Samuel Barber's Cello Concerto (Raya Garbousova); the aforesaid excerpts from "Peter Grimes"; Bergsma's Music on a Quiet Theme; Copland's Symphony; Elliott Carter's Holiday Overture; David Diamond's Rounds for string orchestra; Alexandre Gretchaninov's "Elégie"; Boris Koutzen's "From the American Folklore"; Martinů's Symphony No. 3; Milhaud's Symphony; Gian-Carlo Menotti's Piano Concerto, and Aurelio Pescara's "Commedia dell' Arte."

Works which will have their first American performance include Miaskovsky's Symphony No. 22, Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5, and Shostakovitch's Ninth Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

OCT 12 1945

Shostakovitch Asked To Appear in Boston

Boston, Oct. 12 (A. P.).—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today that Dmitri Shostakovitch, Russian composer, had been invited to come to Boston as a guest conductor, piano soloist or "as a simple member of the orchestra audience."

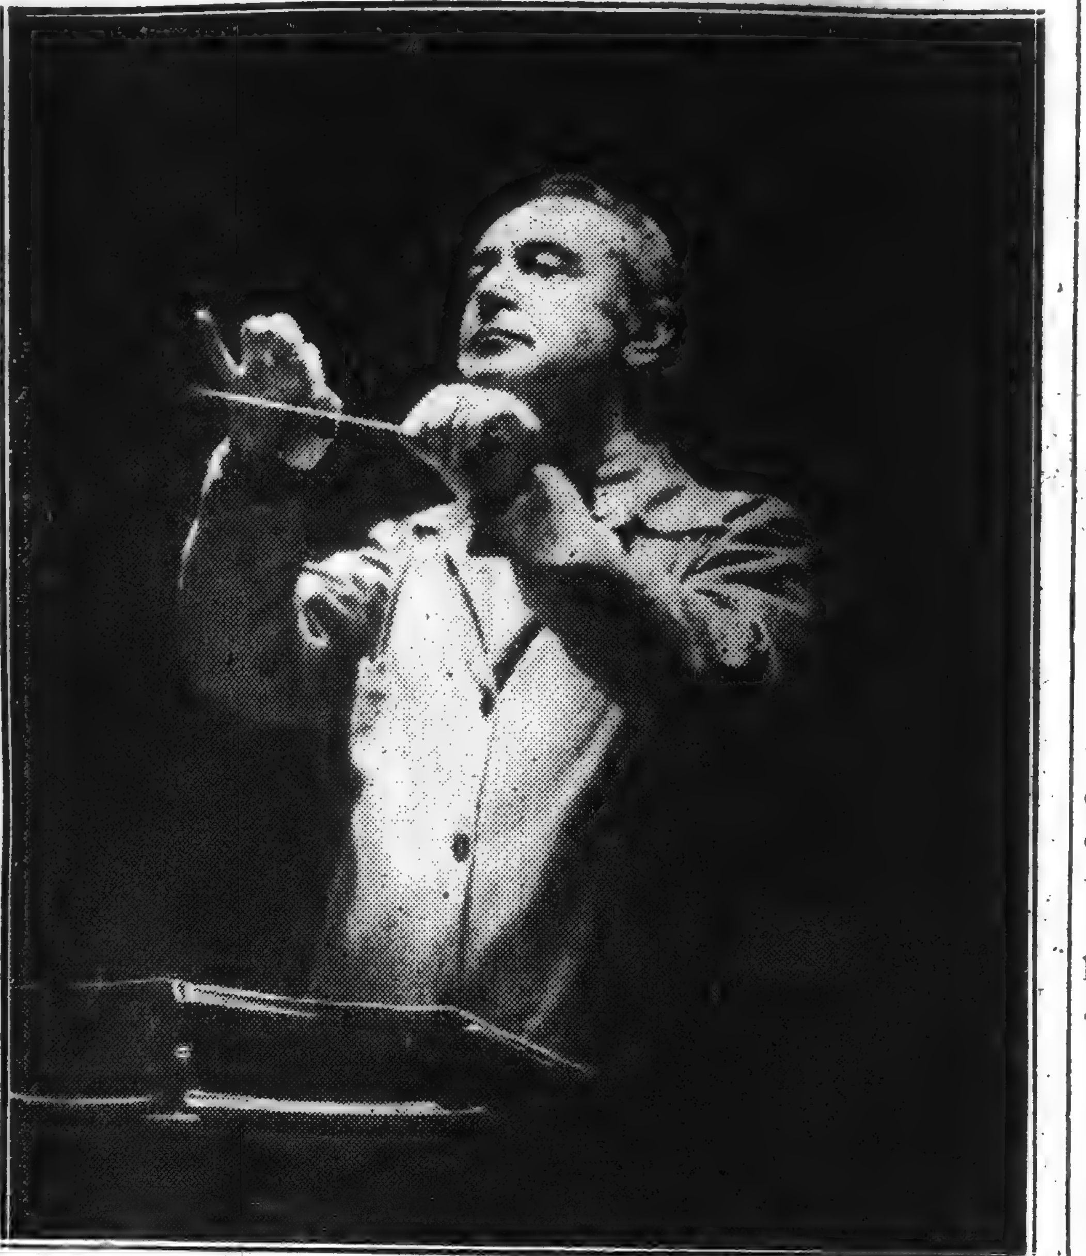
Koussevitsky said he thought the Russian might fly here, possibly to conduct his own Ninth Symphony. Shostakovitch has promised Koussevitsky the first American performance of this opus.

[21]

SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 7, 1945

Koussevitzky

Interview as His 22nd Season Opens



The success or failure of a section of a composition, or maybe the whole of it, or even a whole program, depends, according to Koussevitzky, on the absolute perfection of the playing of the first note. He will therefore hold himself in a state of high tension, in such a statue-like pose as this, communicating equal tension to the orchestra, before signalling the "attack."

has introduced such important men as Hill, Piston, Harris, William Schuman, Leonard Bernstein, Lukas Foss, and Aaron Copland, whose "Appalachian Springs" had its first performance in Boston last Friday. Instead of putting on only one performance of a modernist composer's works, allowing them to be forgotten afterwards, he repeats them so they won't fade into obscurity.

Few people realize the hours of rehearsing necessary for a successful concert. Koussevitzky is a relentless drillmaster. A story is told of the time he was preparing his ensemble for a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. He wanted a pianissimo from the 'cellos of the finest possible fibre sustained through a long passage, and he insisted that the 'cellos play it over and over again until the men gave him precisely what he wanted. He didn't stop until he got it!

While Koussevitzky's language, to the ordinary bystander, is a masterpiece of contradiction his men know perfectly well what he wants. In rehearsing Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica," the orchestra worked up to a terrific crescendo that filled the hall with sound.

Rapping his baton sharply against the face of his conductor's score, Koussevitzky turned to his men and bellowed in an enraged tone, "Gentlemen, eet does not sound. Eet iss too noisy, I cannot hear!"

What Koussevitzky really meant was that he couldn't hear the clarity of tone he was working for, but to those not acquainted with the conductor's mode of speaking they wondered what it did, if not make noise!

Rise to Fame

Once when he and the orchestra tackled some new and very complex composition over which they had been struggling for hours, Koussevitzky brought them to a halt and said bitterly, "Gentlemen, if you cannot play this better you should take it the music home and study as more as you can!"

Koussevitzky has come a long way since the day he stood, as a little boy, in front of a row of empty chairs in his front parlor, conducting a dream orchestra. With the encouragement of his father, a violin teacher, Koussevitzky left home at 14, freshly graduated from the Philharmonic Conservatory, with a pack on his back and three rubles in his pocket for Moscow to apply for a scholarship in conducting.

But when he got to Moscow there was no scholarship in conducting available—only one for double bass. So proficient did Koussevitzky become on the bull fiddle that he toured Europe and Russia as a virtuoso and is still reckoned as one of the only three double bass players in history to achieve rank of virtuoso of the unwieldly instrument.

Always progressive, Koussevitzky inaugurated two great departures in the symphonic world after he formed his orchestra in 1907—he began a series of popular concerts in which young conductors, composers and soloists were given free rein to prove their worth, and he brought music to his people rather than have them come to him by chartering a steamer and touring the Volga for 2300 miles.

Today Koussevitzky is at the peak of his career. At 72 he is the No. 1 symphony conductor in the United States, with an orchestra unequalled in excellence anywhere. During this 65th season, Koussevitzky will, no doubt often look benignly at his men and, as is his custom when something pleases him very much murmur, "Vonderful, vonderful!"

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

OCT 7 - 1945

On the Records

Heralded as the greatest improvement in home phonograph records in 45 years, the new unbreakable, high-fidelity discs developed by RCA-Victor live up to advance notices in their debut.

The vehicle is the symphonic poem, Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, by Richard Strauss, as played by the Boston Symphony. Never, except in concert, has that organization been heard to better advantage, every facet of the brilliant performance being reflected with remarkable realism.

Surface Noise Curbed

Not alone for its fidelity is the new record remarkable. Surface noise has been reduced to the point where a close-bent ear can catch only a faint purr from the gliding pickup. Ruby-red in color, the 12-inch flexible disc weighs only 13 ounces compared with the standard 24, and is slightly thinner.

Incidentally, this "first edition" is another in a long list for the Boston Symphony, which was the first major orchestra ever recorded in America.

There are two records in the initial album.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

OCT 8 - 1945

This Week's Concert Programs Given

Tonight in Symphony Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give the first concert of the Monday night series. The program will consist of Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 94 (the "Surprise"), the Second Suite from Prokofieff's Ballet "Romeo and Juliet," and the Second Symphony of Brahms in D major.

The second program of the longer series of concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday night will include the first public performance of the new Third Symphony by Bohuslav Martinu, which is dedicated to this orchestra. The Symphony is in three movements: Allegro poco moderato, Largo, and Allegro; andante. The program will open with Mozart's Overture to "Idomeneo." The second portion of the program will be devoted to the music of Sibelius and will consist of "The Swan of Tuonela" (English horn solo: Louis Speyer) and the Symphony No. 1 in E minor.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

Cir. (D 82,213)

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 8 - 1945

MONTH or two ago this column surmised—one couldn't call so safe a bet sticking one's chin out—that the Tanglewood Festival would be resumed on a full scale next summer. Symphony Hall was still cagey when questioned but allowed that it was "anybody's guess."

Now the guessing is over. Unequivocally the Boston Symphony trustees have announced that the summer of 1946 will see the return of nine symphony concerts to be given on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons over a period of three weeks.

Simultaneously is announced the gift of the Music Shed to the orchestra by Gertrude Robinson Smith as president of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival Association. This means that the orchestra will have full control and management of the future Tanglewood festivals.

The only stipulations were that all patrons, members and subscribers of the association have opportunity to subscribe for their regular seats before the public seat sale begins and that if the festivals were ever discontinued the title to the Shed would revert to an authorized committee of Berkshire citizens.

The Music Center will be reopened under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky on July 1. Plans are also being made to develop the opera department. There is talk of producing Benjamin Britten's new opera "Peter Grimes."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

OCT 9 - 1945

BERNSTEIN DOES SHOSTAKOVITCH

By IRVING KOLODIN.

In many ways, the task Leonard Bernstein set himself last night in assuming the leadership of the New York City Symphony at the City Center was the most challenging he has faced in his brief two years' career here. But, as in the instance of most of the things which he has undertaken since his appearance as an emergency replacement at the Philharmonic two years ago—whether it has been as composer, conductor, tunesmith of Broadway's "On the Town" or pianist—music's current wonder boy survived the test with credit.

This is no virtuoso ensemble that Bernstein has to work with, and some of its solo performers trod a thin line of separation from disaster several times. I cannot testify to the comparative qualities of the ensemble as Bernstein inherited it from Leopold Stokowski, having not heard the orchestra under its previous conductor. But there was every indication that Bernstein has imposed his own restless, energetic, sometimes impulsive and uncontrolled but always musical personality on the players.

I doubt, for example, that New York has ever heard a more persuasive and well-balanced estimate of the Shostakovitch first symphony than Bernstein provided last night. The fact is that Bernstein has the musical and temperamental orientation to regard Shostakovitch without argumentative intent, as neither a tonal adventurer nor a cause for proselytizing, simply as a contemporary. The consequence was a performance of impressive clarity, equitable pacing and thoroughgoing logic. It was also extremely listenable.

Brahms and Copland.

The Bernstein versatility was exemplified by the following second symphony of Brahms. One might have asked for a more expansive lyricism in some moments of the first and second movements—it tended to be too uncompromisingly streamlined—but the reading had both sweetness and strength, a never-failing contact with musical realities. The orchestra's somewhat shallow string tone was annoyingly evident in this work, but it might well be attributed to the famously poor acoustic properties of this auditorium. He began with a lively, and occasionally inaccurate, playing of the Copland "Outdoor Overture."

If a dissonant ending may be appended here, it would have to do with some of Bernstein's performing mannerisms. It is no sin for any practitioner to seek out a good model, and Bernstein certainly has one in Serge Koussevitzky. But having come so far along the road to individuality, it seems unfortunate for Bernstein to remind us so constantly—in attitudes of arms, body and head, even in mouth breathing—of the famous man from Boston. The program will be repeated tonight at 6 o'clock.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

OCT 9 - 1945

MUSIC

By Miles Kastendieck

Leonard Bernstein Takes Over City Symphony, Scoring One More Triumph

To say that he "wowed" them is to sum up what happened when Leonard Bernstein took over as musical director of the New York City Symphony at the City Center last night. New life was certainly injected into the orchestral world on this occasion. Enthusiasm ran over on both sides of the stage. If he did nothing else, Mr. Bernstein created a kind of white heat while putting on an excellent show.

But he did more. Endowed with one of the greatest talents in the country today, he galvanized 75 players—more than half of them new—into a group of musicians. There was a true spirit of musicianship among them, and they gave what they had. The playing had a pristine quality that carried its own shiny newness and freshness. There were slips, to be sure, chiefly in the brasses, but these were of little consequence for a first concert.

With the temperament of a Stokowski, the gestures of Koussevitzky, and the showmanship of Bernstein, the young conductor tackled the "Outdoor Overture" of Copland, the First Symphony of Shostakovich; and the Second Symphony of Brahms. Each performance generated definite opinions, unquestioned effectiveness, and over-all brilliance. This was an evening of vigor, of color, of clarity. It was also one of imitation, for Mr. Bernstein has sat at the feet of his master, Koussevitzky, so long as to become the great conductor's shadow. It was amazing to note the resemblance of little gestures as well as large; they made one speculate on where the master leaves off and Bernstein begins. Whatever the mannerisms, they got results.

Of the Copland, let it be said that the music was quite characteristic of the man and that it was played as effectively as it was written. The Shostakovich was played too fast and too bright, however clear-cut the execution. The organic whole was often lost in anti-climax and unpoised assurance. To this taste the Brahms fared better. Not only did it show that the conductor has grown, but that his musical sensibilities are right, so far as getting the musicians to play well. Each movement became more progressively absorbing because it more to this work than came out last night; therein lies the question of Mr. Bernstein's future.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 10 1945

Boston Symphony On Radio Again

Allis-Chalmers will close its Oct. 13 broadcast of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, with a salute to the iron and steel industry. This is the first of a series of Allis-Chalmers salutes to the men and women in industry for their contribution to postwar "Good Living" in terms of scientific advancement.

The Oct. 13 broadcast will include Sibelius' Symphony No. 1 and "The Swan of Tuonela." The symphony broadcasts will be heard every Saturday, 9:30-10:30 p.m. over Station WHTD until Dec. 1 and from then on over Station WTHT.

OCTOBER 9, '4

45

MUSIC

Monday Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the first program of the Monday series of the 65th season in Symphony Hall last night, performing the following program:

Symphony in G, No. 94 ("Surprise"), Haydn
"Romeo and Juliet," Second Suite, Op. 64 .... Prokofieff
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73, Brahms

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

I can't think how last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra could have been improved. It was a beautiful concert, an ideal one in point of fact, and it seems to me that if all the remaining concerts in the Monday series are fiascos (which is not at all likely) everybody will still have got his money's worth.

Actually, except for the "Romeo and Juliet" suite of Prokofieff, there was nothing especially exciting on the program. Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony is no longer much of a surprise to anyone, and Brahms' Second hardly comes under the heading of novelty. Yet such is the magic of Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra he has fashioned in these 22 years, the Haydn was a surprise and the Brahms a novelty.

What he does—so far as I can make out—is approach everything as if he had just discovered for the first time how really marvelous it is. He, and his orchestra, have done the Brahms possibly a hundred times and most of us have heard it a score or more. Yet last night it was better than ever because he had found new facets, new aspects, new depths. And he had had the devotion to his art (not to mention the enthusiasm and the vigor) to re-create it for us with all the wisdom and the skill at his command not because we were customers but because he just couldn't do otherwise.

So the drive, the momentum of the opening, the expressivity of the slow movement, the delicacy and verve of the adagietto, the rugged strength of the finale; all these things seemed new and striking from a purely interpretative point of view. Of course he has the orchestra to work with—and who ever heard such cellos as those in the slow movement or such woodwinds as those in the adagietto?

For new music there was the second suite from Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" ballet, and the only trouble with that was that three of the numbers from it were not played at this concert. The work is typical of Prokofieff in the sense there are certain familiar idiomatic tricks, but it goes somewhat deeper than that. In fact, the final section seems about as powerful an emotional thing as I know in Prokofieff. Yet over all there is a certain wryness, a wit that never allows sentimentality to intrude, and the result is rare musical entertainment. In fine, here was a concert of the highest quality throughout, and a vast credit both to the conductor and the orchestra.

Victory Campaign
RALLY

BOSTON GARDEN
Thursday Evening, October 11, 1945

☆

Greater Boston United War Fund

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

OCT 12 1945

Thinks All Art Needs Government Subsidy

DR SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston, Oct. 12—Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, said today that "democratic governments have done nothing for art."

The gray-haired 71-year-old conductor told a press conference that democratic government "unfortunately forget that their people need spiritual food as much as physical food."

Now in his 22d consecutive year as Boston symphony conductor, Koussevitzky believes that the only way all forms of art can be brought to the most people is through governmental subsidies.

He added that the best way for "great factories with tremendous profits" to distribute their incomes was by sponsoring art for the people—not by giving out money. But even in that case, he said, federal or state support is a necessity.

"If the 30,000,000 persons in New England—to take only one section of the country as an example—would donate 50 cents yearly each, this region could have three symphony orchestras, a big hall in every city and a New England opera and ballet company," he declared.

However, he emphasized, such a fund must be kept "out of the hands of politicians and entrusted to special persons, such as musicians or orchestra trustees."

The Boston symphony, now in its 65th season, will give 18 works their local or world premiere here this year. Also scheduled are all seven symphonies of Sibelius in honor of the Finnish master's 80th birthday December 8.

Ambitious Tanglewood Plans Outlined by Koussevitzky

By L. A. Sloper

Serge Koussevitzky will offer 20 novelties in his twenty-second season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—a number which he surpassed only during the extravagant 'twenties. He also has ambitious plans for the production of opera at Tanglewood, in addition to restoring the full program of nine symphony concerts there next summer; and he is still plugging hard for public support of vast musical schemes.

All this, and more, the maestro revealed in the course of his first [illegible] interview with the Boston [illegible] critics, whom he graciously [illegible]ed the other day in his new [illegible] in Brookline. The meeting was brought about by a curious circumstance which the conductor recounted with great good humor. There had been, he remarked, complaints from some of the Boston newspapers that he had given New York papers priority on some of his important announcements.

"But I say," he protested, spreading his arms, "that this is not my fault; it is your fault, because you do not come to see me and ask what I do. So-o, I have decided to invite you here to ask me questions."

⁂

The questions and answers were fruitful. It developed, for example, that 12 of the 20 novelties promised for this season will be world premieres, and that seven of these are by American composers.

Dr. Koussevitzky, we learned,

Continued on Page 4 Column 1

4 Art—Music—Theater THE CHRISTIAN

Koussevitzky Looks Ahead—

Ambitious Operatic Plans Outlined for Tanglewood

Continued from Page 1

will not himself conduct opera at Tanglewood. The preparation of an operatic production, he explained, takes more time than he can spare from his other duties. But he is eagerly anticipating the inauguration of opera performances in the Berkshires, and enthusiastic over the new young conductors he has been developing at the Tanglewood Music School.

Leonard Bernstein is only one of them. (The conductor hinted broadly that Bernstein might direct the first American performance of Benjamin Britten's English opera "Peter Grimes," next summer.) Another is Lukas Foss, composer of the ballet, "The Gift of the Magi," which had its world premiere in Boston last week, from the Ballet Theater. Foss is now the official pianist of the Symphony Orchestra. And there are other young batonists who have not yet been heard from.

⁂

"Peter Grimes," by the way, was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, and excerpts from the score will be played this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time anywhere. The opera had its first performance last season in London, and was reviewed at length in these columns.

Dr. Koussevitzky has some definite ideas about opera and opera production. He feels the need of new blood in the field of the lyric theater. He wants new operas by Americans and new production methods that will parallel the advances made in the speaking theater and in ballet. To this end he has enlisted the services at Tanglewood for several years past of three men who share his progressive views: Dr. Herbert Graf, Dr. Richard Rychtarik, and Boris Goldovsky. With the help of these men and of young American composers, singers, and conductors, he hopes to revivify opera in America.

Nor are Dr. Koussevitzky's plans limited to Boston and Tanglewood. He envisages a future in which music and the other arts will receive government aid instead of being dependent on private or corporate subsidy. He is very definite that art must be supported; it must not be placed on a commercial basis.

⁂

In this connection he mentioned a proposal that he made some time ago, applied to New England. We have, he said, 30,000,000 people in this section. Let each of them contribute half a dollar. In that way, we might have three major symphony orchestras instead of one in New England. Every city would have its large hall in which concert, opera and ballet would be presented; and every town would have its small hall in which the people would hear chamber music. The fund would be administered by a group similar to the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This enthusiasm for the spread of musical culture is an expression of Dr. Koussevitzky's love of democracy. He finds it strange that the democracies so far have not learned the necessity for providing all the people with the benefits of art, but he is confident that eventually this imperative need will be understood. He will be satisfied only with a singing nation.

The compositions which will be played this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time anywhere are Samuel Barber's Cello Concerto (Raya Garbousova); the aforesaid excerpts from "Peter Grimes"; Bergsma's Music on a Quiet Theme; Copland's Symphony; Elliott Carter's Holiday Overture; David Diamond's Rounds for string orchestra; Alexandre Gretchaninov's "Elégie"; Boris Koutzen's "From the American Folklore"; Martinů's Symphony No. 3; Milhaud's Symphony; Gian-Carlo Menotti's Piano Concerto, and Aurelio Pescara's "Commedia dell' Arte."

Works which will have their first American performance include Miaskovsky's Symphony No. 22, Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5, and Shostakovitch's Ninth Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

OCT 12 1945

Shostakovitch Asked To Appear in Boston

Boston, Oct. 12 (A. P.).—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today that Dmitri Shostakovitch, Russian composer, had been invited to come to Boston as a guest conductor, piano soloist or "as a simple member of the orchestra audience."

Koussevitsky said he thought the Russian might fly here, possibly to conduct his own Ninth Symphony. Shostakovitch has promised Koussevitsky the first American performance of this opus.

[21]

OCTOBER 9, '4

45

MUSIC

Monday Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the first program of the Monday series of the 65th season in Symphony Hall last night, performing the following program:

Symphony in G, No. 94 ("Surprise"), Haydn
"Romeo and Juliet," Second Suite, Op. 64 .... Prokofieff
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73, Brahms

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

I can't think how last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra could have been improved. It was a beautiful concert, an ideal one in point of fact, and it seems to me that if all the remaining concerts in the Monday series are fiascos (which is not at all likely) everybody will still have got his money's worth.

Actually, except for the "Romeo and Juliet" suite of Prokofieff, there was nothing especially exciting on the program. Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony is no longer much of a surprise to anyone, and Brahms' Second hardly comes under the heading of novelty. Yet such is the magic of Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra he has fashioned in these 22 years, the Haydn was a surprise and the Brahms a novelty.

What he does—so far as I can make out—is approach everything as if he had just discovered for the first time how really marvelous it is. He, and his orchestra, have done the Brahms possibly a hundred times and most of us have heard it a score or more. Yet last night it was better than ever because he had found new facets, new aspects, new depths. And he had had the devotion to his art (not to mention the enthusiasm and the vigor) to re-create it for us with all the wisdom and the skill at his command not because we were customers but because he just couldn't do otherwise.

So the drive, the momentum of the opening, the expressivity of the slow movement, the delicacy and verve of the adagietto, the rugged strength of the finale; all these things seemed new and striking from a purely interpretative point of view. Of course he has the orchestra to work with—and who ever heard such cellos as those in the slow movement or such woodwinds as those in the adagietto?

For new music there was the second suite from Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" ballet, and the only trouble with that was that three of the numbers from it were not played at this concert. The work is typical of Prokofieff in the sense there are certain familiar idiomatic tricks, but it goes somewhat deeper than that. In fact, the final section seems about as powerful an emotional thing as I know in Prokofieff. Yet over all there is a certain wryness, a wit that never allows sentimentality to intrude, and the result is rare musical entertainment. In fine, there was a concert of the highest quality throughout, and a vast credit both to the conductor and the orchestra.

Victory Campaign

RALLY

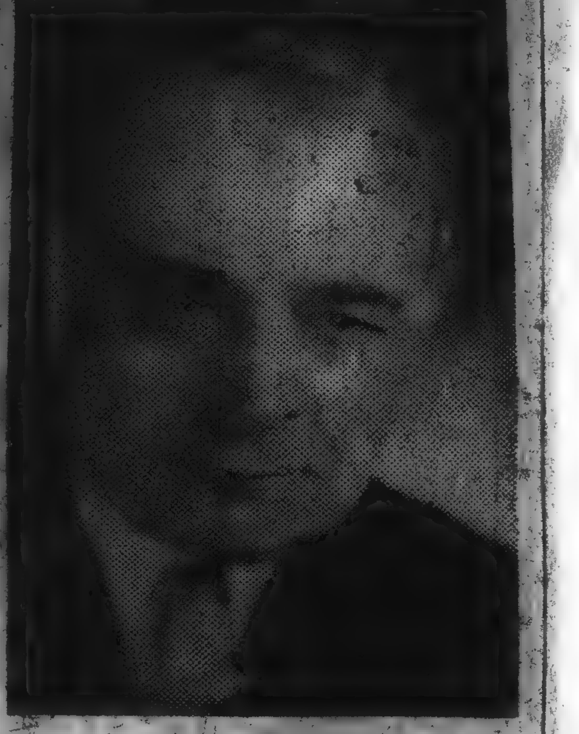
BOSTON GARDEN
Thursday Evening, October 11, 1945

☆

Greater Boston United War Fund

1945

Thinks All Art Needs Government Subsidy



DR SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston, Oct. 12—Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, said today that "democratic governments have done nothing for art."

The gray-haired 71-year-old conductor told a press conference that democratic government "unfortunately forget that their people need spiritual food as much as physical food."

Now in his 22d consecutive year as Boston symphony conductor, Koussevitzky believes that the only way all forms of art can be brought to the most people is through governmental subsidies.

He added that the best way for "great factories with tremendous profits" to distribute their incomes was by sponsoring art for the people—not by giving out money. But even in that case, he said, federal or state support is a necessity.

"If the 30,000,000 persons in New England—to take only one section of the country as an example—would donate 50 cents yearly each, this region could have three symphony orchestras, a big hall in every city and a New England opera and ballet company," he declared.

However, he emphasized, such a fund must be kept "out of the hands of politicians and entrusted to special persons, such as musicians or orchestra trustees."

The Boston symphony, now in its 65th season, will give 18 works their local or world premiere here this year. Also scheduled are all seven symphonies of Sibelius in honor of the Finnish master's 80th birthday December 8.

Ambitious Tanglewood Plans Outlined by Koussevitzky

By L. A. Sloper

Serge Koussevitzky will offer 20 novelties in his twenty-second season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—a number which he surpassed only during the extravagant 'twenties. He also has ambitious plans for the production of opera at Tanglewood, in addition to restoring the full program of nine symphony concerts there next summer; and he is still plugging hard for public support of vast musical schemes.

All this, and more, the maestro revealed in the course of his first [illegible] interview with the Boston [illegible] critics, whom he graciously [illegible]ed the other day in his new [illegible] in Brookline. The meeting was brought about by a curious circumstance which the conductor recounted with great good humor. There had been, he remarked, complaints from some of the Boston newspapers that he had given New York papers priority on some of his important announcements.

"But I say," he protested, spreading his arms, "that this is not my fault; it is your fault, because you do not come to see me and ask what I do. So-o, I have decided to invite you here to ask me questions."

* * *

The questions and answers were fruitful. It developed, for example, that 12 of the 20 novelties promised for this season will be world premieres, and that seven of these are by American composers.

Dr. Koussevitzky, we learned,

Continued on Page 4, Column 1

Koussevitzky Looks Ahead—

Ambitious Operatic Plans Outlined for Tanglewood

Continued from Page 1

will not himself conduct opera at Tanglewood. The preparation of an operatic production, he explained, takes more time than he can spare from his other duties. But he is eagerly anticipating the inauguration of opera performances in the Berkshires, and enthusiastic over the new young conductors he has been developing at the Tanglewood Music School.

Leonard Bernstein is only one of them. (The conductor hinted broadly that Bernstein might direct the first American performance of Benjamin Britten's English opera "Peter Grimes," next summer.) Another is Lukas Foss, composer of the ballet, "The Gift of the Magi," which had its world premiere in Boston last week, from the Ballet Theater. Foss is now the official pianist of the Symphony Orchestra. And there are other young batonists who have not yet been heard from.

* * *

"Peter Grimes," by the way, was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, and excerpts from the score will be played this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time anywhere. The opera had its first performance last season in London, and was reviewed at length in these columns.

Dr. Koussevitzky has some definite ideas about opera and opera production. He feels the need of new blood in the field of the lyric theater. He wants new operas by Americans and new production methods that will parallel the advances made in the speaking theater and in ballet. To this end he has enlisted the services at Tanglewood for several years past of three men who share his progressive views: Dr. Herbert Graf, Dr. Richard Rychtarik, and Boris Goldovsky. With the help of these men and of young American composers, singers, and conductors, he hopes to revivify opera in America.

Nor are Dr. Koussevitzky's plans limited to Boston and Tanglewood. He envisages a future in which music and the other arts will receive government aid instead of being dependent on private or corporate subsidy. He is very definite that art must be supported; it must not be placed on a commercial basis.

* * *

In this connection he mentioned a proposal that he made some time ago, applied to New England. We have, he said, 30,000,000 people in this section. Let each of them contribute half a dollar. In that way, we might have three major symphony orchestras instead of one in New England. Every city would have its large hall in which concert, opera and ballet would be presented; and every town would have its small hall in which the people would hear chamber music. The fund would be administered by a group similar to the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This enthusiasm for the spread of musical culture is an expression of Dr. Koussevitzky's love of democracy. He finds it strange that the democracies so far have not learned the necessity for providing all the people with the benefits of art, but he is confident that eventually this imperative need will be understood. He will be satisfied only with a singing nation.

The compositions which will be played this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time anywhere are Samuel Barber's Cello Concerto (Raya Garbousova); the aforesaid excerpts from "Peter Grimes"; Bergsma's Music on a Quiet Theme; Copland's Symphony; Elliott Carter's Holiday Overture; David Diamond's Rounds for string orchestra; Alexandre Gretchaninov's "Elegie"; Boris Koutzen's "From the American Folklore"; Martinů's Symphony No. 3; Milhaud's Symphony; Gian-Carlo Menotti's Piano Concerto, and Aurelio Pescara's "Commedia dell' Arte."

Works which will have their first American performance include Miaskovsky's Symphony No. 22, Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5, and Shostakovitch's Ninth Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

OCT 12 1945

Shostakovitch Asked To Appear in Boston

Boston, Oct. 12 (A. P.).—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today that Dmitri Shostakovitch, Russian composer, had been invited to come to Boston as a guest conductor, piano soloist or "as a simple member of the orchestra audience."

Koussevitsky said he thought the Russian might fly here, possibly to conduct his own Ninth Symphony. Shostakovitch has promised Koussevitsky the first American performance of this opus.

Progam

☆

JIMMY DURANTE
GARRY MOORE
JERI SULLAVAN and their CBS Radio Gang
FRANK BELL'S WEEI ORCHESTRA

MICHAEL T. KELLEHER
CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS
MAYOR JOHN E. KERRIGAN
GOVERNOR MAURICE J. TOBIN HARVEY S. FIRESTONE, Jr.

GREER GARSON
LT. RICHARD NEY U.S.N.R.

Brief intermission while the Boston Symphony Orchestra is seated

Program

☆

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

TCHAIKOVSKY..........Symphony No. 5 in E minor, Op, 64
(Two Movements)

II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza
IV. Finale (Andante maestoso; allegro vivace)

STRAUSS, J. ....."By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltzes

RODGES..........Waltzes from "Carousel"

SOUSA..........."Semper Fidelis," March

SOUSA.........."The Stars and Stripes Forever," March

"THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER"

Baldwin Piano Used

1945

Thinks All Art Needs Government Subsidy

DR SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston, Oct. 12—Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, said today that "democratic governments have done nothing for art."

The gray-haired 71-year-old conductor told a press conference that democratic government "unfortunately forget that their people need spiritual food as much as physical food."

Now in his 22d consecutive year as Boston symphony conductor, Koussevitzky believes that the only way all forms of art can be brought to the most people is through governmental subsidies.

He added that the best way for "great factories with tremendous profits" to distribute their incomes was by sponsoring art for the people—not by giving out money. But even in that case, he said, federal or state support is a necessity.

"If the 30,000,000 persons in New England—to take only one section of the country as an example—would donate 50 cents yearly each, this region could have three symphony orchestras, a big hall in every city and a New England opera and ballet company," he declared.

However, he emphasized, such a fund must be kept "out of the hands of politicians and entrusted to special persons, such as musicians or orchestra trustees."

The Boston symphony, now in its 65th season, will give 18 works their local or world premiere here this year. Also scheduled are all seven symphonies of Sibelius in honor of the Finnish master's 80th birthday December 8.

---

ever heard such cellos as these in the slow movement or such woodwinds as those in the adagietto?

For new music there was the second suite from Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" ballet, and the only trouble with that was that three of the numbers from it were not played at this concert. The work is typical of Prokofieff in the sense there are certain familiar idiomatic tricks, but it goes somewhat deeper than that. In fact, the final section seems about as powerful an emotional thing as I know in Prokofieff. Yet over all there is a certain wryness, a wit that never allows sentimentality to intrude, and the result is rare musical entertainment. In fine, there was a concert of the highest quality throughout, and a vast credit both to the conductor and the orchestra.

Ambitious Tanglewood Plans Outlined by Koussevitzky

By L. A. Sloper

Serge Koussevitzky will offer 20 novelties in his twenty-second season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—a number which he surpassed only during the extravagant 'twenties. He also has ambitious plans for the production of opera at Tanglewood, in addition to restoring the full program of nine symphony concerts there next summer; and he is still plugging hard for public support of vast musical schemes.

All this, and more, the maestro revealed in the course of his first interview with the Boston critics, whom he graciously [illegible]ed the other day in his new [illegible] in Brookline. The meeting was brought about by a curious circumstance which the conductor recounted with great good humor. There had been, he remarked, complaints from some of the Boston newspapers that he had given New York papers priority on some of his important announcements.

"But I say," he protested, spreading his arms, "that this is not my fault; it is your fault, because you do not come to see me and ask what I do. So-o, I have decided to invite you here to ask me questions."

* * *

The questions and answers were fruitful. It developed, for example, that 12 of the 20 novelties promised for this season will be world premieres, and that seven of these are by American composers.

Dr. Koussevitzky, we learned,

Continued on Page 4, Column 1

Koussevitzky Looks Ahead—

Ambitious Operatic Plans Outlined for Tanglewood

Continued from Page 1

will not himself conduct opera at Tanglewood. The preparation of an operatic production, he explained, takes more time than he can spare from his other duties. But he is eagerly anticipating the inauguration of opera performances in the Berkshires, and enthusiastic over the new young conductors he has been developing at the Tanglewood Music School.

Leonard Bernstein is only one of them. (The conductor hinted broadly that Bernstein might direct the first American performance of Benjamin Britten's English opera "Peter Grimes," next summer.) Another is Lukas Foss, composer of the ballet, "The Gift of the Magi," which had its world premiere in Boston last week, from the Ballet Theater. Foss is now the official pianist of the Symphony Orchestra. And there are other young batonists who have not yet been heard from.

* * *

"Peter Grimes," by the way, was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, and excerpts from the score will be played this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time anywhere. The opera had its first performance last season in London, and was reviewed at length in these columns.

Dr. Koussevitzky has some definite ideas about opera and opera production. He feels the need of new blood in the field of the lyric theater. He wants new operas by Americans and new production methods that will parallel the advances made in the speaking theater and in ballet. To this end he has enlisted the services at Tanglewood for several years past of three men who share his progressive views: Dr. Herbert Graf, Dr. Richard Rychtarik, and Boris Goldovsky. With the help of these men and of young American composers, singers, and conductors, he hopes to revivify opera in America.

Nor are Dr. Koussevitzky's plans limited to Boston and Tanglewood. He envisages a future in which music and the other arts will receive government aid instead of being dependent on private or corporate subsidy. He is very definite that art must be supported; it must not be placed on a commercial basis.

* * *

In this connection he mentioned a proposal that he made some time ago, applied to New England. We have, he said, 30,000,000 people in this section. Let each of them contribute half a dollar. In that way, we might have three major symphony orchestras instead of one in New England. Every city would have its large hall in which concert, opera and ballet would be presented; and every town would have its small hall in which the people would hear chamber music. The fund would be administered by a group similar to the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This enthusiasm for the spread of musical culture is an expression of Dr. Koussevitzky's love of democracy. He finds it strange that the democracies so far have not learned the necessity for providing all the people with the benefits of art, but he is confident that eventually this imperative need will be understood. He will be satisfied only with a singing nation.

The compositions which will be played this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time anywhere are Samuel Barber's Cello Concerto (Raya Garbousova); the aforesaid excerpts from "Peter Grimes"; Bergsma's Music on a Quiet Theme; Copland's Symphony; Elliott Carter's Holiday Overture; David Diamond's Rounds for string orchestra; Alexandre Gretchaninov's "Elégie"; Boris Koutzen's "From the American Folklore"; Martinů's Symphony No. 3; Milhaud's Symphony; Gian-Carlo Menotti's Piano Concerto, and Aurelio Pescara's "Commedia dell' Arte."

Works which will have their first American performance include Miaskovsky's Symphony No. 22, Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5, and Shostakovitch's Ninth Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

OCT 12 1945

Shostakovitch Asked To Appear in Boston

Boston, Oct. 12 (A. P.).—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today that Dmitri Shostakovitch, Russian composer, had been invited to come to Boston as a guest conductor, piano soloist or "as a simple member of the orchestra audience."

Koussevitsky said he thought the Russian might fly here, possibly to conduct his own Ninth Symphony. Shostakovitch has promised Koussevitsky the first American performance of this opus.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

The Greater Boston United War Fund greatly indebted to Dr. Serge Koussevitzk and to every member of the Boston Sympho Orchestra, who so generously give their tim talents and contributions to make o Victory Campaign a success.

The appearance of Miss Garson and Lt. N is through the courtesy of Metro-Goldwy Mayer Pictures.

Jimmy Durante, Garry Moore, Jeri Sullava and Company appear through the courte of the United-Rexall Drug Company, a may be heard Friday evening at ten ov CBS—WEEI.

We acknowledge with thanks the coo eration of Musicians' Union, Local No. George Gibbs, President.

We are greatly indebtedly to the manag ment of the Boston Garden for their genero cooperation and use of their facilities.

We express our thanks to Fred Dal Boston representative for the America Guild of Variety Artists, through whos efforts we are able to present the artists o this program.

CHARLES F. MOORE
Chairman, Rally Committee

RICHARD H. EDWARDS, Jr.
Chairman, Events Committee

(2 nos? Mrs Spark

---

ever heard such cellos as those in the slow movement or such woodwinds as those in the adagietto?

For new music there was the second suite from Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" ballet, and the only trouble with that was that three of the numbers from it were not played at this concert. The work is typical of Prokofieff in the sense there are certain familiar idiomatic tricks, but it goes somewhat deeper than that. In fact, the final section seems about as powerful an emotional thing as I know in Prokofieff. Yet over all there is a certain wryness, a wit that never allows sentimentality to intrude, and the result is rare musical entertainment. In fine, here was a concert of the highest quality throughout, and a vast credit both to the conductor and the orchestra.

Ambitious Tanglewood Plans Outlined by Koussevitzky

By L. A. Sloper

Serge Koussevitzky will offer 20 novelties in his twenty-second season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—a number which he surpassed only during the extravagant 'twenties. He also has ambitious plans for the production of opera at Tanglewood, in addition to restoring the full program of nine symphony concerts there next summer; and he is still plugging hard for public support of vast musical schemes.

All this, and more, the maestro revealed in the course of his first interview with the Boston critics, whom he graciously ed the other day in his new in Brookline. The meeting was brought about by a curious circumstance which the conductor recounted with great good humor. There had been, he remarked, complaints from some of the Boston newspapers that he had given New York papers priority on some of his important announcements.

"But I say," he protested, spreading his arms, "that this is not my fault; it is your fault, because you do not come to see me and ask what I do. So-o, I have decided to invite you here to ask me questions."

* * *

The questions and answers were fruitful. It developed, for example, that 12 of the 20 novelties promised for this season will be world premieres, and that seven of these are by American composers.

Dr. Koussevitzky, we learned,

Continued on Page 4, Column 1

1945

Thinks All Art Needs Government Subsidy

DR SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston, Oct. 12—Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, said today that "democratic governments have done nothing for art."

The gray-haired 71-year-old conductor told a press conference that democratic government "unfortunately forget that their people need spiritual food as much as physical food."

Now in his 22d consecutive year as Boston symphony conductor, Koussevitzky believes that the only way all forms of art can be brought to the most people is through governmental subsidies.

He added that the best way for "great factories with tremendous profits" to distribute their incomes was by sponsoring art for the people—not by giving out money. But even in that case, he said, federal or state support is a necessity.

"If the 30,000,000 persons in New England—to take only one section of the country as an example—would donate 50 cents yearly each, this region could have three symphony orchestras, a big hall in every city and a New England opera and ballet company," he declared.

However, he emphasized, such a fund must be kept "out of the hands of politicians and entrusted to special persons, such as musicians or orchestra trustees."

The Boston symphony, now in its 65th season, will give 18 works their local or world premiere here this year. Also scheduled are all seven symphonies of Sibelius in honor of the Finnish master's 80th birthday December 8.

Koussevitzky Looks Ahead—

Ambitious Operatic Plans Outlined for Tanglewood

Continued from Page 1

will not himself conduct opera at Tanglewood. The preparation of an operatic production, he explained, takes more time than he can spare from his other duties. But he is eagerly anticipating the inauguration of opera performances in the Berkshires, and enthusiastic over the new young conductors he has been developing at the Tanglewood Music School.

Leonard Bernstein is only one of them. (The conductor hinted broadly that Bernstein might direct the first American performance of Benjamin Britten's English opera "Peter Grimes," next summer.) Another is Lukas Foss, composer of the ballet, "The Gift of the Magi," which had its world premiere in Boston last week, from the Ballet Theater. Foss is now the official pianist of the Symphony Orchestra. And there are other young batonists who have not yet been heard from.

* * *

"Peter Grimes," by the way, was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, and excerpts from the score will be played this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time anywhere. The opera had its first performance last season in London, and was reviewed at length in these columns.

Dr. Koussevitzky has some definite ideas about opera and opera production. He feels the need of new blood in the field of the lyric theater. He wants new operas by Americans and new production methods that will parallel the advances made in the speaking theater and in ballet. To this end he has enlisted the services at Tanglewood for several years past of three men who share his progressive views: Dr. Herbert Graf, Dr. Richard Rychtarik, and Boris Goldovsky. With the help of these men and of young American composers, singers, and conductors, he hopes to revivify opera in America.

Nor are Dr. Koussevitzky's plans limited to Boston and Tanglewood. He envisages a future in which music and the other arts will receive government aid instead of being dependent on private or corporate subsidy. He is very definite that art must be supported; it must not be placed on a commercial basis.

* * *

In this connection he mentioned a proposal that he made some time ago, applied to New England. We have, he said, 30,000,000 people in this section. Let each of them contribute half a dollar. In that way, we might have three major symphony orchestras instead of one in New England. Every city would have its large hall in which concert, opera and ballet would be presented; and every town would have its small hall in which the people would hear chamber music. The fund would be administered by a group similar to the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This enthusiasm for the spread of musical culture is an expression of Dr. Koussevitzky's love of democracy. He finds it strange that the democracies so far have not learned the necessity for providing all the people with the benefits of art, but he is confident that eventually this imperative need will be understood. He will be satisfied only with a singing nation.

The compositions which will be played this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time anywhere are Samuel Barber's Cello Concerto (Raya Garbousova); the aforesaid excerpts from "Peter Grimes"; Bergsma's Music on a Quiet Theme; Copland's Symphony; Elliott Carter's Holiday Overture; David Diamond's Rounds for string orchestra; Alexandre Gretchaninov's "Elégie"; Boris Koutzen's "From the American Folklore"; Martinů's Symphony No. 3; Milhaud's Symphony; Gian-Carlo Menotti's Piano Concerto, and Aurelio Pescara's "Commedia dell' Arte."

Works which will have their first American performance include Miaskovsky's Symphony No. 22, Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5, and Shostakovitch's Ninth Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

OCT 12 1945

Shostakovitch Asked To Appear in Boston

Boston, Oct. 12 (A. P.).—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today that Dmitri Shostakovitch, Russian composer, had been invited to come to Boston as a guest conductor, piano soloist or "as a simple member of the orchestra audience."

Koussevitsky said he thought the Russian might fly here, possibly to conduct his own Ninth Symphony. Shostakovitch has promised Koussevitsky the first American performance of this opus.

[21]

BOSTON TRAVELER, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1945

Shostakovitch Invited To Lead Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky Asks Subsidy Concerts

[By United Press]

Dmitri Shostakovitch, Soviet Russia's outstanding symphonic composer, may make his first appearance in the United States at Boston Symphony Hall this winter.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today that he had invited the Russian composer to attend the nation's first performance

SYMPHONY

(Continued on Page Nine)

(AP Photo)
DMITRI SHOSTAKOVITCH

Symphony

(Continued from First Page)

here of his latest major work, the Ninth Symphony.

"I wrote him that he is welcome to come as a guest conductor or as a pianist," Koussevitzky said.

Koussevitzky said that "democratic governments have done nothing for art."

The gray-haired 71-year-old conductor told a press conference that democratic governments "unfortunately forget that their people need spiritual food as much as physical food."

Now in his 22d consecutive year as Boston Symphony conductor, Koussevitzky believes that the only way all forms of art can be brought to the most people is through governmental subsidies.

He added that the best way for "great factories with tremendous profits" to distribute their incomes was by sponsoring art for the people —not by giving out money. But even in that case, he said, federal or state support is a necessity.

"If the 30,000,000 persons in New England—to take only one section of the country as an example—would donate 50 cents yearly each, this region could have three symphony orchestras, a big hall in every city and a New England opera and ballet company," he declared.

However, he emphasized, such a fund must be kept "out of the hands of politicians and entrusted to special persons, such as musicians or orchestra trustees."

The Boston Symphony, now in its 65th season, will give 18 works their local or world premiere here this year. Also scheduled are all seven symphonies of Sibelius in honor of the Finnish master's 80th birthday. Dec. 8.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TELEGRAPH

OCT 13 1945

Shostakovitch May Conduct at Boston

BOSTON, Oct. 12.—Dmitri Shostakovitch, Soviet Russian's outstanding symphonic composer, may make his first appearance in the United States at Boston Symphony Hall this Winter.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today that he had invited the Russian composer to attend the nation's first performance here of his latest major work, the Ninth Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 13 1945

SHOSTAKOVICH GETS BOSTON INVITATION

Koussevitzky Asks Composer to Be Guest at Premiere of 9th —Urges U. S. Aid to Arts

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Oct. 12—Dmitri Shostakovich, Russia's noted composer, has been invited to make his first United States appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, revealed that he and the orchestra's trustees had invited the composer to be a conductor, soloist or a guest when the orchestra presents the first performance in this country of Mr. Shostakovich's newest major work, the Ninth symphony.

His appearance would complete Dr. Koussevitzky's plan for celebrating the war victory of the Allies. Great Britain will be represented this season by Sir Adrian Boult, conductor of the British Broadcasting Company Symphony, and France by Paul Paray as guest conductors.

Expects Russian's Acceptance

The Shostakovich Ninth symphony will be presented in February, and Dr. Koussevitzky expressed the belief that the Russian composer would fly here for the première.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who started his twenty-second year as conductor of the Boston Symphony this month, outlined plans for the orchestra during the season and foresaw a future in which music and other arts will receive Government aid instead of being dependent upon private means.

Governments "unfortunately forget that their people need spiritual food as much as physical food," he said. "Nothing is being done by our Government," he continued. "We have private assistance and we have radio sponsors who are spending money from their great factories. That is the best way to distribute the incomes of the factories to the people. Not in money to them, but in art."

"If the 30,000,000 people in New England would give 50 cents each year," he added, "then there might be three major symphonies in New England instead of one, and every city would have a large hall in which opera, concerts and ballets could be presented, while every town could have a small hall for chamber music."

Operas for Tanglewood

The 71-year-old conductor plans to present opera productions at Tanglewood and restore the full program of nine symphony concerts there next summer.

The orchestra will play this season eighteen major new works. Ten of the pieces will be world premières, four will be the first presentations in the United States and four will be Boston premières.

One of the world premières was given this afternoon when the orchestra presented Bohuslav Martinu's Symphony No. 3.

The orchestra also will present all seven of Jan Sibelius' completed symphonies in honor of the Finnish composer's eightieth birthday, this year.

Other new works include the concerto for 'cello and orchestra by the American composer, Samuel Barber, which will be played with Raya Garbusova, Russian 'cellist, as soloist. William Bergsma's "Music on a Quiet Theme"; the Elliot Cook Carter Jr. "Holiday Overture"; David Diamond's "Rounds for String Orchestra," and Alexander Gretchaninov's "Elegie" are among other American composers' works to be presented for the first time.

Sergei Prokofieff's Fifth symphony and Benjamin Britten's excerpts from the opera "Peter Grimes" will have their first American performance.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

OCT 12 1945

Koussevitzky Urges Subsidies for Art

BOSTON, Oct. 12 (UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today that "democratic governments have done nothing for art."

The gray-haired 71-year-old conductor told a press conference that democratic governments "unfortunately forget that their people need spiritual food as much as physical food."

Now in his 22nd consecutive year as Boston Symphony conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky said he believed that the only way all forms of art can be brought to the most people is through governmental subsidies.

THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—FRIDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1945

Dr. Koussevitzky Has Own Ideas on Music Subsidy

By CYRUS DURGIN

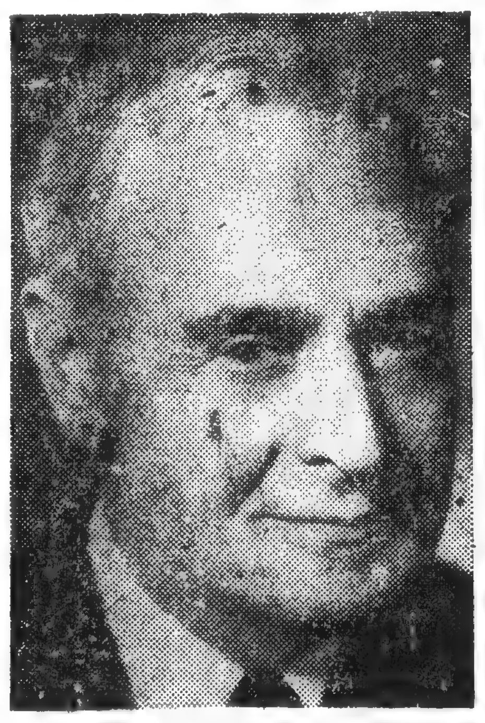
"No democratical country has done something for the art of music," said the Boston Symphony Orchestra's famed conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. "Democratical governments forget people need spiritual food just as physical food," he continued, waving his spectacles for emphasis.

The musician made these observations in his quaint English at an interview in the home he has newly bought in Brookline. It had all begun when he was asked about government subsidy of music. That is a subject dear to Mr. Koussevitzky's heart, and he had plenty to say.

"There are 30 meelion people in New England," said Dr. Koussevitzky. "If a half-dollar everybody gave we would have feefteen meelion dollars for the art.

"Een our country what is doing the government for art? Nothing! Absolutely nothing! We have private assestance, and we have the radio sponsors who are spending the money from their great factories. That ees the best way, what the radio sponsors are doing, to distribute the great eencome of the great factories to the people. Not in money to them, but een art."

With government subsidy, continued Mr. Koussevitzky, every state could have its own great orchestra, and every city its own big hall. He believes that such funds should be administered by special—preferably musical—groups and not by politicians.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Shostakovich Premiere Here

Dressed smartly in salt-and-pepper tweeds, with matching gray-and-white striped bow tie, Mr. Koussevitzky looked hale and animated as he went from one subject to another.

He announced the American premiere of the new Ninth Symphony by Mimitri Shostakovitch next February.

"Will Shostakovich himself come here?"

"Very possibly," grinned the conductor. "The orchestra has invited him to conduct, play, or simply be our guest."

The opera, "Peter Grimes," commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and first presented in London last Summer, will have its American premiere at the Berkshire Festival in "Tanglewood" next Summer. It was composed by a young Englishman, Benjamin Britten; excerpts from the opera will be heard in Symphony Hall during the season.

"Will you conduct the 'Tanglewood' premiere?"

"That would be too much work," smiled Koussevitzky after a pause. "I have not the time. We should get some young and gifted conductor."

"Like Leonard Bernstein?"

"Yes." Again with a smile. This time Mr. Koussevitzky added that while he had conducted opera he never enjoyed doing it.

The 80th birthday of the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius, will be observed by Boston Symphony performances of all seven Sibelius symphonies. Mr. Koussevitzky said that due to an affliction which has made it impossible for Sibelius to write, he has composed nothing in the last 10 years.

Plans for the current Boston Symphony season, not previously announced, include the first Boston appearance, in November, of the French musician, Paul Paray, as guest conductor.

Among the new scores are: First time anywhere: Cello Concerto by Samuel Barber, Raya Garbousova soloist; Symphony by Aaron Copland; "Holiday Overture" by Elliot Cook Carter Jr.; "Rounds for String Orchestra" by David Diamond; Elegie by Alexandre Gretchaninoff; "From the American Folklore," Boris Koutzen; Symphony by Darius Milhaud; "In Memoriam," by Douglas Moore; "Commedia dell' Arte," Aurelio Pescara.

First Boston performances: "Music on a Quiet Theme," by William Bergsma; Second Symphony by Dmitri Kabalevsky; Symphony No. 22 by Nikolai Miaskovsky. First American performances: Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony.

Gospel Crusade Rally of Children Tomorrow

Carlton Booth, nationally known Gospel soloist and song leader, and a junior choir of 300 boys and girls will be heard in the mass rally of the children's Gospel crusade tomorrow morning at 10:15 in Tremont Temple auditorium.

Participants in the program will include Betty and Barbara Aldenberg, aged 8, of Wakefield; David and Jonathan Chorlian, young violinists from Revere; Rosemary Roberts, 7, of Weymouth; Joyce Steele, 12, of Quincy, and Stanley Smith, 8, of Dorchester. Scripture will be read by Alice Taylor and prayer offered by William Reed.

SO. NORWALK, CONN.
SENTINEL

OCT 12 1945

DEMOCRACIES DO LITTLE FOR ART

BOSTON, Oct. 12.—(UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today that "democratic governments have done nothing for art".

The gray-haired 71-year-old conductor told a press conference that democratic governments "unfortunately forget that their people need spiritual food as much as physical food".

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT

OCT 12 1945

Boston, Oct. 12—(UP)—Dmitri Shostakovitch, Soviet Russia's outstanding symphonic composer, may make his first appearance in the United States at Boston Symphony hall this winter.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, said today that he had invited the Russian composer to attend the nation's first performance here of his latest major work, the Ninth Symphony.

"I wrote him that he is welcome to come as a guest, a conductor or as a pianist," Koussevitzky said.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

OCT 12 1945

Russian Composer May Come To Hub

BOSTON, Oct. 12 (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that Dmitri Shostakovitch, Russian symphony composer, had been invited to come to Boston as a guest conductor of the Boston musicians.

Koussevitzky said he thought he Russian might fly here, possibly to conduct his own Ninth Symphony. Shostakovitch has promised Koussevitzky the first American performance of this opus, the Bostonian said.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

OCT 12 1945

Boston Invites Shostakovich

Boston, Oct. 12 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said today that Dmitri Shostakovitch, Russian composer, had been invited to come to Boston as a guest conductor, piano soloist or "as a simple member of the orchestra audience."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

OCT 12 1945

Russian Composer Invited to Boston

BOSTON, Oct. 12 (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that Dimitri Shostakovitch, Russian symphony composer, had been invited to come to Boston as a [illegible] conductor of the Boston musicians.

Koussevitzky said he thought the Russian might fly here, possibly to conduct his own Ninth Symphony. Shostakovitch has promised Koussevitzky the first American performance of this opus, the Bostonian said.

Koussevitzky has long been an admirer of the Russian's work. Several years ago, irritated at reviews uncomplimentary to the composer of the Boston orchestra's performance of his Fifth Symphony, Koussevitzky vowed he would repeat it until critics admitted it was a fine work. He did and they did.

[22]

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1945

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the second concert of its 65th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, performing the following program:

Overture to "Idomeneo" (K.366) . . . Mozart
Symphony No. 3 . . . . Martinu
"Swan of Tuonela," Op. 22. No. 3;
Symphony No. 1 in E minor, Op. 39 . . . . Sibelius

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

With every new work Martinu makes it more clear that he is, all things considered, one of the first two or three composers of our times. His First Symphony was without doubt the finest musical product of 1942; his Two Piano Concerto, given last year, was wondrous, while his Piano Quintet proved last year to be far and away the best chamber music of this generation.

Yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony orchestra introduced his Third Symphony in a remarkably vigorous and discerning performance under Dr. Koussevitzky, and if it didn't quite have the outspoken beauty or unswerving progress of musical thought of the First it had moments of great charm along with its very obvious musical distinction. You couldn't challenge the form of its three movements; each was about as clear and logical as could be, while the melodic inspiration was as always in Martinu, fresh, spontaneous and plentiful—as witness the really exquisite little duet involving Mr. Laurent on the flute and Mr. Foss with one finger at the piano. Nor could you fail to be enchanted by the orchestral textures and sonorities, as for instance in the slow movement when the violins plan a dry-ish sort of figuration against the sustained sound of woodwinds over a gently undulating rhythm. Throughout the entire work there were such moments.

Still, somehow or other I didn't feel there was a wholeness or a great underlying unity in the Symphony. It isn't that it was contrived, for I don't think Martinu ever "contrives" anything. It just didn't strike me as being inevitable but maybe I was too busy thinking how good it did sound when at its best to catch all the musical complexities of the score.

Nonetheless, it is a highly interesting and certainly masterly work and it was most successful with the audience which gave the composer a very respectable and, I am sure, sincerely felt, ovation. Everybody realizes—it is most encouraging to report—that Martinu is indeed one of our foremost men of music, and even if some of us don't hear all there is to hear in his music (and we'd certainly be pretty special if we did in a first hearing), we can somehow tell that it's there and maybe we'll hear more of it next time.

The concert opened with the Overture to Mozart's "Idomeneo," a piece of utter simplicity but with such implications it makes you furious to think nobody ever dreams of doing the opera itself, continued with a superb performance of Sibelius' familiar "Swan of Tuonela" with the solo English horn part beautifully done by Mr. Speyer, and concluded with Sibelius' First Symphony in a glowing interpretation by Dr. Koussevitzky. In the light of latter day Sibelius it is, to be sure, a little mellow, but it is good to hear once in a while—and it was certainly done up to a good brown yesterday.

SOUTH STATION

The South Station Theater this week is featuring "The True Glory," the magnificent documentary on the allied campaign in Europe, from months before D-Day to the conclusion of the war. The film is the result of combined efforts by photographers of the American, British, and other allied armies, and commentary is by soldiers of all ranks and many nations. The program also includes varied short subjects and latest news features.

Oct. 13, 1945

Martinů's Third Symphony Given First Performance

By L. A. Sloper

Bohuslav Martinů's Symphony No. 3 had its first performance anywhere at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky opened this second program of the season with Mozart's Overture to "Idomeneo, Rè di Creta." Listed for the second half of the program were two items designed to begin the Sibelius "festival" which the conductor has announced will include all the seven symphonies. This first installment consists of "The Swan of Tuonela" and the First Symphony, in E minor.

Mr. Martinů's new symphony is dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was projected in observance of the twentieth anniversary of the conductor's tenancy, but has been delayed until the beginning of his twenty-second season here.

According to Milos Safránek, quoted in the program book, Mr. Martinů's. "compositions are in a manner of his own, having no relation to current fashions." The composer himself, who is very articulate with words, has pointed out some of the difficulties encountered "when a composer is trying to express elevated thoughts." He also hints that the symphony form is thought of today as dependent upon a program; and he subscribes to the employment of intensity of expression in this form.

These observations are all germane to a consideration of this symphony. As I listened to it yesterday, I felt throughout that it must have had a program, and that it would have been much better if the program had been announced. As it is, we have only the dedication to go by, and the suggestion made here the other day by my colleague Mr. Tryon, that the music is intended as a tone portrait of the conductor, may well be significant. For the score is marked by a notable intensity, to which Dr. Koussevitzky gave full sway.

This problem of the literary content of the score is important because the music does not stand well alone. Its melodic content is unimpressive, and a literal repetition of an exposition hardly forms a satisfactory recapitulation. There are groups of notes with sequences, inversions or imitations, scale passages which are repeated, brief contrapuntal excursions, but no salient material or compelling treatment. The score is episodic, with little apparent relation between the several segments, and a want of total integration. The most effective moments are toward the end, where a chorale-like passage is followed by a quiet close.

Mr. Martinů is described as a highly individual composer, but his independence is not, so far as I can judge, built upon original musical thoughts nor novel construction. Shall we consider that emotional intensities strung upon a loose framework constitute individuality? In that case, it must be admitted that the individuality is not well disciplined. This symphony might be called the Czech "Pathétique," just as the Sibelius First might serve in a similar capacity for the Finnish people—except that Mr. Martinů's contribution lacks the architectural solidity of the other two.

The new symphony was well received, and the composer appeared on the platform to share the plaudits with conductor and orchestra.

E BOSTON DAILY GLOBE

Oct. 13

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

If anyone is tired of hearing what a magnificent orchestra the Boston Symphony is, that's just too bad. They're going to hear more of the same right now. These two sentences will serve as text for this morning's observations about the concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon.

First, the program was exceptionally good, beginning with the Overture to Mozart's opera, "Idomeneo, King of Crete"; including the first performance of the Third Symphony by Bohuslay Martinu, and ending with two early works of Sibelius—"The Swan of Tuonela" and the First Symphony. Second, the music was the sort to draw out Serge Koussevitzky's necromantic powers of interpretation. Apart from an almost indistinguishable roughness toward the end of the scherzo in Sibelius' Symphony, the orchestra played gorgeously.

Mr. Martinu's Third Symphony is so agreeable that you might wonder whether it will add to his artistic stature, since everyone is aware that music which lives never is easily digested at first hearing. The Symphony falls in three fairly short movements, and its dominant quality is a pre-occupation with complex orchestral effects. There are logic and "line" and a certain amount of forward motion, but also there are so many details that oftentimes the music seems to lag by the wayside. Certainly it doesn't bowl you over.

Nevertheless the work is full of pleasant sounds and what, after a few more performances, may likely prove to be tunes. This is a score that glows with exotic tints. It made me think a little of Mahler's orchestral writing, and a little of the orchestral counterpoint Richard Strauss used to write in his younger days. The resemblance is not to be overemphasized, let it hastily be added, because the Martinu Symphony is in no sense "big" music.

Needless to add, Mr. Koussevitzky gave all possible splendor to a score that only a clever orchestrator could write, and which, I daresay, only a few orchestras can play well. Mr. Martinu appeared on the stage and was applauded.

Were there ever such luminous, rich or emotionally persuasive strings as provided much of the background for Louis Speyer's masterly English horn solo in "The Swan of Tuonela"? I doubt it. Or was the Sibelius E minor Symphony ever read with better style or more overwhelming passion? That, too, I doubt.

The Overture to "Idomeneo," though dramatic, is lesser Mozart, lacking the authority of the "Magic Flute" Overture of the grandeur of that to "Don Giovanni." It has its place and makes its effect, however, when performed as Mr. Koussevitzky does it: with a blend of classic proportion, tonal clarity, and the conductor's own personal intensity.

For the first time since Nov. 14, 1941, the Friday subscribers did not stand and sing "The Star Spangled Banner" yesterday. Mr. Koussevitzky began the new season with it in token of the victory. But now that the war is over he will reserve the National Anthem for special occasions.

This Clipping From OTTOWA, CANADA
EVENING JOURNAL

OCT 13 1945

Shostakovitch Invited to Boston

BOSTON, Oct. 13.—(AP)—Conductor Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today Dmitri Shostakovitch, Russian composer, has been invited to come here as guest conductor. Mr. Koussevitzky said he thought the Russian might fly here to conduct his own ninth symphony whose first American performance he has promised the Boston conductor.

Hall, with Ed Andrews every Wednesday and Saturday and Dick Hingston on Fridays.

Oct 13 1945

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra began their season-long observance of the approaching 80th birthday of Jean Sibelius. Apparently a chronological plan will be followed. In any event, yesterday's pieces were "The Swan of Tuonela" of 1893 and the First Symphony, composed six years later. The conductor said the other day that not only did he intend to play seven symphonies but he would also see to it that they came in the latter or broadcast half of the concert. The true Sibelians do not particularly esteem No. 1. It is indeed less characteristic, more reminiscent. There is more of what is called patheticism, more 19th century romanticism, more tonal drama of the rather obvious sort. Nevertheless, we can descern here what was at the time a new voice, the expression not only of a powerful personality but of the ruggedness and bleakness, the occasional wildness as well as the charm and poetry of the North. As was to be expected, yesterday's performance was one of great eloquence. Dr. Koussevitzky admires Sibelius and believes in him, and among the conductors now functioning in this country he may truly be called the Finnish master's prophet.

The anti-Sibelians will have it that all the music of the mighty Finn is fading. There is precious little music that does not. Some of the symphonies are wearing better than others and the tone poems are wearing less well than the symphonies. Anyway, with Louis Speyer to take the important English horn solo, the gloomy "Swan" was beautifully played yesterday.

There was another symphony and a far less important one, the Third of Bohuslav Martinu, dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra. After the Second Symphony and the Concerto for Two Pianos, this latest from the Czech composer was something of a disappointment. It seemed to lack impulse and direction and also conviction. It tends to be spotty and episodic, though some of the episodes are very attractive. If everything had been as good as the last quarter of the finale the work could at least be set down as extremely agreeable. Summoned to the stage by Dr. Koussevitzky, the composer was warmly applauded. He is, of course, one of the distinguished figures in contemporary music. Mozart's none-too-familiar Overture to "Idomeneo," which looks back to Gluck and forward to the "Jupiter" Symphony, began the concert and, like everything else, in superb performance.

This Clipping From
STAMFORD, CONN.
ADVOCATE

OCT 13 1945

Shortakovich Invited To Conduct In Boston

Boston, Oct. 13. (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, disclosed today that Dmitri Shostakovitch, Russian symphony composer, had been invited to come to Boston as a guest conductor of the Boston musicians.

Koussevitzky said he thought the Russian might fly here, possibly to conduct his own Ninth Symphony. Shostakovitch has promised Koussevitzky the first American performance of this opus, the Bostonian said.

Koussevitzky added that Shostakovitch would be welcome to come here either as guest conductor, piano soloist or "as a simple member of the orchestra audience."

Koussevitzky has long been an admirer of the Russian's work. Several years ago, irritated at reviews uncomplimentary to the composer of the Boston orchestra's performance of his Fifth Symphony, Koussevitzky vowed he would repeat it until critics admitted it was a fine work. He did and they did.

NEW YORK TIMES, SA

SHOSTAKOVICH GETS BOSTON INVITATION

Oct. 12

Koussevitzky Asks Composer to Be Guest at Premiere of 9th —Urges U. S. Aid to Arts

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Oct. 12—Dmitri Shostakovich, Russia's noted composer, has been invited to make his first United States appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, revealed that he and the orchestra's trustees had invited the composer to be a conductor, soloist or a guest when the orchestra presents the first performance in this country of Mr. Shostakovich's newest major work, the Ninth Symphony.

His appearance would complete Dr. Koussevitzky's plan for celebrating the war victory of the Allies. Great Britain will be represented this season by Sir Adrian Boult, conductor of the British Broadcasting Company Symphony, and France by Paul Paray as guest conductors.

Expects Russian's Acceptance

The Shostakovich Ninth Symphony will be presented in February, and Dr. Koussevitzky expressed the belief that the Russian composer would fly here for the première.

Dr. Kousssvitzky, who started his twenty-second year as conductor of the Boston Symphony this month, outlined plans for the orchestra during the season and foresaw a future in which music and other arts will receive Government aid instead of being dependent upon private means.

Governments "unfortunately forget that their people need spiritual food as much as physical food," he said. "Nothing is being done by our Government," he continued. "We have private assistance and we have radio sponsors who are spending money from their great factories. That is the bet way to distribute the incomes of the factories to the people. Not in money to them, but in art."

"If the 30,000,000 people in New England would give 50 cents each year," he added, "then there might be three major symphonies in New England instead of one, and every city would have a large hall in which opera, concerts and ballets could be presented, while every town could have a small hall for chamber music."

The 71-year-old conductor plans to present opera productions at Tanglewood and restore the full program of nine symphony concerts there next summer.

The orchestra will play this season eighteen major new works. Ten of the pieces will be world premières, four will be the first presentations in the United States and four will be Boston premières.

Martinu Symphony Heard

One of the world premières was given this afternoon when the orchestra presented Bohuslav Martinu's Symphony No. 3.

The orchestra also will present all seven of Jan Sibelius' completed symphonies in honor of the Finnish composer's eightieth birthday, this year.

Other new works include the concerts for 'cello and orchestra by the American composer, Samuel Barber, which will be played with Raya Garbusova, Russian 'cellist, as soloist. William Bergsma's "Music on a Quiet Theme"; the Elliot Cook Carter Jr. "Holiday Overture"; David Diamond's "Rounds for String Orchestra," and Alexander Gretchaninov's "Elegie" are among other American composers' works to be presented for the first time.

Sergei Prokofieff's Fifth symphony and Benjamin Britten's excerpts from the opera "Peter Grimes" will have their first American performance.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

1945

Boston Symphony Presents New Work by Martinu

The second program of the season for the Boston Symphony Orchestra had as its particular excitement a new Symphony, No. 3, by Bohuslav Martinu, in a first performance Friday afternoon. This Czech composer, now 55, has been in America since 1941. The new symphony was dedicated "To Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on his 20th anniversary."

We listened to Martinu's work with extreme interest and admiration, but had no response of uplift. There was an odd impression of a broad, well-tilled field showing no rising ground of outlook. Growth was struggling through from richly fertile ground but did not reach up triumphantly.

An under level of quietly-stirring sound characterizes the first movement which creates a feeling of expectancy which does not eventuate. To one not looking merely for program music, there is an abundance of expert harmonic content. A striking closing passage of this movement is concerned with constantly changing rhythm.

Outbreak of Applause

The Largo was received by an unusual outbreak of applause. It had its charm in the minor and a customary passage for woodwinds followed by strongly-marked support by warmer strings and percussion.

The Allegro of the third movement opened harshly, presaging conflict—apparently of the spirit. The associated Andante of this movement is recalled as using a hymn motive in a nobility of mood mirrored in choice instrumentation for the quiet finale.

Mr. Martinu, a de Gaulle type, affectionately escorted by Dr. Koussevitzky, was given a hearty evidence of approbation, both by the audience and by the orchestra, which was twice called to its feet.

As first number, Dr. Koussevitzky had chosen the overture to Mozart's "Idomeneo," an "opera seria" which he conducted in the Mozart Festival at Tanglewood, Aug. 5, 1944, and repeated in regular Symphony Hall concerts Dec. 1 and 2, 1944. The orchestra seemed larger than for a usual Mozart work—indeed, this overture for a tragic opera plot written in Mozart's matured and vital 24th year is appraised as necessarily of richer texture than for his chamber music and more brilliant operas.

Horn Solo Is Feature

For second half of the program, an English horn solo by Speyer featured the majestic gliding "Swan of Tuonela," one of Sibelius' four Legends from the "Kalevala," Finnish folk saga.

One of Dr. Koussevitzky's enthusiasms is the work of Sibelius. He always gives it with authority. His performance in the Symphony No. 1, in E minor, Op. 39, was magnificent fruit of long devotion. In clarity, breadth and keenly perceptive balance of brass and strings it may stand superbly alone as one of his masterpieces of conducting dedicated to the music of an aged and famous contemporary composer whose days are rumored to be verging on national and financial sadness.

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

OCT 14 1945

Music and Music Makers
Off the Records
By Thomas B. Sherman

AFTER hearing the complete recording of "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," done by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky on the new plastic discs, I must concede that the results are magnificent. The new record, made from a material called vinylite, is described as non-breakable, with minimum surface noise and life-like fidelity. This is no exaggeration. The richness of sonority produced by the orchestra is not exactly life-like since the acoustic character of phonographic reproduction in a small room is necessarily different from that of the concert hall. But the sound is unmarred by rattles, murmurs or buzzes and, moreover, every solo instrument comes through in its true quality.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

OCT 14 1945

RECENT RECORDS
By JEROME D. BOHM

VICTOR'S new unbreakable, pliable, plastic record has been made available to the public; its translucent, ruby-red surfaces carrying on two disks Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," set forth by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction. Victor's belief that the release of this record constitutes the greatest improvement in forty years in phonograph records for use in the home seems fully justified, for not only are the records pliable, light in weight and not subject to breakage by dropping on the bare floor, but surface sounds, caused by motor vibration and needle scratching, so prevalent when shellac records are used, have been reduced almost to inaudibility on these new disks.

The recording process, too, seems greatly improved on these vinyl records, for both the quality of the reproduced sound and the frequency range captured seems greater than ever before achieved. The performance of "Till Eulenspiegel" is a superb one, the tone of the Boston Symphony Orchestra having been mirrored with such increased veracity. This is an achievement which redounds to the glory of all concerned—musicians, technicians and publishers.

Another excellently recorded performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is that of Brahms's Third Symphony. This is perhaps Victor's finest accomplishment on shellac records. Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation is on the whole affectingly eloquent, although exception might be taken to occasional touches of sentimentality.

This Clipping From
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
OCT 14 1945

6

Reviews of New Disks

PRESUMABLY there are many people hereabouts who have, in a manner of speaking, adopted the Boston symphony orchestra ever since—let's not be coy about it—the Allis-Chalmers Co. began their regular broadcasts with the distinguished Serge Koussevitzky in command.

For that reason, and many others, there should be considerable local interest in the orchestra's recording of the Brahms third symphony, a recent Victor offering of the highest merit. Surely the third, if a vote were taken among the more devoted followers of music in Milwaukee, would be named the favorite among the four Brahms symphonies, possibly because of the instruction of the late Frederick Stock. Anyway, people love it.

As for the Boston orchestra's recording, it should go without saying that the entire work is beautifully done—richly, majestically, powerfully from first note to last, but still with the sense of intimacy that makes this work the most appealing of the four. It is needless to repeat here that the Boston orchestra is so blessed with able personnel that any desired effect is easily obtainable, but it is certainly true that third symphony brings out the exceptional quality of the orchestra in the most striking fashion.

Koussevitzky, to be sure, has had something to do with it.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

OCT 14 1945

Music and Song—

Record Corner

Superb in every detail, Victor's first album of non-breakable plastic records carries a brilliant performance of Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel," with Serge Koussevitzy and the Boston Symphony orchestra as the artists.

Perhaps a more popular symphonic work could have been chosen for the first pair of plastics—but it is doubtful if a more colorful piece, one which displays fine orchestral performance, could have been picked from the limitless supply of possibles.

"Till" does not, to any great degree, come under the heading of the so-called popular classics, but appears to be just the item for the two ruby-red platters of plastic in this Victor "first edition."

There is practically no surface noise to mar the tonal quality of the orchestra, and in this particular recording that is of prime importance. While the transparent feature has nothing to do with the audible excellence of the records, chances are that one of the first things you will do with the new discs is to hold them up to a light and murmur "how pretty." Everyone who has viewed this corner's review set has done just that anyway.

Aside from the fact that the album, which incidently carries the catalogue designation of DV-1, introduces plastic records, it is a first rate bit of music, too. The excellence of the Bostonians is enhanced by the crystal clear recording.

"Till Eulenspiegel" (pronounced Oil-en-Speegal) tells in music the story of the practical joker of German legend. Till goes through life playing one prank after another with a nonchalant indifference and a merry whistle until he swings from the gallows. According to the old German legend, Till escapes the gallows through trickery but Strauss swings him with a few choice notes. And then carries his soul away on the wings of ethereal tones.

There have been other recordings of Till, but none to surpass this newest Victor offering. It is really first edition material.—H.H.W.

RECORDS: PLASTIC DISKS

Oct. 14

By MARK A. SCHUBART

THE first unbreakable plastic records have been issued by Victor, and the new disks represent a technicological triumph of no mean proportions. For not only are they easier to handle than the traditional shellac records, but surface noise seems to have been almost completely eliminated, and the sonorities of the music sound wonderfully fresh and clear.

For its first recording on these new disks, Victor has released a performance of Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky (Album DV-1, two twelve-inch records), an appropriate choice since the composer's lavish orchestration and use of wide dynamic ranges allows ample opportunity for displaying recording fidelity. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra have risen to the occasion with a sparkling and vital performance of the music.

Victor has announced that their plastic records will sell for $2 per twelve-inch record—just twice the price of the shellac disks—which, despite the obvious advantages, seems expensive. However it appears likely that as they come into wider use, the disks will be sold at lower prices and eventually—unless circular disks are entirely superseded by wire recording or some other new device—will undoubtedly completely replace the shellac product.

This Clipping From
DURHAM, N. C.
HERALD

OCT 14 1945

Victor Recordings

STRAUSS: TILL EULENSPIEGEL'S MERRY PRANKS, OP. 28. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Victor: Album DV-1; two 12-inch records.

For the first release on its new non-breakable plastics records, Victor has chosen Richard Strauss' famous tone-poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, Op. 28," as recorded by Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is a record event.

The new type disc, which is flexible and a translucent ruby-red, has been described by J. W. Murray, general manager of the RCA Victor Records Division, as the most important new development in home recording in the record industry's 45-year history. Although similar plastic records have been used for some time by the armed forces, the high cost has hitherto made them impractical for home use. Production of the new records is still so limited that they will cost a little more than the ordinary records and only special selections will be released on them at present.

Two chief advantages of the plastic records are immediately obvious: they don't have to be handled with delicate care and thus can be safely transported, and surface noise on them is reduced to a minimum. These qualities alone justify the fanfare that the new discs are receiving. But, also, the tonal quality is finer, approaching concert-hall fidelity. This new album will, of course, be available in limited quantities, and later will be presented on the regular type records.

The fourth of Strauss' seven Symphonic Poems, "Till Eulenspiegel" is perhaps the most famous, and certainly the most popular. It was performed for the first time in 1895, five years after the mysterious and intensely brooding "Death and Transfiguration," which stands in severe contrast with this portrayal of a devilish rogue. Through brilliant music the story of the hero, Till Eulenspiegel, is told, his endless tricks, flirtations, and then his trial, at which he first mocks and then bemoans his fate, finally dying with shouts of laughter.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra do a masterly job in this recording. From the opening tender Rondo to the closing chords of musical laughter, they are complete masters of the elaborate orchestration. Strauss' music, when mis-

---

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 14 1945

RECORDS: PLASTIC DISKS

By MARK A. SCHUBART

THE first unbreakable plastic records have been issued by Victor, and the new disks represent a technicological triumph of no mean proportions. For not only are they easier to handle than the traditional shellac records, but surface noise seems to have been almost completely eliminated, and the sonorities of the music sound wonderfully fresh and clear.

For its first recording on these new disks, Victor has released a performance of Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky (Album DV-1, two twelve-inch records), an appropriate choice since the composer's lavish orchestration and use of wide dynamic ranges allows ample opportunity for displaying recording fidelity. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra have risen to the occasion with a sparkling and vital performance of the music.

Victor has announced that their plastic records will sell for $2 per twelve-inch record—just twice the price of the shellac disks—which, despite the obvious advantages, seems expensive. However it appears likely that as they come into wider use, the disks will be sold at lower prices and eventually—unless circular disks are entirely superseded by wire recording or some other new device—will undoubtedly completely replace the shellac product.

[24]

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 14 1945

EVENTS IN

ONE of the first direct communications from Pablo Casals, the famous Spanish 'cellist, has been received here by Boaz Piller, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"I was delighted to have word from you after all this sad time," Casals wrote from Perpignan, France. "Music in America has not lost its rights, as becomes a civilized people. I have thought of you as among my good friends in America, the country of liberty, at the time when we lived in fear of the caprices of the military and the Gestapo. In spite of all the suffering, the honest people here have remained steadfast. For my part, I felt confident in them even in the worst moments.

"I have resumed my activities in England and in Switzerland, from whence I have just returned," Casals continued. "In October I will go back to England. In Paris they will celebrate the forty-sixth anniversary of my debut with the Lamoureux Orchestra. After that will come Belgium and Holland and Switzerland once more—about fifty concerts in all. My cordial good wishes to my friends, beginning with Koussevitzky."

~~Oct~~ 14 - Times

ONE of the first direct communications from Pablo Casals, the famous Spanish 'cellist, has been received here by Boaz Piller, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"I was delighted to have word from you after all this sad time," Casals wrote from Perpignan, France. "Music in America has not lost its rights, as becomes a civilized people. I have thought of you as among my good friends in America, the country of liberty, at the time when we lived in fear of the caprices of the military and the Gestapo. In spite of all the suffering, the honest people here have remained steadfast. For my part, I felt confident in them even in the worst moments.

"I have resumed my activities in England and in Switzerland, from whence I have just returned," Casals continued. "In October I will go back to England. In Paris they will celebrate the forty-sixth anniversary of my debut with the Lamoureux Orchestra. After that will come Belgium and Holland and Switzerland once more—about fifty concerts in all. My cordial good wishes to my friends, beginning with Koussevitzky."

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS

OCT 14 1945

Brahms' Third Is Superbly Played By Koussevitzky

ASTONISHING, isn't it, that out of a few shining black discs can come so much beauty? It's the new Victor album for which the Boston Symphony has recorded the Brahms Third, that I'm talking about. The Third symphony, which the brilliant German conductor, Richter, called Brahms' Eroica, is intensely personal music, gloriously sweeping stuff that alternates with gentleness and singing eloquence. The Boston orchestra and its meticulous conductor, Koussevitzky, are in their element, giving a performance that is truly superb. The recording is of matching calibre.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 15 1945

Rodgers Honored By Koussevitsky

"The Carousel Waltz" from the musical hit, "Carousel," was given its first symphonic presentation last week by Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Boston's Garden. Composer Richard Rodgers was guest of honor.

URDAY, OCTOBER 20,

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the third concert of its 65th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Albert Spalding, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Two Interludes from "The Island God" .... Menotti
Concerto for Violin and orchestra in E major .... Bach Fantastic Symphony, Op. 14A ... Berlioz

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

It is not too wise a course to be very definite about a new composer's merits on the basis of a seven or eight minute composition, but it struck me that Mr. Menotti, in his two Interludes from the opera "The Island God," given their first Boston performance yesterday by the Boston Symphony orchestra, is a man we are going to hear a good deal of from now on.

True, there was not exactly a new note sounded in his two pieces, the first in an elegiac mood rising slowly in intensity to a striking climax, the second a sound and fury piece of considerable excitement. The textures, the idiom, the melodic lines (and very good ones, too) were more or less conventional; indeed, you might even say they harked back a little, but I can't see anything wrong in that. On the contrary, there was an honesty and a straightforwardness of approach that appealed strongly to me simply because I like to see if a composer can write a good tune or a good conventional piece before he tries to astonish me with his musical cerebrations.

Albert Spalding can do a good deal better than he did in the Bach Concerto yesterday, as we all very well know. If he proved to be a little bit rusty yesterday, he had, it seemed to me, the best excuse in the world, for everybody knows of his important contribution to the war effort in the armed forces these past years. So it was wonderful to have him back as the first guest soloist of the season even if he hasn't quite got his fingers up to concert pitch. He still has all his superb musicianship, his stage presence and his tone (as witness the Adagio which, though taken altogether too slowly, was very beautiful), and we're all for him.

As was to be expected, it was Dr. Koussevitzky—with the help of Berlioz and 110 of the best musicians in the world—who in the final analysis stole the show yesterday. The way he reads that Fantastic Symphony is not at all short of fantastic. Every time he does it, which is about once a year, you think he has reached the ultimate in the expresion of the miracles of this famous landmark in music, but each time he finds more to reveal. Yesterday, more than ever before, it seemed that he had written the symphony himself, and I am sure that if Berlioz had heard it yesterday he might well have thought so, too. I don't mean Koussevitzky distorts it out of recognition; on the contrary. I mean that he so perfectly and so passionately catches (and through the orchestra realizes) the wild flights of fancy in the music that it takes you off your feet, and makes you wonder if you've ever really heard it before. As for the orchestral aspects of the performance, who ever heard anything like the English horn and timpani of the closing measures of the Scene in the Fields, or the brasses of the March to the Gallows, or the unison strings of the Ball scene? Not I, for one.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Post Oct 20

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The program of this week's pair of Symphony Concerts is as curious a list as Dr. Koussevitzky or any conductor ever made. It begins with Two Interludes from Gian-Carlo Menotti's opera "The Island God," crass and garish. Obviously, "good theatre" but, as music, very bad. To them succeeds the chasteness and austerity of Bach's E major Concerto for Violin and String Orchestra, in which Albert Spalding is the soloist, and this appalling difference is split by the final number, the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz.

We are beginning to think of Mr. Menotti as an American composer. Actualy he has spent half of his 34 years here and half of them in his native Italy. In his "Amelia Goes to the Ball," brought out by the Curtis Institute in 1937, and performed the next year at the Metropolitan, he showed a flair for the stage and for opera buffa. In this lighter vein was his next work, the radio-commissioned opera "The Old Maid and the Thief." Wholly serious in character, "The Island God" was done at the Metropolitan in 1942, and failed to win acclaim.

It is said that the Overture to "Amelia" is a good concert piece. In the Interludes heard yesterday Mr. Menotti seems to have assimilated the styles and idioms of Mascagni, Puccini and Respighi (there are other influences, too) and to have put the fused result on paper. No more than the vulgarity of certain sections can the outward effectiveness of this music be denied. Yesterday's audience was plainly excited by it and when Dr. Koussevitzky brought the composer to the platform he was roundly applauded. A piano concerto from his hand now impends. What, one wonders, will it be like?

Something got into Mr. Spalding in the first movement of the Bach Concerto yesterday, nor was there perfect agreement between soloist and orchestra. Intonation was dubious, tone was not all that it should have been and attacks lacked perfect precision. In the beautiful Adagio harmony was restored and the final Allegro went much better than the first one. By that time the audience was ready to give Mr. Spalding a big hand, which he in a measure deserved.

It is generally conceded that the "Fantastic" is Berlioz' most successful Symphony. It is certainly one of Dr. Koussevitzky's most successful vehicles.

This Clipping From VARIETY
NEW YORK, N.Y.

OCT 17 1945

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Serge Koussevitzky conducting; Gene Hamilton, announcer
Writer: Maurice Hastings
P.oducer-Writer: Oliver Daniels
60 M'ns.; Sat., 9:30 p.m.
ALLIS-CHALMERS MFG. CO.
WJZ-ABC, N. Y.
(Compton)

Symphonic representation on the air is almost assuming full strength, with only the Detroit Symphony and Philadelphia Orchestra groups needed to complete the roster. The Boston Symphony Orchestra's return brings what radio needs most—artistic distinction. For here is unquestionably the finest orchestra in the land and in the world, an organization welded through a 20-year association of conductor and musicians into a brilliant ensemble that is unique. Strings, brass and winds have been brought to such degrees of refinement and virtuosity as to startle the listener, while musicianship has never been neglected for technique or mere show.

In resuming for the season, the orch has switched from its previous 8:30 p.m. time to 9:30. The switch is likely to increase its audiences west of the Mississippi, who'll find the new time more convenient. Change should also appeal to others and increase draw, as the broadcast will now present the second half of the orchestra's regular concerts, which usually includes soloist or novelty.

Second program of season, Sat. (13), was devoted to Jan Sibelius in honor of the Finnish composer's 80th birthday. Dr. Koussevitzky leading his men through an eloquent performance of "Swan of Tuonela" and the First Symphony. The English horn solo in "Swan" was particularly noteworthy. Program was also interesting for the anecdotes about Sibelius and the tie-in with the Bostonians, as Koussevitzky has been the composer's leading exponent in America (which the program pointed out).

Allis-Chalmers' commercials were on the same high plane as the program. Evening was dedicated to the half-million employees of the iron and steel industry, the three commercials (opening, middle, and close), all of them brief, pointing to the achievements of the men who found ways of refining raw metal. At the close there was brief mention of one of Allis-Chalmers' own products, but most of the talk was generalization. It was all in excellent taste.

Bron.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
Serge Koussevitzky conducting; Gene Hamilton, announcer
Writer: Maurice Hastings
P.oducer-Writer: Oliver Daniels
60 M'ns.; Sat., 9:30 p.m.
ALLIS-CHALMERS MFG. CO.
WJZ-ABC, N. Y.
(Compton)

Symphonic representation on the air is almost assuming full strength, with only the Detroit Symphony and Philadelphia Orchestra groups needed to complete the roster. The Boston Symphony Orchestra's return brings what radio needs most—artistic distinction. For here is unquestionably the finest orchestra in the land and in the world, an organization welded through a 20-year association of conductor and musicians into a brilliant ensemble that is unique. Strings, brass and winds have been brought to such degrees of refinement and virtuosity as to startle the listener, while musicianship has never been neglected for technique or mere show.

In resuming for the season, the orch has switched from its previous 8:30 p.m. time to 9:30. The switch is likely to increase its audiences west of the Mississippi, who'll find the new time more convenient. Change should also appeal to others and increase draw, as the broadcast will now present the second half of the orchestra's regular concerts, which usually includes soloist or novelty.

Second program of season, Sat. (13), was devoted to Jan Sibelius in honor of the Finnish composer's 80th birthday. Dr. Koussevitzky leading his men through an eloquent performance of "Swan of Tuonela" and the First Symphony. The English horn solo in "Swan" was particularly noteworthy. Program was also interesting for the anecdotes about Sibelius and the tie-in with the Bostonians, as Koussevitzky has been the composer's leading exponent in America (which the program pointed out).

Allis-Chalmers' commercials were on the same high plane as the program. Evening was dedicated to the half-million employees of the iron and steel industry, the three commercials (opening, middle, and close), all of them brief, pointing to the achievements of the men who found ways of refining raw metal. At the close there was brief mention of one of Allis-Chalmers' own products, but most of the talk was generalization. It was all in excellent taste.

Bron.

An admirably styled and proportioned account of the Bach Violin Concerto rounded out the consistent pleasure of the afternoon. For this work Mr. Koussevitzky radically reduced the strings, which had as foundation four double-basses.

This orchestral background was suited perfectly to the slender but not pallid tone of Mr. Spalding. He is just the soloist for this Concerto. He plays it with graceful phrasing and unflawed style, with simplicity and none of the virtoso's intensities or mannerisms that are out of place with Bach.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR OCT. 20, 1945

Albert Spalding Soloist In Bach E Major Concerto

By L. A. Sloper

Albert Spalding, first soloist of the Boston Symphony season, played Bach's Violin Concerto in E major, No. 2, with the orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Dr. Koussevitzky opened this third program of the season with Two Interludes from Menotti's opera, "The Island God," and closed it with the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz.

Strangely enough, the Bach E major Concerto had been played only once before at these concerts, and that was 41 years ago, when Ysaÿe was the soloist and Gericke the conductor. New York, however, has heard it twice since then from the Boston orchestra, once with Mr. Spalding and once with Viola Mitchell.

Without invidious comparisons, I should say that Mr. Spalding is the man for this concerto. He has the tone, the technique and above all the classic style needed for it. He played it yesterday with a superb purity of line and an exquisite tonal loveliness. Let us hope that we shall not have to wait 40 years to hear this work again. Its musical values are high, and the slow movement has a devotional quality that recalls its composer's B minor Mass and St. Matthew Passion. Dr. Koussevitzky with a small string orchestra provided an unobtrusive but completely sympathetic accompaniment, and the audience listened intently and applauded warmly.

Mr. Menotti's Interludes had their first performance in Boston. The opera from which they are drawn was produced in 1942 by the Metropolitan in New York. These intermezzos, the program book explains, are designed to picture the rising of mist and fog under the glare of the sun, and the struggles of the exiles who have been cast on a Greek island.

In reviewing the opera, the late Oscar Thompson, writing in these columns, described the music as in a "post-Puccini arioso style." This applies well to the first of these interludes. The second is rather more late-Verdi dramatic. Both are clearly of the theater, and it is easy to believe that they supported effectively the expression of the composer's purposes in the lyric theater. Mr. Menotti was present to take several bows from the platform.

The Fantastic Symphony is one of those in which Dr. Koussevitzky is at his happiest. He revels in the frenetic measures and caresses gently the moments of nostalgia. He has under his command one of the greatest orchestras ever built, and with its quick co-operation he elicits the last gasp of emotion from the score. If only as a medium for the display of the orchestra's magnificent tone and astounding virtuosity, the Fantastic would be welcome.

Music Lovers' Pre-Symphony Meetings Open

By ALISON ARNOLD

The unseasonably warm weather brought Symphony followers out in full force yesterday. And many of the music-lovers on their way to Symphony Hall for the afternoon concert met, from 12:15 until 2 o'clock, at The Copley Plaza, for the first of this season's Symphony luncheons, featuring piano illustrations and explanations of the afternoon's program, by Boris Goldovsky.

Resumed after an interval of a year, the luncheons are sponsored this winter by the Institute of Modern Art, which, besides encouraging the best in contemporary painting by exhibitions at its galleries, on Newbury street, helps to promote interest in all the arts. Mr. Thomas N. Metcalf of the Institute attended the luncheon yesterday with Mrs. Metcalf; and another active member present was Mrs. Gardner Cox.

Mrs. Thomas D. Cabot, wearing a blouse the color of yellow chartreuse with her dark suit, and a band of gold embroidery on her black hat, was at a table with Mrs. Charles Higginson and her daughter, Miss Sally Higginson. Mrs. Higginson wore a gray suit with a matching postillon hat. Also in gray, was auburn haired Mrs. Harold Blanchard.

Sharing a table with Mrs. Francis L. Coolidge, 2d, was her sister, Miss Mary Curtis Mrs. John B. Buttrick and Mr. Horatio Colony. Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs, with a rose on her black hat, was at a table with her daughter, Miss Rebekah Hobbs, and Mrs. George Hawley.

Mrs. Sohier Shaw was in the audience listening intently to Mr. Goldovsky, and others noted were: Mr. Donald McKay Frost, Mrs. T. Mott Shaw, Mrs. William Bayne, Mrs. Edwin S. Dodge, Mrs. Harold Keller, Mrs. Harold D. Hodgkinson, Mrs. Samuel Chamberlain, Mrs. H. Bigelow Emerson, and Mrs. Alexander Steinert, who wore a costume of cinnamon wool, a hat of the same shade with shaded feathers on the brim, and a mink scarf.

Some thought the first movement went too fast, but I thought it was about right. The movement rippled but did not rush. The songful beauty of the adagio is hardly to be described, and as for the final allegro, that was a model of clarity. Mr. Spalding was received most enthusiastically.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Hector Berlioz and Serge Koussevitsky at white heat make a peerless combination. That was exactly the situation at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon during the Boston Symphony Orchestra's performance of the "Fantastic" Symphony by the French composer who was "father of modern orchestration."

The concert began with the first Boston performances of Two Interludes from Gian-Carlo Menotti's opera "The Island God," and included the E major Violin Concerto of Bach, with Albert Spalding as soloist.

Some of the purist boys look down their sharp, academic noses at mention of Berlioz' name. But for concert audiences in general, for many musicians and this chronicler in particular, Berlioz always provides a good time.

The opulence of his orchestration, lush quality of his tunes, passion of his fantasy, and pervading warmth that clothes all his music are not to be sneered at.

The "Fantastic," like the "Harold in Italy" Symphony, is a grand old show, and for a conductor like Mr. Koussevitzky and an orchestra like the Boston Symphony, it is a virtuoso piece of the highest importance. No more proof of the fact is needed than the rousing applause that followed yesterday's performance.

Mr. Koussevitzky has done the "Fantastic" many times before, but I cannot recall any other reading of it so taut or so incandescent. On a hot, sticky day, when strings easily slip out of tune, the orchestra sounded marvelously deep, rich and multicolored.

The Symphony went with a verve and precision that took your breath away, and the finale especially was hairraising.

The only thing off was the chimes. Something ought to be done about those chimes, whose tones are tinny and whose overtones produce a fuzz of dissonance.

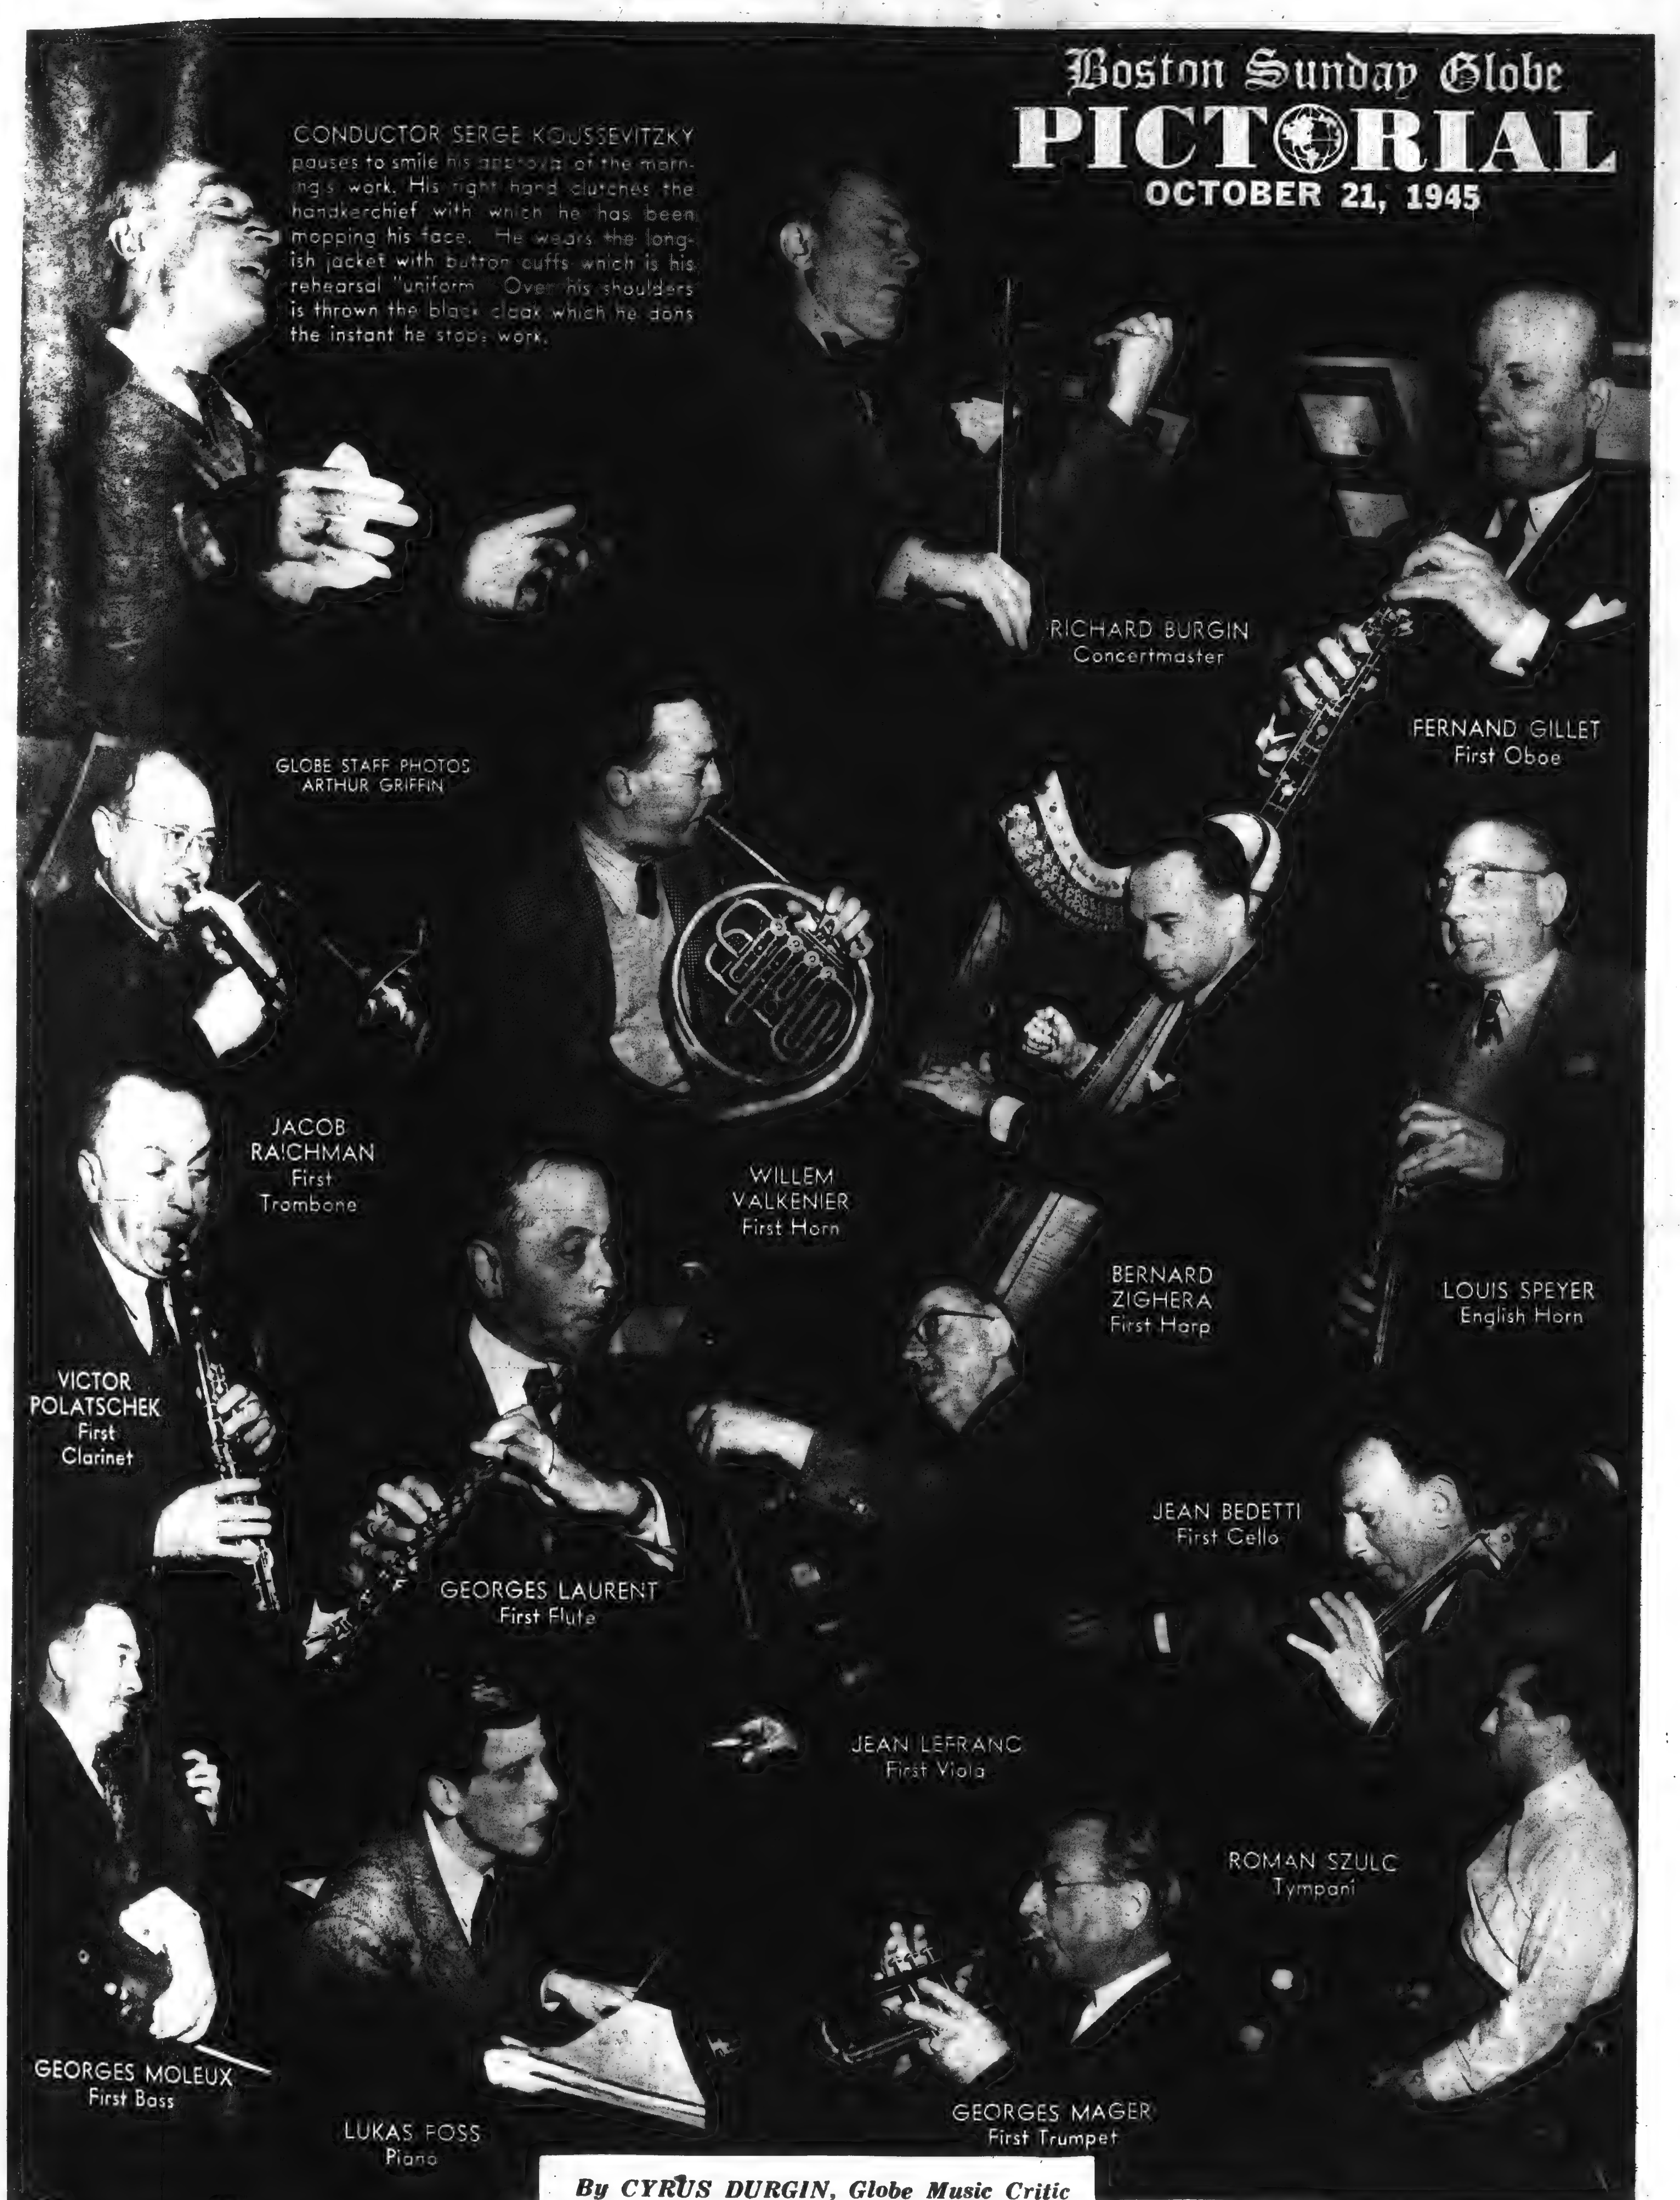
The Two Interludes from "The Island God" are more theatre than concert music, but when played by a large, first-rate orchestra they take on added vivacity which makes them suitable for use in the concert hall.

Mr. Menotti's idiom is modern-cosmopolitan, with a pleasant Italian flavor around the edges. His scoring is solid, and at the same time it sounds "big" and iridescent.

These fragments are not enough to give much of an idea of Mr. Menotti as composer, but that will be remedied soon when his new Piano Concerto is played at these concerts. The dark-haired young composer was brought to the stage by Mr. Koussevitzky, where he was cordially applauded.

[25]

Boston Sunday Globe
PICTORIAL
OCTOBER 21, 1945



CONDUCTOR SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY pauses to smile his approval of the morning's work. His right hand clutches the handkerchief with which he has been mopping his face. He wears the longish jacket with button cuffs which is his rehearsal "uniform." Over his shoulders is thrown the black cloak which he dons the instant he stops work.

GLOBE STAFF PHOTOS
ARTHUR GRIFFIN

RICHARD BURGIN
Concertmaster

FERNAND GILLET
First Oboe

JACOB RAICHMAN
First Trombone

WILLEM VALKENIER
First Horn

BERNARD ZIGHERA
First Harp

LOUIS SPEYER
English Horn

VICTOR POLATSCHEK
First Clarinet

GEORGES LAURENT
First Flute

JEAN BEDETTI
First Cello

JEAN LEFRANC
First Viola

ROMAN SZULC
Tympani

GEORGES MOLEUX
First Bass

LUKAS FOSS
Piano

GEORGES MAGER
First Trumpet

Symphony Aces at Rehearsal

By CYRUS DURGIN, Globe Music Critic

HOURS OF EXHAUSTING REHEARSAL precede the magnificent concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Every morning Monday through Thursday at Symphony Hall Serge Koussevitzky works with the virtuosi he has fashioned into what has been called "the greatest orchestra in the world." Now in his 22d year as conductor, Koussevitzky is a merciless taskmaster and spares neither himself nor his men in the preparation of his vivid interpretations. The Globe's Arthur Griffin took his camera to a rehearsal the other morning and came away with some views of the conductor and the leaders of the various sections of the orchestra, called in musical jargon, "first desk men." This is how they look as they play.

NEW YORK N.Y.
DAILY WORKER
OCT 21, 1945

Change the World

by Mike Gold

BOSTON is soon going to get a fine man to conduct its symphony orchestra in Paul Paray, now head of the Paris Colonne symphony.

Paray was one of the many brave Frenchmen who defied the Nazi occupation. He risked torture and death rather than submit to the beast; he resigned from the Lyons symphony orchestra rather than fire its Jewish members, as instructed by the pianist Alfred Cortot.

Six months after the Nazi invasion this Cortot, well-known to American music lovers, visited Berlin and made his own deal with the beast. Thereafter he left his job as professor in the Ecole Normal de Musique in Paris, and became Vichy's secretary of musical affairs. He is now under house arrest, and will soon be tried for treason.

Not many French artists sold their souls to the Nazi, yet there was enough of a quota of big names that now are being rounded up for trial.

* * *

IN JUNE, 1940, Adolf Hitler paid his triumphal visit to Paris. The Nazi leader came with three ambitions burning in his sick Nazi mind: he wanted to sign the armistice in the Campiegne forest, where the Germans signed for the defeat of World War I; he wanted to visit Napoleon's tomb; and he wanted to enjoy a performance at the Paris Opera.

Hitler and his fellow-rats were shepherded about the Opera by servile Serge Lifar, the ballet master and Germaine Lubin, a massive pro-Nazi soprano. Next night the opera company put on a command performance for the great conqueror of free France.

Now Madame Lubin is in a collaborator's prison; Lifar is under arrest, like Cortot; and a tribunal of great anti-fascists and musicians who did not sell out to the Nazis, will sit in judgment upon the traitors. Paul Paray is on this tribunal, as well as the violinist Jacques Thibaut and the famous Catalan cellist, Pablo Casals, who for the years since Spain fell to the Nazis was believed dead.

Conductor Wihlem Mengleburg, who sold out also to the Nazi sadists, has been permanently barred from the Amsterdam music world, where he once was such a glittering star.

Wilhelm Furtwaengler, appointed by Goering to be the Nazi sub-leader over the musicians of Prussia, is hiding somewhere in Swiss exile. Pianist Walter Gieseking, a rabid Nazi and tool of the beasts, tried to wriggle back to respectability by playing for U.S. Army audiences. But some officers belatedly discovered his Nazi record, and he was forbidden to appear in public again.

* * *

THE mills of the gods grind slowly, but exceedingly fine. It is not a bandwagon any longer, this Nazi Juggernaut. Now the traitors are trying to climb off it, not upon it.

Charles Bedeaux, friend of Eddie the Duke, and a notorious collaborator, explained his deals with the Nazis in the following terms: "I was not doing wrong or being unpatriotic. It was merely that there was nobody left in France except the Nazis with whom a businessman could conduct business."

Boston Symphony Will Be Honored

Bedeaux took his own life, because American democracy caught up with him, finally. Laval has been executed, as was the infamous Darnand and others. No, it is no longer a good business move, a source of cash, and special privilege, and monopoly profits. this Nazi bandwagon.

In the United States, the tendency may be in a different direction. I see where the former "editor" of the Daily Worker, Louis Budenz has jumped on the bandwagon of Monsignor Sheen, and has achieved "spiritual freedom" at last.

Yet so "spiritual" a person should not have been so powerful a hypocrite as to work on a Communist paper, writing Communist editorials while at the same time conniving in secret with that famous politician, M. Sheen.

This ecclesiastical official is running the Polish anti-Soviet movement which the London fascist Poles maintain. M. Sheen conducted much of the propaganda campaign that destroyed the Spanish republic with slander and intrigue, and delivered Spain into the hands of Hitler and Franco.

To my own simple mind, Budenz' conversion is about as "spiritual" as the conversion of Laval or Charles Bedeaux. If it were genuinely religious, he could not have lied with such a smooth face to his co-workers over many years. I despise a liar for pay, and Budenz by his own confession was such a person for quite a time. How can a "spiritual person" be a double-dealer for years? St. Francis never preached such Catholicism, nor was Jesus the friend of fascism.

Sunday Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the first of the series of Sunday concerts of the 65th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, performing the following program:

"Classical' Symphony, Op. 25 . . Prokofieff
Suite from "Appalachian Spring" . . Copland
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43
Sibelius

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

There is no question in my mind that Aaron Copland's "Appalachian Spring" music is well on its way to becoming an American classic.

It has about everything that I can think of offhand that music should have: beauty in the melodic lines, sonority in the harmonic ideas, creative drive, emotional impact, form, proportion, style and taste. And on top of that it has what you might call wisdom for lack of a better term to convey the idea that the composer has learned and lived and has perhaps unconsciously conveyed to us through his music that his heart is in the right place.

Actually of course I don't know if it is or not as I've never met him, but I don't think anyone could write so warmly and tenderly of (as the program of the (suite puts it) presentiments of motherhood or of a husband and wife 'quiet and strong in their new house' if it weren't. Maybe I'm naive or something, but I think the composer really meant what he wrote.

Be that as it may, the composition stands near or on the top purely as American music, 1945. The scoring is exceedingly clever, in fact brilliant, as witness the incomparable texture of the long series of beautiful cadences finally ending on the unison which—except for touching the final chord—brings the work to a very remarkable conclusion. If he uses a melody not his own in the final section (and there's certainly plenty of precedent for that in any composer you can name), he proves time and again throughout that his own melodic inspiration is very superior. Well, here I am talking about Copland as if nobody had ever heard of him before when everybody knows he's one of our best. But to me his new Suite is his best, so I might as well shoot the works.

The Suite, incidentally, was marvelously well played by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra in the top of their form, and Mr. Copland was on hand to receive a fine welcome from the large and attentive audience. The program began with a really delightful performance of Prokofieff's well-liked "Classical" Symphony, and ended with a stormy and intense playing of Sibelius' Second Symphony which, to judge by the audience response, is as popular as ever.

Globe OCT 21

Boston Symphony "Till" and Much Opera Newly Recorded

By CYRUS DURGIN

Victor has issued its first album of records made of the new, red-colored, non-breakable vinyl resin. It is "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" in a gorgeous performance by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In addition to its non-breakable qualities, the new material cuts down surface noise appreciably and, I think, provides better reproduction of tone. DV-1, $4.73 plus tax.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
OCT 21 1945

Boston Symphony Programs Given

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will open the Sunday afternoon series of six concerts this afternoon in Symphony Hall and will give the fourth pair of concerts in the longer series there next Friday afternoon and Saturday night.

Today's concert will begin with Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony and will include the Suite from the Ballet "Appalachian Spring" by Aaron Copland. The second portion of the program will consist of the Second Symphony in D major by Sibelius, which Dr. Koussevitzky will present in accordance with his plan of doing special honor to the Finnish composer, whose 80th birthday will be observed next Dec. 8.

The soloist at the Friday and Saturday concerts will be Alexander Brailowsky, who will be heard in Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto in C minor. The opening number will be Mozarts' "Paris" Symphony in D major (K. 297). This Symphony was composed for the Concert Spirituel in Paris when Mozart visited the capital at the age of 22. Although performed at Tanglewood last Summer, it has not been played at the Boston concerts since 1898. Also on this program are Prokofieff's Second Suite from his Ballet "Romeo and Juliet" and Rimsky-Korsakov's Capriccio Espagnol.

Oct 14

Berkshire Festival Announced for 1946

Pre-War Scale Is Scheduled for Next Summer

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival will be resumed on its pre-war scale next summer at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky will give concerts on Thursdays, Saturdays and Sundays—nine concerts in all, if the 1941 schedule is followed—beginning July 25, 1946. The share in the festival to be taken by the Berkshire Music Center has not yet been announced.

The festival's board of trustees have voted to give the Music Shed and its contents at Tanglewood to the Boston Symphony, giving it the entire control and management of future festivals. The festival's patrons, members and subscribers are to have an opportunity to subscribe for their regular seats before the public sale opens, and, if the Boston Symphony should decide at some future time to discontinue the festivals, the Music Shed will then revert to an authorized committee of Berkshire residents.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 14 1945

This promises to be an interesting music season all around. At the Symphony Concerts we have already heard new pieces from Messrs. Copland, Martinu and Gian-Carlo Menotti. The last-named will soon be represented later by a Piano Concerto to be played by Rudolf Firkusny. Among the new symphonies will be the Ninth of Shostakovitch, very likely with the composer in attendance, the Fifth of Prokofieff, also in its first American performance, the Second of Kabalevsky, and Twenty-second of Miaskovsky and unnumbered ones from Copland and Milhaud. New names at the Symphony Concerts will be those of William Bergsma, "Music on a Quiet Theme"; Elliot Carter, "Holiday Overture"; Henry Cowell, "Hymn and Fuguing Time"; Douglas Moore, "In Memoriam"; and Aurelio Pescara, "Commedia del Arte." Other novelties in prospect are a 'Cello Concerto by Samuel Barber, excerpts from Benjamin Britten's opera "Peter Grimes," David Diamond's Rounds for String Orchestra, and "Elegie" by Gretchaninoff and Boris Koutzen's "From the American Folklore."

POST * * * OCT 21

This afternoon's Symphony Concert will offer Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Copland's "Appalachian Spring" and the Sibelius Second. On Friday and Saturday Dr. Koussevitsky's program will be: Mozart's unfamiliar "Paris" Symphony, the Second Suite from Prokofieff's ballet "Romeo and Juliet," Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" and Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto, with Alexander Brailowsky as the pianist. Impending recitals are those of Norma Farber, soprano, in Jordan Hall on Tuesday evening and Jan Smeterlin, pianist, in the same auditorium next Sunday afternoon, when the Gen. Platoff Don Cossacks will appear at Symphony Hall.

This Clipping From PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
OCT 22

Dr. Koussevitzky To Resume Berkshire Music Festivals

By Helen Havener

NEW YORK, Oct. 22—The best of news of all music-minded New England is the announcement that the famous Berkshire Music Festivals given by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Bostonians will be resumed next Summer. Beginning July 25, 1946, there will be nine concerts on successive Thursdays, Saturdays and Sundays. It is understood that the summer school which Dr. Koussevitzky formerly conducted, and which was discontinued during the war for lack of travel facilities to bring distant students to Tanglewood, will also be resumed. Hotel proprietors, in anticipation, are already issuing notices about the Summer of 1946, and beginning a little refurbishing, and by June America's Salzburg is expected to don again its festival attire.

Young Leonard Bernstein is living up to his title a "boy wonder" in his new capacity as music director of New York's City Center. Taking up the baton laid down by Leopold Stokowski, he has welded together an orchestra that has been giving a prime account of itself ever since its initial concert just two weeks ago. Part of this was undoubtedly response to Mr. Bernstein's own youth, ardor and enthusiasm, for one critic remarked that they "played as if their lives depended on it." But there was no lack—and there has been no lack—of skilled musicianship and gifted interpretation. When critics can write of the playing of Debussy's La Mer that "one could scarcely avoid hearing, on occasion, the foaming surge of the sea" and later, of a Wagnerian selection that "one couldn't be deaf to the death of Siegfried, rattling tympani and all," the mere layman may fairly conclude that the young maestro has arrived. Visitors to New York would do well to visit the City Center and make the acquaintance of his 26-year-old musical genius. American music will obviously hear much of him in the future, and learning to know and evaluate his talent early will place one among the musically sophisticate.

Concert In Paris

Although the elaborate project for a series of American music festivals in Paris under OWI auspices, which would have sent two or three of our most prominent composers and conductors hurrying abroad, was abandoned because funds from French sources, so it is understood, were not forthcoming, the now semi-defunct OWI is apparently salvaging something of its plan. Dispatches from Paris report the first of a series of four festivals held week before last which is alleged to have "taught Parisians that there is modern American music other than jazz" even though a member of the race with which jazz originated, Rudolph Dunbar, Negro, was on the podium. The concert was given as a benefit for French war orphans in the Palais de Chaillot, and the program consisted of William Schuman's American Festival Overture, the same composer's Third Symphony; Virgil Thomson's Symphony on a Hymn Tune, and—what will be of paramount interest to Portlanders—the Aladdin of the late Dr. Edgar Stillman Kelley, whose visit to the City at the time of the presentation of his Pilgrim's Progress a few years ago is so well remembered.

Also from abroad, from Virgil Thomson, the brilliant but caustic critic of the New York Herald-Tribune, comes word that the Berlin Philharmonic, in spite of numerous purges of its Nazi membership—and presumably of previous Nazi purges of its Jewish membership—has emerged a pretty fair orchestra after all. It suffers, Thomson says, from lack of its accustomed leader since Furtwangler and Knappertbusch, two of its foremost conductors, are under ban because of their previous political affiliations, but it gets through its concerts pretty well just the same. Also it made an effective contribution to the revived Salzburg Festival, which ran from August 12 to September 1 in the Festspielhaus and the Mozarteum, and included orchestral and choral music, opera and oratorio.

Opera has also arrived in Berlin, although, the huge state opera having been destroyed by bombing, the performances have been moved to the Admiralspalast. This is located in the Russian district, and another company, the Staedtische Opera, plays in the Theater des Westens. In Vienna, too, opera has been revived. That music has gained enormous impetus through the war there can no longer be room for doubt, or that people will turn to it in an extremity as a major means of release.

The effect of the war on music in America aside from the vast enrichment of American musical life through the influx of musical genius from other countries, remains to be determined. Not until our boys, who have been exposed to the best that other countries have to offer and to our own finest talent through the many concert artists who have entertained them overseas, finally come home will we know the status of the American music of tomorrow.

Mrs. Jane Phinney Harlow will read Dear Ruth at the meeting of the Business and Professional Women's Club this evening at the clubhouse. The Misses Dorothy and Mary Page will have charge of the supper which precedes the meeting. Next Monday evening, a Halloween party will be held with Mrs. Esther Tanner, sports chairman, in charge.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Sibelius, Prokofieff, and Copland were excellent program companions at the opening of the Sunday afternoon series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday. The romantic fullness of the Sibelius Second Symphony, the urbanity of Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, and the taut simplicity of the Suite from the ballet, "Appalachian Spring" offered contrasts as sharp as yesterday's weather, which looked like Fall and felt like Spring.

Chronologically, Serge Koussevitzky's choices for yesterday covered little more than 43 years. Musically, the program owed something to three centuries, beginning with Prokofieff's slight bow to the formalities of the 18th. The concisely patterned "Classical" Symphony was taken at a formidable pace, but better an accasional squeak from a first violin than blurred phrases in the allegro or dragged out moments in the gavotte.

The Sibelius Second was admirably Koussevitzkean, which is to say that the introspective music was richly performed. Melodic themes emerging full grown from a sustained note or a fragmentary tune continue to seem unexpected no matter how familiar the symphony has become.

Begun during an Italian Spring the Second Symphony is full of the changes in atmosphere which G.I.'s have written about as the conditioning agent during the campaign in Italy. Abrupt changes from minor to major midway in the symphony, the quickening 6-8 rhythms, the dizzying figures executed by the strings, produce heady effects associated particularly with Sibelius.

Copland's sharply detailed "Appalachian Spring" improves with hearings at close intervals. The vitality of this music, written for Martha Graham's angular dance motions, seems to have an entirely appropriate affinity with the sensation of strength derived from being outdoors regardless of whether the listener follows the descriptive legend of the ballet furnished in the program, the drive of the music comes through. Folk and regional elements, including five variations on a Shaker theme interpreted by the oboe are strong, but the depth of imagination and the originality of the scoring lift it far above occasional music.—P. W.

SUNDAY SYMPHONY

The opening concert of the Sunday Symphony series took place yesterday afternoon under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The program offered two-thirds delightful and one-third Sibelius.

"Some critics attach the label 'pastoral' to the Second Symphony of Sibelius because of what they refer to as a strong spirit of Finnish folk-music and the atmosphere of fjords and wasteland. But the same reasons would apply to so much of Sibelius' music that a large lump of it could be taken under the single title, 'Finlandia.' However, Dr. Koussevitzky was less interested in painting landscapes than in depicting terse and vital music in the most enormously exciting manner possible."

All this excitement was preceded by two less spectacular works: Prokofieff's "Classical"-Symphony and Aaron Copland's suite from the ballet, "Appalachian Spring." The performance of the first of these merits a criticism rarely directed at the Boston Symphony Orchestra—that is, squeaky strings. It is still a little hard to believe. But it was Copland's composition which must have been the biggest treat for veteran symphonites. Startling instrumental combinations with exciting rhythms and counterpoint had interest beyond that of just novelty. Mr. Copland was present to acknowledge the applause of the audience.

He. Oct 27

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the fourth concert of its 65th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Alexander Brailowsky, pianist, was the soloist. The program:

Symphony in D ("Paris") K 297...Mozart
"Romeo and Juliet," Second Suite, Op 64..........Prokofieff
Concerto No 2 in C minor, Op. 18..........Rachmaninoff
Capriccio Espagnol.....Rimsky-Korsakov

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

Yesterday's concert was the sort to turn you out into the rain in a slightly out-of-this world condition. There was nothing to think about or fret about or even really listen to. It was merely a question of letting yourself go, come what may.

Certainly the high-point of the afternoon was the performance by Alexander Brailowsky and the orchestra of Rachmaninoff's second Piano Concerto. From a purely objective point of view it was by no means a finished performance. There were rather more slips than are usually heard in a concerto performance, and often the contesting forces of orchestra and piano didn't come together as they do on paper. The reason for this could conceivably lie in the super-charged artistic temperaments of the conductor and the soloist, in conflict, but the fact is it generated a tension or an electricity that heightened the emotional excitement of the performance. For a work we all know so well it was a powerful and gripping tour de force, and far more to be desired than a merely routine or letter-perfect reading. Mr. Brailowsky achieved the most clamorous ovation, in any case, that I have heard in Symphony Hall in five years.

The concert began with Mozart's sel -heard "Paris" Symphony, a del ful work revived last summer by Koussevitzky at Tanglewood. After Mozart's laughable ups and downs with the orchestra that first performed it in Paris ("You cannot imagine how they scraped and scrambled," he wrote), it is amusing to speculate on his stupefaction could he have heard it performed with such perfect clarity and distinction and grace as it was yesterday. The slow movement, which you would hardly recognize as Mozart through the almost total absence of characteristic mannerisms, seemed especially interesting to me for its repose, but the entire work proved itself altogether too long neglected. It belongs in the repertoire.

With the Prokofieff "Romeo and Juliet" Ballet Suite the concert's temperature began to rise. The Suite begins with a marvelously effective stroke, and from then on it never ceases to hold your attention or touch your emotions. But it is more than clever. The concluding movement certainly stands among Prokofieff's most sustainedly beautiful things, and the whole reflects a musical invention and a mastery of of the orchestral media pretty hard to equal, let alone surpass, today.

The super-heated Rachmaninoff followed Prokofieff's Suite, and the concert came to climactic end with Rimsky's familiar Capriccio Espagnol in which most of the first desk men—Richard Burgin, Georges Laurent, Ferdinand Gillet, Victor Polatschek, Jean Bedetti and Bernard Zighera—demonstrated once again their prodigious instrumental virtuosity. The whole was, in fine, a spectacular affair.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

BY CYRUS DURGIN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Symphony Hall this week are divided about half and half between symphonic solidity and the tempting fleshpots of coloristic orchestration.

Mozart of the "Paris" Symphony (K. 297) and the Second Piano Concerto of Rachmaninoff represent the aspect of symphonic solidity, while the candidates from the tempting fleshpots of coloristic orchestration are four movements from the Second Suite derived by Serge Prokofieff from his ballet "Romeo and Juliet," and the Spanish Caprice of Rimsky-Korsakoff. Serge Koussevitzky conducts and the soloist for the Concerto is Alexander Brailowsky.

This is an occasion when I must do a humble about-face, because the "Romeo and Juliet" music of Prokofieff now seems extraordinarily good. It is admirably invented, beautifully and cleverly scored and it characterizes the incidents and people from Shakespeare's drama. It should be recorded by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony as soon as possible, for theirs is a tremendously vivid reading.

In 1938, the "composer's conducting" of Mr. Prokofieff did not make the most of these pieces. In 1941, Mr. Koussevitzky drew a great deal more from them. At that time I said, ". . . Shakespearean music? Never!" I trust that will not be held against me at the Final Reckoning.

With four more years of age—and let us hope, of wisdom—it is now easy to see that it is Shakespearean music. English, Americans, French, Germans, Finns and Russians have written music for or about the plays of Shakespeare, which are universal. This of Prokofieff is universal, too and although its dissonant idiom makes it hard to grasp at a few hearings, further performances ripen your understanding so that its beauty and power are evident.

The first soloist of the season, Mr. Brailowsky, had a reception little short of terrific, considering the usual reserve of the Friday audience. Indeed he gave a spirited and heartwarming account of Rachmaninoff's melancholic, melodious and luxuriously perfumed score. Yet the first movement was not too well integrated between soloist and orchestra, and the slow movement could have been more intense. Not until the finale did Mr. Koussevitzky's driving guidance bring the performance to a boil.

Mozart's perky and formalistic little Smyphony got lost amid the brilliance of Prokofieff, Rachmaninoff and Rimsky-Korsakoff, which was too bad, since it hadn't been played at these concerts since 1898. Perhaps Mr. Koussevitzky will have another go at it.

While the clarinets and flutes sounded a wee bit below pitch in the Spanish Caprice, that Slavic distillation of Iberian dance tunes brought the afternoon to a rou- ing conclusion.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Post Oct 27

The program of this week's Symphony Concerts represents a crescendo in musical warmth and excitement. Whether it also represents a decrescendo in musical values only time will tell. Certainly Mozart's "Paris" Symphony, written 167 years ago, when its composer was 22, still makes pretty good listening. Will Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" Ballet Suite, Rachmaninoff's Second Piano Concerto, in which Alexander Brailowsky is the soloist, and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" live that long? We may well have our doubts, though the "Capriccio Espagnol" has already gone more than a third of the way.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra played as a body in Tanglewood Dr. Koussevitzky used to draw heavily upon the music he had presented in Symphony Hall during the winter. In the case of the Mozart and Bach-Mozart Festivals for chamber orchestra of the past two seasons, he has reversed the process, enriching the repertory of the Symphony Concerts proper with rare Mozart works revived for Tanglewood, such as this same "Paris" Symphony, which the orchestra had not played in Boston since 1898. It is an interesting, as well as an attractive piece, by reason of Mozart's adoption of certain tricks that he had picked up in Mannheim and of others that he knew to be dear to the Parisians. Dr. Koussevitzky seemed to be hitting off the music very well yesterday, save for an almost frightening speed in the finale.

In association with the semisatirical ballet for which it was composed Prokofieff's music might make more sense than it does in the concert hall. There is much in the score that is brilliant; there are imposing passages and measures that have no small degree of allure. There is also a curious mixture of styles and intentions, many reminders of Prokofieff's other music and, as has been observed before, scant suggestion of Shakespeare's play as we know it.

When Rachmaninoff used to play his own C minor Concerto the piece had a certain somber dignity, lent to it no doubt by the man's presence as well as by his playing. Of that particular quality there was not much in yesterday's performance, which did, however, make the most of the music's sigh-provoking and pulse-quickening potentialities. Call the performance over-sentimentalized and a bit frenetic, if you will, it went big with the audience. As for the "Spanish Caprice," Dr. Koussevitzky always handles it brilliantly.

AT SYMPHONY—Snapshots in the sold-out house at Symphony Hall where Alexander Brailowsky was soloist in the Rachmaninoff Second Piano Concert. . . . Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, black hat trimmed with rose-colored velvet bows and a black fitted coat. . . . Mrs. Allan Forbes in furs despite yesterday's rain, a briefly veiled brown felt hat and flat gold earrings of Florentine design. . . . Jean Halliday Brooks in a tailored brown suit. . . . Mrs. Richard C. Williams (Helen Knowles), attractive in a suit of black wool worn over a striped chartreuse and black blouse, her suit pockets edged with the striped material, chatting with Mary Churchill Small during intermission.

Mrs. Bartlett Harwood wore furs with her gray-blue tweed suit. Maj and Mrs. Hamilton Osgood were early arrivals, Mrs. Osgood in black.

Others who came in before the second warning bell rang included George Lewis, Harry Coolidge, Sabra Harwood, wearing a black velvet ribbon in her fair hair; Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs, in a plum-colored suit with a lavender blouse and a triple strand of pearls at her throat. . . . Mrs. Malcolm Bradley French in black, with pearl earrings and a small black hat, Mrs. James O. Seamans (Diana Frazer), and Nancy Roelker.

Gl. Oct 27

MARJORY ADAMS

Gl. Oct 27

HENRY B. CABOT ELECTED PRESIDENT B. S. O. TRUSTEES

Henry B. Cabot of Dover was chosen president of the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a meeting yesterday. Cabot, former treasurer of the corporation, succeeds Jerome D. Greene.

Richard C. Paine was elected treasurer, Henry B. Sawyer was reelected vice president, and George E. Judd, clerk. Trustees reelected were Philip R. Allen, John Nicholas Brown, Jerome D. Greene and M. A. DeWolfe Howe. The other trustees are Alvan T. Fuller, N. Penrose Hallowell, Jacob J. Kaplan, Roger I. Lee, Richard C. Paine, Bentley W. Warren and Oliver Wolcott.

Symphony Trustees Name Cabot President

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at their annual October meeting, accepted with regret the resignation of Jerome D. Greene as president of the board and elected as president Henry B. Cabot, until then treasurer of the corporation. Richard C. Paine was elected treasurer; Henry B. Sawyer, re-elected vice-president; and George E. Judd, clerk.

Trustees re-elected, their terms having expired, are: Philip R. Allen, John Nicholas Brown, Jerome D. Greene and M. A. DeWolfe Howe. The other trustees are: Alvan T. Fuller, N. Penrose Hallowell, Jacob J. Kaplan, Roger I. Lee, Richard C. Paine, Bentley W. Warren and Oliver Wolcott.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN

OCT 28 1945

'Till Eulenspiegel' First Entire Work On Plastic

New Unbreakable Disc by Boston Symphony Heads RCA Victor List — Stokowsky Leads N. Y. Symphony in 12 Selections From Bizet's Carmen

By VICTOR PRAHL

Richard Strauss's tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel" played by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitsky (album DV-1, two 12-inch deluxe records) heads RCA Victor's list for the month. The recording is doubly significant in that it presents a superb interpretation in an outstanding performance, and is the first complete work to be pressed on the much discussed new nonbreakable plastic records. A conscientious friend who spent hours playing these discs on three different types of machines, comparing them to previous recordings arrived at the conclusion that surface noise is entirely absent on home sets and audible to only a minimum degree on over-sensitive sets. They definitely will not break and hardly warp. He even soaked them in water and found that it made no difference in the surface. These improvements will cost you just double the price of the old records but in case you are contemplating investing in a sample, this set may prove a wise choice. For a composition rich in the tonal texture and sonority of the different instruments, as well as the ensemble of combinations, and wealth of full orchestration, it can hardly be surpassed. And as it is the first work to be pressed on this new material, it will eventually become a collector's item.

Leopold Stokowski conducting the New York City Symphony offers 12 selections from Bizet's "Carmen" (album DM-1002, four 12-inch records), not confining himself to orchestral excerpts alone but including as well orchestrations of songs and arias. Although the "Toreador Song" has more esprit than any performance we have ever heard, the "Habanera" fairly speaks, and the violinist pours plenty of temperment, emotion, and an over-abundance of luscious tone into Micaela's aria, one nevertheless misses the voices, these very expertly played bits merely serving as a reminder of the opera when well sung. It serves further to remind us of the magnificent job Stokowski accomplished with this newly formed orchestra during his short conductorship. In listening to this music one realizes anew why, from the standpoint of theater and popular appeal, "Carmen" remains the greatest opera ever written.

This Clipping From
CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

OCT 25 1945

New Fall Classiwaxies

BY ELMORE BACON

LISTENING again to the complete Victor recording on the new plastic records of the Strauss "Til Eulenspiegel" played by the Boston Symphony directed by Serge Koussevitsky, confirmed our earlier conviction that here is a recording method that is tops.

The Koussevitsky version of this brilliant music itself is a masterpiece. But this new recording method brings out all the color, the depth, all the beautiful shadings with a clarity that is almost unbelievable in records. And there's no surface noise. This Red Seal DeLuxe Musical Masterpiece Album V-1 is one which Victor may well be proud.

This Clipping From MIAMI, FLA.
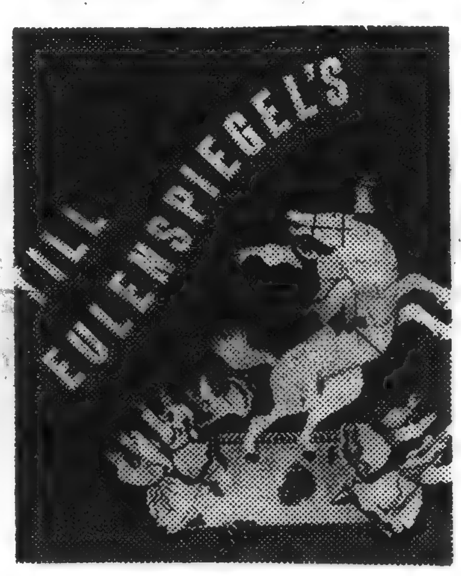
NEWS

OCT 28 1945

Speaking Of Records

By JINNY CONSTANCE

Victor's recent announcement of the new non-breakable de luxe records have been eagerly awaited, and now, the first release of this remarkable development presents Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky.



Strauss immortalized the folk legend of Till Eulenspiegel with this lively, naughty, diabolically ingenious music. It fairly bubbles and sparkles with excitement and foolish pranks this michievous fellow creates as he pursues new adventures, and has become one of the favorite symphonic poems in today's concert halls.

The Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky gives an intelligent reading, and the reproduction is first class. These records, ruby red, produce music with amazing lifelike realism and high fidelity, thus eliminating surface noise entirely. The price of these records is slightly higher, but you cannot afford to miss the experience of this brilliant "autographed" album.

Gl. Oct 27

Koussevitzky Foundation

Composers named to receive the 1945 commissions for symphonic works awarded by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation are Howard Hanson, Olivier Messaien, and Heitor Villa Lobos. Awards were also made to David Diamond and Harold Shapero who will write short compositions for symphony orchestra.

Earlier this year the Foundation announced commissions to Lukas Foss and Alexei Haieff for pieces for cello and piano.

These commissions bring to a total of 21 the composer awards made by the Foundation since it was founded in memory of Natalie Koussevitzky in 1942.

This Clipping From BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
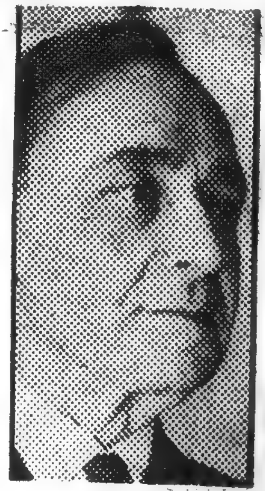
NEWS

OCT 28 1945

* * *

MARTHA PUGH writes from Massachusetts where she is visiting, telling of the Worcester Festival and the part Lansing Hatfield, (Metropolitan baritone who sang "The Vagabond King" here with Marthe Errolle in our Starlight Opera last Summer) has played in the festival. . . . Marvin McDonald (no relation to Jeanette) was in town for the week-end and the opening of the Birmingham Music Club's 40th anniversary season with Verdi's "Rigoletto" Saturday night. . . . A priceless gift I have just received is an autographed album of Koussevticky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing Richard Strauss' delightful "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," one of the most masterly of the symphonic poems, and done on the new non-breakable ruby-red translucent discs that capture the full tonal resources of the orchestra, are remarkably life-like in concert hall fidelity, silent so far as surface noises are concerned, and beautiful in acoustical reproduction.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

This Clipping From
N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

OCT 25 1945

Tanglewood Music Banned by Petrillo

Recording by Boston Symphony Cannot be Used With Motion Film at Conference Dinner Says Union Boss.

James C. Petrillo, the country's boss of union musicians, has decreed that a recording by the Boston Symphony orchestra made at Tanglewood this summer, cannot be used in connection with the showing of motion pictures taken at the same time. No reason was given for the refusal.

Haydn Mason, publicity man for the Berkshire Hills Conference, said that an electric organ accompaniment will be substituted for the symphony recording as a result of Petrillo's ruling. The first showing of the film, with Petrillo approved sound effects, will be at the annual conference dinner in December.

10,000 HAIL FILM FOLK IN FUND SHOW

Greer Garson and Jimmy Durante Lead Screen Stars in Performance for Red Feather Drive

GREER HONORS A CAPTAIN
Beauteous Greer Garson of the movies placed a United War Fund Feather on Capt. Garland Shell, at last night's great meeting at Boston Garden.

The star-studded United War Fund rally with Greer Garson, Jimmy Duranty and the world famous Boston Symphony conductor, Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra drew some 10,000 cheering Bostonians, some who have already contributed and some who will before the closing day Oct. 17, to the Boston Garden last night.

The show which was worth the price of a $5 ticket was free. The performers gave of their services to the rally in the hope that by next Wednesday the $7,759,000 goal, now far behind with a total of only $4,489,672 paid in, will be successfully reached.

STARS BOOST FUND DRIVE

13,000 Workers Hear Symphony at Garden

Sparked to a high pitch of enthusiasm by the antics of Jimmy Durante, the soft voice of Greer Garson and the music of the Boston Symphony Orchestra directed by Serge Koussevitzky, 13,000 volunteer workers left Boston Garden last night keyed-up to put the 1946 Greater Boston United War Fund victory campaign for $7,750,000 over the top in the closing days of the drive.

Fund officials announced that contributions last night had reached the total of $4,489,672 or 58.1 per cent. of the goal to be reached by Oct. 17.

SERIOUS PLEA

Sharing the spotlight with Durante and Miss Garson were Garry Moore, Jeri Sullavan and their CBS radio gang. Funnyman Moore turned serious for a moment at the end of the show to urge, "Keep working very hard for this war chest thing. It is well worth while."

Greer Garson, the current sweetheart of the movies, stole the hearts of the gathering with the plea, "This year after four dark years of war we have a chance to do our part in helping our new world of peace to be a good and lasting one. I suggest we consider this fund a thanks offering for the end of the war or as a proud contribution of your own city."

Stressing the importance of the Fund's work in aiding our former allies, Harvey S. Firestone, Jr., president of the Firestone Tire and Rubber Company and Ohio chairman of the U. S. O., warned:

"In Europe and Asia the next few months will settle for millions of people the grim question of survival

(Continued on Page Ten)

Adams Stirs 10,000 by War Fund Show Appeal; Durante, Garson Star

ESKIMO GREETING—Jimmy Durante greets charming Jeri Sullivan with his 'schnozzle' at War Fund show.

By ROBERT PLAYFAIR

Jimmy Durante made them laugh; Greer Garson brought stars to their eyes; Serge Koussevitsky played classical music under silent hockey clocks—but Charles Francis Adams stole the War Fund show last night by a stirring appeal that left many in tears, in which he pleaded with an audience of 10,000 persons to make up a serious deficit of more than $3,260,328.

See FUND Page 27

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

OCT 29 1945

From Sally Willeke: Knowing your long and loyal interest in South Mountain, I feel sure you will like to read the enclosed clippings about the recent achievements of its "Musical Children." Miss Carol Brice, the Negro contralto who sang on the 1944 South Mountain series, was invited by Koussevitzky to sing for the trustees of the Boston Orchestra two weeks ago. He pronounced her voice one of the great ones of the present day. You may recall Joseph Knitzer as a little boy in short trousers when he studied for five years (1929-1934) on the Mountain. William Kapell spent the summer of 1943 with us, his rise to stardom following his recital in the Berkshire Museum two short years ago being now almost like musical history. As soloist with the New York Philharmonic, under Dr. Artur Rodzinski, he was heard in the Rachmaninoff Variations for piano and orchestra broadcast on a coast to coast network Sunday afternoon. Miss Brice, who gives a weekly song recital on Mondays at 6.30, has as her accompanist Miss Bertha Melnik who appeared on the South Mountain series this past summer.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

OCT 29 1945

Dr. Hanson Chosen For Music Award

Dr. Howard Hanson, Eastman School of Music director, is one of three composers to receive the 1945 Koussevitzky Music Foundation commissions for symphonic works, announced yesterday. The others are Olivier Messaien and Heitor Villa Lobos. David Diamond, former Eastman student, is one of two composers commissioned to write short compositions for symphony orchestra.

Since the Foundation was established in 1942, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky's wife, Natalie, it has given 21 commissions to composers. William Bergsma, Eastman graduate, commissioned earlier to write a string quartet, already has had his work performed.

Yet to be performed, and receiving an earlier award, is a symphonic composition by Burrill Phillips, member of the Eastman faculty.

Bulletin of Brooklyn Institute of Arts & Sciences November, 1945

SIXTY-FIVE GLORIOUS SEASONS

Richard Tucker

Koussevitzky at Rehearsal

The following article is drawn from an editorial, "Vision of Greatness," that appeared in the Boston Globe on October 5, 1945:

When living in a great age it is well to know it. For more than two decades we in Boston and New England have been living in a great period of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. If a repertory theatre of virtuoso actors played in this city week after week the year round none but the classic dramas of ancient and modern literature, it could pour no greater stream of vital energy into our veins—if as much, for the literature of the stage is not as rich as that of music. Hardly two dozen tragedies of the first rank exist; the literature of music is almost an embarrassment of riches.

This afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its sixty-fifth season. Throughout the war this mighty instrument of joy, hope, peace, and the sacrament of beauty went on sounding. So far from letting us down, it held us up; never slackening its tours and schedules in the great concert halls of the land, it played devotedly in Army camps and war hospitals, and one of the historic moments in its career came last August when the Commonwealth of Massachusetts made the closing concert of the season at the Esplanade our public solemnization of the victory over Japan, with a moving address by the Governor and music by the Orchestra to an audience of forty thousand people, hushed and thankful.

The Orchestra has interwoven great music with the life of this community. Beginning more than six decades ago with a public that numbered hundreds, it widened like a majestic river to a public numbering thousands and, as its vibrations have extended to other cities, to Tanglewood, to the Esplanade, and to the broadcast of its Saturday evening concerts, these sightless couriers of the air now carry its art to the invisible millions. It would be hard to name an institution whose beneficence so easily, so naturally, so harmoniously transcends those barriers of nationality, race, color, creed or class which ordinarily divide mankind; for art is universal, and so is the response to it. . . .

"Moral education," says Whitehead, "is impossible apart from the habitual vision of greatness." Year after year the Boston Symphony Orchestra has kept before us the vision of greatness. We, its beneficiaries, can hardly imagine how different our lives would have been without it, and how much poorer. With the constant example of such excellence before us, we instinctively reject mediocrity, and our lives and this community abound in good work which could hardly have been done without the energization of such music sounding through a virtuoso orchestra from the brains and hearts of composers of genius. In the sociological evolution of our era, too, the Orchestra is moving powerfully forward into the new age, evolving from the instrument of a musical elite into a People's Orchestra, admired, prized, and loved by us, the multitude, who owe to it so many great occasions when it fortified our courage, assuaged our grief, and made glad our hearts.

The warmth of appreciation expressed in the above editorial is shared by thousands in Brooklyn. Less than a decade after it was organized the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in our Borough (then a separate city) and has returned ever since to present its annual series of concerts. The first concert for 1945-1946, under the direction of the incomparable Serge Koussevitzky, will take place on Friday evening, November 16.

Christian Science Monitor Nov 1 1945

New Pianist for Symphony

Rudolf Firkusny to Be Heard In Menotti's New Concerto

By Winthrop P. Tryon

"Clear-cut," the score of the Piano Concerto in F major of Gian-Carlo Menotti is, by remark of Richard Burgin, who is bringing the new work out at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, taking his first turn of the season at conducting for Dr. Koussevitzky. "No striving to be modern," by observation of another member of the orchestra who took part in practice of the music one morning.

Those broad covering judgments should serve as quite an introduction, too, to the piece, though they were passed more especially with reference to the orchestral side of it and without particular regard for the solo aspect. But if the concerto has the unity of content and of style that it ought to have, its character as a whole should safely be estimated from any constituent.

Many scores of clear-cut variety have been written which disclose nothing remarkable in performance. Composers sometimes manifest a purpose to be clear-cut when they have little to say, or when they are laying present foundations for something individual and impressive to say at a future day.

Take, for example, the little piece of practice carpentry of Tchaikovsky's which stands on the program with the Menotti Concerto and which bears the designation, Symphony No. 2 in C minor, op. 17. It is hard to believe that the composer of the "Pathetic" Symphony contrived such an obvious and commonplace job as that; and yet, it was in all likelihood a necessary preparation for the masterwork which in the mature development of the man came through.

The Menotti score, then, may be clear-cut even to the point of conventionality and may carry a prediction of big accomplishment yet to eventuate. The book opens out to page one with an Allegro movement for a rather full orchestra, not over-rich in winds but plentifully supplied with percussion. If the actual scoring looks plain, the rhythmic scheme is complicated enough, with threes and twos and other measures demanding the beat one after the other. It can hardly be safe for the conductor to look away from the desk too often. As for the solo part, that in a remarkable way seems to be written with express acknowledgment that a pianist has but one pair of hands and that they cannot be all over the keyboard all the time. So here, likewise, things are clear-cut.

In due course, the Allegro terminates and a slow movement, Lento, succeeds. Hoping that everything goes well with the Allegro and the Lento and that the soloist, Rudolf Firkusny, who is a newcomer to the Boston Symphony, though he was heard some years ago in Boston at an academic musical gathering of some size, makes a good impression with them, let us turn along to the Finale. This is an exhibition of clear-cut scoring in the extreme. It is a march, Allegro Moderato, founded on a four-note theme of the utmost plainness and on a two-note rhythm, heavy-footed and constant.

The four-note main subject, after what seems to be Menotti's way, is formed of a succession of notes that presumes we all sing the chromatic scale as naturally as we do the regular diatonic. When its numerous repetitions are completed, perhaps we shall feel persuaded so ourselves.

The march is broken by a diversion in slow time and is resumed for a tramping, ground-shaking finish. To turn the pages of the book back, here well along in the first movement stands out a longish passage for the piano alone, evidently designed for a cadenza—thanks for soloists at an orchestral concert, and thanks for their cadenzas, which always produce a moment of exaltation when the artist rises to h remember.

[30]

Bulletin of Brooklyn Institute of Arts & Sciences November, 1945

SIXTY-FIVE GLORIOUS SEASONS

Richard Tucker
Koussevitzky at Rehearsal

The following article is drawn from an editorial, "Vision of Greatness," that appeared in the Boston Globe on October 5, 1945:

WHEN LIVING IN A GREAT AGE IT IS WELL TO know it. For more than two decades we in Boston and New England have been living in a great period of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. If a repertory theatre of virtuoso actors played in this city week after week the year round none but the classic dramas of ancient and modern literature, it could pour no greater stream of vital energy into our veins—if as much, for the literature of the stage is not as rich as that of music. Hardly two dozen tragedies of the first rank exist; the literature of music is almost an embarrassment of riches.

This afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its sixty-fifth season. Throughout the war this mighty instrument of joy, hope, peace, and the sacrament of beauty went on sounding. So far from letting us down, it held us up; never slackening its tours and schedules in the great concert halls of the land, it played devotedly in Army camps and war hospitals, and one of the historic moments in its career came last August when the Commonwealth of Massachusetts made the closing concert of the season at the Esplanade our public solemnization of the victory over Japan, with a moving address by the Governor and music by the Orchestra to an audience of forty thousand people, hushed and thankful.

The Orchestra has interwoven great music with the life of this community. Beginning more than six decades ago with a public that numbered hundreds, it widened like a majestic river to a public numbering thousands and, as its vibrations have extended to other cities, to Tanglewood, to the Esplanade, and to the broadcast of its Saturday evening concerts, these sightless couriers of the air now carry its art to the invisible millions. It would be hard to name an institution whose beneficence so easily, so naturally, so harmoniously transcends those barriers of nationality, race, color, creed or class which ordinarily divide mankind; for art is universal, and so is the response to it. . . .

"Moral education," says Whitehead, "is impossible apart from the habitual vision of greatness." Year after year the Boston Symphony Orchestra has kept before us the vision of greatness. We, its beneficiaries, can hardly imagine how different our lives would have been without it, and how much poorer. With the constant example of such excellence before us, we instinctively reject mediocrity, and our lives and this community abound in good work which could hardly have been done without the energization of such music sounding through a virtuoso orchestra from the brains and hearts of composers of genius. In the sociological evolution of our era, too, the Orchestra is moving powerfully forward into the new age, evolving from the instrument of a musical elite into a People's Orchestra, admired, prized, and loved by us, the multitude, who owe to it so many great occasions when it fortified our courage, assuaged our grief, and made glad our hearts.

The warmth of appreciation expressed in the above editorial is shared by thousands in Brooklyn. Less than a decade after it was organized the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in our Borough (then a separate city) and has returned ever since to present its annual series of concerts. The first concert for 1945-1946, under the direction of the incomparable Serge Koussevitzky, will take place on Friday evening, November 16.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR NOV 1 1945

New Pianist for Symphony

Rudolf Firkusny to Be Heard In Menotti's New Concerto

By Winthrop P. Tryon

"Clear-cut," the score of the Piano Concerto in F major of Gian-Carlo Menotti is, by remark of Richard Burgin, who is bringing the new work out at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, taking his first turn of the season at conducting for Dr. Koussevitzky. "No striving to be modern," by observation of another member of the orchestra who took part in practice of the music one morning.

Those broad covering judgments should serve as quite an introduction, too, to the piece, though they were passed more especially with reference to the orchestral side of it and without particular regard for the solo aspect. But if the concerto has the unity of content and of style that it ought to have, its character as a whole should safely be estimated from any constituent.

Many scores of clear-cut variety have been written which disclose nothing remarkable in performance. Composers sometimes manifest a purpose to be clear-cut when they have little to say, or when they are laying present foundations for something individual and impressive to say at a future day.

Take, for example, the little piece of practice carpentry of Tchaikovsky's which stands on the program with the Menotti Concerto and which bears the designation, Symphony No. 2 in C minor, op. 17. It is hard to believe that the composer of the "Pathetic" Symphony contrived such an obvious and commonplace job as that; and yet, it was in all likelihood a necessary preparation for the masterwork which in the mature development of the man came through.

The Menotti score, then, may be clear-cut even to the point of conventionality and may carry a prediction of big accomplishment yet to eventuate. The book opens out to page one with an Allegro movement for a rather full orchestra, not over-rich in winds but plentifully supplied with percussion. If the actual scoring looks plain, the rhythmic scheme is complicated enough, with threes and twos and other measures demanding the beat one after the other. It can hardly be safe for the conductor to look away from the desk too often. As for the solo part, that in a remarkable way seems to be written with express acknowledgment that a pianist has but one pair of hands and that they cannot be all over the keyboard all the time. So here, likewise, things are clear-cut.

In due course, the Allegro terminates and a slow movement, Lento, succeeds. Hoping that everything goes well with the Allegro and the Lento and that the soloist, Rudolf Firkusny, who is a newcomer to the Boston Symphony, though he was heard some years ago in Boston at an academic musical gathering of some size, makes a good impression with them, let us turn along to the Finale. This is an exhibition of clear-cut scoring in the extreme. It is a march, Allegro Moderato, founded on a four-note theme of the utmost plainness and on a two-note rhythm, heavy-footed and constant.

The four-note main subject, after what seems to be Menotti's way, is formed of a succession of notes that presumes we all sing the chromatic scale as naturally as we do the regular diatonic. When its numerous repetitions are completed, perhaps we shall feel persuaded so ourselves.

The march is broken by a diversion in slow time and is resumed for a tramping, ground-shaking finish. To turn the pages of the book back, here well along in the first movement stands out a longish passage for the piano alone, evidently designed for a cadenza—thanks for soloists at an orchestral concert, and thanks for their cadenzas, which always produce a moment of exaltation when the artist rises to [illegible] remember.

[30]

BOSTON HERALD

MUSIC

NOV 3

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the fifth program of its 65th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Rudolf Firkusny, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Prometheus," Op. 43 .... Beethoven
Piano Concerto in F major ..... Menotti
"Spirituals" for String Choir and Orchestra .... Gould Symphony No. 2 in C minor, Op. 17 .... Tchaikovsky

By RUDOLPH ELIE, JR.

What I liked about Gian Carlo Menotti's F major Piano Concerto, given its first performance yesterday afternoon, is its Music for Here and Now flavor. The composer has had the modesty to write for today, not tomorrow, and if he succeeds in speaking his piece tomorrow so much the better. The point is his Concerto proved to be wholly assimilable by yesterday's audience on a first hearing, and what more can be asked of a composer of music I do not know.

There were a number of things that could be discussed from a more artistic point of view, to be sure. There is first the question of reminiscence. Is a touch of Gershwin here, a touch of Ravel there (I'm thinking of the opening of the slow movement), a touch of Rachmaninoff somewhere else and generous splashes throughout of Italian opera and American jazz to be held against a young composer? Especially if that composer demonstrates—as Menotti does—a great gift for inventing a melodic line? I don't think it is. On the contrary, I had much rather hear a new composer's idea of a good tune any day than have him demonstrate to me that he passed his classes in dissonant counterpoint with high marks. So the final movement of his Concerto yesterday, which verges very close indeed on the banal, seems far more honest to me than the most learned essay in musical cleverness.

The first two movements—and the first especially—were exceptionally good. According to the program notes, the composer has had Scarlatti's piano music in mind as a model. He has, in fact, sought a transparent quality throughout, possibly something akin to Mozart or to Stravinsky's latest style. He succeeds very nicely in this until the time comes, as it always must in a concerto, to give the soloist a chance to show us his mettle. Then the purely display qualities of the work crash through, and its musical value lessens. Nonetheless, the abundance of musical ideas throughout, their general level of quality, and the overall display of creative ability, much more than make up for the weaker parts of the work. It seems to me that Mr. Menotti who was on hand to share in the decidedly favorable reception the work received, is to be considered a coming factor in American music.

Rudolf Firkusny, appearing as soloist in the Concerto, performed it with the clearest perception of its author's intentions, displaying besides a powerful technic and a highly musical feeling, and his success with the audience was unmistakable from the outset. The trio of composer, pianist and conductor, in fact, achieved an unusually warm reception.

The program opened with Beethoven's Overture to "Prometheus," an altogether too short piece considering the astonishing musical thought expressed in its brief span, continued with Morton Gould's very amusing "Spirituals" and came to an end with Tchaikovsky's Second Symphony, an interesting revival of no great shakes. Richard Burgin conducted admirably throughout and the orchestra, barring a few rather surprising slips in the Gould piece, sounded fine.

X

SYMPHONY CONCERT

POST NOV 3

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The first four Symphony programs having been on the substantial side, it was decided (by whom I do not know) to introduce into this week's list, conducted by Richard Burgin, echoes of the night club and the lighter theatre. To this end a new Piano Concerto by the now much-in-evidence Gian-Carlo Menotti and Morton Gould's "Spirituals" for string choir and orchestra were placed in most unfortunate juxtaposition in the middle part of the program. Even the rest, while most agreeable to hear and altogether welcome because of the comparative rarity of both numbers, escapes any hint of profundity. This pair of concerts begins with Beethoven's rather Mozartian Overture to "The Creatures of Prometheus" and ends with the anything but gloomy Second Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

The two Interludes from Mr. Menotti's "The Island God," recently heard at Symphony Hall, suggested to this reviewer such composers as Mascagni, Puccini and Respighi, Italians all. In the Concerto Mr. Menotti starts off, and quite successfully, by paying his respects to another countryman, the 18th Scarlatti. The first movement also contains a prominent quotation from Shostakovitch's Seventh Symphony. You hear Gershwin in the second movement, some of which, incidentally, is excellent; and Gershwin and what might well be Victor Herbert in the finale, while Prokofieff and a few other composers bob up here and there. Mr. Menotti has talent and plenty of fluency but distinctly he has not yet found his own voice, unless it is in the opera "Amelia Goes to Ball," which Boston has not heard. Rudolf Firkusny played the Concerto brilliantly and both he and the composer received an ovation.

When Dmitri Mitropoulos introduced Mr. Gould's "Spirituals" here last season they made a striking, in part, a deep impression. Yesterday you began to wonder how much of this was Mr. Mitropoulos and how much Mr. Gould. The more dramatic portions of the music seemed less dramatic, the more frivolous pages more frivolous.

Tchaikovsky's Second Symphony may not be as great, as an important a work as the over-played Fourth, Fifth and Sixth but its neglect in this city is out of all proportion to its merits. In their various ways the first three movements make decidedly pleasant listening and if much of the finale is on the blatant side, at least the second theme is good. For this listener the brightest spot on the program was the Beethoven Overture, charming in itself and beautifully played.

This Clipping From
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
CHRONICLE

NOV 4 - 1945

✓ STRAUSS: TILL EULENSPIEGEL. Recorded by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Two 12-inch records in album: $4.68. Victor set No. V-1.

THIS IS the first of a new series of records pressed in the transparent plastic called Vinylite which has been used for years in the making of electrical transcription for radio stations. Vinylite is flexible, and is therefore, to all intents and purposes, unbreakable. It practically eliminates surface noise, and consequently produces the illusion of higher fidelity recording. It is also much more resistant to wear and tear from the needle than is shellac. Finally, as Victor uses it here, it has the most beautiful rich, red color imaginable; it is an esthetic experience in itself simply to hold these disks up to the light.

Koussevitzky's performance of Strauss' brilliant, gay piece is the last word in zestful virtuosity, and the recording is unbelievably magnificent. Observe, however, this set sells for twice the usual price.

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEX.
TIMES-HERALD

NOV 4 - 1945

Here, in this magnificent performance of a great structural and harmonic work, we find an almost unbelievable clarity of tone. The powerful sweep of Koussevitzky's feeling for the most subtle nuance was never more evident. Master meets master here, and the result is one of the finest albums we have heard.

Leonard Lyons

CHICAGO, ILL. NEWS

Koussevitsky Has Personal Interest In Prokofieff's 5th Symphony

NOV. 5

NEW YORK—Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who will serve as honorary chairman at the conference of American-Soviet cultural cooperation, will conduct Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony in Boston next month. He feels that he is partly responsible for this composition.

More than a year ago Koussevitsky, upon being told that Soviet composers found it difficult to write because of lack of paper, placed an order at Schirmer's for several thousand sheets of music paper to be sent to the Soviet Union, via the embassy, each week.

A few days ago Koussevitsky received the photostat score of Prokofieff's newest work. In the lower left-hand corner he found the trademark, "G. Schirmer, Inc., Music Publishers," identifying it as having been written on paper he sent.

Rudolf Firkusny Soloist In Menotti Piano Concerto

MONITOR

By L. A. Sloper

NOV 3

Gian-Carlo Menotti's Piano Concerto in F had its first performance anywhere yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist, and Richard Burgin conducting. It was the second item of the fifth program of the season, which opened with Beethoven's Overture to the ballet, "The Creatures of Prometheus," and consisted otherwise of Morton Gould's "Spirituals" for string choir and orchestra and Tchaikovsky's Second Symphony, in C minor.

A program designed apparently for entertainment. The overture, the concerto, the "Spirituals" and the symphony are all lively music, and none of them makes very exacting demands upon the listener's attention. Or perhaps somebody said: "Here are a lot of things that are due for performance; let's toss them together and be done with it." The result was not without interest.

Mr. Menotti gave the editor of the program notes no more information about his concerto than that he had been influenced by the pre-Romantic Italian instrumental style and particularly by the keyboard music of Domenico Scarlatti. If he had been more communicative, he might have confessed to glancing back at other composers, of other periods and other countries; but no doubt he knew we could see this for ourselves. Certainly Scarlatti would have been surprised by some of Mr. Menotti's harmonic and rhythmic effects.

If the work has no profound musical significance, it is ingratiating, it is superficially brilliant, and it offers a rewarding vehicle for a virtuosic pianist. It might well become a favorite at popular concerts, alongside, or a cut above, the "Rhapsody in Blue." Mr. Firkusny, in his first appearance with the Boston orchestra, made the most of his opportunity, displaying a good tone, a fluent technique and a firm hold of the rhythmic complexities. The ovation that followed must have been directed at least as much at the soloist as at the composer.

Morton Gould's "Spirituals" were played here last December under the direction of Mr. Mitropoulos. If Menotti's concerto belongs on a popular program, these "Spirituals" belong to the Pop concerts. They do not achieve the lightness and gayety, much less the tragic impact that the composer says he has found in American folk music. The "Sermon" does not convey the devotional feeling that one finds in the Negro Spirituals, the "Little Bit of Sin" is trivial, the "Protest" unimpressive.

The Second Symphony of Tchaikovsky was revived here four seasons ago by Igor Stravinsky. It is a sort of sketchbook, or rehearsal, for the Fourth, Fifth and Sixth. It was interesting to hear it again, to note the passages that were transformed and glorified in the later works.

Mr. Burgin as usual was in complete command of the situation throughout the afternoon, and secured sound and at times eloquent performances.

GLOBE

MUSIC

NOV 3

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Richard Burgin made his first appearance of the season as assistant conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. He gave the first performance of the Piano Concerto by Gian-Carlo Menotti, with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist, and presented Beethoven's Overture to "The Creatures of Prometheus," the "Spirituals" for string choir and orchestra by Morton Gould, and the rarely-heard Second, or "Little Russia," Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

With this Concerto Mr. Menotti has provided pianists with a work of high brilliance, and to the keyboard-orchestral repertory he has contributed a very agreeable work that ought to endure. The orchestral texture is light, to balance a keyboard part whose comparative slenderness was derived, as the composer has explained, from study of the 18th century clavecinists, especially Domenico Scarlatti.

This is not a case of old bottles and new wine, however, because the Concerto is in no sense a return to archaic methods of composition. It is intrinsically modern, gay and bright, with dissonance that seasons but does not paralyze one's musical taste buds. It is also melodic and rhythmically alive. The finale, as more than one listener observed, carries, in its touches of jazz, a strong suggestion of Broadway.

The little reminiscence of the march in Shostakovich's Seventh Symphony, appearing at the outset of the Concerto, is disconcerting, and the first and last movements perhaps are a bit too long. Otherwise the work is fresh and agreeable, and we ought to have another chance to hear it. Mr. Firkusny played brilliantly. The orchestral side was more than competent, but I suspect many little details could be improved with further rehearsal. Composer, soloist, conductor and orchestra all shared a general ovation.

The "Spirituals" of Mr. Gould, first presented last December by Dimitri Mitropoulos, improve on rehearing. (What music doesn't, for that matter?) The writing is ingenious, the contrasted moods engaging, and that final slam-bang of the "Jubilee" section is really good fun.

The first time you hear Tchaikovsky's "Little Russia" Symphony, it is quite an eye-opener (or should it be ear-opener?) because in this work upon Ukrainian folktunes you encounter a side of Tchaikovsky quite different from his pessimism and black despair. I like to think that every symphonist at one time or another writes a "Pastoral" Symphony. This would be Tchaikovsky's. Slight as the "Little Russia" may be in texture and development, it is music of charm, notably the toy march and the irresistible trio of the scherzo. The performances this week are the first since 1941. We ought not to wait until 1949 for the next ones.

Mr. Burgin conducted admirably. The orchestra sounded extremely well, and there was more care for nuances than once was true of his readings. With Beethoven's lesser and unhackneyed Overture he achieved genuine eloquence, and of the other three compositions about the same may be said.

NEW YORK, N.Y. - POST
NOV 3 - 1945

The Lyons Den

By Leonard Lyons

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who will serve as honorary chairman at the Conference of American-Soviet Cultural Co-operation, will conduct Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony in Boston next month. He feels that he is partly responsible for this composition. More than a year ago Koussevitzky, upon being told that Soviet composers found it difficult to write because of lack of paper, placed an order at Schirmer's for several thousand sheets of music paper to be sent to the Soviet Union, via the Embassy, each week . . . A few days ago Koussevitzky received the photostat score of Prokofieff's newest work. In the lower left-hand corner he found the trade mark, "G. Schirmer, Inc., Music Publishers," identifying it as having been written on paper he sent.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MIRROR

NOV 7 - 1945

This Clipping From LOUISVILLE, KY.
TIMES

NOV 8

This Clipping From MACON, GA.
NEWS

Nov 22, 1945

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

NOV 7 1945

Walter Winchell
In New York

married, he's a father, owns his own home and stethos

The Boston Symphony's new conductor will be Dimitri Metropoulis...Be sure and read the short piece in a newsmag under "California," sub-christened: "Sin and Souffle"...Army bigwigs are in a swivet because a burlesk stripper (recently discharged honorably from the WACs) uses that fact in her advertising in Newark...

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will serve as honorary chairman at the Conference of American-Soviet Cultural Co-operation, will conduct Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony in Boston next month. He feels that he is partly responsible for this composition. More than a year ago Koussevitzky, upon being told that Soviet composers found it difficult to write because of lack of paper, placed an order at Schirmer's for several thousand sheets of music paper to be sent to the Siviet Union, via the embassy, each week . . . A few days ago Kousevitzy received the photostat score of Prokofieff's newest works. In the lower left-hand corner he found the trade mark, "G. Schirmer, Inc., Music Publishers," identifying it as having been written on paper he sent.

This Clipping From ATLANTA, GA.
JOURNAL

NOV 9 - 1945

This Clipping From PANAMA CITY, FLA.
NEWS-HERALD

NOV 11 1945

[3']

HERALD USIC NOV 10

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the sixth program of its 65th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:
Symphony No. 5, Op. 100.....Prokofieff
Adagio and Fugue (K. 546).....Mozart
Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 73.....Brahms

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Perhaps the most important musical premiere of the season, Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony is also perhaps the most troublesome to assess with any degree of satisfaction to anybody in a first hearing.

This is not because it is so formidable as music, because it isn't. On the contrary, there is not much of anything new or advanced about it. It is rather because it represents a Prokofieff none of us know very well, not so much from a technical point (for all the familiar mannerisms are there), as from an emotional or even spiritual point of view. Something has happened to our sardonically witty friend of "Peter and the Wolf," the "Classical" Symphony, the Violin and Piano Concertos, even the most serious Piano Sonatas. The old Prokofieff is there in the Scherzo, to be sure. Indeed, he has in that extraordinary movement written what seems to me not only the best Prokofieff in many years, but one of the ranking orchestral scherzos of this century.

It is the first and the third movements that offer the puzzle, for even the roots of the finale are easily found in the Prokofieff of old. The first movement begins marvelously, announcing two striking melodic ideas against a background of rich and dramatic texture. And presently you begin to wonder where you are. You have lost your way in a viscous mass of what is obviously solemn music which is obviously trying to prove something that its composer never tried to prove before. Then all at once you emerge into a truly extraordinary coda, and you realize you are listening to an important musical statement no less important for the fact you didn't catch all the words leading up to it. Its eloquence throughout is unmistakable; it is simply that you (or should I say I?) can't follow the trend of thought through so protracted and highly complicated a development. Yet this first movement is by far the most important of the four, and I suspect that its true greatness will be increasingly evident on further hearings.

The scherzo which follows is a delightful open book, but the adagio again takes us into a rarefied realm, a little less rare for the fact that its chief theme is fairly commonplace and its treatment almost Beethovenate, but as John Burk points out in his program notes, it does carry the symphony to its deepest point of tragic tension. Tragic tension, in fact, characterizes both the first and the third movements, and it is this that catches those who know Prokofieff of old off guard.

For it seems that the war has happened to Prokofieff. This is indeed a "war" symphony heard through the ears of a Russian who has been as much a citizen of the world as a Russian. He has been touched and touched deeply by the war, and although the dry wit, the cosmopolitan humor, the irony, the confident self-assertion and the elan are still there, there is a profound sadness in this symphony. I think this music is probably very close to his own heart, and I think it may in time be very close to ours. Yet, even at first hearing, in a truly marvelous interpretation by Dr. Koussevitzky who has given us his all in the presentation of this important work, it caught the fancy of the audience for an unusually warm reception.

The second half of the program offered Mozart's Adagio and Fugue, which was rather heavily done by a rather larger force string band than seemed necessary, and Brahms' Second Symphony, which was so exquisitely done that a lot of people who usually rush out at the final chord remained to applaud.

GLOBE NOV 10 MU

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Fifth Symphony of Serge Prokofieff was given first performance in America by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon. Serge Koussevitzky also conducted Mozart's Adagio and Fugue for strings (K. 546) and the Second Symphony of Brahms.

Prokofieff's new work is altogether remarkable. It is not often that a first hearing impels one to think of a composition as a masterpiece, but this is just such an occasion.

The business of prophecy is not only risky but foolish, however, and since eternity seems to have plenty of time, let us not rush into cold, cold print with predicitions based upon dubious first impressions.

Suffice it to say the new Fifth Symphony is "big" all the way. The outline is big, so is the spirit. It is music of tension and force and passion and, I think, of profundity.

The idiom is solid and extremely resourceful in terms of modern orchestration and technical devices. Through all four movements runs a sense of inexorable logic, of pattern and structure.

In short, this appears to be music in which high expressive power is balanced by extraordinary theoretical craftsmanship.

The first and last movements are massive, the scherzo of a breadth whose equal you would find only in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and certain symphonies of Mahler. The adagio is both lyrical, with a long melodic line, and curiously resolute. Throughout all four movements Prokofieff's melodic invention is distinctive.

The composer disclaims any program for the Fifth Symphony, terming it only a "symphony about the spirit of man." He wrote it in one Summer month of 1944, after several years of gathering thematic material for it.

Since the work promises to be around indefinitely, there will be plenty of time to attempt to fathom its "meaning." For the present let us merely say it is a musical expression of enormous power.

No doubt Prokofieff's esthetic point of view, as he wrote it, was affected by the war in Russia. Just how much is not a point for the moment.

In the Fifth are pages where both the spirit and the sound make me think of Shostakovich. I doubt that either composer would be "influenced" by the other. Perhaps this similarity is just a manifestation of a common coinage of musical expression in Soviet Russia today.

The Friday audience received the Fifth Symphony with more than usual cordiality. There must have been many in the audience for whom the astringent quality of Prokofieff's dissonance and the uncompromising harshness of his texture made hard listening. Yet one left Symphony Hall with the feeling that the Fifth Symphony had enjoyed a decided success.

After Prokofieff, the thoroughly uncharacteristic Adagio and Fugue of Mozart (the Fugue a summation of what Mozart learned from Bach), and the gracious Brahms Symphony seemed very tame. This in spite of magnificent conducting and playing the afternoon through.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

NOV 1 0 1945

Rhythm and Reason

Bostonians Here Wednesday—Casadesus With Philharmonic

By Harriett Johnson

The Boston Symphony Orchestra which makes its first Carnegie Hall visit of the season on Wednesday, celebrates this year its 60th anniversary of concert giving in New York. Maestro Serge Koussevitsky will present at his initial Wednesday night and Saturday afternoon concerts, Prokofieff's latest symphony, his Fifth, and the first purely symphonic venture the Russian composer has embarked upon in 15 years.

Prokofieff composed the work in the summer of 1944 and it had its world premiere in Moscow last Jan. 13. Its first American hearing was in Boston yesterday. The orchestra's evening concert will begin at 8:45; Saturday afternoon at 2:30.

Koussevitsky

Artur Rodzinski, musical director of the New York Philharmonic, returns to his orchestra Thursday night after two weeks' absence during which he took a trip to Rochester to open the 23d season of the Philharmonic in that city. Robert Casadesus, French pianist, is soloist at the three concerts of the week, Thursday night, Friday afternoon and Sunday afternoon, Nov. 18. He plays the Beethoven Fourth Piano Concerto in G Major, and the program also includes the first performance by the orchestra of Walter Piston's Second Symphony, and the Albeniz-Arbos "Fete-Dieu a Seville," from "Iberia." "Triana" from the same Suite will also be performed on Sunday, while Debussy's "La Mer" is to be played only on Thursday and Friday.

Young Peoples Concerts Begin

Another event of interest in next week's orchestral world is the opening on Saturday at 11 a. m. of the first in a series of six Young People's Concerts given by the Philharmonic Society and conducted by Rudolph Ganz. Sylvia Zaremba, 14-year-old pianist, born in Chicopee, Mass., and a pupil of Isabelle Vengerova, will be soloist. She is to play the first movement of the Grieg Concerto.

Marian Anderson is celebrating on Dec. 30 the tenth anniversary of her first Carnegie Hall recital. Her initial concert of the season is tomorrow night and her second will be the date of her debut. For the latter concert she will sing the identical program of her first Carnegie recital. Tomorrow's program includes the aria, "Pace, Pace, Mio Dio," from "La Forza del Destino," three Handel arias and a group of songs by Hugo Wolf.

Closing Opera Performances

Highlights of the New York City Opera Company's final schedule of the fall season at City Center include a performance tomorrow afternoon of "The Bartered Bride" with Brenda Lewis, John Dudley and Hubert Norville in the leading roles, and Lucille Manners' first Marguerite of the season in "Faust" tomorrow night. Laszlo Halasz conducts "The Bartered Bride" and Jean Morel, "Faust."

Tonight's bill is Johann Strauss' "Gypsy Baron," with Julius Rudel conducting. Although the company winds up its fall events tomorrow night, it will return in the spring with many of the successful innovations of the season back again. Todd Duncan, Negro baritone, returnes with at least one new role to sing and also Ian Cosman, the singing policeman, whose successful debut was one of the season's most entertaining surprises.

The Friends of Music tomorrow afternoon at 5:30 on their Town Hall program feature the first New York appearance this season of William Primrose, violist, who will perform with the Budapest Quartet the Brahms' Viola Quintet, Opus 88. Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn for Two Pianos, Opus 56 B, is to be performed by Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff.

This Clipping From
THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

NOV 9 - 1945

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky returns to the podium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the sixth broadcast of the current season on Saturday, over Station KGO and ABC, from 6:30 to 7:30 p.m.

Dr. Koussevitzky has delved into the annals of the orchestra for part of his program on this occasion. The orchestra, organized in 1881, is now observing its 65th season. It was toward the end of the first year, on February 24, 1882, that the Second Symphony of Johannes Brahms was introduced into its repertoire. It had been premiered on December 30, 1877, in Vienna, and introduced to the United States on October 3, 1878, by Theodore Thomas, but Boston did not hear it until nearly four years later.

Even then its reception was not of the best, and William F. Apthorp wrote that Brahms appeared to be "the hardest nut to crack" while the Boston audience, which, like audiences today, clamor for new works, "turned up its nose" at the work which has remained in the orchestra's repertoire since.

This Clipping From OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES

NOV 1 0 1945

Boston Gives Warm Acclaim To Symphony

BOSTON, Nov. 10—(AP)—The Fifth symphony of Serge Prokofieff, performed for the first time in America by the Boston symphony orchestra Friday, was warmly received by audience and critics.

The Russian composer, who termed his work "a symphony about the spirit of man," sent a cablegram to Conductor Serge Koussevitzky:

"Happy you are conducting American premier of my Fifth symphony. This work is close to my heart."

Praising "a truly marvelous interpretation by Dr. Koussevitzky," Rudolph Elie jr., Boston Herald music critic, said:

"This indeed is a 'war symphony' heard through the ears of a Russian who has been as much a citizen of the world as a Russian. He has been touched and deeply touched by the war, and although the dry wit, the cosmopolitan humor, the irony, the confident self-assertion and the elan are still there, there is a profound sadness in this symphony."

Cyrus Durgin of the Boston Globe
Cyrus Durgin, of the Boston Globe, pronounced the new symphony "big all the way."

Warren Storey Smith of the Boston Post commented:

"Written in the summer of 1944, it was bound to have some connection with the stirring events then in progress. The doubters may well find that the symphony will grow upon acquaintance and Friday's audience took it immediately."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

POST NOV 10

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Time was when the music critic confronted with a new work had a perfect alibi. He could say that the composer's idiom was so strange, so baffling that evaluation was difficult if not impossible and there was nothing left to do but to record a purely personal reaction, favorable or otherwise. The Fifth Symphony of Prokofieff, which had its first performance in America at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, presents a very different problem. Although Prokofieff in this instance has abandoned his rather frequent practice of quoting from himself, there is still nothing about either the matter or the manner of the piece that is essentially unfamiliar. As H. T. Parker liked to say, it is fashioned "from the common stock of music."

And yet the new Symphony has qualities. It may turn out to be of great importance, although in the past important pieces, if not ahead of their time, have been at least abreast of it, and this particular symphony in nearly every respect looks backward. The slow movement, one of the best of the four, even suggests Rachmaninoff, who in his own day was never a radical, while the cheerful finale, at least on a first hearing, has in it little that might be called arresting.

Structually the Symphony seems a masterly achievement, and on the whole it is more serious in character than much that Prokofieff has written. The introspecting opening movement, if not exactly gripping, has mood. The ensuing Scherzo is brilliant, the Adagio full of deep feeling. While denying to the music any programmatic content, the composer has been quoted as saying that it is "a symphony about the spirit of man." Written in the summer of 1944, it was bound to have some connection with the stirring events then in progress. The doubters may well find that the Symphony will grow upon acquaintance and yesterday's audience took to it immediately.

The balance of the program consisted of Mozart's Adagio and Fugue for String Orchestra, played last summer in Tanglewood but last heard at the Symphony Concerts-proper in 1910, and the very familiar Second Symphony of Brahms. No Bach, when it came to writing fugues, Mozart could nevertheless handle the old gentleman's weapons better than anyone else in the second half of the 18th century. By both Prokofieff and Mozart, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Orchestra did handsomely.

This Clipping From
DES MOINES, IA.
TRIBUNE

NOV 1 0 1945

Airglances

By Mary Little.

Dr. Karl Compton, president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and one of the country's leading scientists, will discuss the place of science in post-war activities during the broadcast of the Boston Symphony Orchestra program (8:30 p. m. KRNT-WNAX).

This Clipping From ← MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS

This Clipping From
← NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES

This Clipping From ← PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

This Clipping From
← WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 1 0 1945

PROKOFIEFF 'FIFTH' HEARD

Boston Symphony Offers First U. S. Performance of Work

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Nov. 9—Serge Prokofieff's "Fifth Symphony" was accorded a warm reception here today at its première in the United States by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky before a capacity audience in Symphony Hall.

Several days ago, Dr. Koussevitzky received a cable from the Russian composer who offered his appreciation for the presentation by the orchestra.

The appearance of the "war" symphony on the Boston Orchestra's program is in line with Dr. Koussevitzky's plans for celebrating the victory of the Allied nations this season.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

NOV 1 0 1945

MUSIC NOTES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will open its sixtieth New York season at Carnegie Hall next Wednesday night. Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony will receive its first local performance, and the work will be repeated by the Boston orchestra at its concert the following Saturday afternoon. The Soviet composer's first effort in a purely symphonic form in fifteen years will be coupled on Wednesday with his first symphony, the "Classical." The Second Symphony of Sibelius will complete the program. Saturday's program will have only the Shostakovich Fifth Symphony as complement to the new Prokofieff Fifth.

This Clipping From
TEXARKANA, ARK.
NEWS

NOV 8 1945

The Lyons Den

. . . By Leonard Lyons

By LEONARD LYONS

copies.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who will serve as honorary chairman at the Conference of American-Soviet Cultural Co-operation, will conduct Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony in Boston next month. He feels that he is partly responsible for this composition. More than a year ago Koussevitzky, upon being told that Soviet composers found it difficult to write because of lack of paper, placed an order to Schirmer's for several thousand sheets of music paper to be sent to the Soviet Union, via the Embassy each week . . . A few days ago Koussevitzky received the photostat score of Prokofieff's newest work. In the lower left-hand corner he found the trade mark, "G. Schirmer, Inc., Music Publishers," identifying it as having been written on paper he sent.

[32]

HERALD USIC NOV 10

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave the sixth program of its 65th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program:

Symphony No. 5, Op. 100......Prokofieff
Adagio and Fugue (K. 546)......Mozart
Symphony No. 2 in D, Op. 73......Brahms

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Perhaps the most important musical premiere of the season, Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony is also perhaps the most troublesome to assess with any degree of satisfaction to anybody in a first hearing.

This is not because it is so formidable as music, because it isn't. On the contrary, there is not much of anything new or advanced about it. It is rather because it represents a Prokofieff none of us know very well, not so much from a technical point (for all the familiar mannerisms are there), as from an emotional or even spiritual point of view. Something has happened to our sardonically witty friend of "Peter and the Wolf," the "Classical" Symphony, the Violin and Piano Concertos, even the most serious Piano Sonatas. The old Prokofieff is there in the Scherzo, to be sure. Indeed, he has in that extraordinary movement written what seems to me not only the best Prokofieff in many years, but one of the ranking orchestral scherzos of this century.

It is the first and the third movements that offer the puzzle, for even the roots of the finale are easily found in the Prokofieff of old. The first movement begins marvelously, announcing two striking melodic ideas against a background of rich and dramatic texture. And presently you begin to wonder where you are. You have lost your way in a viscous mass of what is obviously solemn music which is obviously trying to prove something that its composer never tried to prove before. Then all at once you emerge into a truly extraordinary coda, and you realize you are listening to an important musical statement no less important for the fact you didn't catch all the words leading up to it. Its eloquence throughout is unmistakable; it is simply that you (or should I say I?) can't follow the trend of thought through so protracted and highly complicated a development. Yet this first movement is by far the most important of the four, and I suspect that its true greatness will be increasingly evident on further hearings.

The scherzo which follows is a delightful open book, but the adagio again takes us into a rarefied realm, a little less rare for the fact that its chief theme is fairly commonplace and its treatment almost Beethovenate, but as John Burk points out in his program notes, it does carry the symphony to its deepest point of tragic tension. Tragic tension, in fact, characterizes both the first and the third movements, and it is this that catches those who know Prokofieff of old off guard.

For it seems that the war has happened to Prokofieff. This is indeed a "war" symphony heard through the ears of a Russian who has been as much a citizen of the world as a Russian. He has been touched and touched deeply by the war, and although the dry wit, the cosmopolitan humor, the irony, the confident self-assertion and the elan are still there, there is a profound sadness in this symphony. I think this music is probably very close to his own heart, and I think it may in time be very close to ours. Yet, even at first hearing, in a truly marvelous interpretation by Dr. Koussevitzky who has given us his all in the presentation of this important work, it caught the fancy of the audience for an unusually warm reception.

The second half of the program offered Mozart's Adagio and Fugue, which was rather heavily done by a rather larger force string band than seemed necessary, and Brahms' Second Symphony, which was so exquisitely done that a lot of people who usually rush out at the final chord remained to applaud.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
NOV 10 1945

Rhythm and Reason

Bostonians Here Wednesday—Casadesus With Philharmonic

By Harriett Johnson

The Boston Symphony Orchestra which makes its first Carnegie Hall visit of the season on Wednesday, celebrates this year its 60th anniversary of concert giving in New York. Maestro Serge Koussevitsky will present at his initial Wednesday night and ~~Saturday~~ afternoon concerts, Prokofieff's latest symphony, his Fifth, and the first purely symphonic venture the Russian composer has embarked upon in 15 years.

Prokofieff composed the work in the summer of 1944 and it had its world premiere in Moscow last Jan. 13. Its first American hearing was in Boston yesterday. The orchestra's evening concert will begin at 8:45; Saturday afternoon at 2:30.

Koussevitsky

Artur Rodzinski, musical director of the New York Philharmonic, returns to his orchestra Thursday night after two weeks' absence during which he took a trip to Rochester to open the 23d season of the Philharmonic in that city. Robert Casadesus, French pianist, is soloist at the three concerts of the week, Thursday night, Friday afternoon and Sunday afternoon, Nov. 18. He plays the Beethoven Fourth Piano Concerto in G Major, and the program also includes the first performance by the orchestra of Walter Piston's Second Symphony, and the Albeniz-Arbos "Fete-Dieu a Seville," from "Iberia." "Triana" from the same Suite will also be performed on Sunday, while Debussy's "La Mer" is to be played only on Thursday and Friday.

Young Peoples Concerts Begin

Another event of interest in next week's orchestral world is the opening on Saturday at 11 a. m. of the first in a series of six Young People's Concerts given by the Philharmonic Society and conducted by Rudolph Ganz. Sylvia Zaremba, 14-year-old pianist, born in Chicopee, Mass., and a pupil of Isabelle Vengerova, will be soloist. She is to play the first movement of the Grieg Concerto.

Marian Anderson is celebrating on Dec. 30 the tenth anniversary of her first Carnegie Hall recital. Her initial concert of the season is tomorrow night and her second will be the date of her debut. For the latter concert she will sing the identical program of her first Carnegie recital. Tomorrow's program includes the aria, "Pace, Pace, Mio Dio," from "La Forza del Destino," three Handel arias and a group of songs by Hugo Wolf.

Closing Opera Performances

Highlights of the New York City Opera Company's final schedule of the fall season at City Center include a performance tomorrow afternoon of "The Bartered Bride" with Brenda Lewis, John Dudley and Hubert Norville in the leading roles, and Lucille Manners' first Marguerite of the season in "Faust" tomorrow night. Laszlo Halasz conducts "The Bartered Bride" and Jean Morel, "Faust."

Tonight's bill is Johann Strauss' "Gypsy Baron," with Julius Rudel conducting. Although the company winds up its fall events tomorrow night, it will return in the spring with many of the successful innovations of the season back again. Todd Duncan, Negro baritone, returnes with at least one new role to sing and also Ian Cosman, the singing policeman, whose successful debut was one of the season's most entertaining surprises.

The Friends of Music tomorrow afternoon at 5:30 on their Town Hall program feature the first New York appearance this season of William Primrose, violist, who will perform with the Budapest Quartet the Brahms' Viola Quintet, Opus 88. Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn for Two Pianos, Opus 56 B, is to be performed by Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff.

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra
By CYRUS DURGIN

The Fifth Symphony of Serge Prokofieff was given first performance in America by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon. Serge Koussevitzky also conducted Mozart's Adagio and Fugue for strings (K. 546) and the Second Symphony of Brahms.

Prokofieff's new work is altogether remarkable. It is not often that a first hearing impels one to think of a composition as a masterpiece, but this is just such an occasion.

The business of prophecy is not only risky but foolish, however, and since eternity seems to have plenty of time, let us not rush into cold, cold print with predicitions based upon dubious first impressions.

Suffice it to say the new Fifth Symphony is "big" all the way. The outline is big, so is the spirit. It is music of tension and force and passion and, I think, of profundity.

The idiom is solid and extremely resourceful in terms of modern orchestration and technical devices. Through all four movements runs a sense of inexorable logic, of pattern and structure.

In short, this appears to be music in which high expressive power is balanced by extraordinary theoretical craftsmanship.

The first and last movements are massive, the scherzo of a breadth whose equal you would find only in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and certain symphonies of Mahler. The adagio is both lyrical, with a long melodic line, and curiously resolute. Throughout all four movements Prokofieff's melodic invention is distinctive.

The composer disclaims any program for the Fifth Symphony, terming it only a "symphony about the spirit of man." He wrote it in one Summer month of 1944, after several years of gathering thematic material for it.

Since the work promises to be around indefinitely, there will be plenty of time to attempt to fathom its "meaning." For the present let us merely say it is a musical expression of enormous power.

No doubt Prokofieff's esthetic point of view, as he wrote it, was affected by the war in Russia. Just how much is not a point for the moment.

In the Fifth are pages where both the spirit and the sound make me think of Shostakovich. I doubt that either composer would be "influenced" by the other. Perhaps this similarity is just a manifestation of a common coinage of musical expression in Soviet Russia today.

The Friday audience received the Fifth Symphony with more than usual cordiality. There must have been many in the audience for whom the astringent quality of Prokofieff's dissonance and the uncompromising harshness of his texture made hard listening. Yet one left Symphony Hall with the feeling that the Fifth Symphony had enjoyed a decided success.

After Prokofieff, the thoroughly uncharacteristic Adagio and Fugue of Mozart (the Fugue a summation of what Mozart learned from Bach), and the gracious Brahms Symphony seemed very tame. This in spite of magnificent conducting and playing the afternoon through.

This Clipping From
THE ARGONAUT
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
NOV 9 - 1945

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky returns to the podium of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the sixth broadcast of the current season on Saturday, over Station KGO and ABC, from 6:30 to 7:30 p.m.

Dr. Koussevitzky has delved into the annals of the orchestra for part of his program on this occasion. The orchestra, organized in 1881, is now observing its 65th season. It was toward the end of the first year, on February 24, 1882, that the Second Symphony of Johannes Brahms was introduced into its repertoire. It had been premiered on December 30, 1877, in Vienna, and introduced to the United States on October 3, 1878, by Theodore Thomas, but Boston did not hear it until nearly four years later.

Even then its reception was not of the best, and William F. Apthorp wrote that Brahms appeared to be "the hardest nut to crack" while the Boston audience, which, like audiences today, clamor for new works, "turned up its nose" at the work which has remained in the orchestra's repertoire since.

This Clipping From OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
TIMES

Boston Gives Warm Acclaim To Symphony

BOSTON, Nov. 10—(AP)—The Fifth symphony of Serge Prokofieff, performed for the first time in America by the Boston symphony orchestra Friday, was warmly received by audience and critics.

The Russian composer, who termed his work "a symphony about the spirit of man," sent a cablegram to Conductor Serge Koussevitzky:

"Happy you are conducting American premier of my Fifth symphony. This work is close to my heart."

Praising "a truly marvelous interpretation by Dr. Koussevitzky," Rudolph Elie jr., Boston Herald music critic, said:

"This indeed is a 'war symphony' heard through the ears of a Russian who has been as much a citizen of the world as a Russian. He has been touched and deeply touched by the war, and although the dry wit, the cosmopolitan humor, the irony, the confident self-assertion and the elan are still there, there is a profound sadness in this symphony."

Cyrus Durgin of the Boston Globe
Cyrus Durgin, of the Boston Globe, pronounced the new symphony "big all the way."

Warren Storey Smith of the Boston Post commented:

"Written in the summer of 1944, it was bound to have some connection with the stirring events then in progress. The doubters may well find that the symphony will grow upon acquaintance and Friday's audience took it immediately."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Post Nov 10

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Time was when the music critic confronted with a new work had a perfect alibi. He could say that the composer's idiom was so strange, so baffling that evaluation was difficult if not impossible and there was nothing left to do but to record a purely personal reaction, favorable or otherwise. The Fifth Symphony of Prokofieff, which had its first performance in America at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, presents a very different problem. Although Prokofieff in this instance has abandoned his rather frequent practice of quoting from himself, there is still nothing about either the matter or the manner of the piece that is essentially unfamiliar. As H. T. Parker liked to say, it is fashioned "from the common stock of music."

And yet the new Symphony has qualities. It may turn out to be of great importance, although in the past important pieces, if not ahead of their time, have been at least abreast of it, and this particular symphony in nearly every respect looks backward. The slow movement, one of the best of the four, even suggests Rachmaninoff, who in his own day was never a radical, while the cheerful finale, at least on a first hearing, has in it little that might be called arresting.

Structually the Symphony seems a masterly achievement, and on the whole it is more serious in character than much that Prokofieff has written. The introspecting opening movement, if not exactly gripping, has mood. The ensuing Scherzo is brilliant, the Adagio full of deep feeling. While denying to the music any programmatic content, the composer has been quoted as saying that it is "a symphony about the spirit of man." Written in the summer of 1944, it was bound to have some connection with the stirring events then in progress. The doubters may well find that the Symphony will grow upon acquaintance and yesterday's audience took to it immediately.

The balance of the program consisted of Mozart's Adagio and Fugue for String Orchestra, played last summer in Tanglewood but last heard at the Symphony Concerts proper in 1910, and the very familiar Second Symphony of Brahms. No Bach, when it came to writing fugues, Mozart could nevertheless handle the old gentleman's weapons better than anyone else in the second half of the 18th century. By both Prokofieff and Mozart, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Orchestra did handsomely.

This Clipping From
DES MOINES, IA.
TRIBUNE
NOV 10 1945

Airglances

By Mary Little

Dr. Karl Compton, president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and one of the country's leading scientists, will discuss the place of science in postwar activities during the broadcast of the Boston Symphony Orchestra program (8:30 p. m.

This Clipping From ← MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS

This Clipping From
← NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES

This Clipping From ← PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

This Clipping From
← WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 10 1945

PROKOFIEFF 'FIFTH' HEARD

Boston Symphony Offers First U. S. Performance of Work

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Nov. 9—Serge Prokofieff's "Fifth Symphony" was accorded a warm reception here today at its première in the United States by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky before a capacity audience in Symphony Hall.

Several days ago, Dr. Koussevitzky received a cable from the Russian composer who offered his appreciation for the presentation by the orchestra.

The appearance of the "war" symphony on the Boston Orchestra's program is in line with Dr. Koussevitzky's plans for celebrating the victory of the Allied nations this season.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
NOV 10 1945

MUSIC NOTES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will open its sixtieth New York season at Carnegie Hall next Wednesday night. Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony will receive its first local performance, and the work will be repeated by the Boston orchestra at its concert the following Saturday afternoon. The Soviet composer's first effort in a purely symphonic form in fifteen years will be coupled on Wednesday with his first symphony, the "Classical." The Second Symphony of Sibelius will complete the program. Saturday's program will have only the Shostakovich Fifth Symphony as complement to the new Prokofieff Fifth.

This Clipping From
TEXARKANA, ARK.
NEWS
NOV 8 1945

The Lyons Den

. . . By Leonard Ly

By LEONARD LYONS

copies.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who will serve honorary chairman at the Conference
American-Soviet Cultural Co-operation, conduct Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony in Bos next month. He feels that he is partly respo sible for this composition. More than a ye ago Koussevitzky, upon being told that Sov composers found it difficult to write because lack of paper, placed an order to Schirme for several thousand sheets of music paper be sent to the Soviet Union, via the Emba each week . . . A few days ago Koussevit received the photostat score of Prokofie newest work. In the lower left-hand corner found the trade mark, "G. Schirmer, In Music Publishers," identifying it as havi been written on paper he sent.

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE NOV. 11, 1945

PARIS ORCHESTRAS

By VIRGIL THOMSON

By Wireless to the Herald Tribune Copyright, 1945, New York Tribune Inc.

PARIS, Nov. 3 (Delayed).—Paris has five established concert orchestras. These are, in the order of their seniority, that of the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire (conducted by Charles Munch), that of the Concerts Colonne (conducted by Paul Paray), that of the Concerts Lamoureux (conducted by Eugène Bigot), the Orchestre Pasdeloup (of which the titular conductor is Albert Wolff, not yet returned from Argentina where he has passed the last five years) and the Orchestre National de la Radiodiffusion Française (conducted by Manuel Rosenthal). Other permanent orchestras of the first class are those of the Opéra and of the Opéra-Comique. The first of these is conducted in repertory by Reynaldo Hahn, director of the Opéra, by François Ruhlmann, by Louis Fourestier and by Roger Desormière, who is also in charge of the Opéra ballet spectacles. The second, while awaiting the return of Wolff, newly appointed to the directorship of the Opéra-Comique, is led variously by Desormière, by Bigot, by Gustave Cloez and by Francis Cébron.

Four of the concert orchestras—those of the Conservatory, of the Concerts Colonne, Lamoureux and Pasdeloup—play to weekly subscription audiences on the same day at the same hour, which is Sunday at 5:45 p. m. The National Radio Orchestra plays, in addition to studio broadcasts, a public concert every Thursday evening at 8 o'clock in the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées, also broadcast.

The Sunday orchestras all play similar programs. Not identical ones, of course, but programs of such standard character that, like those of our own orchestral subscription concerts, they could on any given day be exchanged one for another without anybody's noticing much. What distinguishes them from ours is chiefly their lack of insistence on Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Sibelius, Shostakovitch and, at present, Wagner. I haven't noticed yet any Strauss either, this season. There is a higher proportion, on the other hand, than we use of Berlioz, Ravel and Schumann. Beethoven and Mozart are, of course, all over the place, as is normal.

The Orchestral Associations

THE big four are not, like our orchestras, philanthropic foundations but musicians' co-operatives. The conductors are elected by the players. The latter receive no fixed wage; they merely share in profits. The four societies receive each 800,000 francs a year as subsidy from the government. In return for this they play 100 minutes a year, as a minimum, of new music by French citizens. The state's subsidy fund, which supports as well the two state opera houses and the state theaters, is derived from horse racing, from the state's percentage in pari-mutuel betting All vacancies in the orchestras, as also in those of the state opera houses, are filled by open competition. Orchestral posts are much sought after because, though the direct income they bring to the holder is small, their prestige, which is great, brings to their incumbents profitable outside engagements and private pupils. Those of the opera houses, which are state owned and operated, amount to a civil service appointment and carry full pension rights.

The most prized posts are those of the Conservatory Orchestra, which is the oldest (it was founded by Habeneck in 1829) and the most highly reputed of them all. After this come in order Colonne, Lamoureux and Pasdeloup. All these groups do first-class work, though the right of the musicians to send substitutes to any rehearsal or concert (however desirable from the point of view of the players, who have to accept every possible outside engagement in order to live) is not conducive to infallible standards of execution. The opera houses permit substitution also. The Radio Orchestra does not.

In all the orchestras the woodwinds and brass are excellent. The string playing, though accomplished, is a little thin for American tastes. Also, it is sometimes inferior to ours in beauty of sound, simply because the musicians do not wish to risk carrying their best violins around in the rain. Last season two cellos being transported by members of the Radio Orchestra were crushed in crowded subway trains. The wonder is that under present working conditions the Paris orchestras continue to do first-class work at all. They do, however; and though their style is somewhat different from ours, their execution, its beauties of balance considered along with its inefficiencies, is no less expert. The Conservatory Orchestra, in fact, is still one of the great orchestras of the world. And when transportation shall be available one hopes an exchange of visits may be arranged with one of our own societies that will enable our music lovers to hear it again.

The Conductors

THE chief French conductors now working here are in order of seniority: Paul Paray, who will visit America this month; Charles Munch, who will take his Conservatory Orchestra to London this month in exchange for Sir Thomas Beecham and the London Philharmonic, who will come to Paris; Roger Desormière and Manuel Rosenthal. Paray and Munch are elderly men, specialists of standard repertory, internationally famous and, like all other subscription concert conductors, conservative minded. Their work in the Beethoven—through—Ravel repertory is impeccable.

Desormière and Rosenthal, now in their forties, are at home in a broader repertory. The music of today and that of the eighteenth century is particularly congenial to them. Their horizon is far larger than Romanticism, and their knowledge of composers' techniques is up-to-date. It is Desormière, for instance, who usually conducts at specially organized concerts the rhythmically complex Messiaen scores and who revives Rameau with the most convincing authority. He also conducts at the Opéra-Comique a "Pélléas et Mélisande" that is all of tenderness and sustained luminosity, with no thickness or weight in it anywhere, a revelation of loving comprehension and of exactitude. His work at all times is musically delicate and intellectually distinguished in a way that that of the standard repertory conductors seldom approaches, though the latter has, of course, a robustness for popular usage that is valuable in large-scale dissemination.

Rosenthal, a voracious score reader, plays to his radio public everything, literally everything. He even plays American music. He plays English music, too, and modern German, including Hindemith; Schoenberg and Alban Berg are announced for shortly. He gives Bartok and Mahler and rare Romanians and all the Poles and Czechoslovaks and naturally the newer French composers like Henry Barraud, and his own picturesque scores as well. Leaving to the four subscription societies their valuable if a little boring rôle as purveyors of standard repertory, he specializes in everything that is not standard repertory, everything that is novel and of good report.

Like all skilled radio men he plays for auditory rather than for visual effect, for what music really sounds like rather than for an emotive appeal that is ineffective beyond the confines of the concert room. He works quickly and correctly. Nothing confuses him, nothing shocks him. And no limitation, intellectual or administrative, hinders him in the execution of the program he considers to be the proper one for a national orchestra playing to a national public, which is to play everything, particularly that which nobody else is playing, to make of his orchestra a sort of national museum of music, a Louvre, a Luxembourg and a Museum of Modern Art all combined. He is thus at once a scholar and a defender of the faith. He poses as nobody's rival. He merely completes the picture, gives a panoramic breadth to the French musical scene. Without him this would be merely a series of peep shows, ancient and modern, surrounding the subscription concerts, which constitute here else, as everywhere, as much a rite as a means of public instruction, a celebration of the accepted Fifty Pieces.

The Available Repertory

WITH two opera houses running all the time, with the Radio Orchestra playing all year, too; with four standard orchestras playing from October to May and with special concerts like those of "La Plèiade" giving works of the most advanced category, with ballet being given a large part of the time by one new enterprise or another and all the time at the Opéra, with young conductors and visiting foreigners constantly appearing in extra concerts, Paris is probably richer today in orchestral music than any other city of the world.

The Negro conductor Rudolf Dunbar is giving right now a series of four concerts of American orchestral music which are being widely attended and discussed. Having not yet heard one of these, I have no opinion as to their quality, though French opinion is friendly, and everybody is grateful for the chance to hear Harris and Piston and Schuman and Copland, and symphonies by Randall Thompson and by myself. My ballet "Filling Station," I may add for the record, was performed a few weeks back at a concert of the National, Rosenthal conducting, and more than favorably received by both public and press.

The greatest excitement, however, that has so far been created here by an American work is due to the broadcasting about six weeks ago of a brief piece by John Cage. Many thought it sterile, and others found it horrid. But all the persons who are sensitive to musical novelty, as well as many of the uninstructed, are eager to hear more of Cage's work, because it does not sound like music they already know.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 1 1 1945

Symphony Makes Appeal for Copies of Program Here

FIFTY of the printed program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert ~~that were dis~~tributed to the record-breaking audience in the Metropolitan Theater Tuesday night are urgently needed by the orchestra management. Persons who carried programs home but are willing to part with them are asked to send them at once to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall, Boston.

A frantic appeal for the programs came yesterday from the orchestra's publicity department. Attendance at Tuesday's concert was the largest ever recorded at a symphony concert here, it was explained. Every seat in the theater was taken and there were scores of standees. As a result, the supply of programs was exhausted. Late in the week, it was discovered that not one had been saved for the orchestra's archives, and an SOS call to the theater revealed that it had disposed of its waste paper and there was no chance of retrieving any of the programs discarded there. So the appeal to the public was made as a last resort.

"This is something that has never happened before in the history of the orchestra," the press agent explained ruefully.

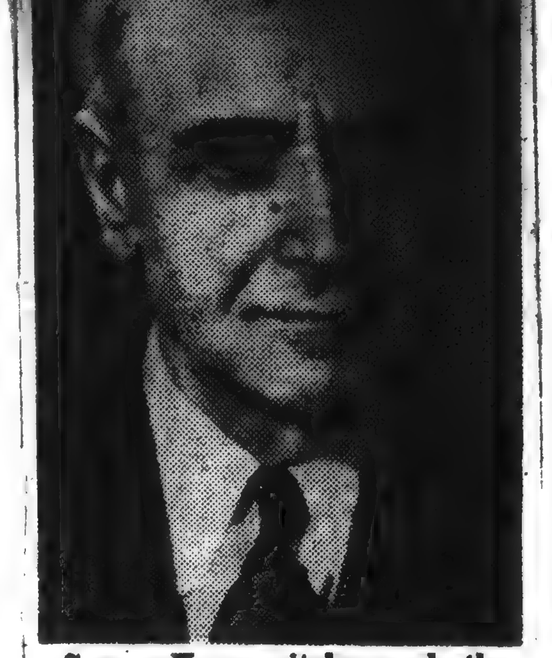
Paul Paray Next Symphony Guest Leader

HERALD NOV. 11 1945

Paul Paray, a distinguished visitor from France, who is expected to arrive in America in the next few days, will make the first appearance of his visit here when he conducts the next pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. These concerts will be on Nov. 23-24, since the coming week will be occupied with the orchestra's first visit of the season to New York and other cities.

M. Paray will also conduct the orchestra at Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on the previous Wednesday, Nov. 21, and the second concert of the Monday evening series on Nov. 26. Conductor of the Colonne Orchestra in Paris, he will present at the coming concerts Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, the Suite from Faure's Incidental Music to "Pelleas and Melisande," Ravel's "La Valse," Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and "L'Apprenti Sorcier," by Dukas.

Visiting Conductor



Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony will give three concerts here this week.

N.Y. TIMES, NOV. 11 '45

Prokofieff Fifth Given U. S. Premiere

BOSTON, Nov. 10.—(AP)—The Fifth Symphony of Serge Prokofieff, performed for the first time in America by the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday, was warmly received by audience and critics.

This Clipping From
DAYTON, O.
~~HERALD~~
News
NOV [illegible]

The Russian composer, who termed his work "A symphony about the spirit of man" sent a cablegram to conductor Serge Koussevitzky:

"Happy you are conducting American premiere of my Fifth Symphony. This work is close to my heart"

Praising "A truly marvelous interpretation by Dr. Koussevitzky," Rudolph Elie, Jr., Boston Herald critic, said:

"This indeed is a 'war' symphony heard through the ears of a Russian who has been as much a citizen of the world as a Russian. He has been touched and deeply touched by the war, and although the dry wit, the cosmopolitan humor, the irony, the confident self-assertain and the elan are still there, there is a profound sadness in this symphony."

Cyrus Durgin, of the Boston Globe, pronouncing the new symphony "'big' all the way," continued:

"It is not often that a first hearing impels one to think of a composition as a masterpiece but this is just such an occasion"

BOSTON HERALD, NOVEMBER 11, 1945

Programs for Faure Festival Are Announced

Although recognized as a composer who has exerted a far-reaching influence on the direction of contemporary music, Gabriel Faure is known in the United States chiefly through his lesser works. It is with this in mind that Harvard University, in its forthcoming festival celebrating the 100th anniversary of the birth of Faure, will offer a notable group of soloists with orchestra and chorus in a series of five programs representing the "greater" Faure.

The first program on Tuesday, Nov. 27, consists of music from "Pelleas et Melisande," excerpts from "Promethee," and "Shylock," and a complete performance of the famed Requiem. This concert takes place in the Harvard Memorial Church at 8:15 P. M. and like all other events in the festival, is open to the public without charge.

On Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 28, at 4:30 P. M. in Paine Hall, the program offers the Second Violin Sonata and the Trio for Violin, 'Cello and Piano. Wednesday night's program in Sanders Theater includes the song cycles "Clinq Melodies de Venise" and "La Bonne Chanson."

A second chamber music concert follows on Thursday night in Sanders Theater, offering the First and Second Piano Quintet, as well as a number of songs. The festival will be brought to an end on Friday night, Nov. 30, in Sanders Theater with a concert performance of the opera "Penelope" with soloists, chorus, orchestra and narrator.

This Clipping From
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
TIMES
N[illegible] 1 [illegible]

Music Prokofieff's Fifth

"I want to tell you a story," Dr. Koussevitzky said.

We had been discussing the work of the Music committee of the National Council, of which Serge Koussevitzky is chairman. We ~~had been talk~~ing of ways and means for building American-Soviet friendship in the field of music.

"It was in the spring of 1944," Dr. Koussevitzky said. "Someone came to me and told me, 'The Soviet composers cannot write any more. They are stopped.' 'But, why?' I asked. 'Because there is no paper, no music paper,' I was informed.

"I immediately called G Schirmer's, the music publishers to ask them if they could supply the paper. But I couldn't rest easy with the telephone call alone. I was deeply concerned and distressed. I wanted to get action right away. So I went down to Schirmer's myself to place an order with them. I ordered several thousand sheets of music paper to be sent to the Soviet Union every other week through the Soviet Embassy. The paper is still being sent."

Dr. Koussevitzky got up and walked over to his piano. "Come here," he said, "I want to show you something." He pointed to a manuscript on top of the piano.

"This is Prokofieff's Symphony. I received it just a few days ago. Early in November I will conduct it with the Boston Symphony or-orchestra. That will be its first performonce in America. A new symphony by one of the world's great composers," he went on. "Look at the paper."

In the bottom left-hand corner was printed "G. Schirmer, Inc., Music Publishers."

This Clipping From NORFOLK, VA.
VIRGINIAN PILOT

NOV 1 6 1945

Koussevitzky Gets a 'Dividend'.

Serge Koussevitzky, long-time conductor of the ~~Boston Symphony~~ orchestra, plays more new music than most symphony conductors dare. He is always on the lookout for new manuscripts. In the spring of 1944 someone told him the Soviet composers had stopped writing because they could get no more music paper.

Koussevitzky went personally to Schirmer's, the music publishers, and ordered several thousand sheets of music paper to be sent every week to Russia, through the Soviet embassy. The gesture evidently tickled the embassy people. They made room for it in the diplomatic pouches or elsewhere, although transport was then deathly tight.

Anyhow, this fall, Koussevitzky received a manuscript of a Fifth Symphony by the Soviet composer Prokofieff—a notable event in any season. The manuscript was on some of the Schirmer paper he had sent over!

This Clipping From
DES MOINES, IA.
REGISTER

NOV 1 1 1945

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 16, at 8:30 P.M.
FIRST BROOKLYN CONCERT
Boston Symphony Orch.
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor
STANDING ROOM ONLY
BROOKLYN ACADEMY OF MUSIC
30 Lafayette Ave., Brooklyn 17. STerling 3-6700

This Clipping From BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

NOV 20 1945

After the Allis-Chalmers radio debut of Prokofieff's 5th Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky told of having in~~troduced Prokofieff~~ in 1908 before a Petrograd 5c-per-head audience. "Already he was composing like nobody else," said Koussevitzky. "Already he was composing like Prokofieff" . . . . The composer-pianist, incidentally, once was managed by S. Hurok, who has managed most of the big names in music. Hurok who measures all events on an occupational basis, was discussing Charles Camille Saint-Saens. "When did he die? Hurok was asked. The impresario replied: "When did Saint-Saens die? It was in the season of 1920-1921."

This Clipping From CANTON, OHIO REPOSITORY

NOV 22 1945

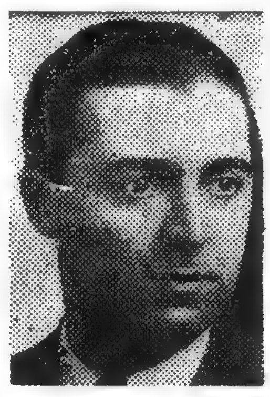
This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE DEMOCRAT

NOV 22 1945

NEW YORK WORLD-TELEGRAM, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1945.

Music

By Louis Biancolli



Prokofieff's Fifth Premiered by Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony celebrated its 60th anniversary as a visiting orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night, and instead of receiving gifts it gave them.

There were three presents, all symphonies, each wrapped in glistening tone and autographed by Serge Koussevitzky in his best handwriting. They left New York sounding and feeling better.

As a tribute to the orchestra and its suave maestro, the crowd stood and applauded when Mr. Koussevitzky took his place on the podium. Then the man handed out the three glittering parcels—Prokofieff's Classical and Fifth Symphonies and Sibelius' Second.

'Classical' Is Tops.

Possibly the best gift came in the smallest package last night—the "Classical." Perfection lies on that music like a benediction. Mr. Koussevitzky merely added his own blessings and the orchestra's.

The symphony runs 12 minutes, but in those 12 minutes you glimpse beauty and order almost unmatched since Mozart. Themes and phrases sweep by like a flight of birds. There isn't a note too many or a note too few.

Since they first ran their fingers through it, Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra haven't lost the wonder of this music. They played it like dazed men, dazed the Svengali way, with a weird hint of the unearthly in their mastery.

Prokofieff Premiere.

Prokofieff's Fifth, locally premiered last night, is another story, a longer one and a tougher one. "A symphony of the spirit of man," the composer calls it. Well, the spirit of man isn't exactly an open book; neither is this symphony.

I found the second and fourth movements the quickest to grasp and like. The second, in scherzo style, over a reiterated staccato bass, moves briskly, swaggeringly, like the passacaglia of Shostakovich's Eighth.

The Finale is good fun, with dazzling glints of satire, the closest reminder being the finale of Shostakovich's Sixth. Shostakovich seems to repay a few debts here by lending his colleague some of his best tricks.

Two Moods.

The other two movements left me puzzled. They bulk large and turbulent and obviously pack a graver message. But the style is dark, even turgid. The music burrows deep into the orchestra, as if afraid of the light.

My idea is this—Prokofieff worked on two plans here, two opposing points of view. In the second and fourth movements he followed the formula of his "Classical Symphony." That is, the themes laid down certain laws, and the composer enforced them.

In the other two movements, Prokofieff let his feelings guide him. The direction was more roundabout, the detours plentiful. You might say here he was the romanticist, the style being freer and the goal hazier. Frankly I prefer Prokofieff when he thinks to when he feels.

A New Idiom.

But the Soviet composer might reply: "Such is the 'spirit of man,' which I tried to picture. An accurate image must show the shadows as well as the lights. I am only reporting what I heard."

True; but Prokofieff has done crisper reporting in the past, even when tackling grim and involved ideas. Maybe he is trying out a new idiom in the first and third movements. I suppose we should await further experiment and rehearing.

One thing about last night's performance. The men played as if everything was as clear as day. If there were riddles in the score, they played with the blithe certainty of those who know all the answers. And Mr. Koussevitzky conducted as if every phrase was as plain as a headline.

This Clipping From
ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER-PRESS

NOV 18 1945

Paul Paray Reaches U. S. From Liberated Paris

BOSTON—(AP)—First important musician to reach this country from liberated Paris is Paul Paray, noted conductor.

He will appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra next week in Boston and Cambridge.

PROKOFIEFF FIFTH IN PREMIERE HERE

NOV 14

Composer's New Symphony Is Presented by Koussevitzky and Boston Orchestra

By NOEL STRAUS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, gave its first local concert of the season last night in Carnegie Hall. Featured on the program was the Fifth symphony of Prokofieff, which received its first New York hearing. This novelty was preceded by the same composer's "Classical" symphony and followed by the Second symphony by Sibelius.

The juxtaposition of the two Prokoffief compositions was a happy idea on the part of the conductor. Since the "Classical" symphony was the first and the Fifth symphony the latest of the composers works in the genre, their performance made clear his growth in his art over the years.

Both were written in a world in turmoil, the "Classical" during the first World War and the Fifth symphony in 1944, while Russia was still at grips with the Nazis. The elegant refinements of the earlier symphony with its attempt to recapture the Mozartean idiom in more modern terms, without a hint of Mozart's subtlety and depth, failed to reflect in the slightest any emotional reaction to the great conflict then confronting humanity. But the Fifth symphony tells a different story.

Feelings Are Evident

Here Prokofieff comes to grips with humanity in its tremendous struggle, and does so with telling sympathy in music of extraordinary vitality. Not suffering and sorrow dominate the work, however, but the sense of power felt by his race and the overwhelming joy experienced in its realization of certain victory over its foes and the forces of evil.

The symphony begins at once with a statement of the chief theme of the initial movement. It is a noncommittal melody, beginning peacefully enough. But soon, the movement, an Andante in sonata form, increases in restlessness, conflicting rhythms adding to the growing agitation which reaches its first peak in the final part of the development section. Then with the beginning of the restatement the chief theme accumulates in power as it is proclaimed by the brasses, and finally makes its appearance in greatly intensified form in a mighty peroration which brings the splendid division to a militant and highly effective close punctuated by crashes of percussion simulating the firing of ordnance.

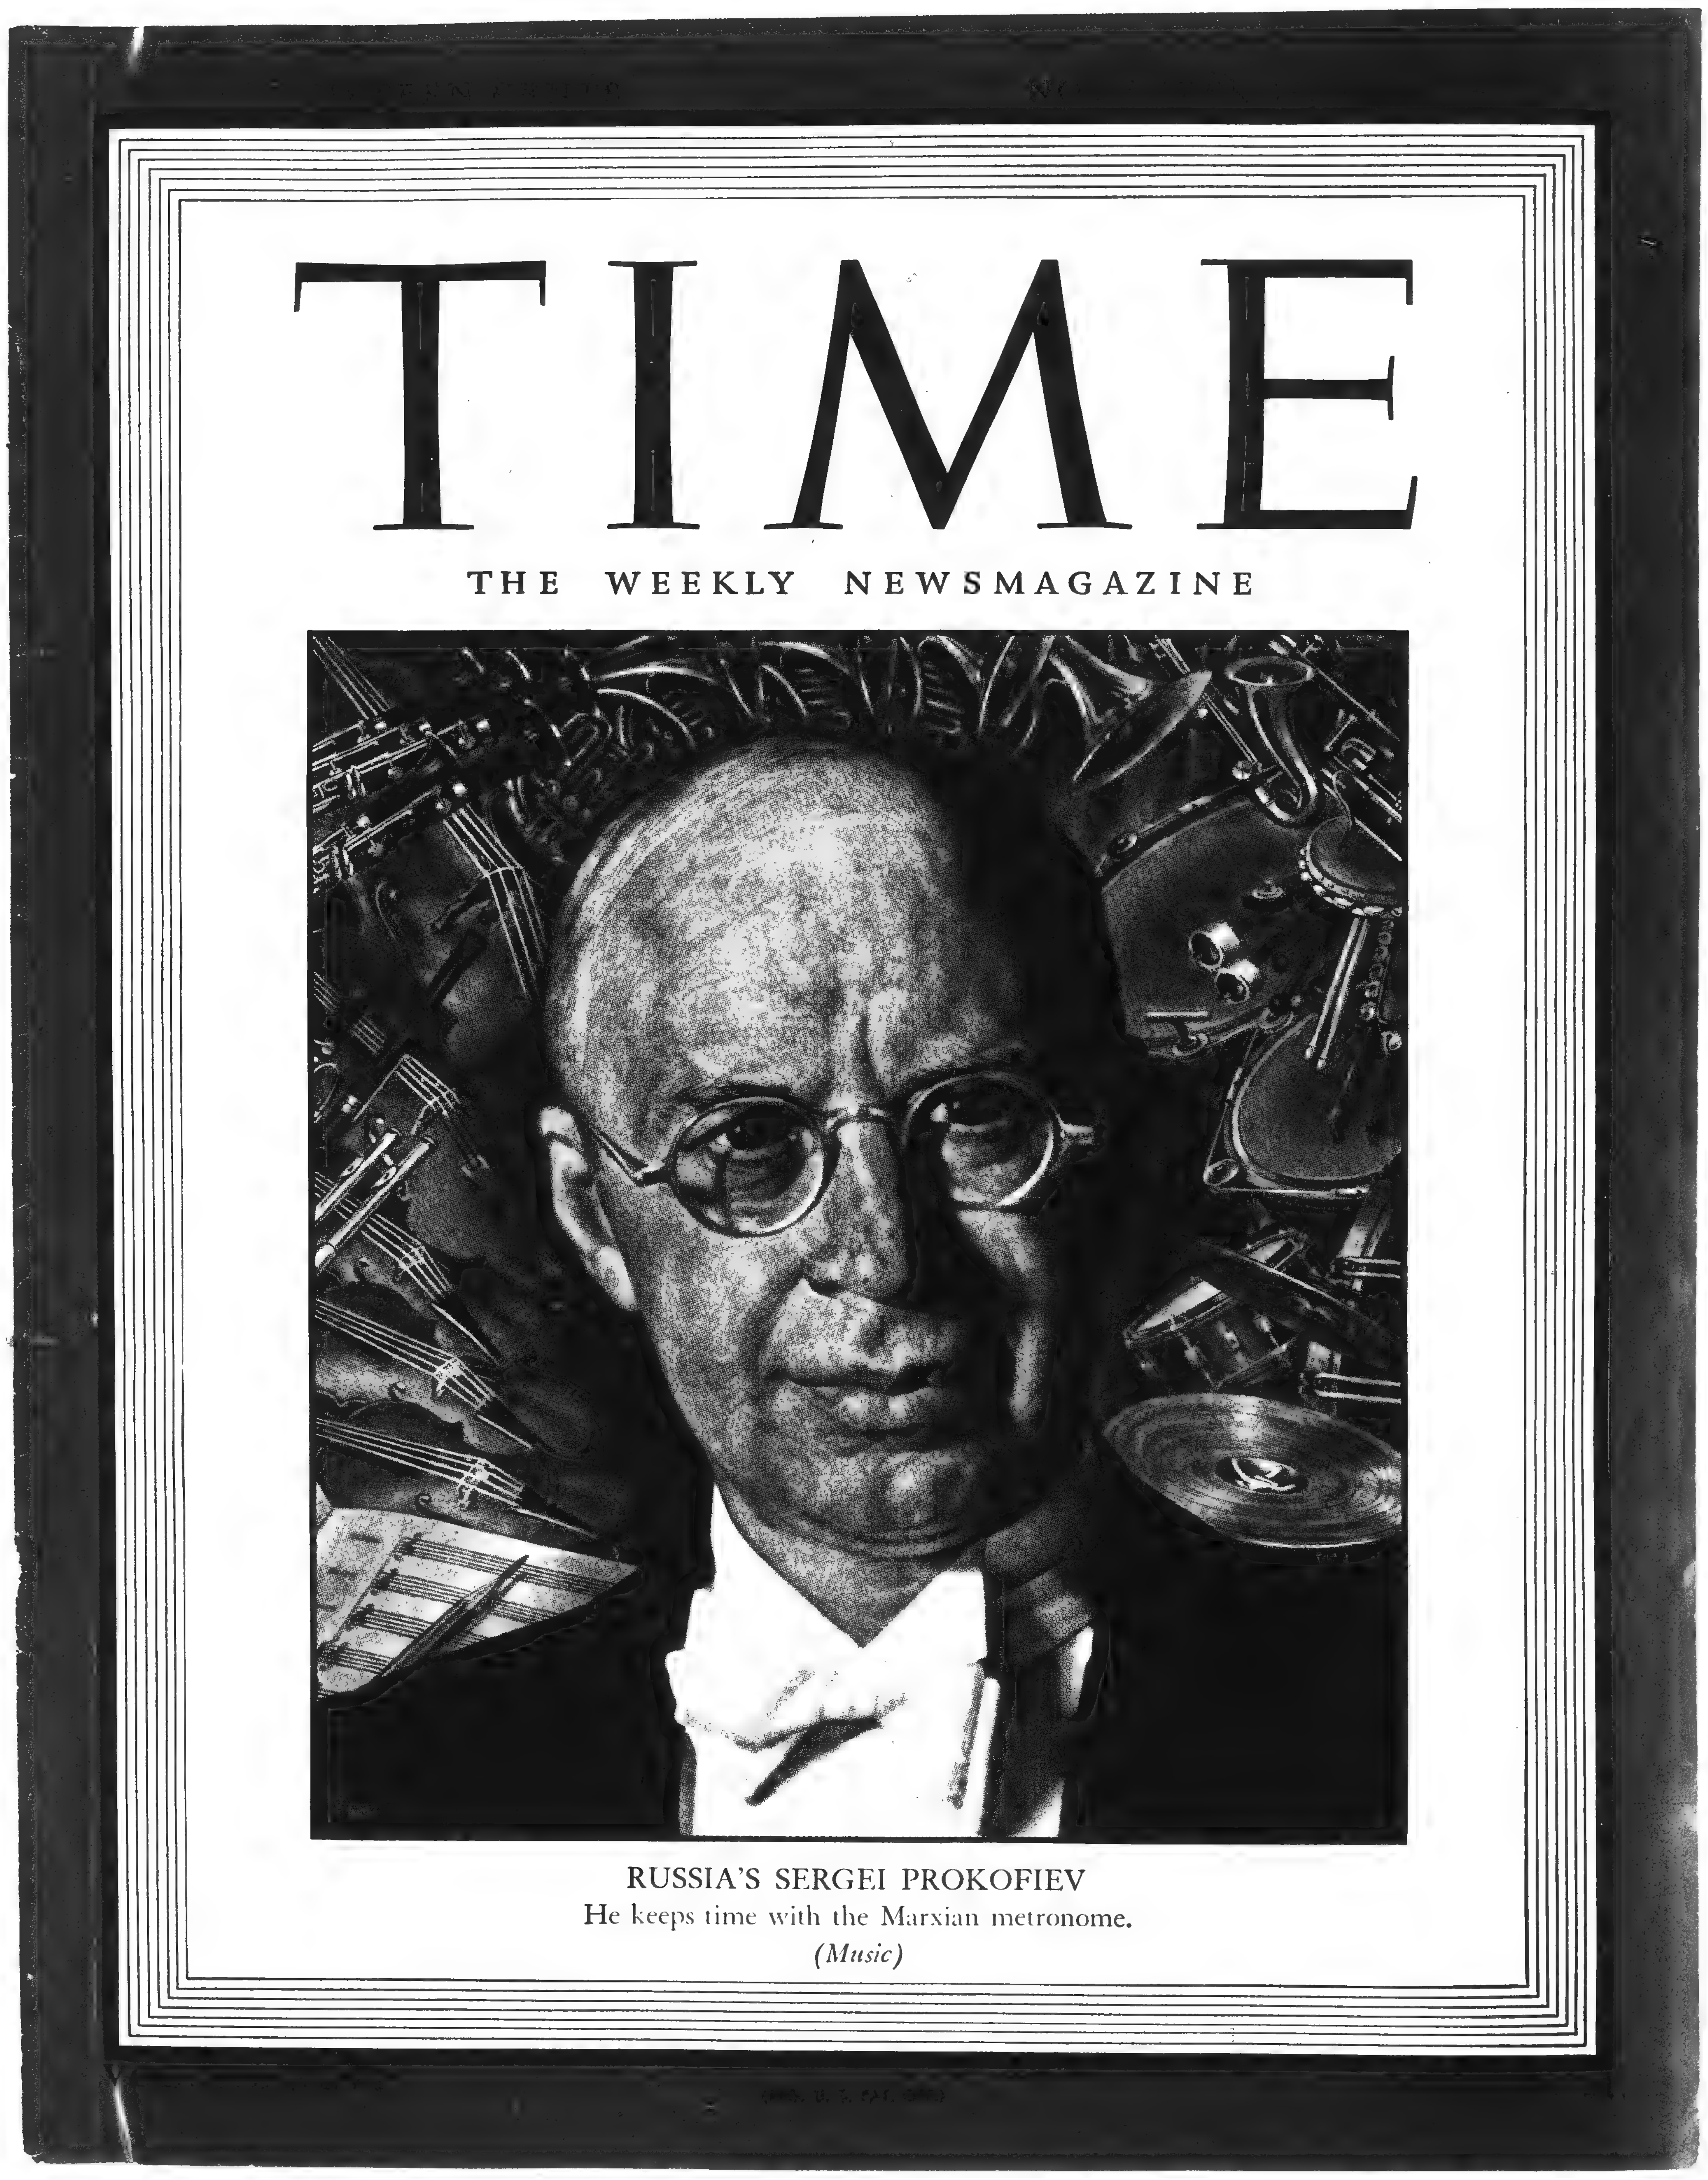
This movement is the crown of the work, but it is followed by a scherzo-like division in quadruple time, with a trio in triple rhythm which comes nearest to rivaling the opening section in interest and clarity of intention. It is filled with exuberance, intensity and energy, and clearly represents soldiery in an orgy of exultation. The second theme has an accompaniment suggesting the galloping of cavalry horses and the cracking of whips. The Trio is introduced and terminated with music for the woodwinds, strikingly simulating Russian peasants of the army playing their folk tunes, and like the first movement arrives at stirring climaxes in its central and terminating measures.

Return to the Warlike

After these two highly impressive movements, the Adagio and the final Allegro Giocoso seemed less convincing at a first hearing. Again, warlike elements appear in the Adagio in its central episode, but the sinuous melodies of this section of the work seem to wander about without sufficiently definite aim, while the overlengthy finale, though replete with joyous life, also missed the sure sense of conviction as a whole that was boasted by the first two movements, which represent Prokofieff at his very best and should rebound advantageously to his fame.

Dr. Koussevitsky, always a champion of Prokofieff's music from the start of the composer's career, led his men in a superb performance of this new and stirring creation. It was played with splendid virtuosity and brought out to the full the vivid coloring and varied moods of the richly scored opus.

In the "Classical" symphony, where the leader adopted brisk tempi for all the movements, the orchestra also performed with marked precision and beauty of detail. As for the Sibelius Second symphony, the Bostonians have presented it here so frequently that their achievement with this masterpiece need not be mentioned here.



TIME

THE WEEKLY NEWSMAGAZINE

RUSSIA'S SERGEI PROKOFIEV

He keeps time with the Marxian metronome.

(Music)

(REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.)

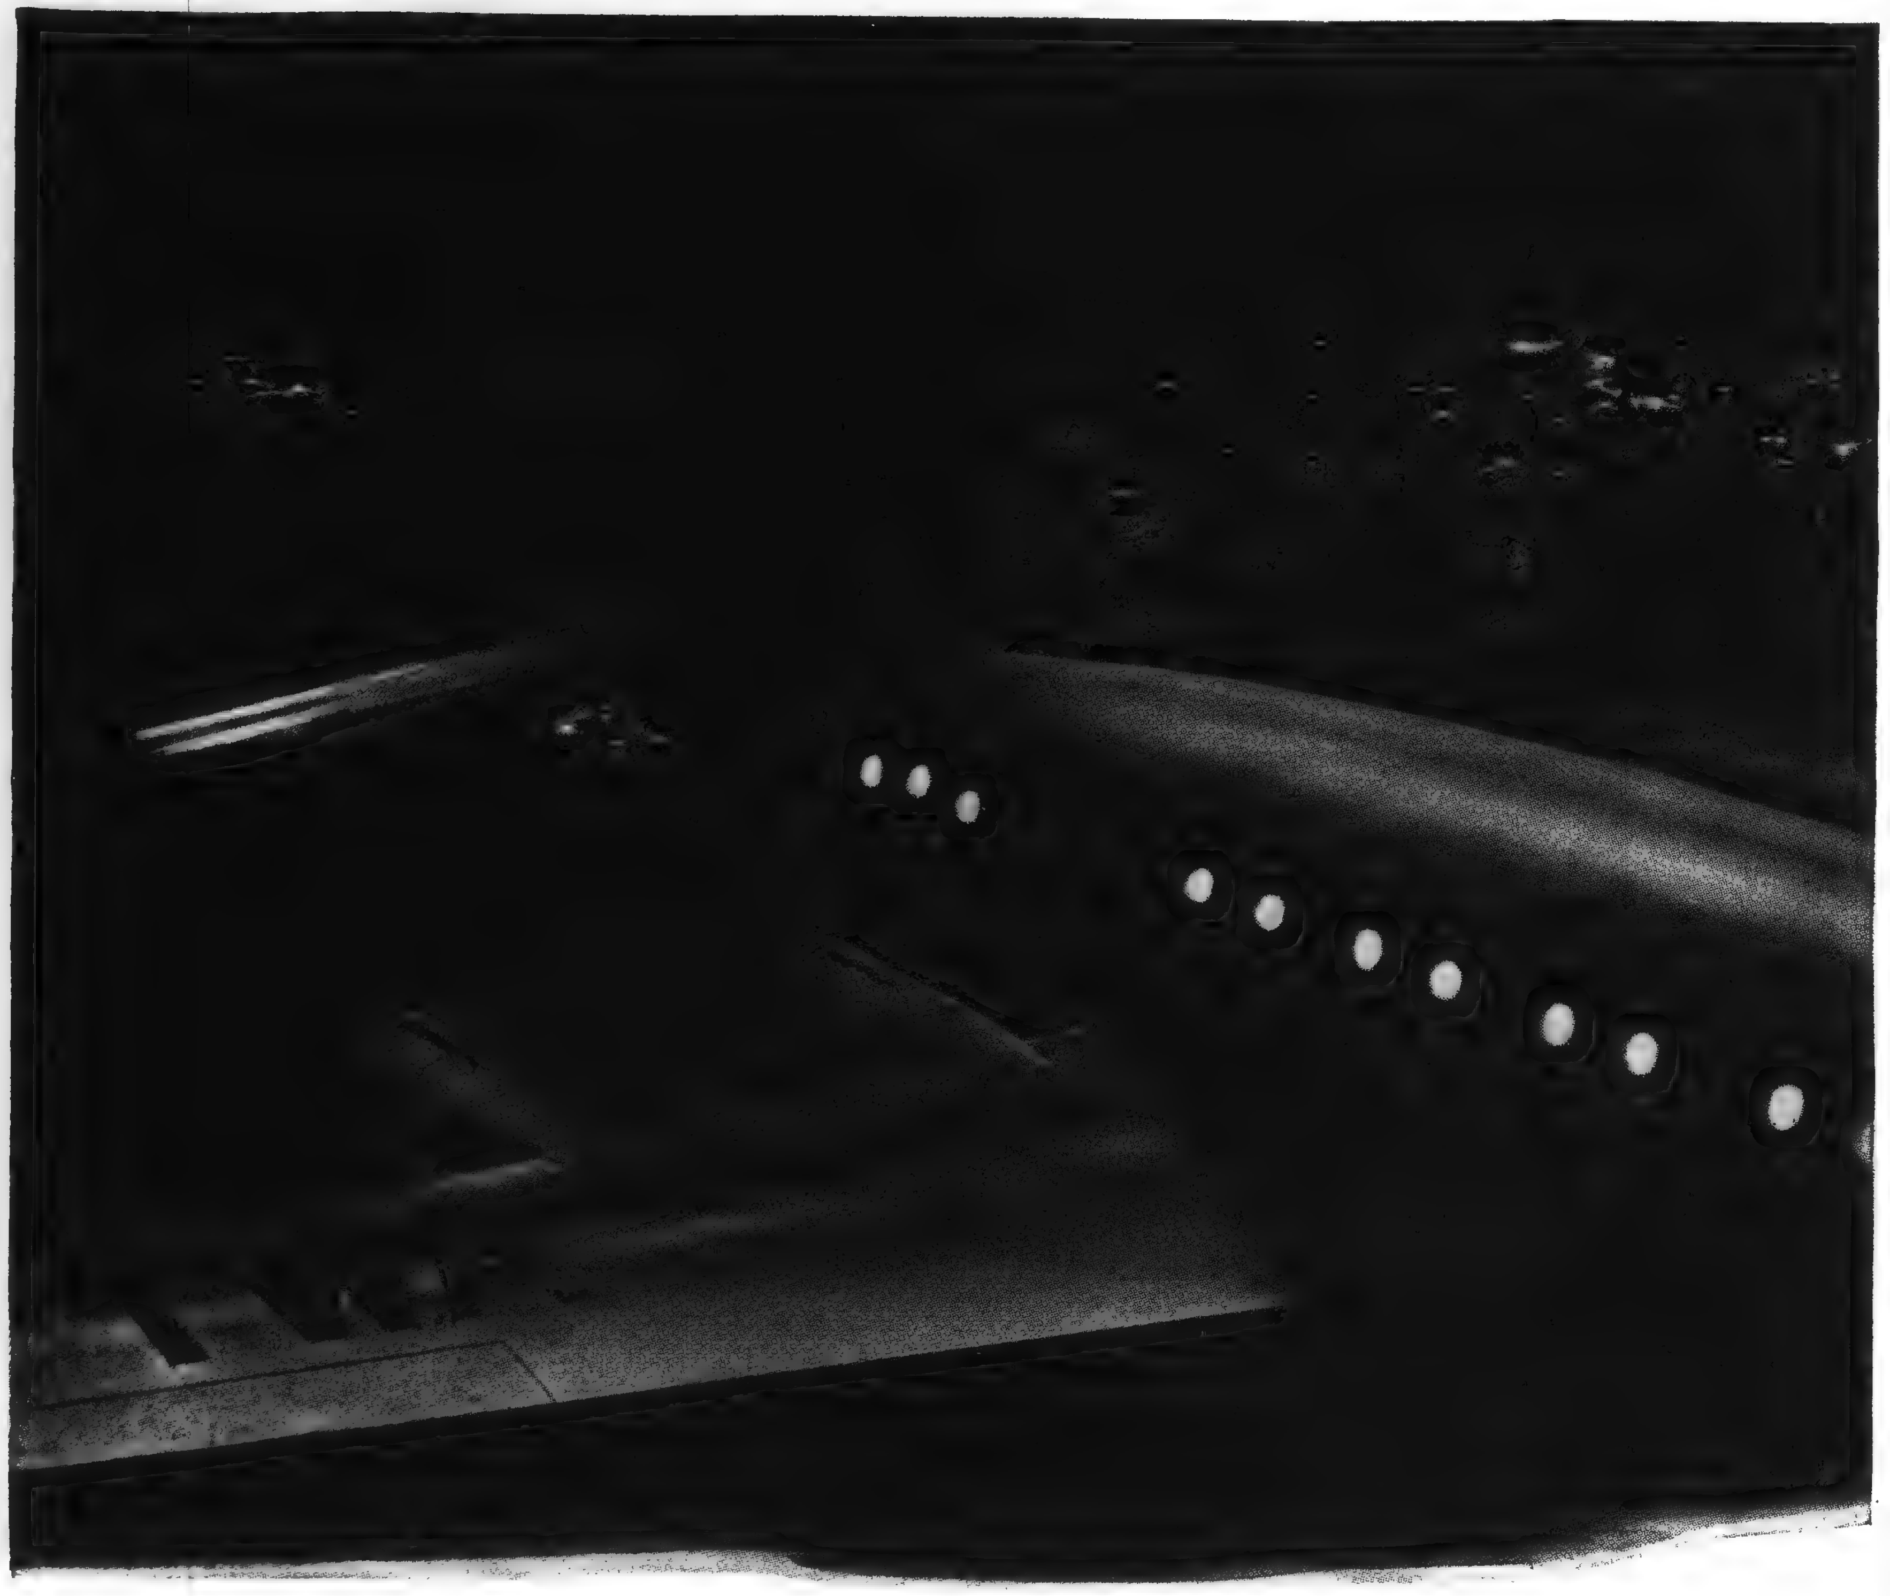
TIME

THE WEEKLY NEWSMAGAZINE

RUSSIA'S SERGEI PROKOFIEV

He keeps time with the Marxian metronome.

(Music)



The Trans-World Airline

IT'S A SHAME TO COME DOWN TO EARTH

There is one way of describing the goal we aim for in planning the service and conveniences of travel by TWA: When you reach your destination so refreshed and relaxed you feel it's a shame to come down to earth—then you've really had a taste of airline travel as TWA people strive to make it.

TWA POINTS THE WAY

International routes shown represent TWA's new trans-world system.

MUSIC

Composer, Soviet-Style

(See Cover)

In the Great Hall of the Moscow Conservatory, the intermission had just ended. It was exactly 9:30 p.m. A woman announcer in a black dress stepped to the platform. Said she: "In the name of the fatherland there will be a salute to the gallant warriors of the First Ukrainian front who have broken the defenses of the Germans—20 volleys of artillery from 224 guns." The dark days of Stalingrad were over; the Polish offensive of January 1945 had begun.

As she spoke, the first distant volley shook the hall. A lank, bald-headed man in white tie and tails, who bore a slight resemblance to U.S. Senator Robert Taft, mounted the podium and stood with bowed head, facing the Moscow State Philharmonic. He seemed to be counting off the rumbles of artillery. At the 20th, he raised his baton and began the world's première of his newest symphony. The bald-headed conductor was Russia's greatest living musician, Sergei Prokofiev.

Last week in Boston's Renaissance Symphony Hall, that same music, Prokofiev's Fifth, had its U.S. première. It was large in scale, a great, brassy creation with some of the intricate efficiency and dynamic energy of a Soviet power plant and some of the pastoral lyricism of a Chekhov countryside. The man who introduced it to the U.S., the Boston Symphony's famed Russian-born Sergei Koussevitsky, was ecstatic. He called the Fifth "the greatest musical event in many, many years. The greatest since Brahms and Tchaikovsky! It is magnificent! It is yesterday, it is today, it is tomorrow. . . . Prokofiev is the greatest musician today! Nobody else can write with such technical perfection, with such instrumentation. And all the time there is beautiful melody!"

Peter and the Wolves. Not all Boston's music-goers share Koussevitsky's enthusiasm for his fellow Russians—Prokofiev and Dmitri Shostakovich—but they respect his judgment. Koussevitsky rates 39-year-old Shostakovich as a great-composer-to-be and 54-year-old Prokofiev as a great composer who has already arrived.

It is for the charming little musical fairy tale, Peter and the Wolf, which he wrote to help children identify orchestral instruments, that Prokofiev is mainly known to the U.S. man in the street. He brought the piece to Koussevitsky, tartly recommending it as suitably infantile for Boston and its critics—who had severely panned his Fourth Symphony. Cinemactor Basil Rathbone and Actor-Singer Richard Hale as narrators have made recordings which are now perennial Christmas best-sellers. Last season it was played twelve times by U.S. symphony orchestras; it was also dance-timed by Guy Lombardo's Royal Canadians (TIME, Nov. 12). In U.S. phonograph-record sales—principally because of Peter and the Wolf—Prokofiev rates above Mozart, though far below Beethoven and Tchaikovsky.

In Russia even Prokofiev's longest works enjoy a mass popularity comparable to that of U.S. best-selling books. While Americans were listening to the Fifth last week, Moscow was awaiting the first performance of Ode to the End of the War, scored for an orchestra with no string section, but with eight harps and four grand pianos thrown in. While he was writing the Fifth, Prokofiev also turned out a new long ballet, Cinderella, an elaborate cinema score for Sergei Eisenstein's picture Ivan the Terrible (he had previously scored Eisenstein's Alexander Nevsky) and an ambitious opera based on Tolstoi's War and Peace.

Victor

PETER AND THE WOLF (ALBUM COVER)
The composer thought it was about Boston's speed.

Train of Thoughts. When a newsman asked Prokofiev what he was trying to say in his Fifth Symphony, Prokofiev answered: "It is about the spirit of man, his soul or something like that." The impatient, offhand answer was characteristic. Like most musicians, Prokofiev thinks his music should speak for itself.

He composes with the cold matter-of-factness of a mathematician, and keeps stacks of copybooks in which he hoards themes for use in future compositions. He jumps from bed to jot one down; they occur to him while taking walks, and especially while riding on trains, where he finds the metronomic clackety-click of the wheels a spur to composition. When he has saved up enough little scraps of melody, he works out an idea for a large composition to use them in. The Fifth Symphony was based on a two-years' accumulation; the actual writing took him only two months.

He works regularly between the hours of 10 and noon every day. When he is seriously at work he never listens to anybody else's music; he only goes to Moscow concerts when he is dry. He says he likes to listen to bad music, because it teaches him what faults to avoid in his own. He continually rewrites. Says he: "The moment a composer finds his language and says 'I've got it' he ceases to be interesting."

A Wide Reach. Tall (6 ft. 1 in.), gangling Sergei Sergeyevich Prokofiev has a clumsy, self-conscious appearance, and lanky, outsize hands which can stretch close to an octave and a half of piano keyboard. The scarecrow awkwardness is particularly apparent when he conducts: he bends only at the knees, so that he constantly seems in danger of toppling over. His idea of relaxation is a game of double solitaire, or of chess. When traveling in the U.S. he carried a miniature set of chessmen around in his pocket, always hopeful of finding someone he could beat. He neither drinks nor smokes, but found it hard during the war to do without candy.

Probably the least typical of all present-day Soviet composers, most of whom have never been outside the Russian wall, Prokofiev has spent a good deal of his career in France, England and the U.S., as a refugee from the Government he now helps to glorify. His father managed a big estate in the southern Russian village of Sontzovka. His mother, a pianist, brought him up on Beethoven and Chopin. Says precocious Prokofiev: "At six I wrote down myself a valse . . . and I composed a march for four hands when I was seven." By the time he was eight he was writing an opera in three acts and six tableaux. His parents, startled and impressed, packed him off to Moscow to study composition with a famous pedagogue and minor composer named Alexander Taneyev. At the St. Petersburg Conservatory, Prokofiev's

WANTED!
1,000,000 men with tough beards to accept my sensational 2 to 1 bet for Mennen Shave Cream against any other shave cream on the market today. Address Mr. W. G. Mennen.

Accept Today This 2 to 1 BET on Your Next Shave!

You Win .. when you buy Mennen Shave Cream! Either Mennen Shave Cream gives you a cleaner shave that keeps you presentable longer... or you get a handsome necktie that costs Mennen one dollar!

You Win .. either Mennen Shave Cream does everything we say—or mail us the empty carton with a letter of explanation and you'll get the necktie postpaid. What could be more fair, men?

Accept this sensational 2 to 1 bet—today!

Bet expires Jan. 19, 1946

MENNEN Shave Cream

- Lather Shave (Plain)
- Lather Shave (Menthol-Iced)
- Brushless (Tube or Jar)

Try MENNEN TALCUM for men... kills the face shine and doesn't show. It's America's favorite men's talcum.

dynamic and dissonant compositions got him the name of the "wild boy wonder." Pedagogue Taneyev, hearing some of the wild boy's music, murmured, "Good Lord! Am I responsible for this?"

When critics scorned his discordant Scythian Suite (1914). Prokofiev turned out the Classical Symphony, just to show them that he was also a master of the past. The Classical Symphony has remained one of his half-dozen most popular works.

Prokofiev, 23 when World War I broke out, was not caught in the Tsar's draft because he was a widow's only son. He and his mother fled Russia in 1918, after the Communist revolution. The officer who gave him his passport told Prokofiev: "You are revolutionary in art as we are in politics. You ought not to leave us now."

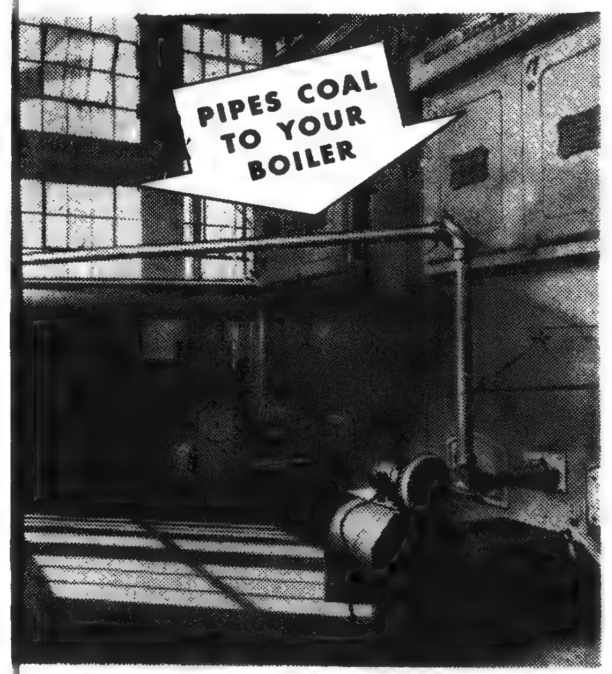
For Russian music, the Bolshevik revolution marked an esthetic as well as a political turning point. The late great Sergei Rachmaninoff left Russia, never to return. Igor (Le Sacre du Printemps) Stravinsky, who was already out of the country, has since lived in France and the U.S. A few older conservatives like Rheinold Glier and Nicolai Myaskovsky stayed on in the U.S.S.R., and came to satisfactory terms with the new Soviet regime. The post-revolutionary generation in which Dmitri Shostakovich grew up was not yet out of music school.

In Paris, Prokofiev and Koussevitsky, who had also fled Russia, strolled the boulevards, drank red wine and ate frogs' legs. Prokofiev's smart, barbaric ballet scores, written for Sergei Diaghilev's émigré Ballet Russe, were a Left Bank rage. Koussevitsky conducted Prokofiev music in what were called the "Concerts Koussevitsky."

In the late '20s, Prokofiev got homesick—or, as he put it, "I became convinced that the artist should not stray away from his native sources." To win Russia's sympathy, he wrote an Age of Steel ballet, using whirring strings and bleating trumpets to glorify life in a Soviet village. Raucous passages called The Factory and The Hammers so pleased the Communists that Prokofiev was warmly welcomed when he visited Russia on concert tours. In 1938, after 20 years of exile, he settled in Moscow again.

Sergei Prokofiev, a man of practical habits, had been a success under the Tsar; he was a success in exile; he is now a success in Soviet Russia.

Superfluous People. Prokofiev was a mature composer with a cosmopolitan background and a fully developed style when he returned. In the mid-'30s, Russia did not shoot but it did ostracize composers whose music did not keep time to the Marxian metronome. Prokofiev's first Soviet piece, Symphonic Song, was scorned by Russian critics for its "morbid resignation" and its "tendencies of urbanized lyricism." Wrote Soviet critic A. Ostretsov: "We do not dispute Prokofiev's right to reflect the emotional world of 'superfluous' people in the West, with their rottenness and putrefaction . . . but we do not share the . . . humanistic sympathy with these persons." Prokofiev apparently weighed and understood the demands of Russia's musical dictatorship. He learned not to deviate from the acceptable line.



How to get more heat from coal

Iron Fireman's advanced ngineering makes coal firing more efficient on Fireman stokers develop heat from al with maximum efficiency and regulate emselves through sensitive precision instruents. Heat is not wastefully released—it produced as needed. This means that tomatic controls, responding instantly to rying needs for heat or steam, regulate the te of combustion while holding the efficiency combustion within very close tolerances.

Many thousands of Iron Fireman users e able to show records of outstanding fuel vings because Iron Fireman makes coal eld usable heat rather than noke, soot and unconsumed ses. For example, Mr. arshall C. Stone, Vice resident of Pacolet Mfg. o., (textile mills), New olland, Georgia, says: "Our on Fireman reduced steam sts 32% and saved us $14,784 year."

Marshall C. Stone

The Iron Fireman engineering, sales d service organization, which covers the tion, is at your service. Write to Iron reman Manufacturing Co., 3721 West 6th St., Cleveland 11, Ohio. Other plants Portland, Oregon; Toronto, Canada.

IRON FIREMAN
Automatic Coal Stokers
PIPES COAL TO YOUR BOILER

Sovfoto

RIMSKY-KORSAKOV, MUSSORGSKY, TCHAIKOVSKY
The tradition is less than a century old.

Prokofiev is not so well known in the U.S. for the kind of superpatriotic melodrama that characterized Shostakovich's Leningrad and May Day symphonies. But he has written his share. In 1939, as a birthday present to his boss, he wrote a piece called Homage to Stalin. He also did a Cantata for the 20th Anniversary of the October Revolution, using words by Marx, Lenin and Stalin. Except for a Romeo and Juliet suite, nearly everything he has written in the U.S.S.R. has been built on Russian folk themes, and to glorify Russia's past and present. And his hard, brilliant, unsentimental, highly polished music had just the qualities the Bolsheviks liked. He soon became the most influential composer in Russia, and even non-Russians had to admit that no other composer in the world could match him in technical adroitness and flash.

When the Prokofievs had to leave Moscow during 1941, he went one way (to the Caucasus) and his wife and two sons, 20 and 16, another. He has been separated ever since from his wife, a Spanish singer named Lina Llubera whom he met on his first trip to Manhattan. Prokofiev now lives in a Moscow apartment with a tall, intense young writer named Mira Mendelssohn, who helped him on the libretto for War and Peace, the Tolstoyan opera which had its tryout last March. Stalin had promised to let Manhattan's Metropolitan Opera produce it, but after its Moscow première, War and Peace was hastily withdrawn for reworking. Soviet critics objected mostly to Mira's unwieldy text.

Income: "Plenty." The Soviet Government, which considers music as serious a subject as farming or factory work, has made high-grade musical composition a paying proposition. Soviet composers today are counted not only among the most respected but among the wealthiest citizens of the Soviet Union. Prokofiev, like a cautious capitalist, says of his income: "It is plenty."

Russia's music is systematically organized—from the mightiest flames of Russian creative inspiration down to the low-

Steichen, Ralph Crane, Sovfoto

RACHMANINOFF, STRAVINSKY, SHOSTAKOVICH
One stayed, two strayed.

"How much living will you do after 59?"

A man in his thirties, if he thinks of it at all, will not be much concerned about his sixtieth birthday, or those beyond.

Actually, however, the chances are that he will not only be alive at sixty, but very much interested in life and living.

Statistics show that out of 10,000 men who buy life insurance around the age of 35, more than 64% will be alive at the age of 65 while slightly over 34% will live to see their 75th birthday.

These facts speak for themselves. They are concrete proof that it is wise for every man in the prime of life to think long and hard about a sound retirement program.

It is not easy for the man in average circumstances to lay aside money for his retirement. One good way to do it is through life insurance. In this way, you provide protection for your family while saving for the time when your working days are over.

Any John Hancock agent will be glad to show you exactly how you can make your life insurance do this double job. Let him help you work out an insurance program fitted to your personal needs and income.

Consult your John Hancock representative freely—both before and after you take out any life insurance policy His experience in fitting the many benefits of insurance to each individual's particular needs can help you get more value out of every dollar you invest in life insurance

An 80-year-old mutual life insurance company serving over 7,500,000 policyholders.

John Hancock MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY OF BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS
GUY W. COX
Chairman of the Board
PAUL F. CLARK
President

liest tuba spit valve. A Soviet bureau called Glavnoe Musicalno Pravelenya (Glavmus for short) spends over 6,000,000 rubles a year ($1,200,000) keeping Soviet composers well-fed and commissioning them to write operas and symphonies. It even runs a "composers' country house" at Ivanovo, about 100 kilometers from Moscow, where all good Russian composers go in the summertime. One of Russia's top composers, Armenian-born Aran Khachaturian, calls it "an institution for the production of masterpieces and pigs."

The estate has 66 cows, 8,000 chickens and ducks, 135 pigs, and room for 20 composers. In the main building the composers eat, sleep, loaf and criticize each other's music. Nearby are five dachas, or cottages, where each composer can lock himself in to work in privacy. There, during the past two summers, Shostakovich finished his Eighth Symphony, Khachaturian, his Second, and Prokofiev finished his Fifth and began his Sixth. Prokofiev worked in a glassed-in verandah—containing couch, grand piano, chair and table—overlooking a pond where Ivanovo village kids swim.

Prokofiev's music, like everybody else's in Soviet Russia, has to be okayed first by his fellow composers in a private "sitting," before it can be played in public. The sittings were pretty rough during the 1936-37 purge of "formalism" in music—which meant an end to fancy musical tricks that the masses could not understand. Shostakovich was a prime target, and Prokofiev caught a few glancing blows. Now, considering that at one sitting rival composers can make or break a year's work by one of their colleagues, the sessions are fairly harmonious. Fellow members, regarding another's work in the communal spirit, can tell him he has been composing too many chamber works, and should change his pace. Prokofiev's Fifth Symphony was commissioned (the going price for symphonies: from 8,000 rubles up, plus performance bonuses) after his fellows decided that, since his last symphony was written in 1930, it was high time for another.

At first Prokofiev, the ex-émigré, was held suspect by the others, but the industry with which he turned out marching songs and heroic legends during the war, despite recent stretches of illness, seems to have proved his musical patriotism. Says Khachaturian: "He has behaved like a real Soviet citizen."

Aggressive Rhythms. Whether Glavmus is getting its money's worth in quality is for future generations to judge. But of its stimulating effect on quantity production there can be no doubt. Since 1939, recognized Soviet composers have written more than 66 symphonies, 46 operas, 22 ballets, 150 orchestral suites, fantasies and overtures, 40 cantatas, 400 smaller choral works and 150 quartets, quintets and other chamber music. Much of it is pretty uniform in style: restless, intensely energetic music, full of theatrical climaxes and aggressive rhythms, as cannily construct-

Buy Victory Bonds!
BLADES– Plentiful Now!
RAZORS... Very Soon
Schick Injector
BLADE CORNER GUARDS
SOLID GUIDE BAR
SCHICK

THE RAZOR THAT WON

this dramatic test of loyalty

- Back in 1942 all of our production of Schick Blades went to our fighting men. Hundreds of thousands of civilians had no choice but to lay aside their Schick Injector Razors and use some other type of razor on the market. That condition lasted for almost a year!

THE CHALLENGE

Then Schick Blades became available again in 1943, and the Schick Injector Razor was put to a crucial test—a test probably unequalled in all razor history. Would the hundreds of thousands who had been forced to use other razors now keep on with these razors? Or—now that Schick Blades were again plentiful—would they return to the Schick Injector Razor?

THE COME-BACK

The answer to that question was the most convincing proof of razor appeal ever offered!

The Schick Injector Razors—forced into retirement a year before—were put back to work—almost to a man! We know because Schick Blade sales climbed back to pre-war levels within a few short months. A dramatic answer to a most dramatic test!

PLENTY OF SCHICK BLADES AT DEALERS BUT—

All the Schick Injector Razors we can produce are still going to the armed forces. We expect to resume civilian production shortly—so in a few months your store will have one for you. Then we hope you, too, will try the razor that passed the supreme test of razor loyalty.

THE EXCLUSIVE SHAVING ADVANTAGES MEN COULDN'T FORGET

AUTOMATIC BLADE CHANGE . . . A pull and push on the Injector shoots out old blade, slides in fresh one instantly. Nothing to take apart or reassemble. No fumbling with sharp edges or paper wrappers.

SOLID GUIDE BAR . . . has a sure-grip surface that stretches and flattens the skin just ahead of the blade. Makes whiskers pop up for closer, more comfortable shave. Corner guards protect against nicking and scraping.

DOUBLE-THICK BLADES . . . twice as thick as ordinary blades, 3 times as thick as paper-thin ones. Take and hold a really keen edge. Oil-packed in special cartridge, their cutting edges are suspended in space.

Schick Injector RAZOR

MAGAZINE REPEATING RAZOR COMPANY, BRIDGEPORT 1, CONN check these LOW INSURANCE RATES you'll find you really can afford to carry $10,000 of life insurance

Age	Monthly Rate Per $1000
20	$ .92
25	1.01
30	1.15
35	1.32
40	1.58
45	1.94
50	2.48

● Here is a long-term policy that protects you for the expectancy of life based on your age, according to the American Experience Table of Mortality. It has cash and loan values. Rates quoted apply to standard risks.

At age 35, a $10,000 policy costs you only $13.20 per month and will, should you die during the expectancy period, pay your beneficiary $10,000 or a monthly income for life. This low cost policy cannot be issued in amounts less than $2,500. Write today for full details.

THE LINCOLN NATIONAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY
FORT WAYNE 1, INDIANA

More Than One And Three-Quarters Billion Dollars Of Insurance In Force

MAIL THIS COUPON TODAY

Mailing this coupon involves no obligation. So act now—send for full information about this low-cost policy. Even slight delay may cause an advance in your insurance age and increase the rate you pay.

THE LINCOLN NATIONAL LIFE INSURANCE CO.
Dept. T-511, Fort Wayne 1, Indiana
Please send me full details about your Low Cost Plan, which provides ample protection at low cost.

Name __________
Address __________
City __________
State __________ Date of Birth __________

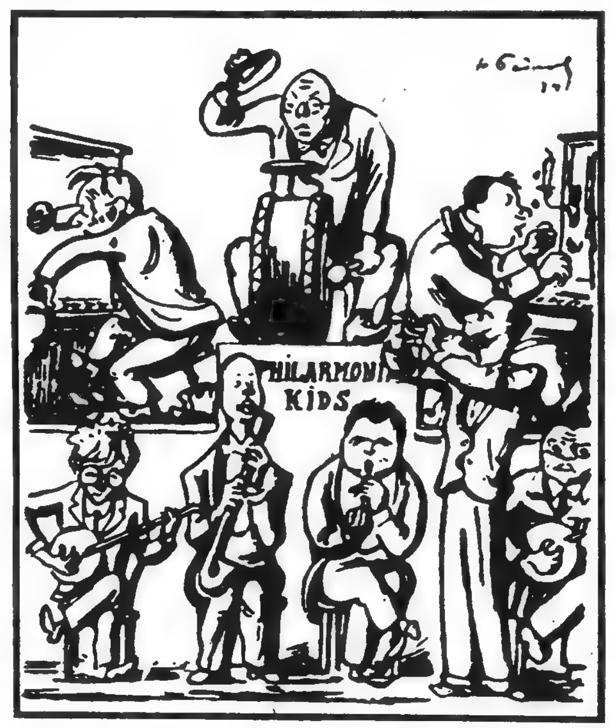
ed, and at its worst about as emotionally appealing, as a linotype.

Russia's musical tradition is still less than a century old: the "father" of Russian music, Michael Ivanovitch Glinka, died in 1857. Yet it already boasts some of music's most famous names—such pre-Soviet romantics as Tchaikovsky, Mussorgsky, Borodin, Rimsky-Korsakov. The younger Soviet composers are generally more gifted and expert than those of the U.S., less jaded than those of Western Europe. Western Europe's only living first-raters, Germany's Richard Strauss and Finland's Jan Sibelius, are aged men whose best work is already a generation old.

The Soviet's musical powerhouse works like a group of high-pressure advertising men, efficiently turning out a commodity of proved effectiveness. One of their main jobs is to advertise the Soviet Union and Soviet culture to the rest of the world. How well that job has been done can be judged from the worldwide fame of Composers Prokofiev and Shostakovich.



N. Radlov-Sovfoto

U.S. INFLUENCE ON RUSSIAN MUSIC*
Urbanized lyricism is not encouraged.

Cold Garrets & Warm Music. A considerable amount of immortal music has been written in cold garrets, with an empty larder in the background. Richard Wagner and Felix Mendelssohn lived comfortable lives, but Mozart, after a life of penny-counting, was buried in an unmarked pauper's grave, and Franz Schubert sold his songs for as little as 20¢. Nearly all the great composers have been men of intensely religious or mystical rather than materialistic temperament.

So far, Soviet Russia's bright new music, for all its brilliant streamlining, has conspicuously lacked the heart-warming, human quality—the "humanistic sympathy" so despised by Communists—that earns great symphonies and operas the love of succeeding generations. But the commissars of Glavmus, looking westward, can well ask where better symphonies and operas are being written today.

---

* From a 1934 Communist cartoon. On the saxophone, Prokofiev; on his right, Shostakovich.

[35]

MUSIC

Prokofieff's Voice Is Cosmopolitan; His Theme Is the Spirit of Russia

In his Moscow apartment last week, Serge Prokofieff fidgeted restlessly. His latest composition, "Ode on the End of the War," had been finished only the week before, too late for adequate rehearsals—and, so, too late for its scheduled performance at the Bolshoi Theater on the eve of the "October Holidays" (see page 44). Prokofieff had reason to be fretful. Last winter he slipped in the street and suffered a concussion. Because of recurring headaches and high blood pressure, his doctors ordered him to bed and limited him to one hour a day of musical composition. Hence his delay in finishing the "Ode" and hence its postponement.

However,, had it been possible, Prokofieff could have been gratified in Boston last week instead of fretful in Moscow. For in Boston, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony presented the Western Hemisphere première of Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony, a work which was given its world première to Moscow last January.

The Fifth is the first purely symphonic work Prokofieff has written since the Boston Symphony commissioned his Fourth to celebrate the orchestra's 50th anniversary in 1930. Prokofieff could ask for no better interpreter than Koussevitzky. The Russian-American conductor has sponsored him ever since Prokofieff's modernism scandalized pre-revolutionary St. Petersburg 35 years ago. Later "Koussie" helped introduce him to the Paris of the early '20s, and he has performed twenty of Prokofieff's works in Boston.

And "Koussie" could feel an additional satisfaction in the new Fifth. Hearing some time ago that score sheets were scarce in Russia, he had thousands of them sent over. When Prokofieff's new symphony arrived, it was scored on paper Koussevitzky had sent.

Although Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony fell on Boston with a dull thud, the Fifth made an instant impression—and few audiences are less easily impressed than are the ladies of Boston when they assemble for the Friday-afternoon meetings with their Muse. Whoever listens to this symphony—and Koussevitzky has scheduled seven additional performances of it outside Boston—will want to hear it again. The witty inventions associated with Prokofieff's familiar Classical Symphony are there in brilliant abundance, but present also is an emotional tension far removed from the jests of his concertos, the fantasy of "Peter and the Wolf," or the theatrical effectiveness of film scores like "Alexander Nevsky." The Fifth was written during the war, in the summer of 1944, and it shows it.

"I strove to write music which was supremely human," Prokofieff wrote. "It is a symphony about the spirit of man." One cannot miss, however, that this is a very Russian man. But, where Dmitri Shostakovich would have made him a common man, Prokofieff has made him a cosmopolitan.

Citizen at Large: This difference in viewpoint could easily symbolize the differences between Russia's two greatest present-day composers. As a willing product of the revolution, Shostakovich became, during the war years, the Voice of Soviet Russia. He wrote music that was keyed to the times—overwritten and excessively sentimental, but nonetheless full of an emotional impact not to be denied. The U.S.S.R. may live to rue a Molotoff; it could not miss with a Shostakovich.

Sovfoto

Prokofieff calls on his musical brain cells for extracurricular effort

Prokofieff, however, speaks with a different voice. His meaning is international. Prokofieff was a vital force in modern music twenty years ago. Unlike the men with whom he was compared at that time —Igor Stravinsky, Arnold Schöenberg, the late Béla Bartók, Paul Hindemith, and Darius Milhaud—he did not feel compelled to leave his first environment and emigrate to the United States when totalitarianism overwhelmed the old world. Though he worked in Paris, toured the world, and had been to this country several times, he voluntarily returned to Russia but remained as potent and respected an influence in international music society as ever.

This man who so successfully bridged the gap between effete Paris and revolutionary Russia is, in appearance and emotion, Russian to the core. His extraordinarily large bald head, protruding lips, long thin neck, and long, long arms make him a natural for caricaturists. Of his background, he once wrote: "I was born in the village of Sontzovka, in the Ekaiterinoslav government, which is now in the Dniepropetrov district, at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, on April 11, 1891, according to the old style, which corresponds to April 23, new style. My father was director of the estate of the Sontzovs . . . My mother played the piano rather well, chiefly Beethoven and Chopin, and this gave me a taste for serious music from my youngest years."

When Prokofieff saw that the revolution was there to stay, he left Russia in 1918—by the simple expedient of applying for a passport and getting it. He did not return until a brief visit in 1927 convinced him that he was not considered as a suspicious émigré but as an honored and respected Soviet citizen at large. In 1934, he decided to go back home for good, although he did tour the United States again in 1937 and 1938—returning to Russia with such capitalistic luxuries as a Ford car and a nine-tube radio.

Srg Prkfff at Play: Since his return to his homeland, Prokofieff has been extremely prolific—especially in the fields of film and theatrical music. His five-act ballet "Cinderella" is planned for a première in a few weeks and, although his score for an opera based on Tolstoi's "War and Peace" has been sung publicly a few times, the world still waits and wonders how such a monumental undertaking could possibly be staged.

Though Prokofieff's style has remained as unique as ever, his canvas is much broader and his pen sweeter. Anyone who now charges that the big Russian writes brilliant music for merely brilliance's sake picks a fight—and Serge Sergeivich was never one to spare his tongue in sarcasm.

Prokofieff the man is also practical and hard to best in a bargain, especially when it comes to exploiting himself. He is meticulously neat, painfully punctual, and has a method for everything. When he lived in Paris, he and eleven friends would play bridge from 3 p.m. until 2 a.m. in his crowded and smoky apartment near Les Invalides. For these sessions, he even devised a graph to show the relative position of each player at every phase of the game. When he writes post cards, he usually saves space by omitting all vowels. Friends, therefore, hear from him as Srg Prkfff.

Prokofieff has two sons, neither of whom is especially interested in music. One of them, however, inherits his father's great passion for chess—a passion which might have brought Prokofieff fame in Russia if he had not concentrated on music instead. In 1940 the composer commented: "In general, work goes very well these days—if it weren't for chess. But I must forget chess for a while. Music comes first and it is not easy to combine the two. I am convinced that the same brain cells work while playing chess as while composing."

Which is probably why Prokofieff is extra fretful these days in Moscow. Not only does poor health limit this hard-working, prolific composer to one hour of composition a day. Chess has been barred altogether.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 22 1945

SIBELIUS HONORED AT CONCERT HERE

Composer's 80th Birthday Is Occasion for Gala Program Featuring His Symphonies

By NOEL STRAUS

A concert devoted to works by Jean Sibelius was presented last night in Carnegie Hall in honor of the Finnish composer's eightieth birthday. The gala event was sponsored by prominent American and Finnish residents of this city, and the proceeds will be used for the relief of the children of Finland. In the large audience which came to pay tribute to the veteran master was Kalle T. Jutila, Finnish Minister to the United States, who was attended by Sigurd von Numers, counselor, and Olavi Munkki, secretary, of the Legation.

The program, performed by ninety members of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, with Karin Branzell, contralto, as soloist, was directed by Simon Parmet, Finnish conductor, who made his American debut. He had chosen for the occasion Sibelius' First and Sixth symphonies, the ever-popular "Finlandia," and three of the composer's songs, "The Diamond on the March Snow," "The North" and "Was It A Dream," given with orchestral accompaniment.

Sixth Symphony Heard

After playing the national anthems of this country and Finland, Mr. Parmet opened the concert with a presentation of the most seldom heard of Sibelius' symphonies, the Sixth. Despite the fact that this work ranks as one of its composer's most estimable creations, it has had but two previous performances in this city, both of which were given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, who attended last night's concert.

The Sixth symphony is scored like the better-known Fourth symphony of Sibelius, but with the addition of a bass clarinet and harps, which rob it of any bleakness and lend it a special character all its own among the composer's seven compositions in the genre. The music, largely in the Dorian mode, has nothing of the heroic, elemental nature of the First symphony, played later in the evening, and is much lighter in its orchestration.

Exceedingly firmly knit, the symphony is based entirely on a couple of germinal motifs stated in the introduction of the opening movement, and is a masterpiece of construction. It demands a great deal of finesse and restraint for the proper interpretation of its four movements if its pastoral mood is to be eloquently established and maintained.

Too Much Energy

On the contrary, Mr. Parmet accorded the content a heavy-handed unfoldment, favoring thick, opaque sonorities and floods of tone that left the real message of the opus in obscurity. There was more energy than subtlety in his treatment of the score. The balance of tone was often so ill-adjusted that in the canon for harp and flute in the scherzo the strings were permitted to make such a din that the harp part was completely inaudible, and this was but one of many such muddy passages. Delicate pianissimi were never achieved, and the whole work, if not without intensity, all sounded noisy, without mood, and with little differentiation of any sort between the various movements. Because the "Finlandia" could better endure under this sort of approach, it fared better, being enthusiastically projected, though it also was without any marked light and shade.

The songs, for which Mr. Parmet had composed the able orchestral support, were not on a par with the symphonic offerings, Sibelius not being at his best in lyrics of this kind. They also received overweighty handling by the orchestra, and as a result Miss Branzell sang them so consistently with rich, full voice that there was not much contrast of any sort in the interpretations.

During the concert, Prof. Douglas Steere of Haverford College, just returned from Finland on a mission on behalf of the American Friends Service Committee, made an address in which he read a message from Sibelius stating his pleasure at the tribute accorded him and his appreciation of the help being granted his country.

This Clipping From
N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

NOV 28 1945

SYMPHONIC FESTIVAL COMMITTEES PLANNED

G. Churchill Francis Attends Pittsfield Meeting

G. Churchill Francis, treasurer of the North Adams Savings bank, yesterday attended a luncheon-meeting in Pittsfield at which plans were made establishing committees in different Berkshire county towns and cities to assist the Berkshire Symphonic festival for the Boston Symphony orchestra. A new organization was made necessary when the Berkshire Symphonic association disbanded.

Mr. Francis left Pittsfield for Boston, where he will remain until Friday on a business trip, and the North Adams committee will not be announced until after his return.

RED HOOK, N.Y.
ADVERTISER
11/29/45

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO HAVE BERKSHIRE ADVISORY GROUP

LENOX, Mass.—The organization of an honorary committee to function in Berkshire County in an advisory capacity representative of different business and other interests, has been proposed by Henry B. Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Invitations to serve have been issued to some of the proposed members, who have been asked to attend a luncheon at the Wendell-Sheraton Tuesday.

Among those who will attend the meeting will be George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, who will be prepared to review with the committee the Tanglewood festival and school plans. With such a committee in the locale of the annual festival, it is expected that the Boston office may be kept informed as to conditions to the advantage of both the orchestra and the festival. The committee also will be kept informed as to the activities of the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

NOV 30 1945

Koussevitzky To Conduct Concert Here

Boston Symphony To Play at Mosque On Tuesday Night

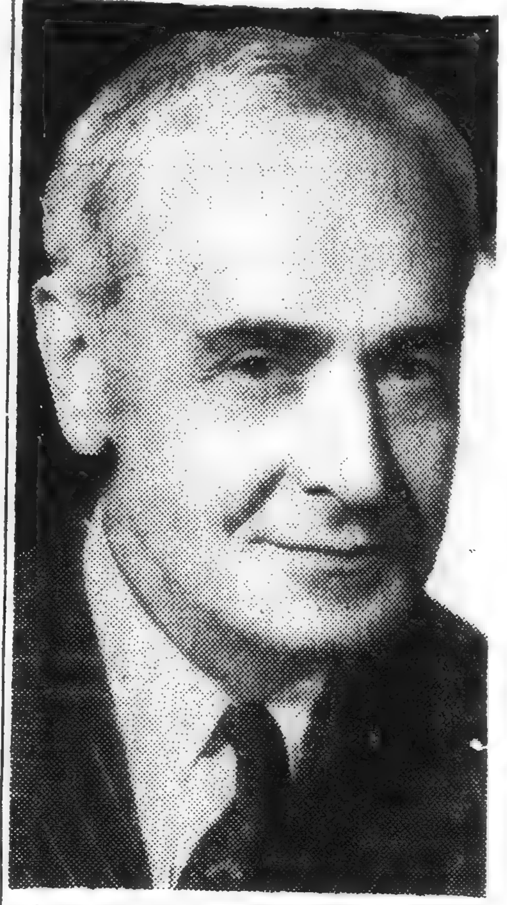
The Boston Symphony Orchestra which celebrates its sixty-fifth anniversary this season will appear in Pittsburgh for one concert, Tuesday night at Syria Mosque, under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who has led the Boston Orchestra for more than a quarter of its history, will conduct the program which includes Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony, which had its American premiere November 9 in Boston; Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, and the Brahms Fourth Symphony in E Minor.

The Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra's first of three "Concerts for Children" this season will be presented Saturday afternoon, December 15, at Carnegie Music Hall, under the direction of Vladimir Bakaleinikoff. A demonstration of string instruments will be featured. The symphony's assistant concertmaster, Julius Schulman, will be soloist in a performance of "Zigeunerweisen" by Sarasate.

The program will include Wolf-Ferrari's overture to "The Secret of Suzanne," Tschaikowsky's adagio movement from "Swan Lake," Glinka's "Kamarinskaya," Boccherini's "Minuet," and Johann Strauss' "Blue Danube." Two Christmas songs, "Silent Night" and "Oh, Come All Ye Faithful," will also be played.

Famed Conductor To Appear Here



DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in Syria Mosque Tuesday night under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association.

This Clipping From
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

NOV 27 1945

Announcement has been made that the Berkshire Festivals will be resumed next year on a pre-war scale. The opening date has been announced as July 25 and three concerts weekly are scheduled for Thursdays, Saturdays and Sundays.

The board of trustees has voted to give the Music Shed at Tanglewood to the Boston Symphony orchestra. The one proviso is that first preference of seats shall go to patrons of the past who bought them through the festival managemen. If the orchestra discontinues the summer concerts, the ownership of the shed would revert to the festival organization.

This Clipping From
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

NOV 25

Boston Orchestra to Play Early Here

THE Boston symphony orchestra will return to the Milwaukee Auditorium on Dec. 8 for a concert sponsored by the Arion club. As was the case in its concert last year, the Boston orchestra will be on a nation-wide network for Allis-Chalmers when it plays, and so the concert will begin at 7:30 p. m. Listeners at the Auditorium are expected to be seated well before 7:30.

Serge Koussevitsky will conduct a program that will include two works of Sibelius, in honor of the Finnish composer's eightieth birthday, which occurs Dec. 8. These works are the familiar "Finlandia" and the second symphony.

The program also will include a "Romeo and Juliet" suite of Prokofieff, the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovanstchina," and the Rimsky-Korsakov "Capriccio Espagnol."

This Clipping From
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
DAILY TIMES

NOV 29 1945

Finn Conductor, Serkin Pupil in Twilight Concert

Finns from throughout the northwest will be in Minneapolis Sunday for the celebration of the eightieth birthday of their noted countryman, Jan Sibelius, at a special twilight concert by the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra at Northrop Auditorium at 4:30 p. m.

Featured will be two works by the composer, Finlandia and the ever popular Symphony No. 2, in D major. As guest conductor, a close and intimate friend of the composer's will be on the podium. He is Tauno Hannikainen, permanent conductor of the Helsinki Symphony Orchestra, who now is conducting the Duluth Symphony. Guest artist will be the talented young Viennese pianist, Hilde Somer, who is a special pupil of Rudolf Serkin's.

Hilde Somer

Hannikainen

Hannikainen was born in Finland in 1896 and studied music at the Sibelius Academy at Helsinki. He completed his musical education in Helsinki, Paris, Berlin and Vienna and then concertized as a 'cellist throughout Europe. He was appointed conductor of the Helsinki Orchestra in 1941 and then came to this country at the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky to conduct several concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston Symphony Enthusiasts Are Anxious To Hear Koussevitzky Treatment of Brahms

BY ELMORE BACON

This Clipping From CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

DEC 1 - 1945

THE distinguished Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony pay Cleveland an annual visit at Music Hall Wednesday night. Which, with Vladimir Golschman guest directing the Cleveland Orchestra in his second pair of concerts with William Kapell as piano soloist, and Dr. Rudolph Ringwall presenting an all-Russian music Twilight Concert tomorrow, provides plenty of symphonic atmosphere for the week.

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony has won a definite place in the hearts of Cleveland symphony enthusiasts. And there's much interest in the Koussevitzky treatment of the Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E Minor op. 98, that he is to present at Music Hall Wednesday night. The famous Boston director definitely will be here, he has assured Mrs. Emil Brudno who manages this Civic Concert Association series.

The program opens with the Mozart E Flat Symphony No. 39 K543 and includes the Beethoven Third Leonore Overture.

Kapell

William Kapell, youthful exponent of the keyboard and Russian music, makes his bow here with the Cleveland Orchestra Thursday night playing the much-heralded piano concerto by Khatchatourian. In his twenties, Kapell created a stir in New York on his appearance with the Philharmonics there, won a three season solo contract with the Philadelphia Orchestra and appeared seven times in one season with the Boston Symphony. The Armenian concerto was featured by him,

The Tschaikowsky Fantasy "Francesca da Rimini" and the Schonberg "Verklarte Nachte" close the program, which opens with Siloti's arrangement of the Vivaldi Concerto for Orchestra and Organ.

Twilight

The Twilight Concert tomorrow at Severance Hall at 3:30 presents the Cleveland Orchestra in a program of highly melodious Russian music.

Opening with the Kabalevsky Overture to "Colas Breugnon," it includes the lovely Classical Symphony by Prokofieff, the clever Scherzo from the Shostakovich Fifth Symphony, the charming "Music Box" by Liadoff, the Moussorgsky "Gopak," "The Young Prince and the Young Princess," from "Scheherazade," and the Polovetzian Dances.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Post. Dec. 1, '45

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Still determined to be heard in the most familiar music, Paul Paray, guest-conductor from Paris, chose Beethoven's Fifth for the major item on this week's Symphony program. There was also the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto, with Mischa Elman as soloist, but one suspects that Mr. Paray had no voice in that particular matter—that Mr. Elman and the concerto were there already. What is more, however well acquainted the conductor may be with Tchaikovsky's music, he showed little sympathy for it yesterday, concerning himself mainly in following Mr. Elman and keeping the orchestra together.

Beethoven, however, suited Mr. Paray. As one who esteems clarity above color and prizes lucidity above lushness, he gave a fine exposition of the first two movements of the Symphony.

Two slight French pieces, both of them transcriptions, made the end: Ravel's orchestral version of his "Pavane for a Dead Infanta" and Mottl's of Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque." The Pavane was beautifully set forth and Mr. Paray made the most both of the Bourree's subtle rhythms and of its irony. The audience was cordially disposed.

MUSIC

Dec 1

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Paul Paray conducting, gave the eighth program of its 65th season in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Mischa Elman, violinist, was the soloist. The program:

Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67 . . . Beethoven Concerto for Violin in D major, Op. 35 . . . Tchaikovsky
"Pavane pour une Infante defunte" . . Ravel
Bourree Fantasque . . . . Chabrier-Mottl

By RUDOLPH ELIE, Jr.

Yesterday's program rather followed the law of diminishing returns, growing weaker as it went along and finally fading out almost entirely with Chabrier's routine Bourree Fantasque which is neither much of a bourree nor especially fantastic. It was a little too bad, too, that the concert failed to turn us out into the snow at a suitable temperature, because Paul Paray's conducting throughout clinched the striking impression he made last week.

Of course it would have been better if they had done it the other way around, beginning with the Chabrier and ending with the Beethoven, but I suppose the radio situation prevented that. In any case, it was definitely Beethoven's day, the Fifth Symphony in M. Paray's unique conception of it taking win, place and show.

What he does with it is give it back its heart and soul. He is not so much interested in its exterior aspects. Its outward appearance is less important to him than its inward; the room is a little untidy, but you know its closets are immaculate. And although he projects its emotional thunder, you are very sure that it is Beethoven's own thunder, not his.

He does it as a closely-knit unit, which is to say each movement is a perfect entity and so is the symphony itself, yet he does do curious things with the tempo here and there. Sometimes there is a sense of halting, of gathering, of suspended animation. In the famous transition from the scherzo to the finale, it makes your scalp tingle a little; in other places you're not so sure you are with him. On the whole, it was a reading of great clarity and strength, and certainly proved that M. Paray has the measure of the giants.

It is hard to know what to say about the Tchaikovsky or about Mr. Elman for playing it. Apparently, after the Martinu last year, he wanted to show us how he sounded in a juicy composition, which is perfectly all right, but it didn't need to be quite so juicy as this. It is, you must admit, a distinctly overwrought violin concerto strictly for debuts at pop concerts (and I don't mean our Pop concerts, either). To be sure it is very hard to play, although Mr. Elman with his incredible technical accomplishments doesn't make it seem so, and the result, as poor Monsieur Jourdain puts it in "The Would-be Gentleman," is "never did such low thoughts soar so high." Splendidly accompanied by the orchestra under M. Paray (who is obviously a wizard as a concerto leader), Mr. Elman achieved what I prefer to believe was a tribute to his playing, not his choice of music.

The only other notable aspect of the concert was the all too brief horn solo of Mr. Valkenier in Ravel's fragrant "Pavane pour une Infante defunte," which would have seemed much better if it had been the prelude to the concert, not one of the postludes. The orchestra is on tour next week and will return on the 14th to do Prokofief's Fifth again as well as the "Emperor" Concerto with Alexander Borovsky as soloist.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

Boston Symphony To Honor Sibelius

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will commemorate the 80th birthday of Jan Sibelius when it broadcasts next Saturday from Milwaukee. During the ABC program a message will be read from the composer, who resides in his native Finland.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, announced at the beginning of the year that he would honor Sibelius during the season by playing all of his symphonies and many of his tone poems. The climax comes on his birthday, Dec. 8, when the orchestra will play his Symphony No. 2 and "Finlandia," two of his best-known works.

This Clipping From
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

DEC - 2 1945

A camera study of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (left), eminent conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, playing here Dec. 8.

This Clipping From
JACKSON, TENN.
SUN

DEC 2 - 1945

Boston Symphony To Pay Visit To Milwaukee

Paying its annual visit to the home of its sponsor, Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co., the Boston Symphony Orchestra will commemorate the 80th birthday of Jan Sibelius when it appears in Milwaukee on Saturday, December 8. The weekly broadcast over WTJS-ABC at 8:30-9:30 p. m. will have several notable features.

Mayor John L. Bohn will greet the orchestra and announce preliminary plans for Milwaukee's observance next year of the centennial of its founding.

During the program, also, a message will be read from Sibelius, still residing in his native Finland. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, announced at the beginning of the year that he would fete the Finnish composer during the season by playing all of his symphonies and many of his tone poems. The climax, coming on his birthday, December 8, will find the Symphony No. 2 and "Finlandia," probably his two best known works, on the program.

Expressing his appreciation, Sibelius sent the following cablegram, which will be read:

"I am happy and proud of the appreciation given to my art in mighty America. I send my kindest regards to all of the friends of my music."

In 1935, when Sibelius' 70th birthday was observed in Finland, Dr. Koussevitzky was given the honor of opening a "Sibelius Festival" in Helsinki, which the composer attended. As a result of the festival, Dr. Koussevitzky received many governmental honors and awards. When he planned to make this a "Sibelius Year," Dr. Koussevitzky cabled the composer as follows:

"Your 80th birthday is a source of true inspiration to all whose lives have been enriched by the power of your creative genius and the beauty of your music. The Boston Symphony Orchestra and I are happy to make this an anniversary season. We are performing and broadcasting your great symphonies and tone poems in grateful recognition of your invaluable contribution to musical art and to humanity.

"In extending to you my feeling of deep admiration and in sending my heartfelt wishes, I speak also for the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and your countless admirers in America."

Globe

MUSIC

Dec 1

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Paul Paray concludes his appearances as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the Symphony Hall concerts of yesterday afternoon and tonight. His farewell program begins with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, includes the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto with Mischa Elman as soloist, Ravel's "Pavane for a Dead Princess" and the Bourree Fantasque by Chabrier.

The distinguished conductor of the Colonne Orchestra in Paris may take leave of the Boston public with the assurance that he has made a favorable if not exciting impression.

As a week before, his work yesterday was sound and scholarly, balanced and proportioned, without exaggeration—and without those added qualities of "personality" and emotion that make an audience stand up and cheer.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony (which it appears, will not go through the rest of eternity as the "V for Victory Symphony," since no one calls it that any more) was meticulously read. Every note sounded. From top to bottom the texture was transparent. The style was irreproachable, the rhythms were vital.

But here Mr. Paray showed what may be his weakness as an arresting interpreter. That is his predilection for slow tempi. The first, third and fourth movements of the Fifth can be taken a good deal faster than Mr. Paray made them go without distorting Beethoven's intention.

So can the Tchaikovsky Concerto go faster without harm to its content or style. Because of a comparative snail's pace, the Concerto was dull and lifeless, although Mr. Elman, as usual, produced a full, rich glowing tone. Now and again there was disagreement between conductor and soloist in the matter of tempo.

Mr. Paray, as has been observed before, has the French virtues of order and clarity. He also has a "French ear" for tone, especially for the brass, which he brings out as a separate entity, not closely blended in with the sonorities of strings and woodwinds.

Ravel's fanciful Pavane was altogether delightful, and it evoked something of an archaic mood. So was the Bourree Fantasque which, although it is rather a worthless little piece, has vigor and elan and is good fun without, as Alexander Woollcott said of other good things in life, being "illegal, immoral or fattening."

It has been rewarding to hear Mr. Paray, although he did not elect to give us any modern French music. He is an able musician.

SANDERS THEATRE

"Penelope"

"Penelope," the lyric opera of Gabriel Faure, was given in a condensed concert performance at Sanders Theatre last night. This was the concluding program of the festival in honor of the centenary of Faure's birth. Nadia Boulanger conducted. The singers were soprano Olympia di Napoli (Penelope), mezzo-soprano Neil Tangeman (Euryclee), tenor William Hain (Ulysses), baritone Romolo di Spirito (Antinous), and tenor Paul Matthen (Eumee). Paul Leyssac narrated the story. The choruses were from the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, and the orchestra was drawn from the Boston Symphony.

It was a rare privilege to hear this performance, probably the first in this country, where only the orchestral prelude has been known before. Set to a poem by Rene Fauchois (who became a prominent French playwright), "Penelope" is a high-minded and rarefied work. There evidently is little physical action until the third act in the telling of the Grecian legend of Ulysses' return to his wife, Penelope, after 20 years, and his killing of the objectionable suitors who have besieged her.

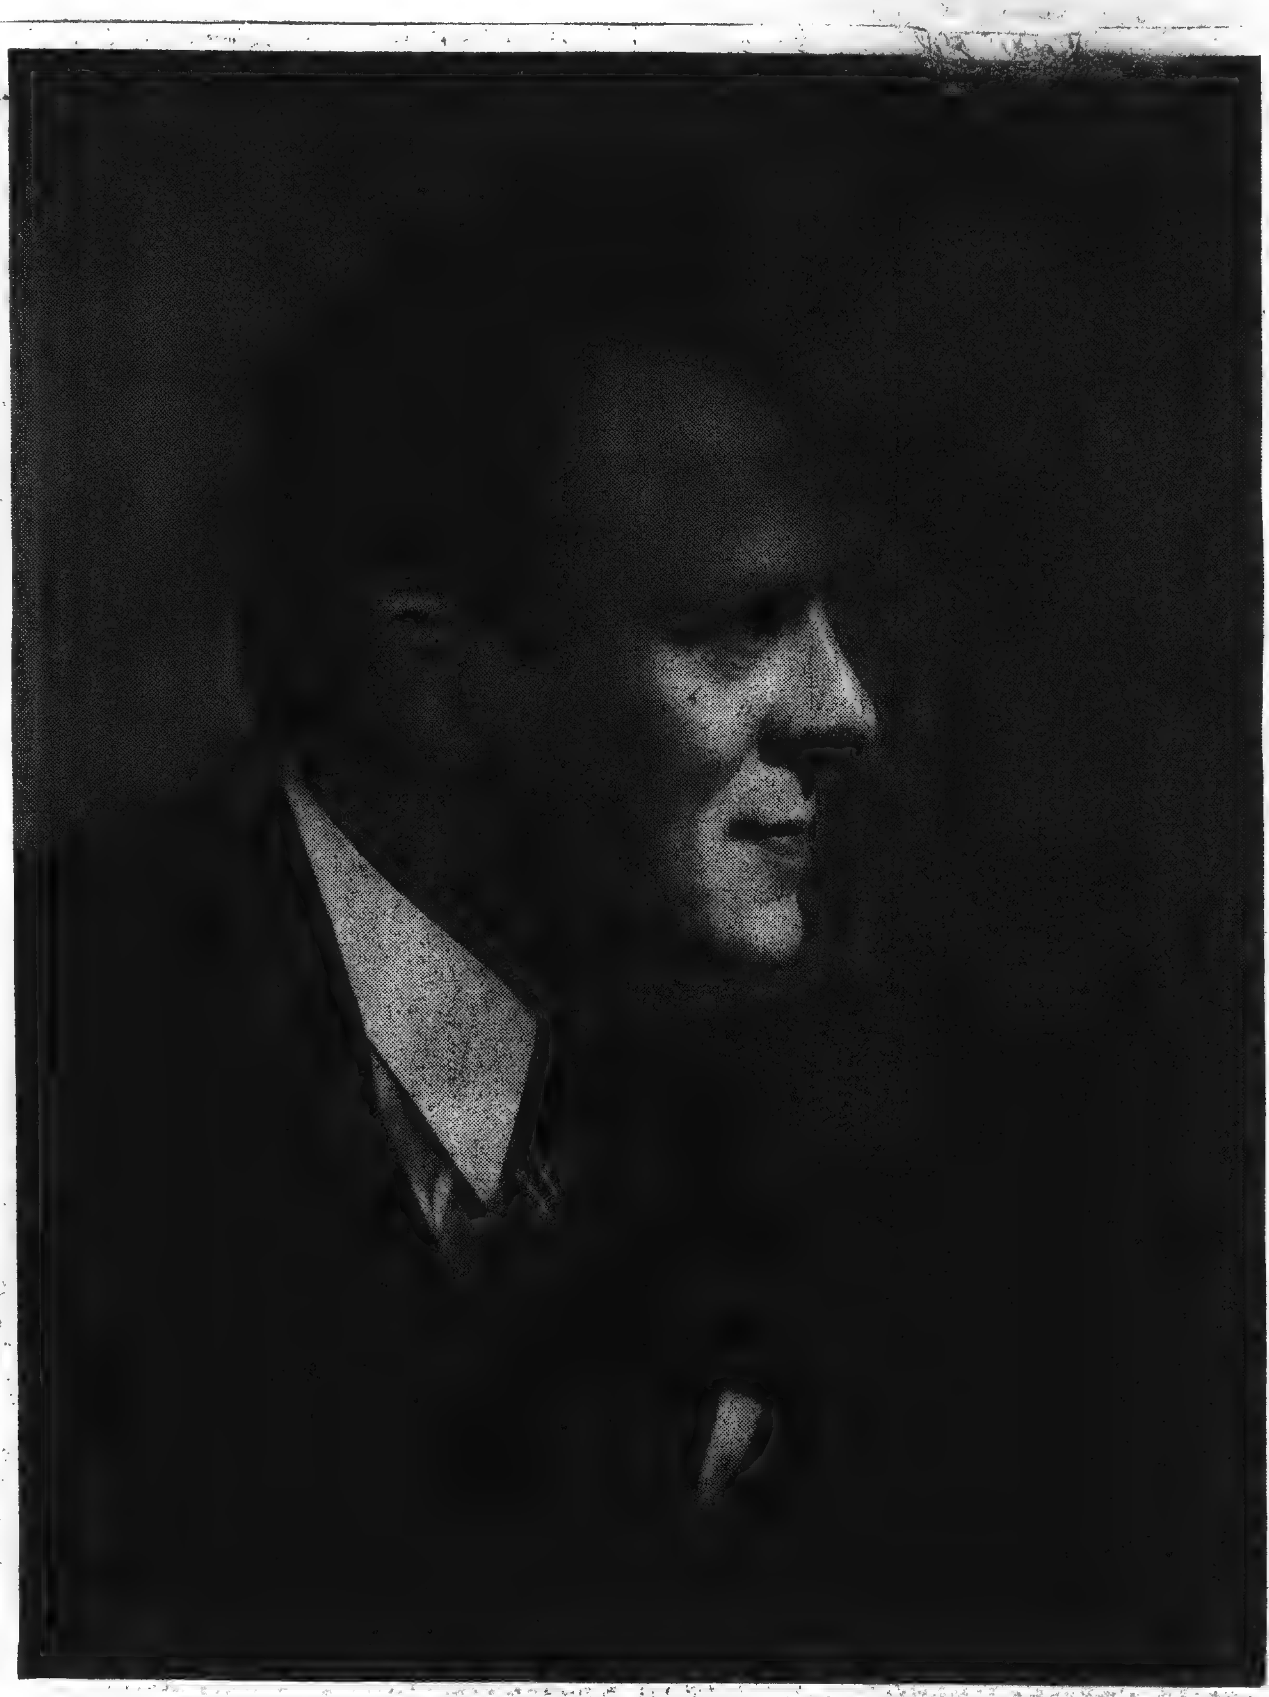
The first act is also static musically. Not until the end of the second act does the music take fire. But throughout there are grace and charm, especially in the vocal parts. Harmonically you find now and again a touch of Wagner and Debussy. Yet "Penelope" is distinctly French and distinctly Faure. Though first produced in 1913, it does not "date" as does many another work of the period. It probably needs the trappings of the theatre to make full effect. Yet a concert performance exhibits its musical merits plainly. "Penelope" was not orchestrated by Faure, but by hands unknown. The instrumental dress is expert and fitting. C. W. D.

NO. 6
International Musician
December, 1945

RICHARD BURGIN

(Third in the series of articles on the Concert Masters of our Great Symphony Orchestras.)

By Cecil Johns



RICHARD BURGIN, Associate Conductor and Concert Master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

THE photograph of Richard Burgin on this page reproduces his features faithfully but can scarcely show the animation, the mobility which is their outstanding characteristic. His are features, moreover, which typify no one nationality, which imprint personality rather than raciality. This accords with the facts of his life; for though he was born (on October 11, 1893), in Warsaw, Poland, of Russian parents, he has lived in the United States for twenty-five years, and is proud of his American citizenship.

Though neither his parents, nor any of his ancestors so far as he has traced them, were particularly musical ("There has to be a start sometime", he blithely remarks), he began to study the violin at five years of age under Isidor Lotto and proved so proficient on that instrument that it gradually dawned on all concerned that here was his life work.

When he was ten years old he left Warsaw to go to Berlin, remaining there under the tutelage of Joseph Joachim until his thirteenth year. During this period, however, he returned to Warsaw as a child of eleven to make his professional debut as soloist with the Warsaw Philharmonic Society, on December 7, 1903.

It was in 1907 that the young Richard travelled with his father to America, to remain there a year and a half, a period which he remembers with the greatest satisfaction since it was the one which initiated him into the wonders of this land, in fact finally was to make an American of him.

European Prologue

From his fourteenth to his eighteenth year he studied under Leopold Auer at the Petrograd Conservatory, graduating in 1912 while still in his 'teens. During this period he played in eastern Europe as soloist and in recitals in Norway, Sweden, Denmark and Finland, and served as concert master and soloist with the Helsinki Symphony Orchestra, the Christiania (now Oslo) Philharmonic Society and the Stockholm Concert Society. Coincidentally he was concert master in Europe under two former conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Messrs. Max Fiedler and Artur Nikisch, as well as under Richard Strauss and Sibelius. In 1916 and 1917 he was assistant teacher to Auer in Stockholm and Christiania. In these cities he also led string quartets the members of which he had drawn from those two cities' respective orchestras.

In the Autumn of 1920 his career in America began, for it was then he came to this country to fill the post of concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But the arduous duties connected with this post were not enough for a man of his boundless energy. In 1922 he organized from the membership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the Burgin String Quartet, which has been an invaluable medium through which residents of the New England states have been made acquainted with the literature of chamber music. Then, in 1924, when the orchestra's regular conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, contracted a severe cold just before a performance, the task of conducting the orchestra was assigned to him. This eventually resulted in his becoming associate conductor, a position that has widened in scope until in the present season he is conducting fifteen of the orchestra's concerts.

Busy as he is with these concerts and with his duties as concert master, Mr. Burgin still has time to enjoy life hugely, especially those games of the active intellect, chess and bridge. He delights in tennis, too, but rather in the spectator's role, since the instrumentalist's need for

(Continued on Page Fifteen)

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

DEC - 2

Boston Symphony To Play Prokofieff's Works at Mosque

Serge Koussevitzky to Appear in Concert; Tinayre and Pittsburgh Orchestra Listed

By RALPH LEWANDO, Press Music Editor

The week's major concerts bring, in order of appearance, the Boston Symphony and Serge Koussevitzky who come to Syria Mosque Tuesday night; Yves Tinayre in song recital at Foster Memorial Wednesday night and the re-appearance of Fritz Reiner and the Pittsburgh Orchestra Friday night and next Sunday afternoon at the Mosque.

Featuring the second event of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association, the Bostonese will play the "Classical" and Fifth symphonies of Prokofieff and Brahms' Fourth symphony.

Mr. Lewando

We listened in to the Boston Orchestra's recent radio broadcast which included the Prokofieff Fifth, the Soviet composer's latest major symphonic work. It is, in our opinion, the most important and significent of its type to emerge from any country since the advent of the late war.

It is a well-made composition, notably individual in expression and effectively developed. As played by the Boston Orchestra under the fine leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky the excellent content of the entire piece was set forth with brilliant and appealing results.

'Classical' in 1917

If you like good symphonic music and its good performance don't miss this concert. It will be a rewarding experience.

The "Classical" symphony of Prokofieff came out in 1917. His fourth symphony was composed in 1929. Since then the Soviet composer has composed a multitude of works in various forms. Then after a 15-year lapse he turned again to the symphonic form. During that time he took copious notes for the Fifth symphony. In 1944 the score was completed in a month. It required but one more month to orchestrate it.

The Fifth symphony is scored for two each of flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons; E-flat clarinet, bass clarinet, four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, tuba, timpani, bass and military drums, cymbals, harp, piano and strings.

Apropos of the Prokofieff Fifth, Dr. Koussevitzky said, "I want to tell you a story." He had been discussing the work of the Music Committee of the National Council of which he is chairman. The conversation was about ways and means for building American-Soviet friendship in the music field.

No Paper

"In the Spring of 1944," continued the conductor, "someone came to me and told me, 'The Soviet composers cannot write any more. They are stopped.' 'But why?' I asked. 'Because there is no music paper.'

"I immediately called G. Schirmer's, the music publishers," said the conductor, "to ask them if they could supply the paper. But I couldn't rest easy with the telephone call alone. I was deeply concerned and distressed. I wanted action right away. So I went down to Schirmer's myself to place an order with them.

"I ordered several sheets of music paper to be sent to the Soviet Union every other week through the Soviet Embassy. The paper is still being sent."

Dr. Koussevitzky got up and walked over to his piano. "Come here," he said to the interviewer. "I want to show you something." He pointed to a manuscript on the piano.

"This is Prokofieff's Fifth symphony. I received it a few days ago. Early in November I will lead the Boston Orchestra in its premiere American performance. A new symphony by one of the world's great composers," he went on. "Look at the paper."

In the bottom left-hand corner was printed G. Schirmer, Inc., Music Publishers.

Friends' Second Event

Mr. Tinayre's song recital on Wednesday night at Foster Memorial will mark the New Friends of Music second event. A distinguished baritone and interpreter, Mr. Tinayre will be assisted by Pittsburgh Orchestra musicians. The program includes Kriedel's cantata "Die Engelein," Ravel's Le Grillon, after Jules Renard's text; four Debussy songs based on Verlaine's words and J. S. Bach's Cantata No. 189.

Returning after a triumphal concert tour, Dr. Reiner and the Pittsburgh Orchestra will resume activity here Friday night and next Sunday afternoon. After these concerts the orchestra will rest one week and start again on Dec. 21 when Nathan Milstein will be soloist, with Dr. Bakaleinikoff conducting.

For this week-end's brace of events, Dr. Reiner's program choices are Merry Wives of Windsor overture, Nicolai; Brahms' Third symphony; Scherzo and Nocturne from Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream score, and Liszt's second piano concerto with Witold Malcuzynski as soloist.

Born at Warsaw in 1914, Malcuzynski studied with Turcynski at the Warsaw Conservatory and with Paderewski. He won the grand prize at the last International Chopin Competition in Warsaw.

He made a sensational debut in Paris and was considered the season's musical revelation. He played in many European centers, toured South America, Canada and the United States, and appeared with the Philharmonic Symphony with emphatic success.

This season he booked to appear with practically every major orchestra in the United States and Canada.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

DEC 5 - 1945

Acclaim Won By Boston Symphony

Loyal Followers Here Jam Mosque, Have Great Evening

By Donald Steinfirst

The affection in which Pittsburgh holds the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its dynamic conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, was amply demonstrated last night at Syria Mosque when the largest audience ever to hear a soloist-less symphony concert in the Mosque filled every seat and all the standing room space that the law allows. It was the Bostonians' first appearance in Pittsburgh in two years and to mark the occasion, Dr. Koussevitzky selected a program of three symphonies, the E Minor of Brahms, the Classical of Prokofieff and the same composer's latest symphony, the 5th.

Always Joy to Hear

The sprightly Classical Symphony is always a joy to hear, especially in the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky did not seem to be taking the fast pace that he usually employs in this work and it appeared to be all the better. It is a gay little tongue-in-cheek work, pseudo-Mozart and the Boston Symphony played the comedy piece up to the hilt.

It was a brilliant piece of program making to place the Classical Symphony written in one World War next to the new Fifth Symphony written a quarter of a century later in another. Styles in wars have changed and apparently styles in Prokofieff symphonies, too. Where the Classical is unconcerned, the new symphony is most certainly introspective and subjective, if one may except the vulgarity of the theme of the last movement. The opening Andante is moving music and of much power. In thematic material, it is not as rich as the two faster movements, but it is pure unadulterated and non-programatic and it has some of the most effective crescendos that Prokofieff has ever written. In particular, there is the gradual climax-building that precedes the finale of the first movement. Here is first class orchestral writing.

Well-Deserved Ovation

To me the second movement, a tangy scherzo, is the most rewarding of all the four sections, and in most places it approaches sheer genius. Feather-light, it dances along merrily with many a syncopated passage to help it achieve its goal. The third movement is the most romantic of the four. Here the composer paints with broad and heavy strokes leading into a bright and cheery Finale, where despite the rather common march tune that sparks the movement, one cannot help being impressed with the composer's devil-may-care attitude.

The orchestral tone was a joy to behold. Its rhythmic sense was acute, and its response split-second. There was a long and loud ovation for conductor and orchestra at the conclusion of the work, as there might well be. Prokofieff certainly takes first place among contemporary composers and as interpreted by Dr. Koussevitzky, he is vital, celar and interesting.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

DEC 5 - 1945

Boston's Symphony Given Ovation Here

Group Under Direction of Koussevitzky Plays to Capacity Crowd in Syria Mosque

By RALPH LEWANDO, Press Music Critic

Two years have passed since the magnificent Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzy, its distinguished conductor, last appeared here. That is too long a time for their Pittsburgh devotees to be without the inspiration the Bostonians provide.

So when they made their single concert appearance here this year at Syria Mosque last night it was too gala an occasion to miss. Result: a capacity audience that was thrilled and bestowed well-deserved ovations upon the symphonic favorites.

Mr. Lewando

The event was the second of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Assn's. current course. It was an unforgettable artistic treat.

The program included Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony — his first; and by contrast, that composer's latest symphony: the Fifth, with Brahms' Fourth rounding out the list.

Fifth One of the Finest

This Fifth of Prokofieff is a remarkable work. It brims with power and inspiration. It is able-bodied and full-blooded, so typically individual that one would have no difficulty in knowing its idiom as that of the Soviet composer.

Out of the gruelling years of war, deprivation, tragedy and difficulties comes this fascinating composition —one that is destined to take foremost place among the outstanding pieces of symphonic repertory.

Skill and interest, originality and craftsmanship, mark this work as a transcendent creation of this composer.

It is not a work, though, that might be easily grasped by the average listener, or even the experienced listener, at first hearing. Luckily, this writer heard the piece broadcast a couple of weeks ago, and this earlier acquaintance helped greatly to appreciate more thoroughly last night's performance.

Rise to Great Heights

As for the playing of the symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky and his musicians mounted the heights of inspired effort in each of the four demanding movements. The orchestra's supreme virtuosity, brilliant response and co-ordinated ensemble, and Dr. Koussevitzky's magnetic command and fervent interpretative powers were blended into eloquent expression.

The audience listened with rapt attention. At the conclusion of the symphony a prolonged demonstration of applause recalled the conductor three times. He shared the ovation with the orchestra.

An interested listener was Dr. Fritz Reiner, the eminent leader of the Pittsburgh Orchestra.

Dr. Reiner, incidentally, has been invited to conduct the Boston Orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston, on Dec. 21-22. Dr. Reiner has chosen for the brace of concerts Mozart's "Haffner" symphony, excerpts from Richard Straus' "Salome;" Iberia and Straus' Domestic Symphony, a work which he has not yet presented in Pittsburgh.

This Clipping From NEW MASSES
NEW YORK, N.Y.

DEC 4 - 1945

Notes on Music

It is a memorable experience to be able, within the space of a single week, to hear two new and exceptional orchestral compositions by contemporary composers, such as Walter Piston's Second Symphony and Prokofieff's Fifth. Piston's work, though more than a year old, did not get to New York till the spring of this year, when it was performed at Columbia University. I heard it for the first time at the Philharmonic concert of November 15. Here is the kind of craftsmanship we have come to expect of our modern composers combined with an original musical content and rich thematic development. Here expert orchestration is not merely a deceptive facade intended to conceal the bareness of the interior. Piston knows what he is after; he proceeds to achieve it with assurance and economy. The first and third movements combine structural brilliance with forcefulness of expression and powerful thematic materials. The slow movement, it seemed to me, was less spontaneous and original. But aside from this, the symphony manifests a distinctive talent of a very high order, mature and sure of itself.

I listened to Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony in the Hunter College Auditorium, from which the Boston Symphony was broadcasting it on the Allis-Chalmers program. It is not too much to say that this is an extraordinary creation—heroic in content, conception and execution. Let those who will (like the very smart though not uninformed writer in a recent issue of Time magazine) prate of the "Marxian metronome." Prokofieff's new symphony will survive that kind of talk. It is another example of the fruitful and deepening effect which the late war has had on the Soviet composer. It is a unified piece of work—a glorious tribute to a heroic people. I don't think I am reading too much of a "program" into the symphony when I say that the first movement (Andante) proclaims the invincibility of the Russian people; the second (Allegro marcato) reflects mockery and defiance of the enemy; the third, a magnificent Adagio, is a requiem for the dead; and the fourth (Allegro giocoso) expresses the joyous sense of relief, underlined by seriousness. Passion, lyricism, humor—are all there; but not levity. Of the four movements, I think the first three are unquestionably great music. I found the fourth somewhat more confusing and less substantial than the others. But there can be no question that this work opens a fresh, new world of musical experience—both for the composer and the listener. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave it an interpretation in every way worthy of the great subject.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

DEC 5 - 1945

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL REOPENS NEXT JULY

Boston, Dec. 5—After a two-year wartime suspension, the ~~Boston Sym~~phony orchestra will resume its Berkshire festival and music center next July at Lenox with ~~Serge Koussevitzky~~ as director, it was announced today.

HARTFORD, CONN
TIMES
12/[illegible]

Berkshire Festival Plans '46 Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces the resumption next July of the Berkshire Music Center with Serge Koussevitzky as director, at ~~Tanglewood in~~ Lenox, Mass. Aaron Copland has been appointed assistant director.

The school, which had long been a cherished plan of Dr. Koussevitzky, was instituted in 1940 for those who wished "an opportunity for a summer of living and working in music." It has been suspended for two years on account of war conditions and will be resumed on the original plan with the principals of the orchestra and other notable musicians as faculty.

One section of the school will be for qualified music students, and will consist of an orchestra, an opera department, a class in conducting classes in musical composition and a department of chamber music.

The other section will, as before, consist of students with less specific qualifications who wish to increase their acquaintance with music and its interpretation. This department will include a chorus preparing for festival concerts and a second orchestra. All students will have access to concerts, lectures and other activities as well as the festival itself.

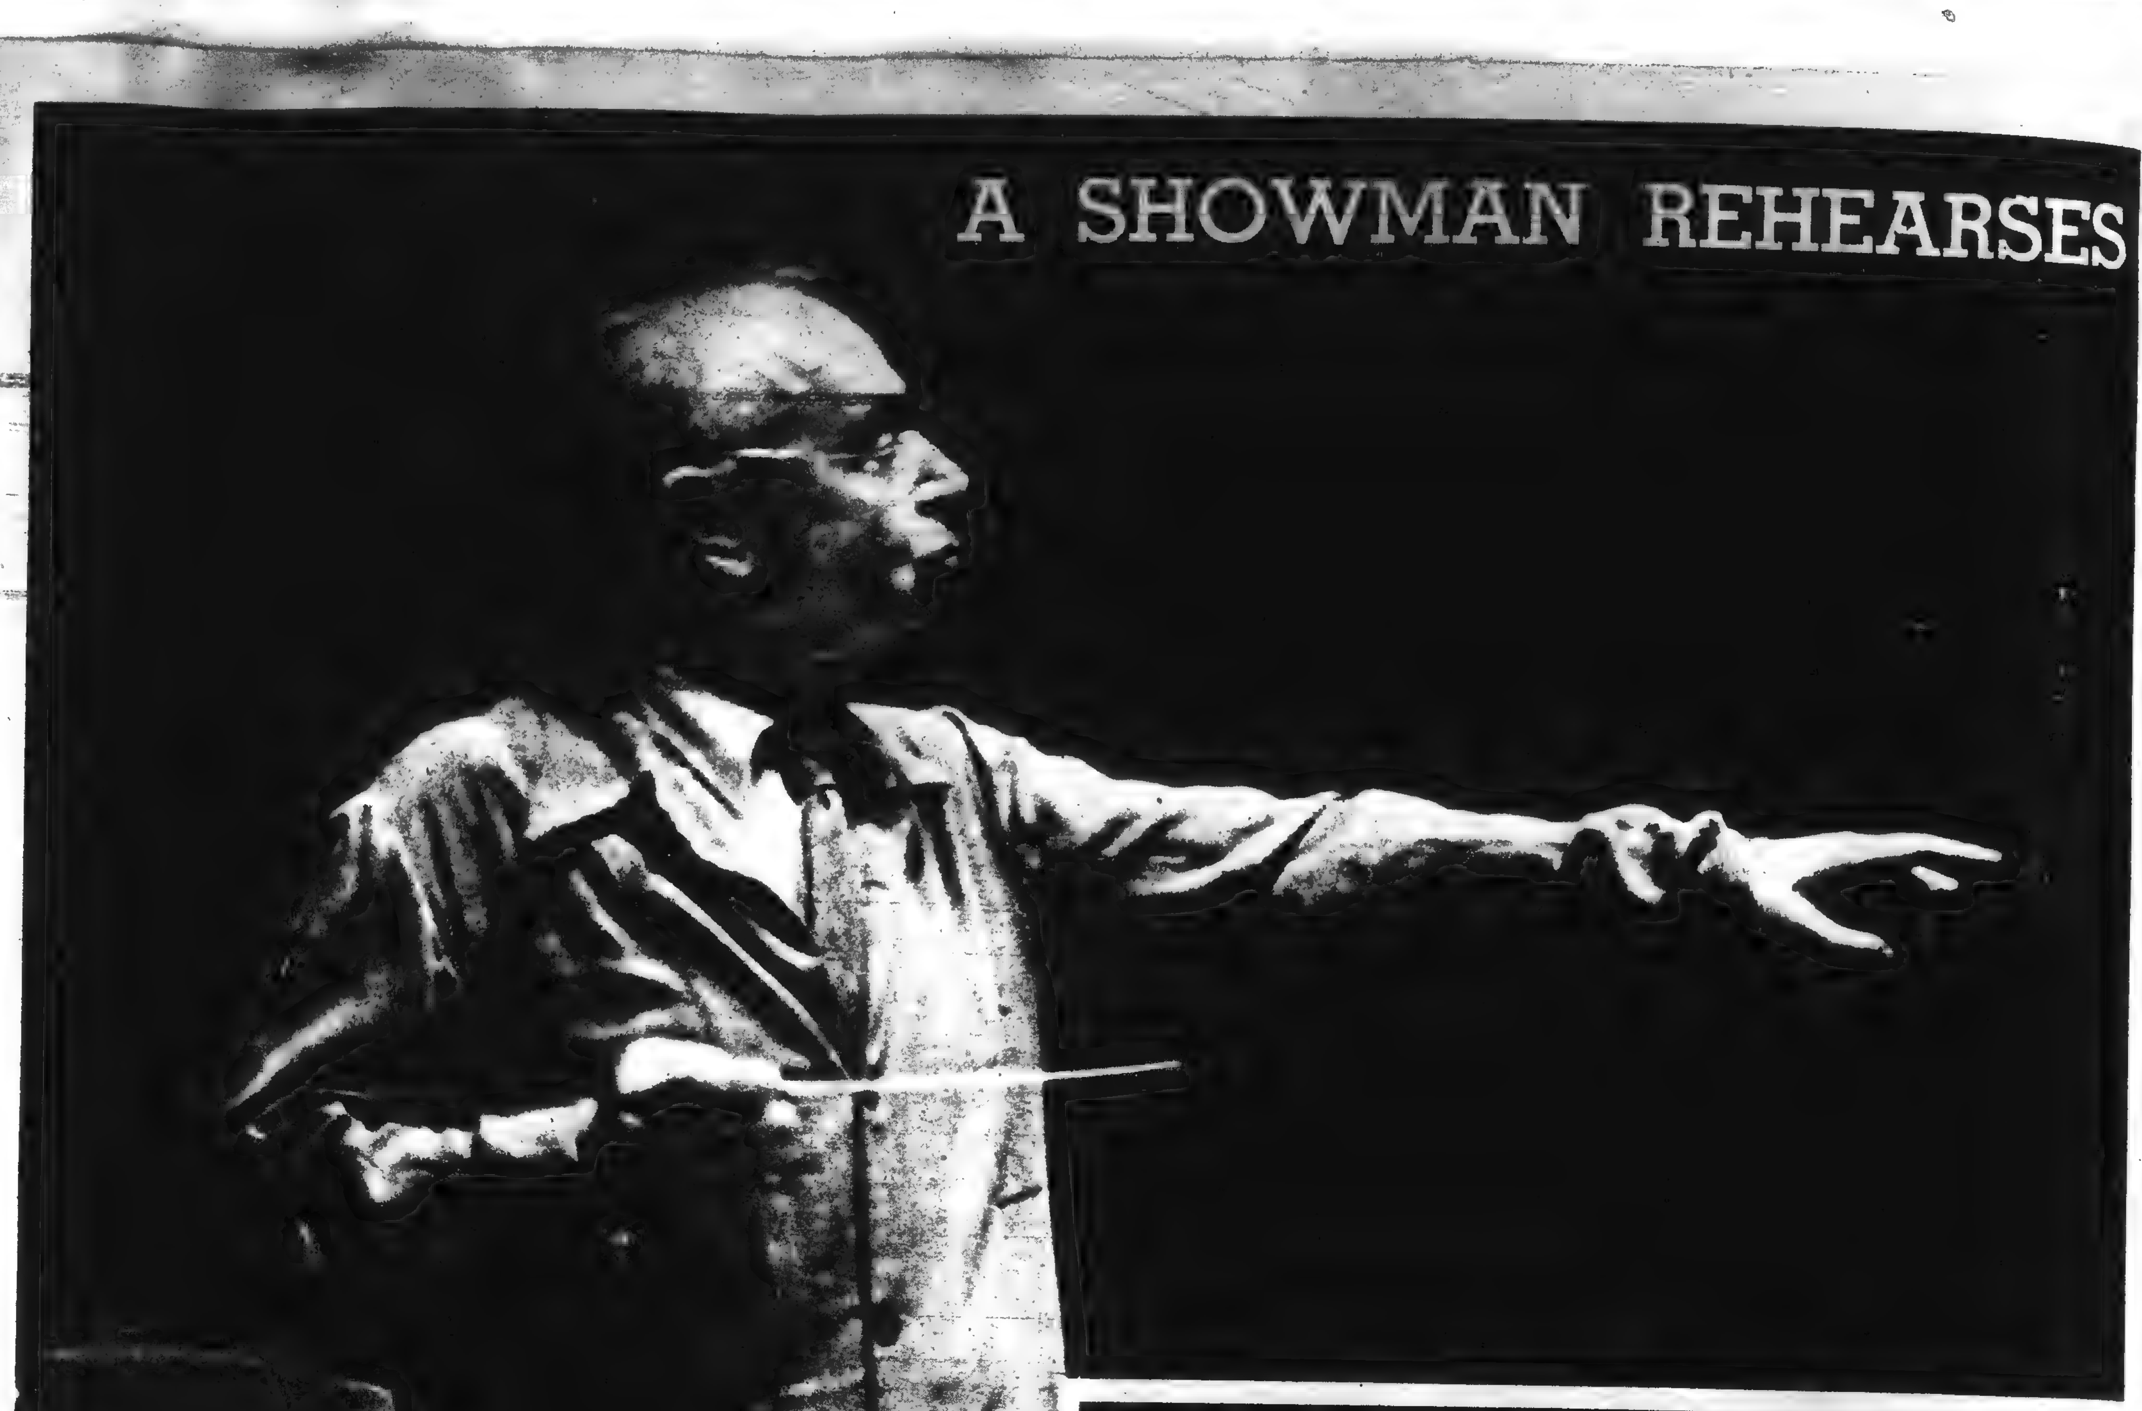
The term will consist of six weeks from July 1 to Aug. 10, the last three coinciding with the Berkshire Festival, which will also be reinstated next summer. Applications for auditions for the school departments should be made to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall, Boston.

[40]

PAGE 8

Rehearsing or giving a concert, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a showman. Imperious, intense, emotional, the Russian Napoleon of the baton dramatically directs his gestures and expressions as much to the audience as to his musisians. In the candid shots on this page Koussevitzky is shown at a rehearsal giving opening instructions, motioning the cellos to come in, deliberating dreamily as he draws from the strings and spurring the boys for the final crash. Koussevitzky will bring his orchestra to Chiçago next Friday at Orchestra Hall and will honor the 80th birthday of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, in Milwaukee, December 8, in a program to be broadcast by the American Broadcasting Co.

A SHOWMAN REHEARSES



This Clipping From
BATON ROUGE, LA.
STATE TIMES

DEC 8 1945

Paying its annual visit to the home of its sponsor, Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co., The Boston Symphony Orchestra will commemorate the 80th birthday of Jan Sibelius when it appears in Milwaukee. The weekly broadcast at 8 p. m. will have several features. Mayor John L. Bohn will greet the orchestra and announce preliminary plans for Milwaukee's observance next year of the centennial of its founding. During the program a message will be read from Sibelius, still residing in his native Finland. Dr. Sarge Koussevitsky, conductor of the orchestra, announced at the beginning of the year that he would fete the Finnish composer during the season by playing all of his symphonies and many of his tone poems. The climax, coming on his birthday, will find the Symphony No. 2 and "Finlandia," probably his two best known works, on the program.

This Clipping From
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

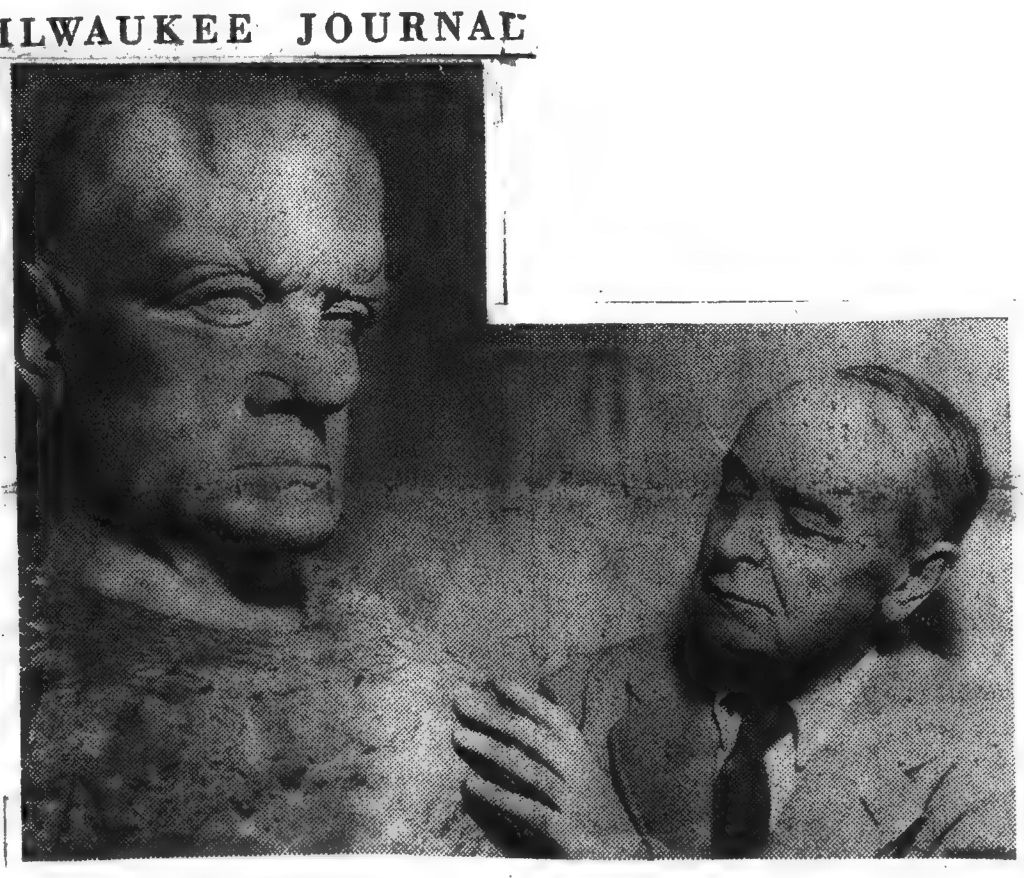
DEC 6 - 1945

Boston Symphony Day Proclaimed by Bohn

Mayor Bohn Thursday issued a proclamation setting aside Saturday as Boston symphony day, in view of the fact that the Boston symphony orchestra will be in Milwaukee for a concert Saturday night under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The mayor urges citizens and civic groups "to observe the day as one of tribute and honor to this great organization and its eminent conductor."

December 6, 1945

THE MILWAUKEE JOURNAL



Jean Sibelius, Finland's famed composer, will be 80 years old on Saturday, and in honor of the day the Boston symphony orchestra, which will be in Milwaukee that day, will stress Sibelius' music. Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston orchestra, is a close friend of Sibelius. He is shown looking at a bust of Sibelius, made by the late Mrs. Koussevitzky, who was a gifted sculptor.

This Clipping From CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
[illegible] 1945

Koussevitzky Bares Magic In Brahms 4th Symphony

BY ELMORE BACON

THE annual visit of the distinguished Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony brought out the usual capacity audience at Music Hall last evening. And again as usual it was thrilled by the notable display of orchestral artistry.

The program included the Mozart Symphony in E Flat Major in which some of the sparkle failed to spark through the slow tempos, the Beethoven "Leonore" Overture No. 3 brilliantly and also somewhat deliberately performed, and closed with a superb performance of the Brahms Fourth Symphony in E Minor.

The Koussevitzkys have just about everything one desires in a symphonic group, including a conductor who gets a marvelous response to his batonic demands. From the minute his baton at the start passes in upward sweep the second button on his weskit, until his final downward stroke denoting the end, Maestro Koussevitzky gets the utmost in tonal warmth and delicacy of shading. He achieves fortes that, starting as pianissimos, really are fortes. His men long ago solved the mysteries of his somewhat unconventional batoning.

• • •

THE Brahms Fourth is marked by severity, almost harshness and solidity, much in contrast to his other symphonic works. The Bostonese gave it a remarkably fine performance. It is not a moving work, but Koussevitzky displayed all that it contains. And in the finale in particular revealed the classic design of its stately corridors in which the reverberant brasses seemed in closing to point the passage of a glorious idea to destiny.

With the utmost of delicacy in the lovely andante, while the woodwinds piped an angel dance, the plucked violins seemed to whisper the brushing rustle of the angelic wings. It was Koussevitzky, the magician, unfolding the Brahms magic.

The Mozart opus, the first of his three last major symphones, was of course beautifully etched under the Koussevitzky direction. All of its delicacy and charm were revealed, especially in the lovely minuet. Pianissimo passages in the strings really shimmered. The work's lack of emotional depth and a sense of undue repetition became more apparent through the deliberateness of the tempo. But the calm beauty of this music flamed to life under the Koussevitzky mirroring of the Mozart classic serenity.

The somewhat similar deliberate timing of the Beethoven Overture was less noticeable, however, by reason of the wide variety of its content, and the shifting interest in its dramatic episodes. In this too, the Koussevitzky art of turning a phrase, of dramatically pointing a climax, of inspiring his superb strings to golden song, was fully realized.

After all we rather wished Dr. Koussevitzky had slipped in a modern piece instead of the overture.

The concert was a feature of the Cleveland Civic Concert Course directed by Mrs. Emil Brudno.

PITTSBURGH POST-GAZETTE:

Acclaim Won By Boston Symphony

Loyal Followers Here Jam Mosque, Have Great Evening

By Donald Steinfirst

The affection in which Pittsburgh holds the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its dynamic conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, was amply demonstrated last night at Syria Mosque when the largest audience ever to hear a soloist-less symphony concert in the Mosque filled every seat and all the standing room space that the law allows. It was the Bostonians' first appearance in Pittsburgh in two years and to mark the occasion, Dr. Koussevitzky selected a program of three symphonies, the E Minor of Brahms, the Classical of Prokofieff and the same composer's latest symphony, the 5th.

Always Joy to Hear

The sprightly Classical Symphony is always a joy to hear, especially in the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky did not seem to be taking the fast pace that he usually employs in this work and it appeared to be all the better. It is a gay little tongue-in-cheek work, pseudo-Mozart and the Boston Symphony played the comedy piece up to the hilt.

It was a brilliant piece of program making to place the Classical Symphony written in one World War next to the new Fifth Symphony written a quarter of a century later in another. Styles in wars have changed and apparently styles in Prokofieff symphonies, too. Where the Classical is unconcerned, the new symphony is most certainly introspective and subjective, if one may except the vulgarity of the theme of the last movement. The opening Andante is moving music and of much power. In thematic material, it is not as rich as the two faster movements, but it is pure unadulterated and non-programatic and it has some of the most effective crescendos that Prokofieff has ever written. In particular, there is the gradual climax-building that precedes the finale of the first movement. Here is first class orchestral writing.

Well-Deserved Ovation

To me the second movement, a tangy scherzo, is the most rewarding of all the four sections, and in most places it approaches sheer genius. Feather-light, it dances along merrily with many a syncopated passage to help it achieve its goal. The third movement is the most romantic of the four. Here the composer paints with broad and heavy strokes leading into a bright and cheery Finale, where despite the rather common march tune that sparks the movement, one cannot help being impressed with the composer's devil-may-care attitude.

The orchestral tone was a joy to behold. Its rhythmic sense was acute, and its response split-second. There was a long and loud ovation for conductor and orchestra at the conclusion of the work, as there might well be. Prokofieff certainly takes first place among contemporary composers and as interpreted by Dr. Koussevitzky, he is vital, celar and interesting.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH
DEC 5 - 1945

Record Crowd Hails Boston Symphony

By J. FRED LISSFELT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky directing, gave its only concert of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association's season last night in Syria Mosque. The audience is said to have been the largest ever to attend a purely symphonic concert in the Mosque.

The program was surely the most austere imaginable, three symphonies, and the enthusiasm equal to the size of the audience.

There can be no deviation from the general opinion regarding this superb orchestra. I listened last night from the top balcony and never before have I so deeply rejoiced in the luxuriant undertone of any orchestra, created of course by the finest body of strings now playing. For dynamic power and virtuosity, it is incomparable and therefore delights in daring attention to detail that mighty upset any other ensemble. To all this the director adds his unlimited emotional powers and enthusiasm, especially for music of the present.

Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" is now household music in America, its outstanding characteristic last night being the fine simplicity and Mozartean tone quality achieved even with full orchestra.

In contrast came the same composer's latest symphony, the Fifth and his Opus 100. Almost 30 years difference in age, it can still be easily identified through certain devices which Prokofieff cannot escape. On first hearing I like to remember the Strauss-like themes of the first movement, and best of all the skillful development of this movement. The shears may be applied with benefit to the slow movement; it seems to sing too many themes. The allegro giocoso is music which both intrigues and elates its hearers, the East contributing both melody, humor and its whirling tempo. The finale seemed reminiscent and its closing coda a real Prokofieff flourish.

The second half of the program was in a mellower tone, Brahms' Fourth Symphony, in full flowering of romantic declamation gave Koussevitsky phrase after phrase to display his craft in modelling, the trombone choir during the passacaglia becoming a moment of transcendent beauty.

This Clipping From CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS
DEC 6 - 1945

New Heights Reached by ~~Boston Sym~~phony

By MILTON WIDDER
Music Editor

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, made its annual appearance in Public Music Hall last night and its classical program won the acclamation of the capacity audience.

In the years this orchestra—the greatest in the world today—has been coming here it has increasingly thrilled the subscribers of the Cleveland Concert Course Association.

And no wonder. The Boston stands alone today as an interpretative instrument. I doubt if any orchestra in the history of modern times ever has reached the artistic heights this organization has achieved.

To say that Mr. Koussevitzky's Brahms Fourth Symphony was thrilling is an understatement. His conception of the symphony was so vast in meaning, so profound, that one's innermost feelings responded to his memorable interpretation. Besides the perfection of playing the orchestra produced a Brahms that was new to Cleveland. It appeared as a colossus of symphonies and created a musical heritage that will be hard to reach with the years to come.

The program opened with the melancholy but beautiful Mozart Symphony in E flat—one of the last three the Viennese wrote. In contrast to the latter heavy fare, the Mozart had exquisite charm, lyric beauty and the singing strings of the orchestra had ample opportunity to get in their work of precision.

For the middle of this dramatic concert, Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3 was directed by Mr. Koussevitzky with a bravura and drive that, within its short eight minutes, re-lived the story of "Fidelio."

It is a symphony like the one 3000 of us heard last night that makes life worth living.

CLEVELAND PLAIN DEALER, THURSDAY,

BOSTON MUSICIANS THRILL AUDIENCE

DEC 6

Koussevitzky Orchestra in Brilliant Concert

BY HERBERT ELWELL

The Boston Orchestra, under its distinguished conductr, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, last night at Public Music Hall rejuvenated some familiar music for the delectation of one of the largest and most animated musical audiences seen here in some time. The capacity crowd at this event, sponsored by the Cleveland Civic Concert Association, showed a warmth of appreciation which must have been pleasing to the Bostonians and which certainly proved that musical taste is keenly alive in this community.

Here is an orchestra which has the mellowness of age and the spirit of youth. In the tradition of great art, it is constantly renewing itself with old material. And when, year after year, one uses the same words to describe its excellence, one is not intentionally redundant. One is merely trying to convey that one has been spiritually renewed by playing of such perfection and power. It is a unique experience, undimmed by repetition.

One marveled again at intonation so pure that the softest woodwind tone cut through the great string section with utmost clarity. Never was there forcing or intensity so harsh, as to make any section opaque, yet what warmth came forth when desired, what blending and what incisiveness! Here, indeed, was the delicacy of chamber music with the grandeur of orchestral proportions. Not just the first-chair musicians, but every man, from Concertmaster Bergin down to the sensitive timpanist, impressed as an ensemble player of the highest order.

Expectations Filled

As for the conductor, one knows what to expect, and he did not disappoint. Koussevitzky offered us the Mozar E flat Major Symphony, the "Leonore" No. 3 of Beethoven and the Brahms Fourth. Some listeners might have hungered for a little modernity, but the strictly classic fare was, of course, a challenge to the great rejuvenating capacities of the conductor and no one could have left the hall without feeling that he had heard music as contemporaneous and as fresh as if it had been composed yesterday, such was the illuminating conviction and vitality that re-entered these well known scores.

The Mozart was marked by reserve and a dynamic scale that scarcely exceeded forte. Yet in this small frame was a variety of nuance, an almost compassionate tenderness in phrasing and an evenness of rhythmic flow, especially in the Minuet, that made Mozart relive, not with superficial sparkle, but deep human pathos.

The profile of Beethoven was never more vivid than in the concentrated drama of the "Leonore" Overtrue, which is always a tour de force under this baton. And throughout the Brahms such was the characterization of subject matter through the deliberately prepared entrances that one lived through this masterpiece anew, in breathless admiration for the greatness of both the music and its interpreters.

This Clipping From
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS
DEC 6 - 1945

Boston Symphony To Play Sibelius And Prokofieff

Two Prokofieff symphonies and the Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Opus 43, by Sibelius, will be played by the ~~Boston Symphony~~ orchestra at Hill auditorium Monday ~~evening~~ when the organization appears here for the 14th time under Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and for the 21st time as a group.

The Prokofieff symphonies are the "Classical" symphony, Opus 25, and Symphony No. 5, Opus 100. The program is the fifth in the University Choral Union series.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has appeared here annually since 1931 when Koussevitzky gave his first performance here. He directed the orchestra in each subsequent concert at Hill auditorium with the exception of the program in 1943 at which time Richard Burgin, associate conductor, directed the musicians, due to Mr. Koussevitzky's illness.

This Clipping From PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
DEC 6 - 1945

Music Center To Be Resumed

Berkshire Festival Also Reinstated

Of interest to followers of the Berkshire Music Festival is the announcement by the Boston Symphony Orchestra that the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., will be resumed next July with Serge Koussevitsky as director.

Aaron Copland has been appointed assistant director. The school was instituted in 1940 for those who wished to profit by the experience of "an opportunity for a Summer living and working in music." It has been suspended for two years because of war conditions, and will be resumed on the original plan, with the principals of the orchestra and other notable musicians as faculty.

Th term will consist of six weeks (July 1-August 10), the last three weeks coinciding with the Berkshire Festival, Serge ~~Koussevitsky~~ conductor, which will also be reinstated next Summer.

?

This Clipping From TOLEDO, OHIO
BLADE

DEC 7 - 1945

TOLEDO BLADE: FRIDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1945

Superlative Concert Given By Boston Orchestra

By ARTHUR PETERSON

The king of orchestras appeared in the Museum Peristyle last night without its crown; the Boston Orchestra played without Serge Koussevitzky.

Musical Toledo naturally shares in the general awe and reverence which have been the best of Dr. Koussevitzky's American laurels; and if only in the sense that we always prefer to see all the appurtenances of grandeur solidly in place forever and aye, his absence was sorely felt.

And yet in a fuller sense, not in the least metaphysical, he was there after all. His roots go down so deeply into the orchestra that the man can only be physicaly absent, never musically absent, at concert time.

Controls in His Hands

Wherever he is, the controls remain in his hands. The eyes behold the deputy (last night it was Richard Burgin, the concertmaster) but the ears go on hearing Koussevitzky.

All that being so, then it must recorded today that the concert was a superlatively fine one with little missing but the nimbus of the Koussevitzky presence and very little changed but the greater urgency of Mr. Burgin's conducting as compared with Dr. Koussevitzky's. Where Dr. Koussevitzky slightly flicks the last joint of a finger to move a whole range of tonal mountains, Mr. Burgin may use a whole hand and swing at the waist.

No Disparagement Intended

There is no disparagement in the comparison, for there are many conductors of good name and fair ability who would have been jumping around like two Mitropouloses in Mr. Burgin's place. It was not for nothing that his colleagues joined in the applause (five curtain calls I think it was) at the end of the concert. That was something like Pegasus nickering compliments to another rider than Bellerophon. (Note to roughneck readers: Pegasus was a fabulous winged horse and Bellerophon was his regular jockey, See?)

The program was pleasantly on the light side with Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture" as a starter. This is Brahms in extrovert vein with a deal of gusty brass and jocular tunes popping out for a romp every now and then.

Work From Prokofieff

The next work was from Prokofieff—to my notion the composer who has been most successful in striking a golden mean between the austerities of old musical traditions and the brilliant but dangerously anarchic liberties of the new notions. Prokofieff can cut loose without running hog-wild into such nonsense as helicopter modulations and din for din's sake.

The Prokofieff piece was a panel of ballet music, the Second Suite from his "Romeo and Juliet." It was in four sections with a definite end to match a definite beginning and good clean-limbed stuff in between.

Next was that most successful of orchestral scherzos, Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," one of the handful of works in instrumental music which can tell an absolutely intelligible and consecutive story with no more introduction than a skimpy paragraph of words. Considering our worries about the atomic bomb which we sorcerer's apprentices have been fooling with, it should be regularly referred to by every world-thinker.

The last work, Franck's D-minor Symphony, was played with infinite attention to detail and particular emphasis upon Franck's brilliant economy in the use of thematic material.

Toledo Times - Friday December 7, 1945

Boston Symphony, Burgin Win Praise

Substitute for Koussevitzky Conducts Orchestra in Pleasing Concert

By FREDERICK KOUNTZ

THERE should have been—and undoubtedly there was—profound personal regret among the audience at the Museum last evening that the head of the Boston Symphony family was unable to conduct his orchestra in Toledo. Musically there was no need for regret. And that is one of the wonders of the Boston Symphony.

We have heard Mr. Burgin conduct here before. We had reason to believe last night, as we did two years ago, that he is an uncommonly fine conductor, that he knows the ways of orchestral literature, that through the Boston orchestra he makes a vivid story out of every piece of music. But never do we forget that he is conducting Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky for one reason or another is unable to conduct; Mr. Burgin steps in; if the orchestra were behind a screen not one in a hundred would notice a difference.

Many-Sided Orchestra

Except for the Prokofieff there was nothing in the program last night that has not been heard here before, perhaps many times. But it was all music that showed this orchestra from many sides. You might have wondered about the Brahms Academic Festival Overture how any orchestra could send forth such a mass of sound and keep it from harshness and vulgarity. Perhaps you had said to yourself that The Sorcerer's Apprentice was one part of the program that you could do without. Yet if you were not amazed into complete attention by the way this music was played, you probably were alone in the audience.

And you must have had some questions about the Cesar Franck Symphony. Was it ever in the mind of the saintly Franck that sounds of such complete, almost sensuous beauty should have come out of the second movement of his symphony? Or did he intend that the initial rhythmic pronouncements of his third movement should be so solidly rhythmic that audiences would get their hands and feet moving or even conduct a little from their seats?

The Boston orchestra can make a tremendous lot of sound but the sound is always music. It can take music like The Sorcerer's Apprentice which has been beaten into a pulp for years and years by the mistreatment it has had, spruce it up, and give you something shining and alive. It can read into Cesar Franck a little sensuousness or even a few hot licks. You may not agree entirely with what they do with the music but you notice in their attack an authoritative voice; you hear presented to you a clear-cut conception, an interpretation that sets itself a line and does not vary from it.

Makes No Mistakes

This orchestra plays exactly. It makes no mistakes. Its voices never disappear in a melange of sound. Its playing is completely transparent so that every note can be observed. There is an ultimate cleanness, a kind of impeccable tailoring about its performances. It remains one of the musical wonders of the world.

The music played last night that was unfamiliar locally was the Suite No. 2 from the Ballet, Romeo and Juliet by Prokofieff. Prokofieff has a countryman whose music is usually long with a tendency toward being overblown. And always there is a great lot of publicity about what he is doing. The music of Prokofieff is in short statements mostly. It is direct. It is distinct in contour. Prokofieff possibly might never need publicity as such. His music is publicity.

His music which we heard last evening was fresh, almost astringent. By turns it was inventive as in the first movement; in 'Juliet, the Maiden' there was tenderness that occasionally seemed classically ironical; in the 'Dance' it bubbled and moved quickly and sharply; in the last movement there was a great profundity. It was clearly lined music, sharp and pungent. It was given a magnificent performance.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

DEC 7 - 1945

Festival School To Be Resumed At Tanglewood

The Boston Symphony orchestra announces that with the resumption of the Berkshire Music Festival in July, all activities of the center, including the school, and special classes, will be part of the program.

Established in 1940, it was suspended for two years during the war, and will be continued on the original plan.

One section of the school will be for qualified music students and will consist of an orchestra, an opera department, a class in conducting, classes in musical composition, and a department of chamber music.

The other section will, as before, consist of students with less specific qualifications, who wish to increase their acquaintance with music and its intrepretation. This department will include a chorus preparing for Festival concerts, and a second orchestra. All students will have access to concerts, lectures and other activities, as well as the festival itself.

The term will consist of six weeks (July 1-Aaugust 10), the last three coinciding with the Berkshire Festival. Applications for auditions for the school departments should be made to the ~~Boston Sym~~phony orchestra, Symphony hall, Boston.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

DEC 6 - 1945

Berkshire Music Center Resumes Next Summer

Koussevitzky to Head School ~~July 1 to Aug. 10~~

The activities of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., will be resumed next summer under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, according to an announcement received yesterday from the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Aaron Copland, composer, has been appointed assistant director. The term will run from July 1 to Aug. 10. The last three of these six weeks coincide with the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

The center, opened in 1940, was suspended for two years because of war conditions. One section of this school will be for qualified music students and will consist of an orchestra, an opera department, a chamber-music department and classes in conducting and composition. The other section will consist of students with less specific qualifications who wish to increase their acquaintance with music and its interpretation. This will include a chorus preparing for the festival programs and a second orchestra.

Applications for auditions for the center's departments should be made to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Symphony Hall, Boston.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

DEC 7 - 1945

The New Records

Boom in 'Clair de Lunes'—Koussevitzky's Brahms No. 3—The Lighter Side.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

Anybody's hunt for a satisfactory performance of Debussy's "Clair de Lune" should be ended by the appearance in the last week or two of no less than three new versions. Victor has one by Jose Iturbi, Columbia offers Oscar Levant's interpretation, and if it is the harmonica to which you are partial, you can find Larry Adler doing a "verse and chorus" on a ten-inch Decca disk.

The oddity among this collation is that the product of the many talented Oscar is actually more faithful to the directions of the composer, in such matters as phrasing and rhythm, than that of his rival actor-pianist Iturbi, who is supposed to have a concert pianist's knowingness about these things. I also prefer the sound of Levant's piano, and the quality of his tone.

This performance is one in a series grouped in an album entitled "Popular Moderns" (granted that you can accept Lecuona, Debussy and Poulenc all as "moderns") which reveals the out-of-town, or radio, Levant as opposed to the mono-pianist Manhattan knows principally for his playing of Gershwin. However, the crispness and bite of his "Magic Fire" and "Miller's" dances of Falla, the incisiveness of his "Golliwogg's Cake Walk," and the charm of his "Malaguena" would sound as well here as in Lincoln, Neb.

I care less for his way of doing the Poulenc "Perpetual Movements" for they require an evenness of articulation and finger control at medium speed which Levant does not have. There is, moreover, the considerable high level of Rubinstein's playing of them on V-15660 to challenge, and Levant is not in this pianistic class (yet). The other pieces in the volume are the Albeniz "Tango in D," Debussy's "Maid With the Flaxen Hair," and a Poulenc "Pastourelle." (Columbia Set 560).

Brahms No. 3.

An item which appeared some weeks ago and which I have not previously gotten around to hearing is the Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony recording of the third Brahms symphony. I have not always been an admirer of the Koussevitzky treatment of Brahms, but time and repetition have combined to unlock many of the composer's secrets to him; or, perhaps, won me to Koussevitzky's thinking.

It is a mellow and compelling Brahms one meets in this work, and the singularly dark richness of the Boston string tone and the fullness of the woodwinds count for much. The recent addition to the Victor catalogue, so far as this score is concerned (that of Kindler), is no competition for it in depth of understanding, while the alternate versions by Stock, Walter and Weingartner are in no such realm of actuality in reproducing as this is. There is scarcely an instrument in the texture which cannot be distinguished, while the solidity of tone heard from the double basses provides a foundation rarely audible in the past. (Victor Set 1007.)

The Lighter Side.

Fanciers of the authentic in Latin Americana should be entranced by a collection of rhumbas, congas, boleros, rhumbas guarachas, &c., played by the orchestra of Havana's Hotel Nacional. They are virtuoso in every respect, with more variety of rattling noises than one would think possible, and a particularly good trumpet player. He not only knows the style, but also can play the trumpet -- something of a freakish combination.

Among the titles are "Tumbando Cana," "Conga de los Dandys," "Cuatro Personas," "Blen Blen Blen" and a particularly attractive tune called "Dulce Densangano." Musicraft is the sponsor of this collection, and they have done an excellent job of the recording, which has a gratifying amount of air around the sound. They may be purchased either separately or as album N-4.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

DEC

[illegible]

This Clipping From
YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR

Famed Boston Symphony Here

BY CHARLES BUCKLEY.

ORCHESTRA HALL
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor.

"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25,	Prokofieff
Symphony No. 5, Op. 100	Prokofieff
Symphony No. 2, in D Major, Op. 43	Sibelius

The Boston Symphony Orchestra long has enjoyed the reputation of being one of the world's great orchestras. Last night Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony at Orchestra Hall in a program which reinforced this reputation.

Primarily, the Boston Symphony is a fine orchestra because of the excellence of the individual players and because these players are rehearsed sufficiently to insure perfection of ensemble. Intonation and timing are fundamentals too often taken for granted.

When we hear an orchestra like the Boston Symphony we realize more than ever that fine orchestral playing is based on mastery of fundamentals.

Orchestral tone is transparent; execution, facile. Koussevitzky has concentrated on brilliance and polish. In holding a consistent level of emotional excitement, he spares neither himself nor the orchestra nor the audience.

Sibelius to Be Honored By Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will commemorate the 80th birthday of Jan Sibelius, distinguished Finnish composer, by presenting two of his best known works at 9:30 tonight on WFMJ.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in his Symphony No. 2, and in "Finlandia." During the program a message from Sibelius will be read. Mayor John L. Bohn, of Milwaukee, will speak.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH

DEC

Symphony In Home Concert

By J. FRED LISSFELT

The Pittsburgh Symphony Society under Fritz Reiner returned to Syria Mosque last night after its exciting southern tour. The entire program breathed the spirit of well-being, a good prelude to the Advent season.

The opening Overture to Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor" displayed our director's theater style at its best, quick change in mood from romantic to humorous, so characteristic of the opera.

Having heard Koussevitsky's Brahams earlier in the week, last night's Third Symphony invited much comparison. Amazed as one could be at the Boston director's daring accentuation of detail, one could never be in accord with his permitting many a broad and important theme to fall into background, even into obscurity at times. Reiner never makes such an error; no matter how delighted he is to display a nice turn in his woodwinds, he never is misled from first matter. The allegretto of the Third I prefer somewhat faster, and while Reiner strikes here a genial note, I believe it thus remains somewhat piecemeal.

Three excerpts from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night Dream" music, the Nocturne, Scherzo (worth a hundred other Perpetual Motions) and the Wedding March closed the orchestra's contribution to music we too rarely hear by a virtuoso orchestra.

Soloist of the evening was Witold Malcuzinski playing Liszt's "A Flat Piano Concerto." This work is resplendent in the chromaticisms of its day; it overflows with diminished seventh chords and the many technical tricks of Czerny's virtuoso studies. Equipped with strong wrists for the banal octaves, most conservatory students can play this concerto. But it adapted itself admirably into the program, and a pianist of Malcuzinski's talents raises it out of its mediocrity to Olympian heights.

The pianist revives in his personality all the glamour which must have surrounded Liszt and easily won the audience. He played the Chopin C sharp minor Waltz with all its graceful rubato as encore.

Chicago Herald-American
★ Sat., Dec. 8, 1945—5

THE CHICAGO SUN, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1945

Boston Symphony Again Demonstrates Its Artistry

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky Blends All Instruments in Admirable Performance

By Felix Borowski.

ORCHESTRA HALL was filled when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, gave the first of its two concerts there last evening.

This organization has been heard here more than once in the last few seasons, and its surpassing beauty of tone in strings and wind, its impeccability of its technical execution, the impressive unity of response to the calls which the conductor makes upon it, have been discussed with unsparing admiration in these columns. All these qualities were again in evidence at the concert which is the subject of this review.

Special Interest.

The main feature of the program was the new Fifth Symphony by Prokofieff, which received its first performance in these parts. The work, written last year, has its own importance to the composer; for he says, "It is the culmination of a large period of my creative life. I conceived it as a symphony of the greatness of the human spirit."

It is evident that the work is connected with the Armageddon which, even as Prokofieff was putting down the notes upon his score, was entering its final phase; but less as a delineation than as a reflection of lofty heroism and indomitable will.

Fine Style Demonstrated.

Not often has Russia's outstanding creative artist made music of such power or nobility, or organized with such strength of sinew and sustained breadth of style as that which was heard last night. The opening movement indubitably is the most arresting of the symphony's four divisions. It flamed with eager inspiration, and the sincerity of its utterance has not always been a constituent of a composer who began as a satirist and who is a later transition—In "Romeo and Juliet" and "Summer Day," for instance—ended as a banal sentimentalist.

The Scherzo also is of great interest, and has affinities with the classical symphony with which Mr. Koussevitzky opened his concert. While the slow movement is, over-lengthy, it, too, contained moments of great beauty, and wiped out recollection of the conventional tunes which dirfigured the Andantes of his last two piano sonatas, otherwise fine works.

Prokofieff spent his ammunition by the time he reached the finale, which falls considerably below the worth of the preceding movements. The subject matter is merely passable and contrasts strangely with the magistral music that had gone before. For the rest, greatest admiration is due to the architectural solidity of the work as a whole, and the striking skill with which the orcestra is handled.

Inspiration Seen.

Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of the composition was one of elevated inspiration and insight into Prokofieff's intentions. The manner in which he controlled his forces, the orchestra balance, the dramatic intensity, without strident force, with which he molded the brass tone, were a delight to hear.

This perfection was not, however, confined to Krokofieff's Fifth Symphony. It was as evident in his Classical Symphony—which conductor and orchestra made a model of humor and vivacity—and in the two movements which were heard of Sibelius' D major symphony. It was great conducting, great performance.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

DEC 8 - 1945

ON THE AISLE

By Claudia Cassidy

Koussevitzky's Matchless Orchestra Introduces Brilliant Prokofieff Symphony

Concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Presented in Orchestra hall Friday evening, Dec. 7, 1945. The program:

Classical Symphony	Prokofieff
Symphony No. 5 [First Chicago Performance]	Prokofieff
Symphony No. 2, D major	Sibelius

Serge Koussevitzky and the matchless Boston orchestra played a superb concert in Orchestra Hall last night that not only honored Jan Sibelius, who is 80 years old today, but gave Chicago its first performance of Serge Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony, a work Mr. Koussevitzky believes to be the finest of its kind since Brahms and Tschaikowsky, and for which he puts up a magnificent argument.

For this great conductor is no niggardly admirer to teeter cautiously on the fence of opinion when it comes to a score that wins his mind and his heart at one stroke. He gives it full devotion, tremendous enthusiasm, deep understanding, intuitive skill. He brings it richly to life, and no greater boon can befall a composer than to have his music fall in such hands. Some one said last night the Prokofieff certainly could be botched up by the wrong performance. Certainly it could be. The point is that it was not. It was gloriously and to me persuasively presented. In other words, I was sold.

All the way? I don't think that is particularly important. What I do think important is that we have a brilliant new work by a superior craftsman who seems to me not writing to order, as some have suspected, but saying precisely and vividly what he wants to say. In fact, I think that is why Mr. Koussevitzky programmed the work with the Classical Symphony of 30 years ago, just to contrast the tongue in cheek skill of that sardonic jest at writing to academic order with the mature brilliance of a man who is heeding just one voice, his own.

And, of course, the fact that he could write the one so deftly so long ago made possible the development of the other. For the Fifth Symphony is lovingly wrought to a great orchestra's measure. Its opening is a challenge that demands to be heard. The scherzo is gay as confetti, with a wonderful trio exquisitely introduced and withdrawn by the winds. A delicate, insouciant trumpet hovers in the air—the whole thing heralds what Mr. Koussevitzky so aptly calls the carnival of the finale, a carnival heard in a dream, a dream induced by the lovely variations of the slow movement and from which you wake to the intricate but clean and shining sound of Russian bells.

Last night's, I believe, was Mr. Koussevitzky's eighth performance of the Prokofieff this season, so that it had the full benefit of the orchestra's magnificence, which is an almost indefinable whole made up of wonderful equilibrium, a glowing tone that builds to incandescent climax, a virtuosity founded on the true elegance of simplicity, and, of course, the conductor who has devoted his life to making that orchestra possible. I am sorry not only that Prokofieff was unable to hear the performance, but that Sibelius was so far away on his birthday. Because that must be exactly the way he wanted his Second Symphony to sound, with the deep throated song surging up and up until at last it breaks thru the dark Norse legends to shine in the glory of the northern sun.

This Clipping From
WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE

DEC - 8 1945

Koussevitzky ~~Felicitates~~ Jean Sibelius

BOSTON, Dec. 8 (U.P.)—Conductor Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today sent a message of felicitations to Jean Sibelius on the Finnish composer's 80th birthday.

The message read: "Your 80th birthday is a source of true inspiration to all whose lives have been enriched by the power of your great genius and the beauty of your music. The Boston Symphony Orchestra and I are happy to make this an anniversary season. We will perform and broadcast your great symphonies and tone poems in grateful recognition of your invaluable contribution to musical art and to humanity.

In extending to you my feeling of deep admiration and in sending my heartfelt wishes, I speak also for the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and your countless admirers in America."

All seven Sibelius symphonies will be performed by the orchestra this season and most of them will be broadcast over a national network.

Famed Boston Symphony Here

BY CHARLES BUCKLEY.

ORCHESTRA HALL
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor.
"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25, Prokofieff
Symphony No. 5, Op. 100 Prokofieff
Symphony No. 2, in D Major, Op. 43 Sibelius

The Boston Symphony Orchestra long has enjoyed the reputation of being one of the world's great orchestras. Last night Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony at Orchestra Hall in a program which reinforced this reputation.

Primarily, the Boston Symphony is a fine orchestra because of the excellence of the individual players and because these players are rehearsed sufficiently to insure perfection of ensemble. Intonation and timing are fundamentals too often taken for granted.

When we hear an orchestra like the Boston Symphony we realize more than ever that fine orchestral playing is based on mastery of fundamentals.

Orchestral tone is transparent; execution, facile. Koussevitzky has concentrated on brilliance and polish. In holding a consistent level of emotional excitement, he spares neither himself nor the orchestra nor the audience.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-AMERICAN

DEC - 8 1945

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC - 8 1945

Happy Birthday

Jean Sibelius, one of our civilization's great men, is 80 years old today.

In one way, for a man who has been so long among us, we know little about him: he has a bald, massive head, likes whiskey and cigars, dislikes Wägner, holds an honorary degree from Yale, and has lived secluded for years in a sort of log cabin at Jarvenpaa, Finland.

In another way we know all about him. We have his music. We know the mystery and the dark beauty of some of the tone poems and the symphonies, the routine solemnity of Finlandia, the graceful superficiality of Valse Triste. We have heard his rhythms and listened as he hammered his curious scraps of themes into elaborate structures. We have tingled with brassy blasts out of the north. We have peered through forbidden mists at the swan.

An odd and perhaps important fact about his life is his escape from a fate that has horrified more than one composer: his family tried to make a lawyer of him. Another odd fact is that his country gave him a pension, though not a large one, to enable him to spend less time teaching music and more composing it. As an investment in mere publicity for Finland the subsidy has been profitable, and as a contribution towards the spiritual enrichment of man it has been one of the more happy acts of mortal government.

Among the Sibelius enigmas is the Eighth Symphony. For years there have been rumors of it. The Seventh was finished in 1924, but whether Sibelius has since begun, discarded, or abstained from an eighth he declined, as recently as last year, to say. Visitors report that he is not well, as might be expected when his age and the conditions of life in Finland are considered; perhaps he is physically incapable of writing.

His public utterances are likely to be general and unilluminating when they are not expressed in music. Not long ago Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, one of his leading interpreters, received a cable: "Happy and proud of the appreciation given my art in mighty America. I send my kindest regards to all friends of my music." There are thousands of such friends. The period of awed and indiscriminate adoration, which was promoted powerfully a few years ago, has passed, but the more sober regard for the best of his work is increasing

This Clipping From
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

DEC 9 - 1945

Great Music, Made Superb

Boston Orchestra Under Koussevitzky in Sensational Success

By RICHARD S. DAVIS
Of The Journal Staff

GREAT music was heard in Milwaukee's Auditorium this Saturday night—the music fashioned by the mighty orchestra which has clearly earned the right to be saluted as the finest orchestra in the history of the world. It is, of course, the Boston symphony.

Under the gray lion who is Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra played for all who could find room in the huge hall. Music of the north was the material, wisely chosen music that fitted into the night's pattern perfectly and made the program one of the finest ever presented in the town. Three Russians and the magnificent Finn, Jean Silbelius—these were the source.

The immediate temptation is to speak of what the occasion meant, rather than of the music that was produced, glorious though the latter was. It meant that no one in the audience of more than 6,000 will ever again need to feel out of it when excited talk turns to the legends of exalted music and the names of music's heroes are bandied about. For this audience in Milwaukee certainly heard the orchestra that stands alone in the greatest hour for orchestral music America has known. It was a privilege not easily valued merely to be sitting there with the others who were thrilled.

* * *

The power of music in such a form as this is indescribable. It is the power that lifts worn listeners out of themselves and sets them to tingling with an exhilaration that no other force in art can approach. The uplift is more spiritual than physical, but for the moment the transformation it effects on all us groundlings is complete.

It was just so with the thousands who had dashed away from their suppers to be on time for the concert Saturday night. Nobody could mistake it. These people were inwardly soaring. They sat more quietly in the Auditorium than any audience has ever sat before and the delight on their faces was so great a tribute to the music they heard that any further report seems excessive.

Let it never be doubted that Serge Koussevitzky and his men could feel the wistful eagerness out in front. The listeners knew that, if the mood of the conductor and orchestra was right, they would hear music to last through the years. And the mood was right.

* * *

Responsiveness is perhaps first among the virtues of the men from Boston. They respond to their dynamic leader as if each were a separate keyboard that he could touch. The figure may be trite, but that is how it is when a conductor has superb ability to lead and his orchestra knows the meaning of his least signaled command.

The tone of the orchestra is not to be put into words. To say that the strings have incomparable tang and bite is only to prattle the obvious, and to dwell upon the quality of the woodwinds must surely lead to purring. It should now be known that the brasses never are strident and that a burble in the horns is all but unthinkable.

The orchestra simply has no discernible weakness and the composite tone, whether in a whisper or a smashing climax, is the voce of a balanced choir. Sixty-five years have built tradition for this orchestra, the tradition that nothing can be brash or awkward and nothing ever is.

* * *

The Russians of Saturday night were Prokofiev with the "Romeo and Juliet" ballet, second suite; Moussorgsky with the prelude to "Khovanstchina," and Rimsky-Korsakov with the "Capriccio Espagnol." The last alone was actually familiar.

It was the fact of familiarity, however, that made the superiority of the conductor and the orchestra so unmistakable. The wine of this music had never before seemed half so heady. Never before was the swirl so abandoned or the glint on the whole scene so bright. The "Caprice" has been called sensuous many times in Milwaukee reviews, but in retrospect the term seems to have been applied to a fiesta of the DAR.

In the second half of his program, Koussevitzky honored the distinguished Sibelius, who was 80 on this very day. First there was the beloved "Finlandia," which all the school children know by heart, and then the second symphony. Here was the moment for the orchestra to dig deep for singing tone—for mellow tone of sturdy body and great strength. Such tone was found and all of it carried the extra something that means nobility.

* * *

It should go without saying that the audience did its best to show how great was its gratitude. The conductor was kept striding in and out in his peculiarly stately fashion until finally he unbent and tossed off, as he did the last time he was here, the high spirited American classic of John Philip Sousa, "Stars and Stripes Forever." No condescension, mind you, merely indulgence in a corking good tune.

That was all there was. It was enough, all in all, to make the concert incomparably the highest point of the rich musical season, no matter what may still be on the way.

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

DEC 9 - 1945

★ ★ ★

THE FIFTH SYMPHONY was recently given its first American performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. Other war-time compositions which have engaged some of Prokofiev's seemingly unlimited energies are a symphonic suite called "Year 1941," a children's suite for small orchestra, entitled "Summer Day," music for the film and the cantata "Alexander Nevsky," the symphonic suite based on his opera "Semyon Kotko," 14 arrangements of Russian songs for voice and piano, a quartet on north Caucasian themes, and finally an "Ode on the End of the War," written within the last few months.

More of these works, one hopes, will be heard in the United States. But with nothing to go on but the titles, it may be assumed that this music is predominantly patriotic and optimistic. Whatever else may be wrong with the Soviet composers, they are obviously not affected by any sickness of the soul.

HICAGO DAILY TRIBU
Monday, Dec. 10, 1945 ★★★★ 2

ON THE AISLE

By Claudia Cassidy

Koussevitzky's Boston Orchestra Plays Superb Mozart, Beethoven and Brahms

PERHAPS you remember that when the late Frederick Stock took the Chicago Symphony orchestra on its golden jubilee tour, it was nowhere more admired and more at home than in Boston. And surely it is true that in the last two seasons when Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra have come touring, they were nowhere more admired and more at home than in Orchestra hall. For the tradition back of the two organizations was for many years much the same, and tho the Boston orchestra is now on a pinnacle of virtuosity, it retains the basic virtues of simplicity, dignity, reticence, supreme devotion to music. To many of us, great as it is, it doesn't sound like a visiting orchestra. It makes us feel we have come back home.

Concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Presented in Orchestra hall Sunday afternoon, Dec. 9, 1945. The program:

Symphony in E-flat major, Köchel 543 ....Mozart
Overture, "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 4, E minor.........Brahms

For one of the reassuring things about people is how easily we accept the best as our due. Take, for example, Mozart's utterly beguiling Symphony in E flat major. Mr. Koussevitzky's performance was quite the most beautiful I have heard, yet beyond certain initial shocks of sheer pleasure, it was the most natural performance in the world, of which you would say as we said of Monteux's Schumann at Ravinia, "Why, that's the way it ought to sound." It was the most supple Mozart imaginable, delicate yet glowing, held liquid in a sheath of luminous tone. Little turns of phrase were magically revealing, yet you heard the work as a whole, which is the finest gift a conductor and orchestra can make to an audience.

After the Mozart on a perfectly planned program came the great "Leonore" Overture, Beethoven in the magnificent style of Koussevitzky's "Eroica," darkling in texture, lofty in purpose, serene in performance that rose to one superb climax. And then came Brahms' Fourth Symphony, that goes in my gallery of memories with Stock's First and the Second as recently played by our orchestra with Bruno Walter.

It was tonally glorious, of course. What else could it be with such an orchestra? But it was also as mellow as if the orchestra had played it hundreds of times, as it probably has, and as fresh as if it never had been played before. It was lovingly burnished, yet crisp and clean with the transparence that brings out all the lovely inner voices without sacrifice of the score's great arch of characteristic line. Of it all, I liked the finale best, for when Mr. Koussevitzky comes to a passacaglia, he is a happy man. The statement of the theme and the glory of its variations will be something to remember until we hear its like again.

Copy of 'Lost' Cantata Sent to Sibelius, 80, by Boston Symphony

Boston Globe
Dec. 9
1945

Also Boston
Post
Dec. 9
1945

MILWAUKEE, Dec. 8 (AP)—A "lost" cantata, Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," was winging its way to its composer today on the Finnish master's 80th birthday anniversary.

All copies of the cantata, including the original, were believed lost when a German music publishing house was bombed.

Today, the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented an all-Sibelius concert and a copy of the "Origin of Firt" was dispatched to Sibelius in Finland.

Oliver Daniel, producer of the Boston Symphony, said the copy was pieced together from parts discovered in an American publishing house and the remaining sections, which had been sent from Leipzig to America in 1938 for a concert.

HELSINKI, Dec. 8 (AP)—The Finnish Government today presented composer Jan Sibelius an annual pension of $1680 on his 80th birthday.

This Clipping From
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

DEC 9 - 1945

6,000 APPLAUDED — Conductor Serge Koussevitsky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra wipes his brow after thrilling performance of Sibelius' Second Symphony at the Auditorium last night. Sentinel photo.

Symphony Honoring Sibelius Here Called Most Thrilling in Years

By EDWARD P. HALLINE

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played Sibelius' "Finlandia" last night as if it were Beethoven's "Eroica," and the Finn's Second Symphony was made as spectacular and stirring as the closing scenes of "Goetterdaemmerung."

Dedicated to Sibelius, just turned 80, this broadcast portion of the concert at the Milwaukee Auditorium was just about the most thrilling symphonic music this community has heard in years.

And it was only the last half of a concert whose Russian first half was practically as exciting. The music which preceded the broadcast was a suite from Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" ballet, Moussorgsky's "Khovanstchina" Prelude and Rimsky-Korsakow's "Capriccio Espagnol."

UNHEARD HERE BEFORE

The Prokofieff, which hasn't been heard here before, was far different from the familiar Tschaikowsky lamentation on the same theme. It was brilliantly theatrical and Romeo's sighs rent rent the heavens in the screaming brasses of Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra.

The Moussogorsky music was spacious and beautiful, and Rimsky-Korsakow's Spanish excursion was a dazzling festival of one. That, indeed, was one especial virtue of the Bostonians' performnace. Whether a thing was emotionally stirring or not, it was bound to be musically exciting, for under Dr. Koussewitzsky the briefest drum roll, the slightest squeak of the woodwinds and a few inches of pizzicatti made their entrances and exits within the hearing of all. Nothing was drowned out, and everything was heard with the right proportion of sound. It was an example of inspired stage direction for a cast of virtuosos.

CLARITY IN ALL CHOIRS

On "Finlandia" the various choirs of the Boston orchestra worked with that superb clarity and incisiveness for which they are noted. More than that, Dr. Koussevitzky put all the intensity of his soul into this patriotic Finnish composition. It could not have helped but warm the heart of the rugged octogenarian who heard it, we hope, a few thousand miles away.

The Second Symphony is not Sibelius' best. For the first three movements, one might well have wished for the First, Third or Fifth Symphonies, all of which are more glamorous and brilliant. But these ideas were dispelled by the tremendous finale, where the music marches with giant strides and issues proclamations befitting the Day of Judgment. For that, if nothing else, let Dr. Koussevitzky and the Bostonians be thanked a thousand times.

Six thousand Arion Musical patrons packed the Auditorium to hear the concert. They also listened to Mayor Bohn tell the nation, via the broadcast, to come to Milwaukee's Centurama, the centennial birthday celebration next year.

This Clipping From OMAHA, NEBR.
MORNING WORLD-HERALD

DEC 9 - 1945

Serge Koussevitzky . . . in Milwaukee hums "lost" cantata sent to Sibelius on Finnish composer's eightieth birthday anniversary.—AP Wirephoto.

Sibelius to Get 'Lost' Cantata

Milwaukee, Wis. (AP)—A "lost" cantata, Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," was winging its way to its composer Saturday on the Finnish master's eightieth birthday.

All copies of the cantata, including the original, were believed lost when a music publishing house in Leipzig, Germany, was bombed.

Saturday, the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented an all-Sibelius concert and a copy of the "Origin of Fire" was sent to Mr. Sibelius.

Oliver Daniel, producer of the Boston symphony, said the copy was pieced together from parts discovered in an American publishing house and the remaining sections which had been sent from Leipzig to America in 1938 for a concert.

Helsinki (AP)—The Finnish Government Saturday presented Composer Jean Sibelius an annual pension of $1,680 on his eightieth birthday. The composer was flooded with congratulatory telegrams in his suburban Helsinki villa.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

DEC 9 - 1945

Famed Boston Symphony, Mitropoulos and Gordon, Pianist with Civic

AND ART

By NORMAN NAIRN

DR. Serge Koussevitzky and the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will make their annual visit to the Eastman on Tuesday evening. So popular is this event that the house has been sold out completely for more than a month, and the possibility of any tickets being returned is remote. The program arranged for Tuesday comprises Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" and his Symphony No. 5, and Jan Sibelius' Symphony No. 2.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

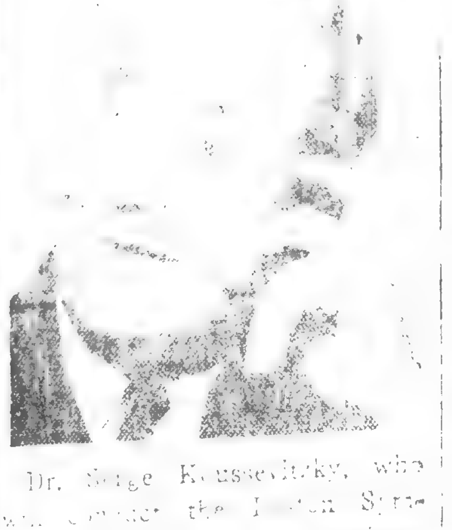
DEC 9 1945

AN INVESTIGATION

. . . brought out the fact that for the 1938 performance by the Boston Symphony Sibelius had portions of the work transmitted by radiophone from Leipzig, after copies of them had been lost by regular shipment. With the assistance of the Associated Music Publishers, the complete score has been put together, including the original parts sent by radiophone and a photograph made of the manuscript. This bound copy has been sent to Sibelius and he will have a photographic copy of his original manuscript for his personal archives.

[45]

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in its broadcast from Milwaukee over WCFL-ABC at 8:30 tonight.

This Clipping From
YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR

Sibelius to Be Honored By Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will commemorate the 80th birthday of Jan Sibelius, distinguished Finnish composer, by presenting two of his best known works, at 9:30 tonight on WFMJ.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in his Symphony No. 2, and in "Finlandia." During the program a message from Sibelius will be read. Mayor John L. Bohn, of Milwaukee, will speak.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH

Symphony In Home Concert

By J. FRED LISSFELT

The Pittsburgh Symphony Society under Fritz Reiner returned to Syria Mosque last night after its exciting southern tour. The entire program breathed the spirit of well-being, a good prelude to the Advent season.

The opening Overture to Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor" displayed our director's theater style at its best, quick change in mood from romantic to humorous, so characteristic of the opera.

Having heard Koussevitsky's Brahams earlier in the week, last night's Third Symphony invited much comparison. Amazed as one could be at the Boston director's daring accentuation of detail, one could never be in accord with his permitting many a broad and important theme to fall into background, even into obscurity at times. Reiner never makes such an error; no matter how delighted he is to display a nice turn in his woodwinds, he never is misled from first matter. The allegretto of the Third I prefer somewhat faster, and while Reiner strikes here a genial note, I believe it thus remains somewhat piecemeal.

Three excerpts from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night Dream" music, the Nocturne, Scherzo (worth a hundred other Perpetual Motions) and the Wedding March closed the orchestra's contribution to music we too rarely hear by a virtuoso orchestra.

Soloist of the evening was Witold Malcuzinski playing Liszt's "A Flat Piano Concerto." This work is resplendent in the chromaticisms of its day; it overflows with diminished seventh chords and the many technical tricks of Czerny's virtuoso studies. Equipped with strong wrists for the banal octaves, most conservatory students can play this concerto. But it adapted itself admirably into the program, and a pianist of Malcuzinski's talents raises it out of its mediocrity to Olympian heights.

The pianist revives in his personality all the glamour which must have surrounded Liszt and easily won the audience. He played the Chopin C sharp minor Waltz with all its graceful rubato as encore.

Chicago Herald-American
★ Sat., Dec. 8, 1945—5

Famed Boston Symphony Here

BY CHARLES BUCKLEY.

ORCHESTRA HALL
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor.

"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25, Prokofieff
Symphony No. 5, Op. 100 Prokofieff
Symphony No. 2, in D Major, Op. 43 Sibelius

The Boston Symphony Orchestra long has enjoyed the reputation of being one of the world's great orchestras. Last night Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony at Orchestra Hall in a program which reinforced this reputation.

Primarily, the Boston Symphony is a fine orchestra because of the excellence of the individual players and because these players are rehearsed sufficiently to insure perfection of ensemble. Intonation and timing are fundamentals too often taken for granted.

When we hear an orchestra like the Boston Symphony we realize more than ever that fine orchestral playing is based on mastery of fundamentals.

Orchestral tone is transparent; execution, facile. Koussevitzky has concentrated on brilliance and polish. In holding a consistent level of emotional excitement, he spares neither himself nor the orchestra nor the audience.

THE CHICAGO SUN, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1945

Boston Symphony Again Demonstrates Its Artistry

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky Blends All Instruments in Admirable Performance

By Felix Borowski.

ORCHESTRA HALL was filled when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, gave the first of its two concerts there last evening.

This organization has been heard here more than once in the last few seasons, and its surpassing beauty of tone in strings and wind, its impeccability of its technical execution, the impressive unity of response to the calls which the conductor makes upon it, have been discussed with unsparing admiration in these columns. All these qualities were again in evidence at the concert which is the subject of this review.

Special Interest.

The main feature of the program was the new Fifth Symphony by Prokofieff, which received its first performance in these parts. The work, written last year, has its own importance to the composer; for he says, "It is the culmination of a large period of my creative life. I conceived it as a symphony of the greatness of the human spirit."

It is evident that the work is connected with the Armageddon which, even as Prokofieff was putting down the notes upon his score, was entering its final phase; but less as a delineation than as a reflection of lofty heroism and indomitable will.

Fine Style Demonstrated.

Not often has Russia's outstanding creative artist made music of such power or nobility, or organized with such strength of sinew and sustained breadth of style as that which was heard last night.

The opening movement indubitably is the most arresting of the symphony's four divisions. It flamed with eager inspiration, and the sincerity of its utterance has not always been a constituent of a composer who began as a satirist and who is a later transition—In "Romeo and Juliet" and "Summer Day," for instance—ended as a banal sentimentalist.

The Scherzo also is of great interest, and has affinities with the classical symphony with which Mr. Koussevitzky opened his concert. While the slow movement is, over-lengthy, it, too, contained moments of great beauty, and wiped out recollection of the conventional tunes which dirfigured the Andantes of his last two piano sonatas, otherwise fine works.

Prokofieff spent his ammunition by the time he reached the finale, which falls considerably below the worth of the preceding movements. The subject matter is merely passable and contrasts strangely with the magistral music that had gone before. For the rest, greatest admiration is due to the architectural solidity of the work as a whole, and the striking skill with which the orcestra is handled.

Inspiration Seen.

Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of the composition was one of elevated inspiration and insight into Prokofieff's intentions. The manner in which he controlled his forces, the orchestra balance, the dramatic intensity, without strident force, with which he molded the brass tone, were a delight to hear.

This perfection was not, however, confined to Krokofieff's Fifth Symphony. It was as evident in his Classical Symphony—which conductor and orchestra made a model of humor and vivacity—and in the two movements which were heard of Sibelius' D major symphony. It was great conducting, great performance.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

DEC 8 - 1945

ON THE AISLE

By Claudia Cassidy

Koussevitzky's Matchless Orchestra Introduces Brilliant Prokofieff Symphony

Concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Presented in Orchestra hall Friday evening, Dec. 7, 1945. The program:
Classical Symphony................Prokofieff
Symphony No. 5..................Prokofieff
[First Chicago Performance]
Symphony No. 2, D major.........Sibelius

Serge Koussevitzky and the matchless Boston orchestra played a superb concert in Orchestra Hall last night that not only honored Jan Sibelius, who is 80 years old today, but gave Chicago its first performance of Serge Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony, a work Mr. Koussevitzky believes to be the finest of its kind since Brahms and Tschaikowsky, and for which he puts up a magnificent argument.

For this great conductor is no niggardly admirer to teeter cautiously on the fence of opinion when it comes to a score that wins his mind and his heart at one stroke. He gives it full devotion, tremendous enthusiasm, deep understanding, intuitive skill. He brings it richly to life, and no greater boon can befall a composer than to have his music fall in such hands. Some one said last night the Prokofieff certainly could be botched up by the wrong performance. Certainly it could be. The point is that it was not. It was gloriously and to me persuasively presented. In other words, I was sold.

All the way? I don't think that is particularly important. What I do think important is that we have a brilliant new work by a superior craftsman who seems to me not writing to order, as some have suspected, but saying precisely and vividly what he wants to say. In fact, I think that is why Mr. Koussevitzky programmed the work with the Classical Symphony of 30 years ago, just to contrast the tongue in cheek skill of that sardonic jest at writing to academic order with the mature brilliance of a man who is heeding just one voice, his own.

And, of course, the fact that he could write the one so deftly so long ago made possible the development of the other. For the Fifth Symphony is lovingly wrought to a great orchestra's measure. Its opening is a challenge that demands to be heard. The scherzo is gay as confetti, with a wonderful trio exquisitely introduced and withdrawn by the winds. A delicate, insouciant trumpet hovers in the air—the whole thing heralds what Mr. Koussevitzky so aptly calls the carnival of the finale, a carnival heard in a dream, a dream induced by the lovely variations of the slow movement and from which you wake to the intricate but clean and shining sound of Russian bells.

Last night's, I believe, was Mr. Koussevitzky's eighth performance of the Prokofieff this season, so that it had the full benefit of the orchestra's magnificence, which is an almost indefinable whole made up of wonderful equilibrium, a glowing tone that builds to incandescent climax, a virtuosity founded on the true elegance of simplicity, and, of course, the conductor who has devoted his life to making that orchestra possible. I am sorry not only that Prokofieff was unable to hear the performance, but that Sibelius was so far away on his birthday. Because that must be exactly the way he wanted his Second Symphony to sound, with the deep throated song surging up and up until at last it breaks thru the dark Norse legends to shine in the glory of the northern sun.

Famed Boston Symphony Here

BY CHARLES BUCKLEY.

ORCHESTRA HALL
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor.

"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25, Prokofieff
Symphony No. 5, Op. 100 Prokofieff
Symphony No. 2, in D Major, Op. 43 Sibelius

The Boston Symphony Orchestra long has enjoyed the reputation of being one of the world's great orchestras. Last night Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony at Orchestra Hall in a program which reinforced this reputation.

Primarily, the Boston Symphony is a fine orchestra because of the excellence of the individual players and because these players are rehearsed sufficiently to insure perfection of ensemble. Intonation and timing are fundamentals too often taken for granted.

When we hear an orchestra like the Boston Symphony we realize more than ever that fine orchestral playing is based on mastery of fundamentals.

Orchestral tone is transparent; execution, facile. Koussevitzky has concentrated on brilliance and polish. In holding a consistent level of emotional excitement, he spares neither himself nor the orchestra nor the audience.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-AMERICAN

DEC - 8 1945

This Clipping From
WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE

DEC - 8 1945

Koussevitzky ~~Felicitates~~ Jean Sibelius

BOSTON, Dec. 8 (U.P.)—Conductor Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra today sent a message of felicitations to Jean Sibelius on the Finnish composer's 80th birthday.

The message read: "Your 80th birthday is a source of true inspiration to all whose lives have been enriched by the power of your great genius and the beauty of your music. The Boston Symphony Orchestra and I are happy to make this an anniversary season. We will perform and broadcast your great symphonies and tone poems in grateful recognition of your invaluable contribution to musical art and to humanity.

In extending to you my feeling of deep admiration and in sending my heartfelt wishes, I speak also for the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and your countless admirers in America."

All seven Sibelius symphonies will be performed by the orchestra this season and most of them will be broadcast over a national network.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

DEC - 8 1945

Happy Birthday

Jean Sibelius, one of our civilization's great men, is 80 years old today.

In one way, for a man who has been so long among us, we know little about him: he has a bald, massive head, likes whiskey and cigars, dislikes Wagner, holds an honorary degree from Yale, and has lived secluded for years in a sort of log cabin at Jarvenpaa, Finland.

In another way we know all about him. We have his music. We know the mystery and the dark beauty of some of the tone poems and the symphonies, the routine solemnity of Finlandia, the graceful superficiality of Valse Triste. We have heard his rhythms and listened as he hammered his curious scraps of themes into elaborate structures. We have tingled with brassy blasts out of the north. We have peered through forbidden mists at the swan.

An odd and perhaps important fact about his life is his escape from a fate that has horrified more than one composer: his family tried to make a lawyer of him. Another odd fact is that his country gave him a pension, though not a large one, to enable him to spend less time teaching music and more composing it. As an investment in mere publicity for Finland the subsidy has been profitable, and as a contribution towards the spiritual enrichment of man it has been one of the more happy acts of mortal government.

Among the Sibelius enigmas is the Eighth Symphony. For years there have been rumors of it. The Seventh was finished in 1924, but whether Sibelius has since begun, discarded, or abstained from an eighth he declined, as recently as last year, to say. Visitors report that he is not well, as might be expected when his age and the conditions of life in Finland are considered; perhaps he is physically incapable of writing.

His public utterances are likely to be general and unilluminating when they are not expressed in music. Not long ago Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, one of his leading interpreters, received a cable: "Happy and proud of the appreciation given my art in mighty America. I send my kindest regards to all friends of my music." There are thousands of such friends. The period of awed and indiscriminate adoration, which was promoted powerfully a few years ago, has passed, but the more sober regard for the best of his work is increasing

This Clipping From
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

DEC 9 - 1945

Great Music, Made Superb

Boston Orchestra Under Koussevitzky in Sensational Success

By RICHARD S. DAVIS
Of The Journal Staff

GREAT music was heard in Milwaukee's Auditorium this Saturday night—the music fashioned by the mighty orchestra which has clearly earned the right to be saluted as the finest orchestra in the history of the world. It is, of course, the Boston symphony.

Under the gray lion who is Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra played for all who could find room in the huge hall. Music of the north was the material, wisely chosen music that fitted into the night's pattern perfectly and made the program one of the finest ever presented in the town. Three Russians and the magnificent Finn, Jean Silbelius—these were the source.

The immediate temptation is to speak of what the occasion meant. rather than of the music that was produced, glorious though the latter was. It meant that no one in the audience of more than 6,000 will ever again need to feel out of it when excited talk turns to the legends of exalted music and the names of music's heroes are bandied about. For this audience in Milwaukee certainly heard the orchestra that stands alone in the greatest hour for orchestral music America has known. It was a privilege not easily valued merely to be sitting there with the others who were thrilled.

* * *

The power of music in such a form as this is indescribable. It is the power that lifts worn listeners out of themselves and sets them to tingling with an exhilaration that no other force in art can approach. The uplift is more spiritual than physical, but for the moment the transformation it effects on all us groundlings is complete.

It was just so with the thousands who had dashed away from their suppers to be on time for the concert Saturday night. Nobody could mistake it. These people were inwardly soaring. They sat more quietly in the Auditorium than any audience has ever sat before and the delight on their faces was so great a tribute to the music they heard that any further report seems excessive.

Let it never be doubted that Serge Koussevitzky and his men could feel the wistful eagerness out in front. The listeners knew that, if the mood of the conductor and orchestra was right, they would hear music to last through the years. And the mood was right.

* * *

Responsiveness is perhaps first among the virtues of the men from Boston. They respond to their dynamic leader as if each were a separate keyboard that he could touch. The figure may be trite, but that is how it is when a conductor has superb ability to lead and his orchestra knows the meaning of his least signaled command.

The tone of the orchestra is not to be put into words. To say that the strings have incomparable tang and bite is only to prattle the obvious, and to dwell upon the quality of the woodwinds must surely lead to purring. It should now be known that the brasses never are strident and that a burble in the horns is all but unthinkable.

The orchestra simply has no discernible weakness and the composite tone, whether in a whisper or a smashing climax, is the voce of a balanced choir. Sixty-five years have built tradition for this orchestra, the tradition that nothing can be brash or awkward and nothing ever is.

* * *

The Russians of Saturday night were Prokofiev with the "Romeo and Juliet" ballet, second suite; Moussorgsky with the prelude to "Khovanstchina," and Rimsky-Korsakov with the "Capriccio Espagnol." The last alone was actually familiar.

It was the fact of familiarity, however, that made the superiority of the conductor and the orchestra so unmistakable. The wine of this music had never before seemed half so heady. Never before was the swirl so abandoned or the glint on the whole scene so bright. The "Caprice" has been called sensuous many times in Milwaukee reviews, but in retrospect the term seems to have been applied to a fiesta of the DAR.

In the second half of his program, Koussevitzky honored the distinguished Sibelius, who was 80 on this very day. First there was the beloved "Finlandia," which all the school children know by heart, and then the second symphony. Here was the moment for the orchestra to dig deep for singing tone—for mellow tone of sturdy body and great strength. Such tone was found and all of it carried the extra something that means nobility.

* * *

It should go without saying that the audience did its best to show how great was its gratitude. The conductor was kept striding in and out in his peculiarly stately fashion until finally he unbent and tossed off, as he did the last time he was here, the high spirited American classic of John Philip Sousa, "Stars and Stripes Forever." No condescension, mind you, merely indulgence in a corking good tune.

That was all there was. It was enough, all in all, to make the concert incomparably the highest point of the rich musical season, no matter what may still be on the way

---

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

DEC 9 - 1945

★ ★ ★

THE FIFTH SYMPHONY was recently given its first American performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. Other war-time compositions which have engaged some of Prokofiev's seemingly unlimited energies are a symphonic suite called "Year 1941," a children's suite for small orchestra, entitled "Summer Day," music for the film and the cantata "Alexander Nevsky," the symphonic suite based on his opera "Semyon Kotko," 14 arrangements of Russian songs for voice and piano, a quartet on north Caucasian themes, and finally an "Ode on the End of the War," written within the last few months.

More of these works, one hopes, will be heard in the United States. But with nothing to go on but the titles, it may be assumed that this music is predominantly patriotic and optimistic. Whatever else may be wrong with the Soviet composers, they are obviously not affected by any sickness of the soul.

CHICAGO DAILY TRIBU
Monday, Dec. 10, 1945 ★★★★ 2

THE AIS

By Claudia Cassidy

Koussevitzky's Boston Orchestra Plays Superb Mozart, Beethoven and Brahms

PERHAPS you remember that when the late Frederick Stock took the Chicago Symphony orchestra on its golden jubilee tour, it was nowhere more admired and more at home than in Boston. And surely it is true that in the last two seasons when Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra have come touring, they were nowhere more admired and more at home than in Orchestra hall. For the tradition back of the two organizations was for many years much the same, and tho the Boston orchestra is now on a pinnacle of virtuosity, it retains the basic virtues of simplicity, dignity, reticence, supreme devotion to music. To many of us, great as it is, it doesn't sound like a visiting orchestra. It makes us feel we have come back home.

Concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Presented in Orchestra hall Sunday afternoon, Dec. 9, 1945. The program:
Symphony in E-flat major, Köchel 543 .... Mozart
Overture, "Leonore," No. 3..... Beethoven
Symphony No. 4, E minor......... Brahms

For one of the reassuring things about people is how easily we accept the best as our due. Take, for example, Mozart's utterly beguiling Symphony in E flat major. Mr. Koussevitzky's performance was quite the most beautiful I have heard, yet beyond certain initial shocks of sheer pleasure, it was the most natural performance in the world, of which you would say as we said of Monteux's Schumann at Ravinia, "Why, that's the way it ought to sound." It was the most supple Mozart imaginable, delicate yet glowing, held liquid in a sheath of luminous tone. Little turns of phrase were magically revealing, yet you heard the work as a whole, which is the finest gift a conductor and orchestra can make to an audience.

After the Mozart on a perfectly planned program came the great "Leonore" Overture, Beethoven in the magnificent style of Koussevitzky's "Eroica," darkling in texture, lofty in purpose, serene in performance that rose to one superb climax. And then came Brahms' Fourth Symphony, that goes in my gallery of memories with Stock's First and the Second as recently played by our orchestra with Bruno Walter.

It was tonally glorious, of course. What else could it be with such an orchestra? But it was also as mellow as if the orchestra had played it hundreds of times, as it probably has, and as fresh as if it never had been played before. It was lovingly burnished, yet crisp and clean with the transparence that brings out all the lovely inner voices without sacrifice of the score's great arch of characteristic line. Of it all, I liked the finale best, for when Mr. Koussevitzky comes to a passacaglia, he is a happy man. The statement of the theme and the glory of its variations will be something to remember until we hear its like again.

This Clipping From OMAHA, NEBR.
MORNING WORLD-HERALD

DEC 8 - 1945

Serge Koussevitzky . . . in Milwaukee hums "lost" cantata sent to Sibelius on Finnish composer's eightieth birthday anniversary.—AP Wirephoto.

Sibelius to Get 'Lost' Cantata

Milwaukee, Wis. (AP)—A "lost" cantata, Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," was winging its way to its composer Saturday on the Finnish master's eightieth birthday.

All copies of the cantata, including the original, were believed lost when a music publishing house in Leipzig, Germany, was bombed.

Saturday, the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented an all-Sibelius concert and a copy of the "Origin of Fire" was sent to Mr. Sibelius.

Oliver Daniel, producer of the Boston symphony, said the copy was pieced together from parts discovered in an American publishing house and the remaining sections which had been sent from Leipzig to America in 1938 for a concert.

Helsinki (AP)—The Finnish Government Saturday presented Composer Jean Sibelius an annual pension of $1,680 on his eightieth birthday. The composer was flooded with congratulatory telegrams in his suburban Helsinki villa.

Copy of 'Lost' Cantata Sent to Sibelius, 80, by Boston Symphony

Boston Globe
Dec. 9
1945

Boston Post

MILWAUKEE, Dec. 8 (AP)—A "lost" cantata, Jan Sibelius' "Origin of Fire," was winging its way to its composer today on the Finnish master's 80th birthday anniversary.

All copies of the cantata, including the original, were believed lost when a German music publishing house was bombed.

Today, the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented an all-Sibelius concert and a copy of the "Origin of Firt" was dispatched to Sibelius in Finland.

Oliver Daniel, producer of the Boston Symphony, said the copy was pieced together from parts discovered in an American publishing house and the remaining sections, which had been sent from Leipzig to America in 1938 for a concert.

HELSINKI, Dec. 8 (AP)—The Finnish Government today presented composer Jan Sibelius an annual pension of $1680 on his 80th birthday.

This Clipping From
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

DEC 9 - 1945

6,000 APPLAUDED — Conductor Serge Koussevitsky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra wipes his brow after thrilling performance of Sibelius' Second Symphony at the Auditorium last night. Sentinel photo.

Symphony Honoring Sibelius Here Called Most Thrilling in Years

By EDWARD P. HALLINE

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played Sibelius' "Finlandia" last night as if it were Beethoven's "Eroica," and the Finn's Second Symphony was made as spectacular and stirring as the closing scenes of "Goetterdaemmerung."

Dedicated to Sibelius, just turned 80, this broadcast portion of the concert at the Milwaukee Auditorium was just about the most thrilling symphonic music this community has heard in years.

And it was only the last half of a concert whose Russian first half was practically as exciting. The music which preceded the broadcast was a suite from Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" ballet, Moussorgsky's "Khovanstchina" Prelude and Rimsky-Korsakow's "Capriccio Espagnol."

UNHEARD HERE BEFORE

The Prokofieff, which hasn't been heard here before, was far different from the familiar Tschaikowsky lamentation on the same theme. It was brilliantly theatrical and Romeo's sighs rent rent the heavens in the screaming brasses of Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra.

The Moussogorsky music was spacious and beautiful, and Rimsky-Korsakow's Spanish excursion was a dazzling festival of one. That, indeed, was one especial virtue of the Bostonians' performnace. Whether a thing was emotionally stirring or not, it was bound to be musically exciting, for under Dr. Koussewitzsky the briefest drum roll, the slightest squeak of the woodwinds and a few inches of pizzicatti made their entrances and exits within the hearing of all. Nothing was drowned out, and everything was heard with the right proportion of sound. It was an example of inspired stage direction for a cast of virtuosos.

CLARITY IN ALL CHOIRS

On "Finlandia" the various choirs of the Boston orchestra worked with that superb clarity and incisiveness for which they are noted. More than that, Dr. Koussevitzky put all the intensity of his soul into this patriotic Finnish composition. It could not have helped but warm the heart of the rugged octogenarian who heard it, we hope, a few thousand miles away.

The Second Symphony is not Sibelius' best. For the first three movements, one might well have wished for the First, Third or Fifth Symphonies, all of which are more glamorous and brilliant. But these ideas were dispelled by the tremendous finale, where the music marches with giant strides and issues proclamations befitting the Day of Judgment. For that, if nothing else, let Dr. Koussevitzky and the Bostonians be thanked a thousand times.

Six thousand Arion Musical patrons packed the Auditorium to hear the concert. They also listened to Mayor Bohn tell the nation, via the broadcast, to come to Milwaukee's Centurama, the centennial birthday celebration next year.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

DEC 9 1945

AN INVESTIGATION

. . . brought out the fact that for the 1938 performance by the Boston Symphony Sibelius had portions of the work transmitted by radiophone from Leipzig, after copies of them had been lost by regular shipment. With the assistance of the Associated Music Publishers, the complete score has been put together, including the original parts sent by radiophone and a photograph made of the manuscript. This bound copy has been sent to Sibelius and he will have a photographic copy of his original manuscript for his personal archives.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

DEC 9 - 1945

Famed Boston Symphony, Mitropoulos and Gordon, Pianist with Civic

AND ART

By NORMAN NAIRN

DR. Serge Koussevitzky and the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will make their annual visit to the Eastman on Tuesday evening. So popular is this event that the house has been sold out completely for more than a month, and the possibility of any tickets being returned is remote. The program arranged for Tuesday comprises Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" and his Symphony No. 5, and Jan Sibelius' Symphony No. 2.

Boston Globe Dec. 9 1945

also Boston Post Dec. 9 1945

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

DEC 9 - 1945

Ex-G. I. Leads Philharmonic In Emergency

Walter Hendl, Conductor of Army Jazz Band, Fills in for Rodzinski

Walter Hendl, twenty-eight-year-old composer and conductor, whose recent Army career included the direction of a jazz band, called "The Jive Bombers," conducted the orchestra of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York at Carnegie Hall last night, after only a few hours' notice and a partial rehearsal. It was his first public appearance with the orchestra.

Mr. Hendl, who was appointed assistant conductor of the orchestra only three weeks ago, received an enthusiastic ovation from a capacity audience, many of whom had witnessed a similar pinch-hitting triumph two years ago by Leonard Bernstein, now director of the New York City Symphony.

Substituting for Dr. Artur Rodzinski, the orchestra's musical director, who was kept at home by a bad cold.

Had Conducted One Rehearsal

Until yesterday morning Mr. Hendl had conducted the orchestra in rehearsal only once before. Asked by Dr. Rodzinski to take the rehearsal yesterday, he was hard at work when, at 11:30 a. m., he learned that he would have to conduct the evening public performance.

"I sort of swallowed twice," he said yesterday afternoon, "and blinked a few times. Then I yelled to some one to call my wife and my mother and tell them about it, and to try to get them tickets. Then we went on rehearsing—the men were wonderful about it."

Under union regulations only a two-and-a-half-hour rehearsal was allowed. Mr. Hendl passed the afternoon with Dr. Rodzinski, going over the scores, then had "a big steak dinner with my wife."

Mr. Hendl was born in West New York, N. J., and at eighteen won the New Jersey State Music Contest sponsored by the Griffith Foundation. Later he studied at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, and in 1939 received a conducting fellowship under Fritz Reiner. He was associated with the music faculty of Sarah Lawrence College in Bronxville for three years and during the summers studied conducting with Serge Koussevitzky.

Inducted in Fall of '42

Still comparatively unknown in the music world, Mr. Hendl was taken into the Army in the fall of 1942. He passed most of the next two years at the New Castle Army Air Base in Delaware, working with the Army Air Forces Ferry Command, and building up his "Jive Bombers."

"I like jazz," he said yesterday "And I like folk music, and classical—I like music."

Discharged in December, 1944 after a period of hospitalization Mr. Hendl returned to serious music, writing the score for "Dark of the Moon" and organizing a current series of concerts at Town Hall called "This Is Our Music."

Mr. Hendl, a tall, blond young man with glasses, strove hard for composure yesterday, and in the midst of the attendant Carnegie Hall excitement, seemed to achieve it. His main problem seemed to be the tickets for his wife and his mother, Mrs. Ella Hendl, of Union City.

The problem was neatly solved by Mrs. Rodzinski later in the day. At last night's performance Mr. Hendl's mother and Mr. Hendl's wife sat proudly side by side in the Rodzinski box.

The Performance

The Philharmonic's playing last night was on the perfunctory side. The batonless Mr. Hendl kept his tempos very much on the strict side in the Mendlssohn and Schubert works; the result had no particular rhythmical surge. The Mendelssohn Scherzo had little of the essential airiness one is used to hearing in it. The dynamics were heavy. In the Schubert Symphony Mr. Hendl showed himself quite in control of sonorities, but his manipulation of them evinced insufficient sensitivity and imagination. The reading turned out to be competent but prosaic, wanting in emotional conviction.

The Second Rachmaninoff Concerto fared rather better than the preceding works. Gyorgy Sandor, who played the solo piano part, gave a solid and not too agitated performance. His tone was not of the brilliance one might have wished for, and the ensemble was a little inclined to crowd in upon his sound-realm, but his playing was precise and vigorous. Mr. Hendl kept soloist and orchestra together without difficulty.

P. B.

STORM OVER PARAY

Dec. 9 1945 Post

Critical Controversy Rages Here Now Over Frenchman's Quality as Conductor

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is always a good sign when a conductor or any artist stirs up controversy. It means that we still take music seriously. It means also that there is more than one standard of excellence, more than one path to a desired goal and, for that matter, more than one goal. Furthermore, an artist should feel flattered when there is disagreement about him. No great man is accepted as equally great by all competent authorities. Conversely, unaminity of opinion as to an artist's merits clearly implies that they are strictly limited.

There cannot be many people today who share the once common delusion that the conductor of an orchestra is there chiefly for show, that if the music is good and the band is good the result will be uniformly satisfactory. Such fundamental matters as tempo and dynamics are entirely up to him. There are also less definite, more imponderable issues, such as objectivity versus subjectivity in interpretation; a conductor's relative preoccupation with tone or with line, with expression or with motion; whether his approach is the historical one of making Beethoven sound (approximately) as he used to sound instead of trying to make him sound like Strauss or Tchaikovsky, and hence more exciting to an audience of today. Ernest Newman once held up Weingartner as an exemplar of the former attitude and Koussevitzky of the latter and cast his vote for Koussevitzky.

* * *

We have recently had in Boston, in the person of Paul Paray of Paris, a conductor quite different from any we have lately encountered, at least among directors of real stature. And he turned out to be a critical storm centre. Indeed, the readers of the various reviews must have wondered if their authors had really attended the same concert. There were those who thought that the Boston Symphony sounded fine under his direction and others who opined that tonally it bore but a distant resemblance to its customary self, who felt that Mr. Paray was relatively indifferent to color as such, more concerned with the bone structure of the music than with its flesh or at least with the state of its complexion. In the case of Ravel's "La Valse" it was obvious that he was emphasizing not its very apparent sensuousness but its underlying irony. Indeed he lately quoted the composer as having favored that very interpretation, though one recalls his own conducting of it here as resulting in something quite different from either the lush version of Koussevitzky or the cynical one of Paray. You would probably be safe in describing it as a compromise between the two, as a golden mean between their extremes.

The learned in such matters assure us that Mr. Paray's approach to music is typically French in its rather spare directness, its analytical quality, its relative impersonality. Yet, oddly enough in certain instances, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," for example, he succeeded in making the piece sound not more French but less so and you wondered why, if the conductor was so indifferent to the purely sensuous element, Franck, Debussy and Ravel had laid such obvious stress upon it, conjuring up in their various ways some of the most succulent, the most ravishing sounds in orchestral literature. Had Mr Paray given us a drab Sibelius you would have got his point better.

* * *

For my personal taste Mr. Paray was happier with Beethoven's Fifth, in his second program, than he had been with any of the French compositions of the week before, Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which by general consent he handled superbly, making it more graphic, more vividly expressive than any other who has presented it here of late. His Beethoven of the first two movements of the C minor was convincingly Beethovenish and what he did with them will not soon be forgotten. But why did he take the scherzo so slowly and likewise rob the finale of a measure of its excitement by similarly deliberate pace? Here one gracefully recalled Koussevitzky's stirring reading of a year ago.

Anyway, however you felt about this or that piece or the man in general, Mr. Paray stimulated us, he made us think, he forced us to reconsider things we had begun to take for granted and whether or not he really succeeded in so doing we must admire him for endeavoring to speak for the composer rather than for himself. Which is hardly the attitude of the prima donna conductors, the glamour boys of the baton (or the expressive hand), who have made the leader, not the orchestra, the music itself or the assisting artist the true box-office magnet. Possibly we have been lured from the path of musical rectitude but some of us are again ready for a touch of the familiar Koussevitzky magic. We like, not too much, perhaps, but just a little hypnotism with our music.

* * *

A repetition of the new Prokofieff Fifth Symphony, Beethoven's "Emperor" Piano Concerto with Alexander Borovsky as soloist and his Overture to "Coriolanus" make this week's Symphony program. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

DEC 9 1945

A PHOTOGRAPHIC

. . . copy of a manuscript which its composer, Jan Sibelius, had believed lost, has been made by the American Broadcasting company and was presented to the Finnish master as a gift on his 80th birthday. Sibelius let it be known a short time ago that he lacked the manuscript of his "Origin of Fire," a work written in 1902 and presented in 1938 by the Boston Symphony orchestra. He had sent the manuscript to Breitkopf and Hartel, music publishers in Leipzig, and when allied bombing of the city destroyed the plant the manuscript became a war casualty.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 9 - 1945

HENDL, 28, CONDUCTS THE PHILHARMONIC

Assistant Wins Plaudits After Taking Over for Rodzinski, Ill, on Short Notice

Due to the sudden indisposition of Artur Rodzinski, last night's concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall was led by Walter Hendl, the organization's newly appointed 28-year-old assistant conductor, who took over the baton on short notice, and with but one rehearsal. Despite the handicaps involved in this initial appearance with the orchestra, Mr. Hendl directed the lengthy and exacting program in a serious, intelligent and creditable manner.

His debut offered a striking parallel to that of Leonard Bernstein, who first attracted wide attention, when at the last moment he was called upon to conduct the Philharmonic on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 14, 1943, because Bruno Walter had become ill. Like Mr. Bernstein, Mr. Hendl is an American in his twenties, and a composer and pianist, as well as a conductor. Both musicians, moreover, had studied conducting with Serge Koussevitzky in the Berkshires, and both had the unexpected privilege of leading the orchestra shortly after their appointment to the assistant conductorship.

Clean-Cut Performances

Following an announcement by Bruno Zirato, the orchestra's associate manager, that Mr. Hendl would replace Dr. Rodzinski at this concert, the youthful conductor came on stage to lead his first offerings, the Overture and Scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream." Directing without stick, he held his forces together capably in the two selections, giving performances of them that, if not displaying any marked individuality or sensitiveness, were clean-cut and alive. Although there were occasional blemished attacks, as in the chords of the woodwinds in the closing measures of the overture, they could be excused, considering the brief rehearsal period possible under the circumstances.

For the monumental Symphony in C major, No. 7, which came next, a more decisive beat was needed than Mr. Hendl brought to its four extensive movements. This was especially the case in the great finale, which though energetically presented wanted the incisive rhythmic pulsation required to bring out its essential character. Some episodes in the work as a whole were ably read, but in general the interpretation was more animated and straightforward than deeply imaginative, with a lack of tenderness and intensity in most of the lyric parts of the opus.

The concert terminated with the piano concerto in C minor, No. 2, of Rachmaninoff, with Gyorgy Sandor as soloist. Because of the length of the program this reviewer was able to hear only the first movement of this work. Mr. Hendl had no difficulty in keeping the musicians under steady command in the opening division, but he did little to mitigate the over-heavy orchestral scoring, so that mountainous evocations of sound were summoned up against which Mr. Sandor's left hand passagework was obscured, though the glassy, pounded tones produced by his right hand emerged over the orchestra clearly and coldly.

Mr. Hendl left no doubt of his solidly grounded musicianship. It must be remembered that he came to his task without the benefit of sufficient time for adequate preparation of so formidable a schedule, and that he merited praise for his accomplishment under the handicaps he suffered, in spite of the deficiencies mentioned. His endeavors were definitely appreciated by the large audience present, which was fervent in its applause after each of the offerings.

Mr. Hendl did not know he was to conduct the orchestra until he attended the rehearsal held yesterday morning, when it developed that Dr. Rodzinski would not be able to direct because of a severe sore throat. Whether Dr. Rodzinski would be in physical condition to lead this afternoon's concert could not be decided last night.

Taught at Sarah Lawrence

Mr. Hendl was appointed assistant conductor of the orchestra Nov. 20, to succeed Ignace Strasfogel, who retired. He was born at West New York, N. J., and educated in Union City. At 18 he won the award of the New Jersey State Music Contest sponsored by the Griffith Foundation, and in 1937 was awarded a piano scholarship with David Saperton at the Curtis Institute. In 1939, he won a conducting fellowship at that school, under Fritz Reiner, and then began a three-year period as member of the music faculty of Sarah Lawrence College.

During the summer of 1941 and 1942 he studied conducting with Serge Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Music Center and also appeared as student pianist and student conductor at the Berkshire Festival. In 1942 he conducted the New Jersey N.Y.A. Orchestra in Newark, and in the fall of that year enlisted in the Air Forces Ferry Command, from which he was honorably discharged in December, 1944, after six months' hospitalization. Since his discharge he wrote the score for the current Broadway play, "Dark of the Moon," and has appeared as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a "Pops" concert, as piano soloist with Leon Barzin's orchestra over WQXR and with the Columbia Broadcasting Orchestra, under Fritz Reiner. He also organized and directed the recent series of lecture discussions, "This Is Our Music," a survey of American music given in Town Hall.

N. S.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 9 - 1945

A ROUNDUP OF RADIO LISTENING

By OLIN DOWNES

We have been around a lot in late days, hearing music. Thus we attended what can properly be called the American debut of Paul Paray, the distiguished French conductor, as guest leader with the Boston Symphony. We heard the same organization, under Koussevitzky, when it brought over Prokofieff's new Fifth symphony. And we attended the Metropolitan opening, hearing Mr. Ralf, the new Lohengrin tenor, and Fritz Busch conducting—from a safe place, with reading lamp at our side, score on the pillow before us, radio at the proper angle. In short, we listened, during a period of convalescence happily ending, in bed, and found the circumstance most propitious for music.

Toscanini conducted with the NBC Orchestra a notable Italian program. Rodzinski, with the Philharmonic-Symphony, presented John Alden Carpenter's new symphonic poem, "The Seven Ages of Man," after the moralizings of Shakespeare. WQXR started an uncommonly interesting series of piano music through the centuries. A whole repertory of chamber music came over the air while we reflected that there are compensations in this world for inactivity, and that it's an ill wind that blows no good to a lover of music.

Faure Work Broadcast

Mr. Paray is a find. He had conducted once in New York at a summer Stadium concert, but this was his first real chance to show what he could do with an orchestra of unsurpassed powers, as sensitive to his wishes as a violinist finds a Stradivarius. He conducted the Fauré excerpts from the score composed for Mrs. Patrick Campbell's production of "Pelléas et Mélisande," the drama. He interpreted with enough grave reticence and depth of feeling to complete its poetical spell. When he directed Ravel's "La Valse" he took it, for an exception among virtuoso conductors, as a waltz of Viennese pace and swing—that is to say, at a considerably slower tempo and in a more nostalgic spirit than is customary. This did not lessen, but rather intensified its tragic undertone and sardonic style. When the coda came, with the crashes that make the measures, in the memorable phrase of Lawrence Gilman, "as perturbing as a mobilization order," the effect was three times the more powerful for having been held in reserve. The same principle obtained in Dukas' "Sorcerer's Apprentice." It was held strictly to the measure, with far more of burlesque than is ever achieved by the customary exaggerations. By contrast were the clear melodic lines, the rich yet delicate colors and the tonal balances of "L'Après-midi d'un faune." In this remarkably equipped conductor we have first and last a musician, not a sensationalist, but a most perceptive interpreter, whose art should be better known to our public.

Also it is true that French orchestration, beautiful in its clarity and economy of means, is the kind of instrumentation that transmits beautifully. One is not as sure of the exact effect of Prokofieff's Fifth symphony, heard on the air, as he is of Ravel or Dukas or Mr. Paray's conducting. Prokofieff's symphony is, in the first place, more savage and weighty than the French scores. It is masterly in the boldness of its progression and its transformation of insignificant themes into grand symphonic utterances. But it does not, and perhaps can't, at this stage of radio, sound as clearly as slighter instrumentation. Nor can its climaxes come through as the score showed that they must in the concert hall. The radio's limited sonorous gamut doesn't permit this. Nevertheless, an extremely impressive score, and one more testimony to the immense productivity of contemporaneous Russian composers.

[46]

This Clipping From LIFE
CHICAGO, ILL.
DEC 10 1945

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, performs Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony at a concert in Boston's Symphony Hall. This orchestra, regarded by many as the finest in the U.S., is noted for its remarkable satin-smooth tone, flawless teamwork and hair-trigger responsiveness to the motions of a conductor's baton. Founded in 1881, the Boston Symphony is the third oldest in the U.S. The New York Philharmonic-Symphony and the St. Louis Symphony are older. String players occupy foreground and extreme left of picture. Woodwinds are in the middle, brasses behind them. Empty chairs at rear are those of trombonists and tuba player, who do not play in this Beethoven symphony. Seating arrangement is explained at right.

12-13-[illegible]

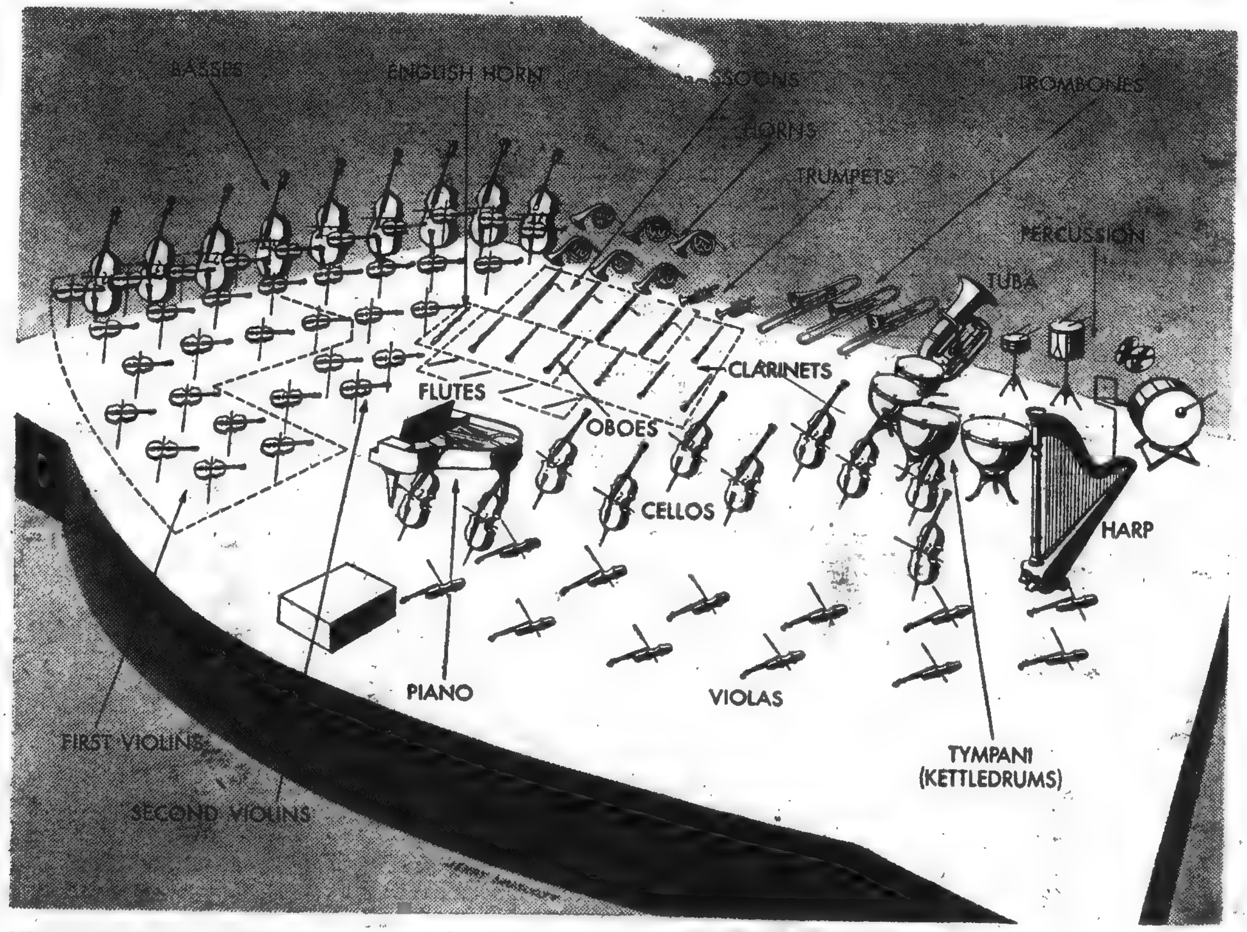
The Symphony Orchestra

IT TAKES 100 MEN TO PLAY THE WORLD'S GREATEST MUSIC

Most of the greatest music in the world is written for an intricate, collective musical instrument called the symphony orchestra. It consists of a carefully balanced arrangement of individual musical instruments, ranging from violins to bassoons, played by a team of nearly 100 highly trained specialists. Its organization is as standardized as that of an army and its actions are as carefully coordinated as those of a military campaign. Under the direction of famous conductors like Toscanini, Koussevitzky, Beecham, Mitropoulos, symphony orchestras provide most of the high-class music heard over the radio and in U.S. concert halls. Some of them, like the Boston Symphony (left), New York Philharmonic, Philadelphia Orchestra and Chicago Symphony, are world-famous organizations whose members have played together for many years.

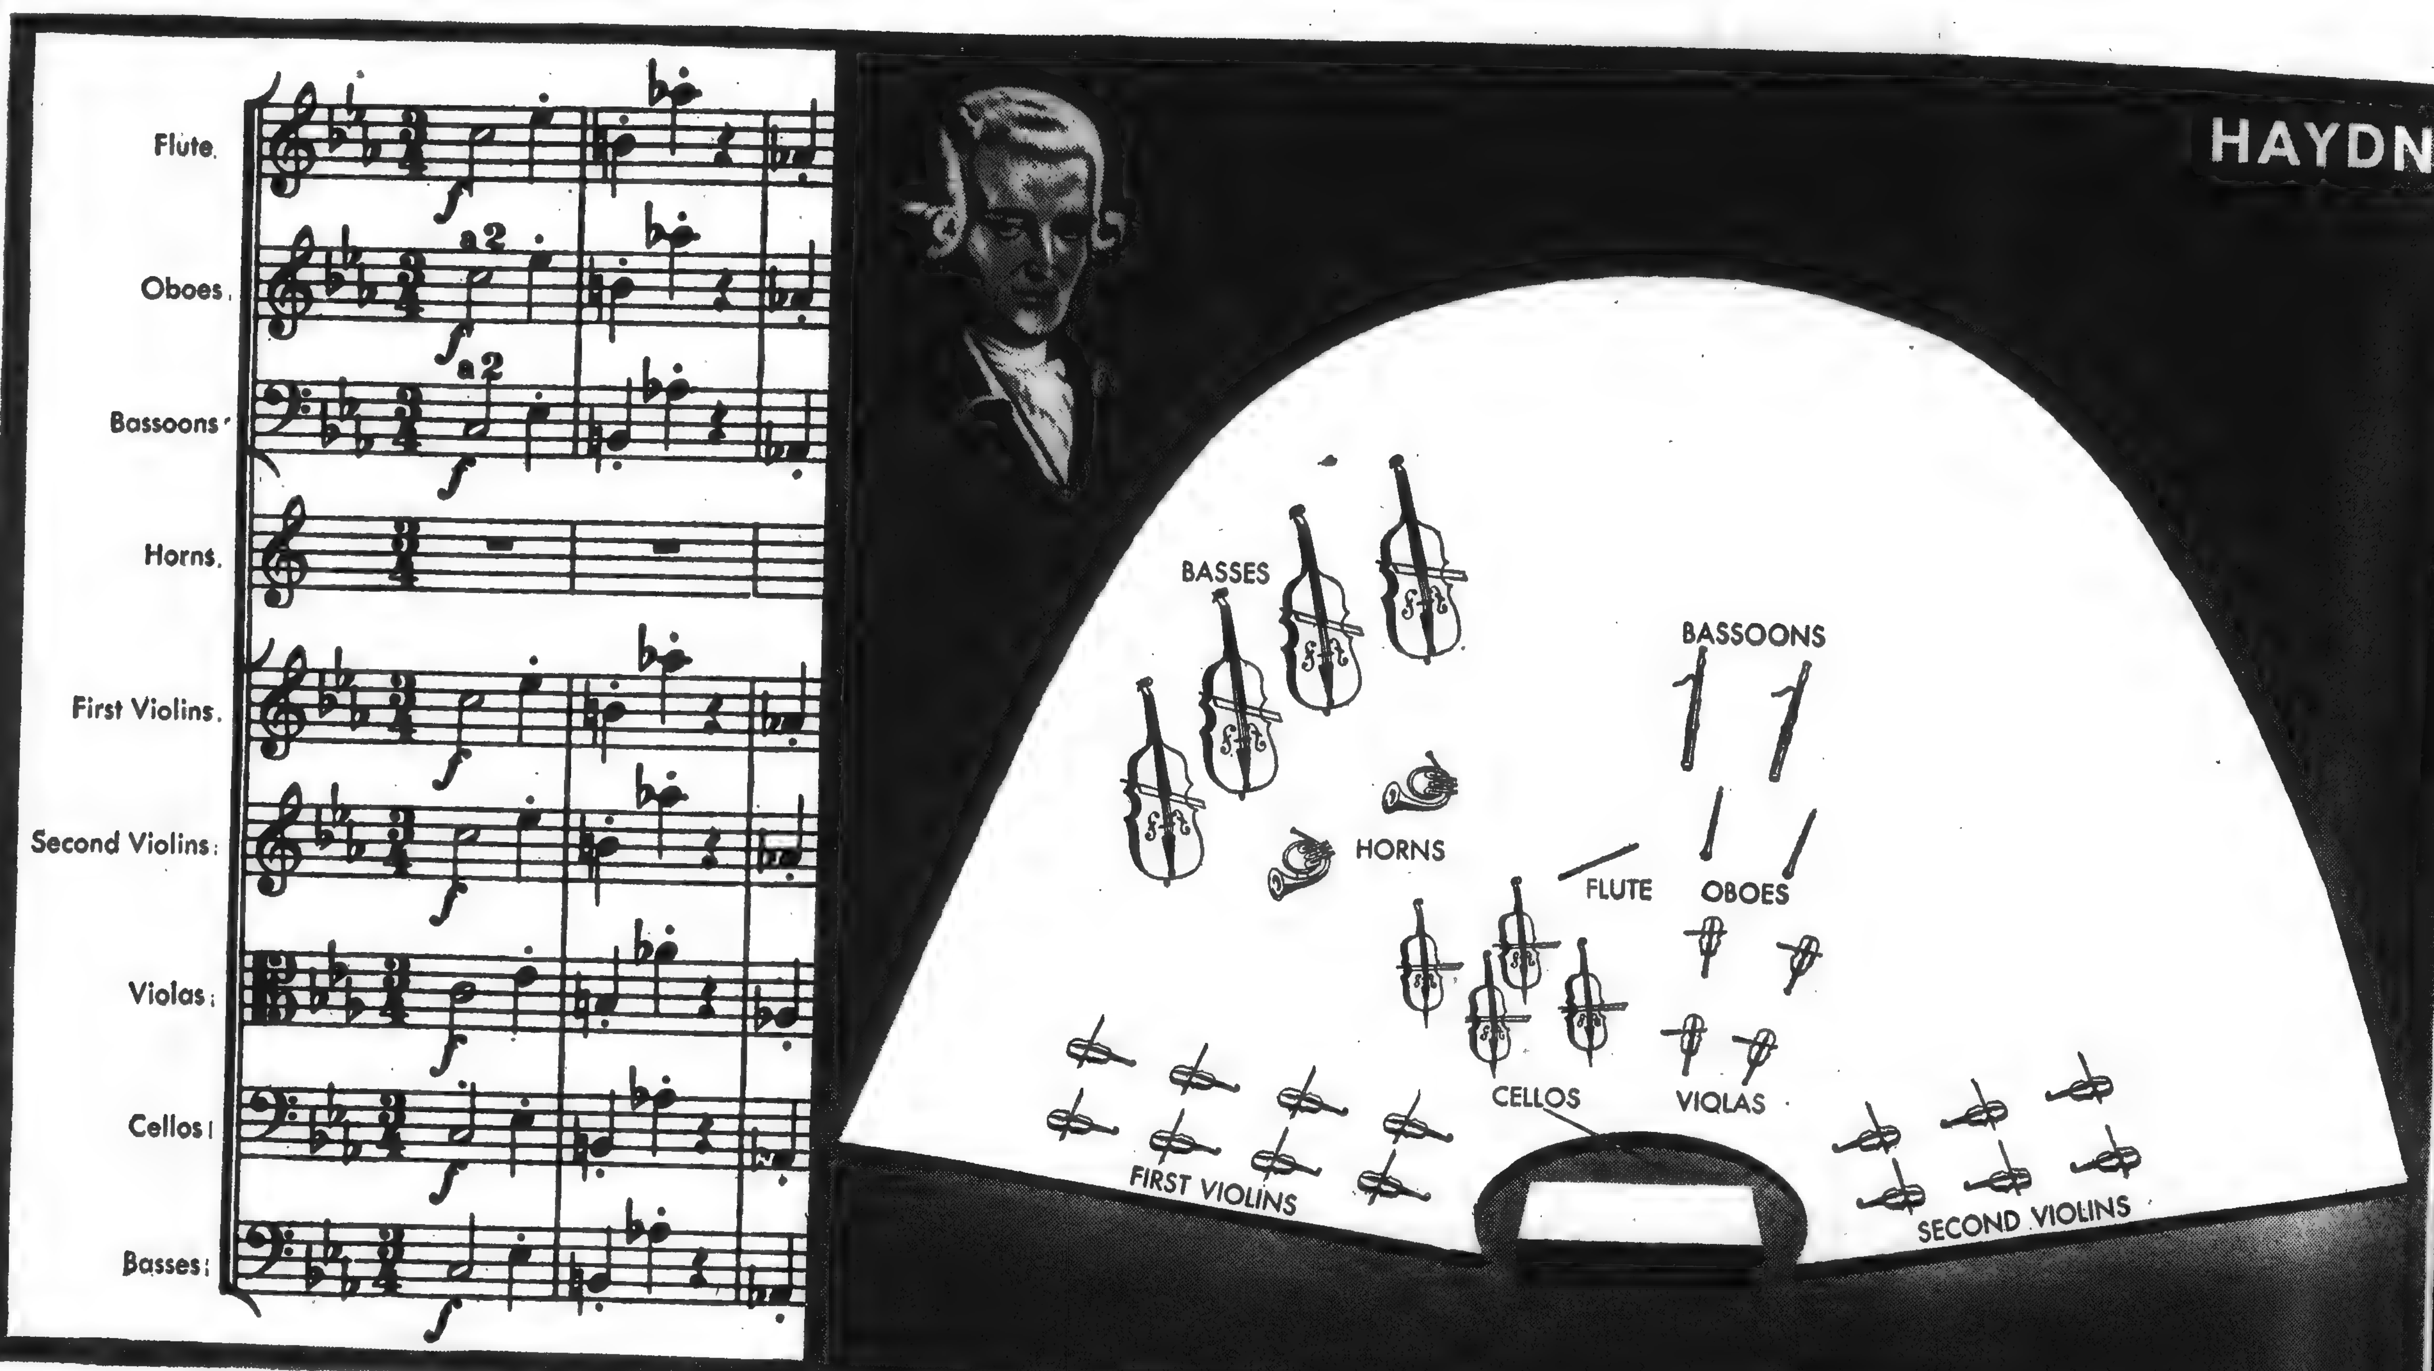
America has more symphony orchestras by far than any other country in the world. Of the 350 symphony orchestras in the U.S., 30 are generally ranked among the world's finest. Of these, five (New York, Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia and the NBC Symphony) are unequaled anywhere outside the U.S. These top-rank orchestras cost around a million dollars a year to run and, though their concerts draw an annual audience of more than 3,000,000 people, they invariably lose money at the box office. Their losses are cheerfully made up by ardent U.S. music lovers who feel that the ability to hear and provide great music is worth some financial sacrifice.

But a symphony orchestra is more than an efficient musical machine and a financial headache. It is an instrument of incredibly varied resources which can be used by a master composer to create endless combinations and contrasts in tone color. In the 200 years since Austrian Composer Josef Haydn invented it, nearly every composer of consequence has written for its beautifully balanced choirs of strings, woodwinds and brass, gradually has added new instruments until it reached today's proportions. The make-up of the modern symphony orchestra and the steps in its evolution are illustrated on the following pages.



UNORTHODOX SEATING is used by Koussevitzky. He places his violas and cellos on his right, all his violins on his left. Most conductors put first violins on left, second violins on right. Koussevitzky believes his arrangement achieves closer violin coordination.

CONTINUED ON NEXT PAGE



Flute
Oboes
Bassoons
Horns
First Violins
Second Violins
Violas
Cellos
Basses
a2 a2
HAYDN
BASSES
BASSOONS HORNS FLUTE
OBOES CELLOS
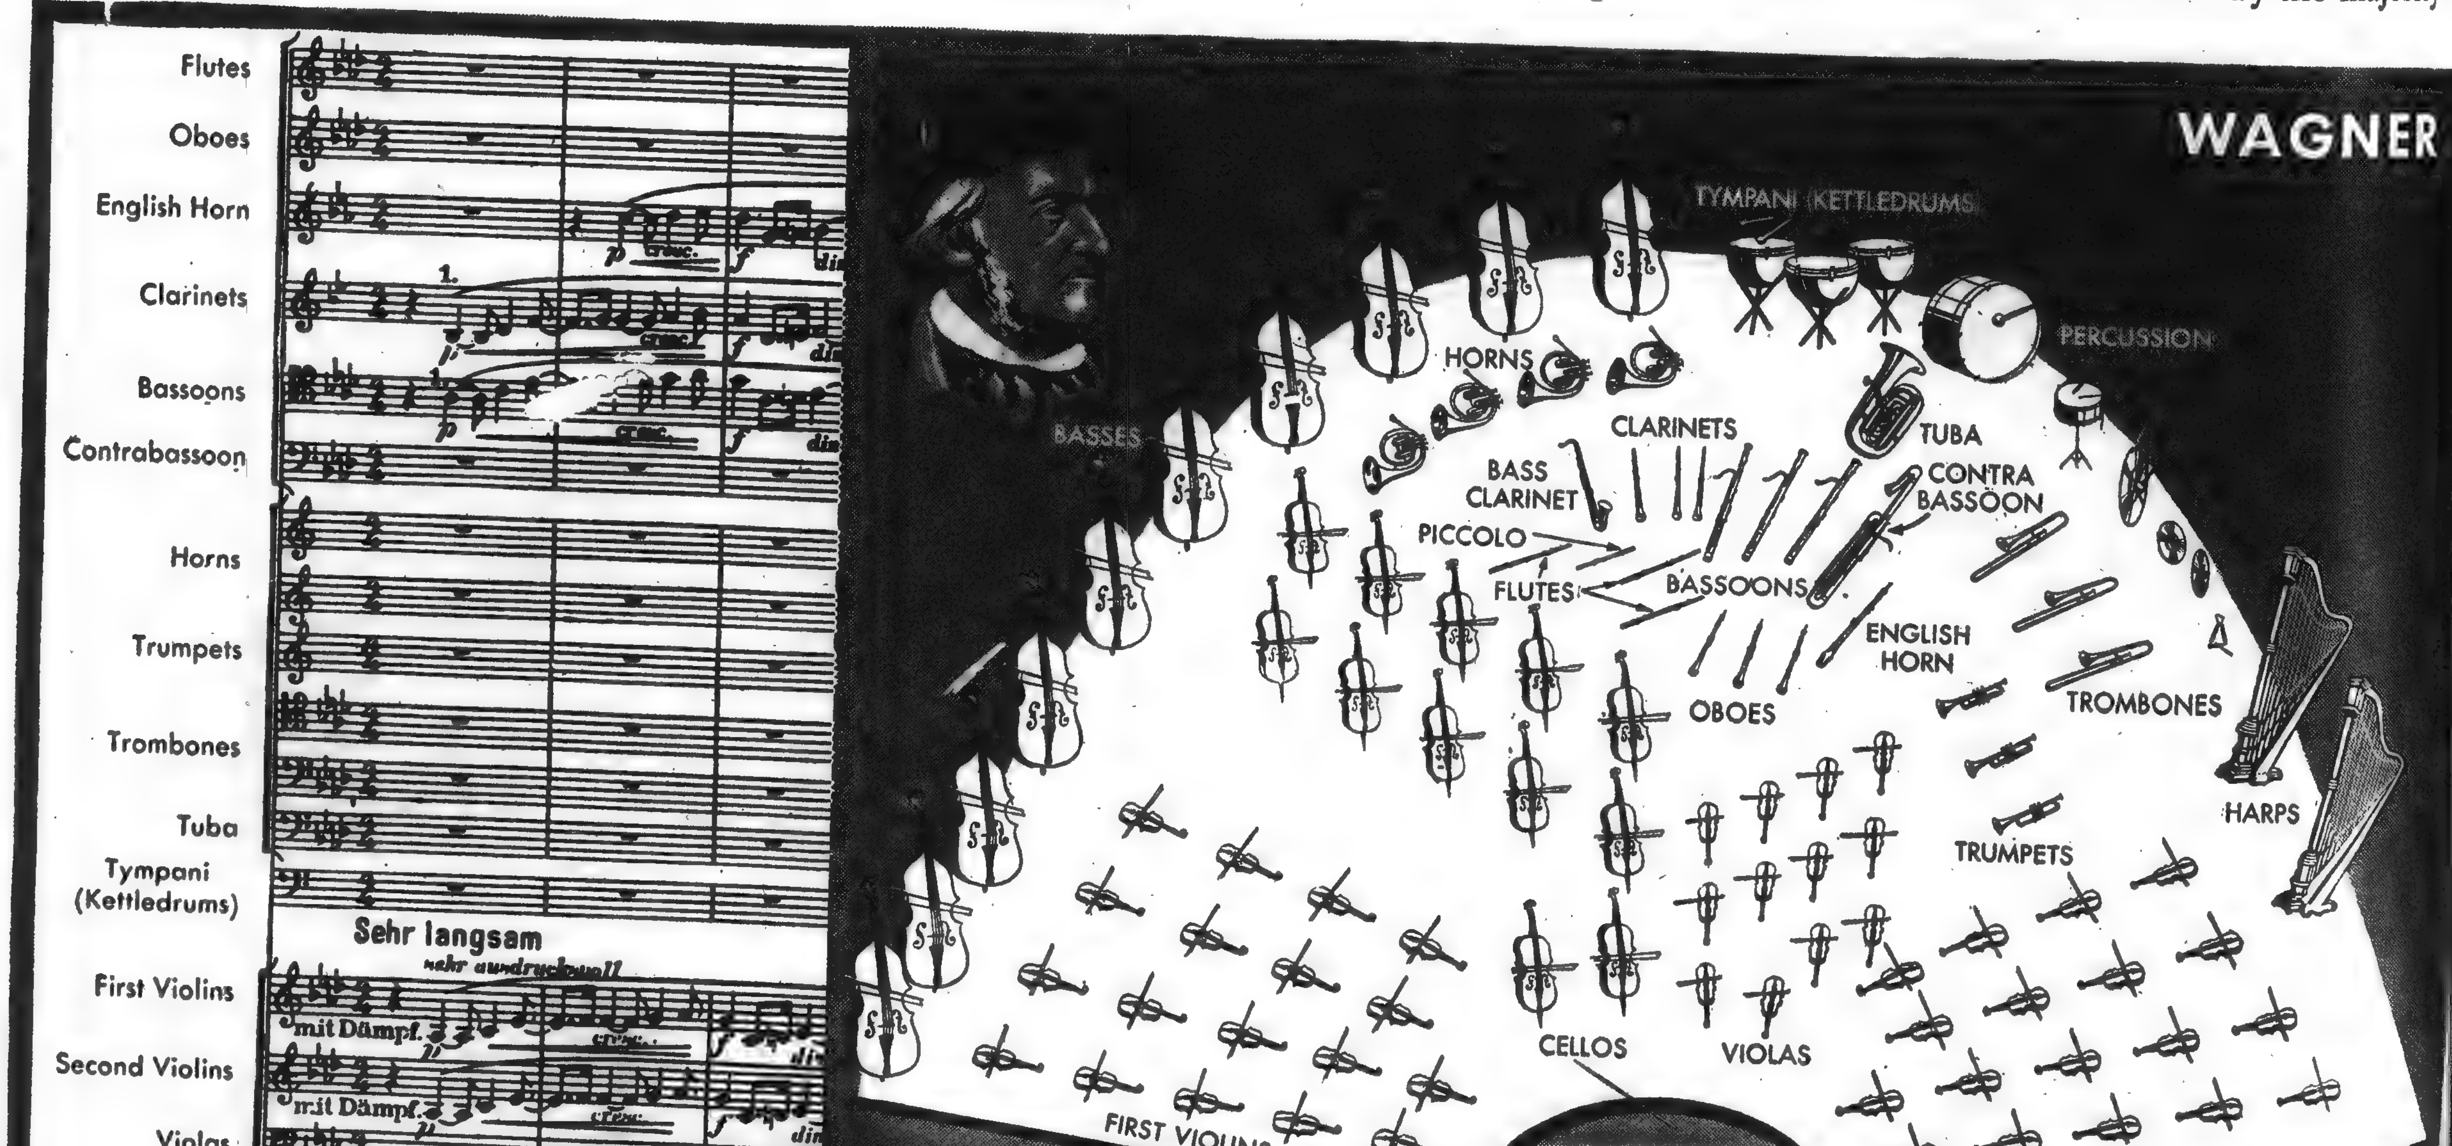
VIOLAS
FIRST VIOLINS
SECOND VIOLINS

ORIGINAL ORCHESTRA, standardized nearly 200 years ago by Josef Haydn, seldom exceeded 33-man combination shown above beside opening page of his 78th Symphony. It contained all essential elements of modern orchestra: five groups of strings, a small set of woodwinds (flute, oboes, bassoons), an equally small set of brasses (horns).

IT HAS GROWN IN 200 YEARS

Since its first appearance, in Austria about 1750, the symphony orchestra has grown tremendously in size and complexity. But its outlines have not changed. The diagrams on these pages show different stages of its evolution in the hands of four great composers. Beside each diagram is a page of the printed score of a typical composition by the composer represented. Symphony scores are written with a different line for each instrument, are used by conductors while directing the men in the orchestra. The seating arrangement shown in the diagrams is traditional and is used by the majority of



Flutes
Oboes
English Horn
Clarinets
Bassoons
Contrabassoon
Horns
Trumpets
Trombones
Tuba
Tympani (Kettledrums)
Sehr langsam sehr ausdrucksvoll mit Dämpf.
First Violins
Second Violins
Violas
Cellos
Basses
WAGNER
TYMPANI (KETTLEDRUMS)
PERCUSSION
HORNS
BASSES
CLARINETS
BASS CLARINET
TUBA
CONTRA BASSOON
PICCOLO
FLUTES
BASSOONS
ENGLISH HORN
OBOES
TROMBONES
HARPS
TRUMPETS
CELLOS
VIOLAS
FIRST VIOLINS
SECOND VIOLINS

FOR "PARSIFAL" (1882) (the opening measures of which are shown above left) Richard Wagner used a modern symphony orchestra like the Boston, shown on the preceding page. To Beethoven's Fifth Symphony combination he has added harps, English horn, bass clarinet, tuba, percussion, as well as extra horns, woodwinds and strings.

10-13-

BEETHO

HIS "FIFTH SYMPH enlarged Haydn's phony orchestra ussevitzky (see p gements of their Every symphony oirs"—the strin ach of which co

STRAV

PIAN

"THE RITE OF SPR of the largest and et of woodwinds (flute, set of brasses (horns).

composition by the ony scores are written instrument, are used he men in the orchesshown in the diaby the majority of

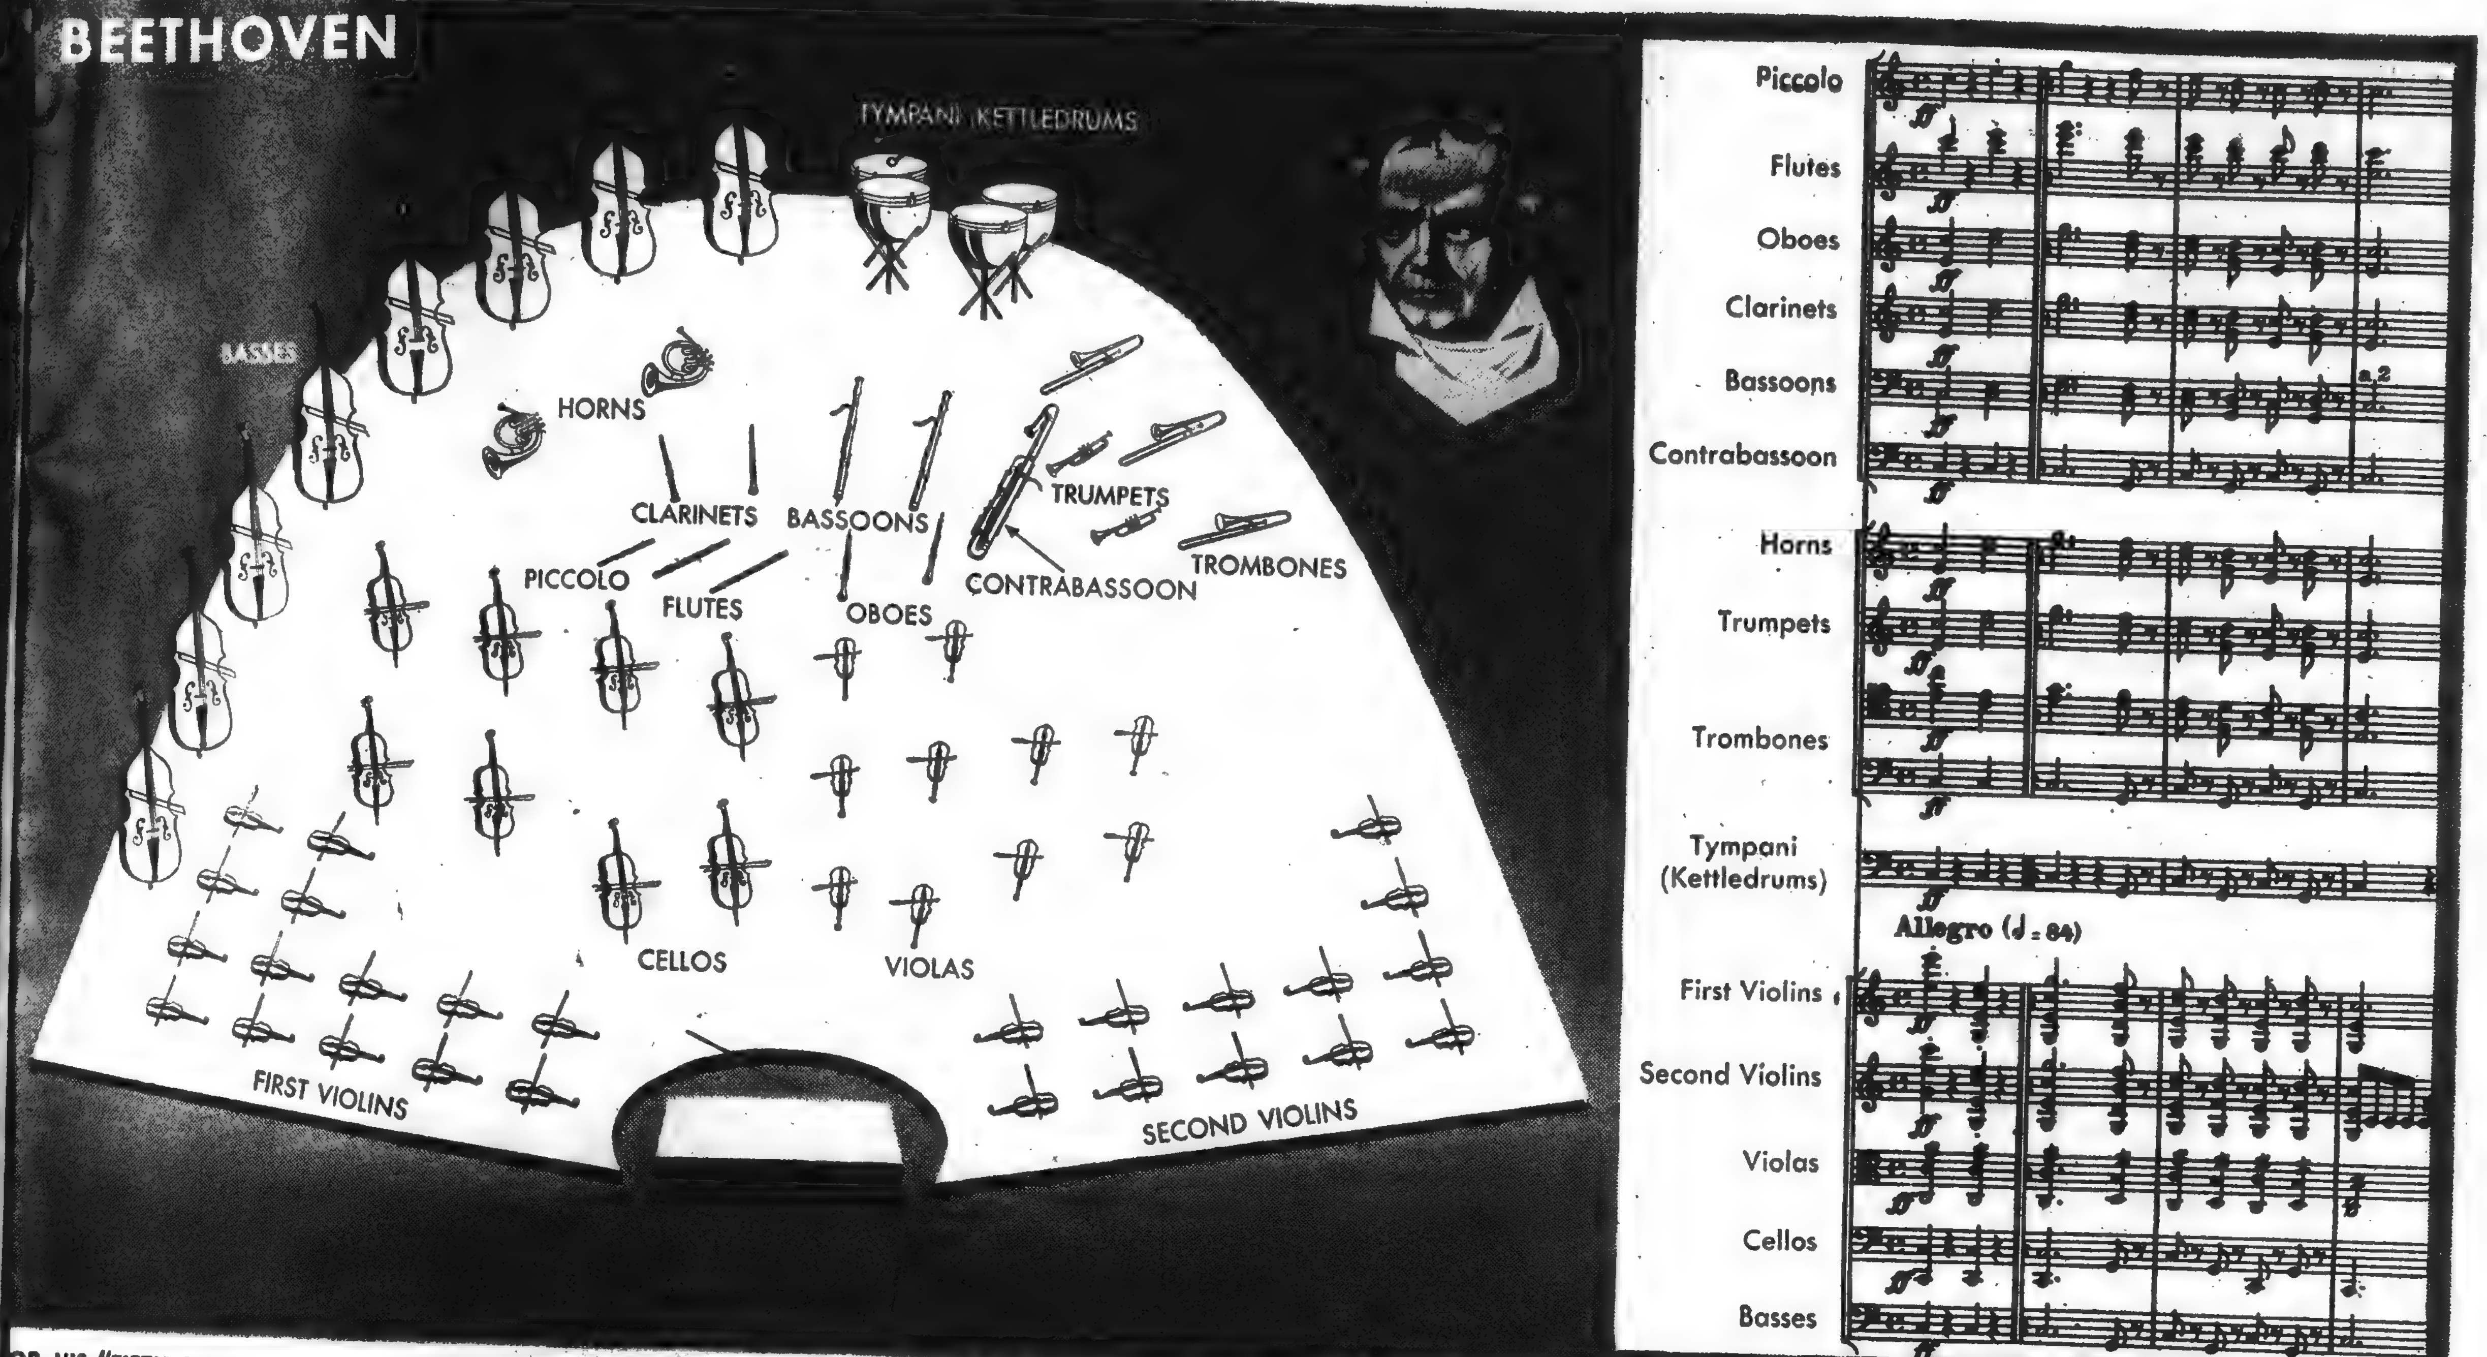
BEETHOVEN



TYMPANI (KETTLEDRUMS)
BASSES
HORNS
CLARINETS
BASSOONS
TRUMPETS
PICCOLO
FLUTES
OBOES CONTRABASSOON
TROMBONES
CELLOS
VIOLAS
FIRST VIOLINS
SECOND VIOLINS
Piccolo
Flutes
Oboes
Clarinets
Bassoons
Contrabassoon
Horns
Trumpets
Trombones
Tympani (Kettledrums)
Allegro (♩ = 84)
First Violins
Second Violins
Violas
Cellos
Basses

OR HIS "FIFTH SYMPHONY" (1807) Beethoven considerbly enlarged Haydn's orchestra, adding a piccolo, an extra flute, two clarinets, a contrabassoon, two trumpets, three trombones, tympani and many extra string players. Score at right shows opening of the last movement with all the instruments going full blast. ff means very loud.

ymphony orchestras. Some conductors, like Serge Koussevitzky (see pages 98-99), prefer special arangements of their own.

Every symphony orchestra consists of three "choirs"—the string, the woodwind and the brass—each of which constitutes a veritable small orchestra in itself. Most important of these is the string choir, which has always been divided into five sections: first violins, second violins, violas, cellos and basses. Members of these sections play in unison (i.e., all first violins play the same part). Woodwind choir, unlike string, consists of soloists who do not usually play in unison. It ranges in tone, in the modern orchestra, from high squeaks of the piccolo to low rumblings of the contrabassoon. Brass choir also consists of soloists with individual parts. Percussion section, consisting of kettledrums, gongs, cymbals, etc., is added for exclamation and spice.

VAGNER NES HARPS
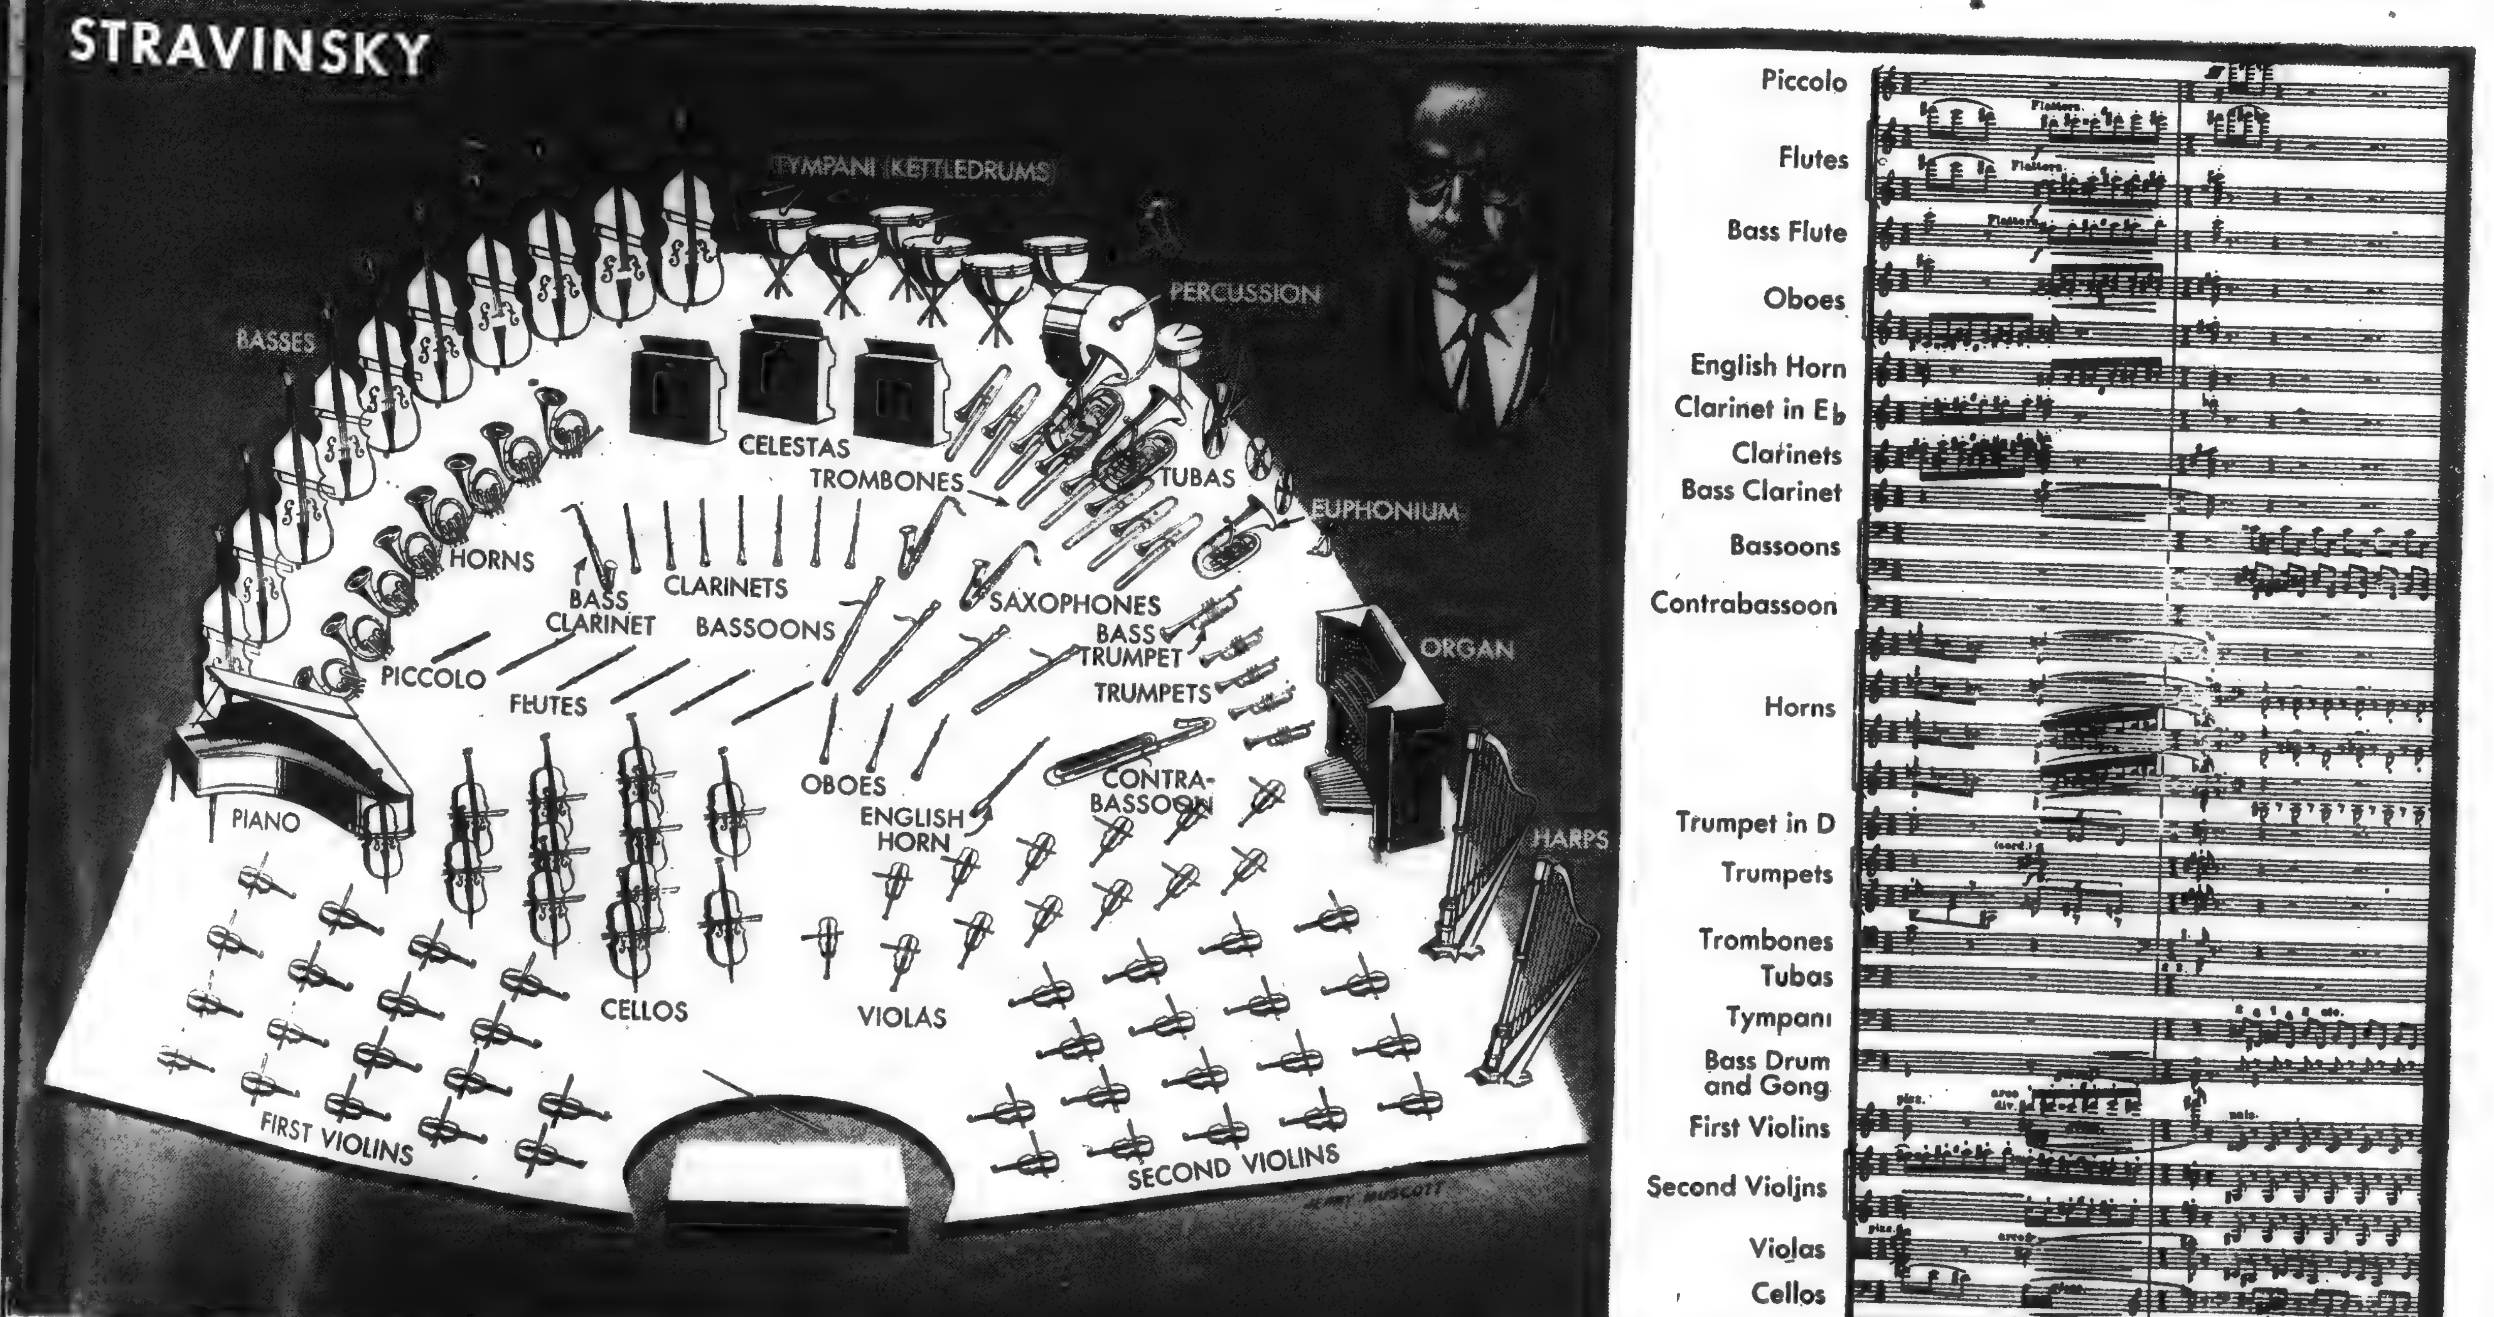
IOLINS

, bass clarinet, tuba, per-
, woodwinds and strings.

STRAVINSKY



TYMPANI (KETTLEDRUMS)
PERCUSSION
BASSES
CELESTAS
TROMBONES
TUBAS EUPHONIUM
HORNS
BASS CLARINET
CLARINETS
BASSOONS
SAXOPHONES
BASS TRUMPET ORGAN PICCOLO
FLUTES
TRUMPETS
OBOES
ENGLISH HORN
CONTRA-BASSOON
PIANO
HARPS
CELLOS
VIOLAS
FIRST VIOLINS
SECOND VIOLINS
Piccolo
Flutes
Bass Flute
Oboes
English Horn
Clarinet in E♭
Clarinets
Bass Clarinet
Bassoons
Contrabassoon
Horns
Trumpet in D
Trumpets
Trombones
Tubas
Tympani
Bass Drum and Gong
First Violins
Second Violins
Violas
Cellos
Basses

FOR "THE RITE OF SPRING" (1913) Igor Stravinsky used one of the largest and most complicated orchestrations ever devised, utilizing more than 125 men with such additional instruments as organ, celestas, euphonium and the piano. Even the crowded page of the score at right fails to show all the instruments used in this composition.

CONTINUED ON NEXT PAGE

VIOLINIST John Corigliano is concertmaster (chief first violin) of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, where he sets the pace for 17 other first violins. New York born and trained, he is excellent solo violinist as well as orchestral expert.

VIOLA PLAYER Carlton Cooley heads the viola section of the NBC Symphony. His instrume is much like a violin but larger and lower in pitch. The viola is supposed to be played by o appointed violinists, but Cooley is a specialist, has always played viola since the age of seve

HORN PLAYER James C coiled instrument, po and Wagner because CELLIST Leonard Rose is chief cellist of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. Born in Washington, D.C., he made his first concert tour at the age of 14, has since played with the Cleveland Orchestra and NBC Symphony under Toscanini.

BASS PLAYER Anton Torello, a Spaniard by birth, is head of the Philadelphia Orchestra's bas section and, with the exception of Conductor Serge Koussevitsky (who is also a virtuoso on th bass), the most famous bass player in the U.S. Torello has appeared in recitals as a soloist

TROMBONIST Robert Jo the trombone instead a trombonist. He spen

THESE ARE TOP ORCHESTRA MEN

It takes at least 18 different types of musical specialist to make up a modern symphony orchestra. Each of these specialists must have spent many years mastering his instrument and the techniques of many of the instruments follow century-old traditions. Specialists on particularly rare or difficult instruments like the oboe, horn and bassoon often command salaries up to $300 or $400 a week and are fought over by managers of U. S. orchestras much as .370 hitters are fought over by the managers of U. S. baseball teams.

The symphonic players shown on this and the following pages are champions of their leading candidates for phony orchestra. Up ers in U.S. sympho born and trained, as

12-137

NBC Symphony. His instrume is supposed to be played by a yed viola since the age of seve he Philadelphia Orchestra's bas sky (who is also a virtuoso on th appeared in recitals as a soloist

HORN PLAYER James Chambers is the first horn of the Philadelphia Orchestra. His tightly coiled instrument, popularly known as the French horn, was a great favorite of Beethoven and Wagner because of its hauntingly beautiful tone. It is also frightfully difficult to play.

TRUMPETER Harry Glantz of the NBC Symphony is the champion of U.S. symphonic trumpeters. Though born in Russia he was trained in the U.S. Glantz is noted for his large, brilliant tone and enormous agility in playing rapid passages.

TROMBONIST Robert Jones of the Detroit Symphony wanted to be a saxophone player, took up the trombone instead because the band in the town where he spent his childhood needed a trombonist. He spent six years with the Kansas City Symphony before going to Detroit.

TUBA PLAYER William Bell of the New York Philharmonic was born in Creston, Iowa. His job requires greater lung power than any other in the entire orchestra and he can play lower than anybody but the contrabassoonist (see p. 105) oboe, horn and bassoon ofter to $300 or $400 a week and managers of U. S. orchestras are fought over by the man-all teams.

layers shown on this and the following pages are not necessarily the undisputed champions of their specialties, but they would be leading candidates for a champion all-American symphony orchestra. Up to a generation ago most players in U.S. symphony orchestras were European born and trained, as few Americans had either the inclination or the opportunity to study such obscure professions as English horn and contrabassoon playing. But this situation has gradually changed. Today the Europeans are becoming a fast-dwindling minority. Of the 18 high-ranking specialists shown on these pages, 12 were born and trained in the U.S.

The finest U.S. orchestras are noted not only for the particular excellence of certain individual soloists, but also sometimes for the quality of whole choirs. The finest woodwind choir in the U.S., for example, is that of the Philadelphia Orchestra; the finest string choir is that of the Boston Symphony.

CONTINUED ON NEXT PAGE

PICCOLO PLAYER George Peter Madsen of the Boston Symphony carries his instrument in his vest pocket, like a pencil. Really a small flute, it emits orchestra's highest notes.

FLUTIST William Kincaid, generally considered the finest in the U.S., plays a solid-platinum flute in the Philadelphia Orchestra. Flutes are also made of silver, gold, wood.

OBOIST Marcel Tabuteau of the Philadelphia Orchestra i the world's champion on his instrument. The oboe ha been favorite solo instrument from Haydn to Stravinsky ENGLISH HORN PLAYER Harvey McGuire plays in the Cleveland Orchestra. McGuire's nasal-toned instrument is neither English nor a horn but a low-pitched variety of oboe.

CLARINETIST Simeon Bellison of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony was born in Moscow. His instrument is the same as Benny Goodman's, but he plays it differently.

BASS CLARINETIST Peter Zukowsky's instrument looks like a large saxophone, but is made mainly of wood and has a mellower tone. He plays in the Chicago Symphony.

BASSOONIST Benjamin Kohon's instrument is to an oboe what a cello is to a violin. Kohon is a leading member of the woodwind section of Toscanini's NBC Symphony.

HARPIST Alice Chalifoux plays with the Cleveland Orchestra. Most U.S. symphony harpists are women. Harps were not widely used in symphonies until mid-19th Century.

TYMPANIST Saul Goodman of the NewYork Philharmonic plays instruments also known as kettledrums. Most symphonies employ three tympani tuned to different pitches.

NTRABASSOONIST Rober ilharmonic-Symphony e in the orchestra. His l

12-137

Philadelphia Orchestra i nstrument. The oboe ha rom Haydn to Stravinsky ky's instrument looks ade mainly of wood and the Chicago Symphony.

NewYork Philharmonic
kettledrums. Most symuned to different pitches.

NTRABASSOONIST Roberto Sensale of the New York ilharmonic-Symphony can play lower than anybody se in the orchestra. His lowest notes go as far down as the lowest ones on the piano keyboard. Most contrabassoonists begin as bassoonists and switch instruments later in life. Because of scarcity they are in great demand. A symphony orchestra without a contrabassoonist is as incomplete as a car without a carburetor. A contrabassoonist without a symphony orchestra sounds terrible.

THE CHICAGO SUN, MONDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1945

Koussevitzky Again Shows He's Master of Classics

By Felix Borowski.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared here for the second time this season at a concert given at Orchestra Hall yesterday, in which the conductor must again have impressed the public with the miracles which, in the course of 21 years, he has worked with his organization.

As in the performance last Friday, the rich tonal quality of the strings, the flexibility of the woodwind, the beautiful and unstrained sonority of the brass were outstanding features of an orchestra the like of which there cannot have been many in the history of musical art.

An Exacting Program.

The program, if less immediately interesting than that of the first concert, was in all respects more exacting; for it offered no highly colored novelty like Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony to give all possible opportunities to make an arresting effect.

Many famous orchestras, and as many famous conductors, have have worked their will with the E flat major symphony by Mozart, the third "Leonore" overture by Beethoven and the E minor symphony by Brahms. An interpretation of them obviously invites comparisons, but Mr. Koussevitzky was not to be intimidated by such an eventuality: nor, indeed, was there reason for him to be.

Mozart Played Admirably.

Mozart's symphony was admirably set forth.

The opening movement and the Andante were unerringly set in the frame of the true Mozartian style, and among many felicitous details, the pianissimo with which Mr. Koussevitzky negotiated the repetition of the subject of the Trio, inserted in the Minuet, was of bewitching loveliness.

The finale, however, was taken at an extraordinarily rapid tempo—too rapidly for the best effect, for the first violins, while they played every note with perfect articulation gave an impression of being unduly rushed.

A Superb 'Leonore.'

Beethoven's "Leonore" overture was given a superb reading. The floating tranquility with which the slow introduction was negotiated gave point to the agitated and dramatic music of the main movement. The opening subject of the latter was given out piano, as it should be, and Mr. Koussevitzky made much of the crescendo to lead into its sonorous repetition.

The work as a whole is filled with great moments of drama, and its director missed not one.

While there was not in Brahms' E minor symphony the exalted achievement which might cause all others to be forgotten, it was a fine one for all that.

Radicalism Avoided.

Mr. Koussevitzky attempted no radical departure from the traditional exegesis, but he was careful to provide the score with as much color as it would allow.

In this work, as in Beethoven's overture, the brass fortissimos were made the more effective because of the restraint with which, in general, the trumpets and trombones were handled.

CHICAGO DAILY NEWS.
12 Mon., Dec. 10, 1945.

Milwaukee In Tribute To Sibelius

BY ADELE HOSKINS.

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY.

THE 80TH BIRTHDAY of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, may have gone unsung and unnoticed in many corners of the earth Saturday, but not in Milwaukee. . . . It provided ABC with its most important musical broadcast of the year, attended by even network president, Mark Woods, and brought 6,000 music-minded Milwaukeeans to Municipal Auditorium. . . . They came to hear the Sibelius Second Symphony to be sure, and his tone poem, "Finlandia," but mostly to hear them played by the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

★ ★ ★

Heard over WCFL, the hour broadcast brought only half the concert to listeners, but it was the portion that Dr. Koussevitzky hopes the ailing Sibelius was able to hear in Finland. . . . The event was memorable, not because I was among the fortunate few from Chicago invited by Allis-Chalmers, sponsors of the program, to be present, but because the town made famous by beer and a chantootsie paid homage to the musical best of Boston and dedicated it to Finland's finest.

★ ★ ★

